RONDELET, JEAN, a reputable French architect and writer on the art, was born at Lyons in 1734. He studied at Paris, under Soufflot, and was employed by the latter to assist in the execution of the church of S. Genevieve. Soufflot having died in 1780, before its completion, Rondelet was commissioned to finish the edifice, to which the National Assembly gave the name of the French Pantheon. In 1783 he visited Italy for improvement, and made many designs and architectural researches. He was subsequently employed by government in various important commissions; was a member of the Academy of architecture, and professor of Stereometry. He published a large number of valuable writings on the art, among which are his Traité theoretique et pratique de l'Art de Batir; and a number of articles in the Encyclopedie Methodique. His various labors at length rendered him totally blind. He died in 1829.

RONDINELLI, NICCOLO, a painter born at Ravenna, about 1460. He studied under Giovanni Bellini, and assisted him in his works. His pictures were painted in the first manner of his instructor, but with greatly inferior abilities; the principal are in the churches and convents of his native city. He died, according to Vasari, at the age of 60.

RONDINOSI, ZACCARIA, a painter of Pisa, of whom there are notices from 1665 to 1680. According to Morrona, he executed some works for the churches of his native city.

RONDOLINO. See TEREZSI.

RONSERAY, MARGARETTA LOUISA AMELIA DU, a French lady, born at Paris in 1730. She executed a few etchings after the French masters, among which are Venus rising from the sea, after Bouchardon; The Fountain of Grenelle, from the cartoon by Pierre, for the church of S. Roch at Paris; a View of the Tower of Palmerana, after Cochin; a Sultan and a Sultana, after B. Picart.

RONTBOUT, J., a Dutch landscape painter, of whom little is known, though his pictures are quite common in Holland, and possess considerable merit. The landscape somewhat resembles the manner of Jacob Ruysdael, and the figures resemble those of Hobbema. He usually signed his pictures with his name, but sometimes with a monogram, resembling that of Ruysdael.

RONTBOUT, N., a painter of landscapes, highly commended by Pilkington. That author says he was of Flemish origin, and studied in Italy; but he is not mentioned by any of the Dutch or Flemish writers. Pilkington specifies only one picture by him, in the possession of Thos. Cobbe. Probably he is the same as the preceding artist.

RONZELLI, FABIO, a painter of Bergamo, who flourished, according to Tassi, about 1629, and executed some excellent works for the churches. Lanzi says, "if he was not sufficiently select and ideal, he was at least solid and robust." He commends his Martyrdom of St. Alessandro in the church of Santa Grata.

RONZELLI, PIETRO, a painter of Bergamo, probably the father of the preceding, concerning whom there are notices from 1588 to 1616. He is chiefly commended by Tassi for the excellence of his portraits.

ROODTSEUS, ALBERT, a Dutch portrait painter of little note, was born in 1590, and died at Hoorn in 1648.

ROODTSEUS, JOHN ALBERT, was the son of the preceding, born at Hoorn in 1615. After learning the rudiments of art, he studied with Peter Lastman, and became one of the most eminent portrait painters of his time. Some of his best pictures are said to equal the admirable productions of Bartholomew vander Helst. There are three large pictures by him in the Hall of the Society of Archers, in his native city, representing the portraits of the principal officers of that institution, executed with surprising truth and effect. He died in 1674.

ROODTSEUS, JACOB, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Hoorn in 1619. He studied with John David de Heem, and painted flowers and still-life in his style. His works approach the merit of the admirable productions of his instructor. He died in 1669.

ROOKER, EDWARD, an English designer and engraver, born at London about 1712. He possessed excellent talents for engraving architectural views, evinced by his large plate of the Section of St. Paul's Cathedral, from a drawing by Wale. Among other plates by him are four views in Italy, after Wilson; six Views in London, and twelve do. in England, after Paul Sandby.

ROOKER, MICHAEL ANGELO, was the son of the preceding, born at London about 1743. He studied engraving under his father, and landscape painting under P. Sandby. He painted the scenery for the Haymarket Theatre for several years, and engraved a series of Views of the city of Oxford, for the Oxford Almanacs, which possess considerable merit. He died in 1801.

ROORE, JACOB DE, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1686. His father was a goldsmith, and intended him for that occupation, but he died while Jacob was very young. His mother allowed him to follow the bent of his genius, and placed him under the instruction of Louis vander Bosch. He next studied two years with Nicholas van Schoor, and lastly with Gaspard Jacob van Opstal. He made such great progress under the last named master, that he copied for him a picture of St. Christopher by Rubens, to fulfil a commission from the court of France, with a precision and beauty that excited the surprise and satisfaction of his instructor, who scarcely had occasion to retouch it. At the age of twenty, he was admitted a member of the Academy of Antwerp. In the early part of his career, he painted history in the style of van Opstal, but possessing a happy talent for imitation, he adopted the subjects and manner of the younger Teniers, with such extraordinary success that he could scarcely execute all the commissions he received from the collections in Flanders, Brabant, and Holland. He was also much employed in embellishing the saloons of wealthy people, and the ceilings of the public edifices, distinguished for readiness of invention, and extraordinary facility of hand, although lacking that elegant taste of design which he might have acquired at Rome. Among his principal performances of this class were, the History of Achilles, Brennus besieging the Capitol, Antony presenting the crown to Julius Cæsar, and the History of Pandora, one of his most admired performances. His coloring is agreeable, and his easel pictures are executed with a free and spirited pencil, and delicately finished. He died at Antwerp in 1747.

ROOS, JOHN HENRY, an eminent Dutch painter of landscapes, figures and animals, and portraits, was born at Otterberg in 1631. He was the son of a poor weaver, who apprenticed him at the early age of nine years for the term of seven years, to a painter of little note, named Julian du Jardyn. He made little progress under this master, who employed him in drudgery, which was a part of the art quite uncongenial to his feelings. At the expiration of his indentures, he commenced studying under Adrian de Bie, an able designer of landscapes and animals, and soon manifested such extraordinary talent in painting landscapes, embellished with cattle, horses, sheep, goats, camels, and other animals, that he not only surpassed his instructor, but became one of the most celebrated animal painters of his time. He designed everything after nature with the utmost accuracy, and frequently placed his animals in attitudes the most singular and difficult to be represented. His landscape is pleasingly diversified with pleasant fields, woodlands, and shepherds' cots, or ruins more picturesque, rocks, mountains, and waterfalls, always adapted to the subject represented. His coloring is fresh and vigorous, his pencil firm and decided, and his conduct of the chiaro-scuro is excellent. For the most part he chose those sacred and historical subjects which admit of the greatest number and variety of animals, such as Jacob tending and Jacob driving his flocks and herds, Esau meeting his brother, Moses tending the flocks of Jethro, the Angel appearing to the Shepherds, &c. He was invited to the court of the Elector of Mentz, for whom he painted some of his choicest works. He also excelled in portraits, and painted those of that prince, and of the principal personages of his court, for which he was munificently rewarded. At the recommendation of his patron, he was employed in painting portraits at several of the courts of Germany; and had he been solely intent on the aggrandizement of his fortune, he would have confined himself to that lucrative pursuit, for his portraits deserved great admiration for their intrinsic excellence, and were rendered particularly attractive by the introduction of landscapes in the back-grounds, diversified with distant prospects of groves, hills, and groups of cattle, charmingly disposed, or incidents taken from sacred or profane history, giving force to the principal subject, and adding interest to the picture. But his predilection for his favorite subjects was not subdued by this seductive allurements, and having settled at Frankfort, he pursued his profession during the remainder of his life with the most flattering success. The Elector of Mentz honored him with a gold chain and medal, and several other princes testified their approbation by similar presents. In 1685, a dreadful fire broke out in the dead of night at Antwerp, and soon extended to the dwelling of Roos. While endeavoring to save a part of his valuables, he was suffocated, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. There are a considerable number of spirited and charming etchings by him, from his own designs. Bartsch gives a catalogue of thirty-nine; to which Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has added five more. The principal are a set of eight plates of Animals, dated 1665; a set of twelve plates of Domestic Animals; and several large plates of Landscapes, with ruins and animals, &c.

ROOS, THEODORE, was the brother of the preceding, born at Wezel in 1638. He first studied under Adrian de Bie, and afterwards with his brother, whom he assisted in his works till 1659, when he was invited to the court of Manheim, and taken into the service of the Elector. His first performance was a large picture, representing the principal magistrates of Manheim, still preserved in the Council Chamber. He afterwards visited several other courts of Germany, particularly those of Baden and Hanau, and found much encouragement in painting the portraits of distinguished personages. The Elector Palatine employed him to paint the portraits of the Duke and Duchess of Orleans, for which he was liberally remunerated, and honored with a gold medal and chain. The Duke of Wurtemberg employed him on several historical works, and appointed him his principal painter. The pictures of this artist are chiefly confined to Germany, where they are highly esteemed, particularly his portraits, which are said to possess the merit of perfect resemblance. His manner was broad and free, and his coloring clear and vigorous, but he was deficient in design, and his drawing is frequently incorrect. He executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs. Bartsch describes a set of six upright landscapes, with figures and ruins, dated 1667, and Weigel adds a Holy Family, in the Dresden Gallery, dated 1671. These prints are extremely scarce. He died in 1698.

ROOS, PHILIP, called ROSA DA TIVOLI, the son of John Henry R., was born at Frankfort in 1655. He early showed a passion for painting. Under the able instruction of his father he made great progress, and showed such extraordinary talents that the Landgrave of Hesse, in whose service the elder Roos was then engaged, took Philip under his protection, and sent him to Italy with a pension sufficient for his support. On his arrival at Rome, according to Lanzi, he commenced studying with Giacinto Brandi, whose daughter he afterwards married. He applied himself to his studies with such assiduity that he was regarded as the most laborious young artist of his time, and acquired a wonderful facility in design and execution, for which reason he was named Mercurius by the Bentvogel Society. A remarkable proof of this is recorded by C. le Blond, then a student at Rome. "It happened one day, that several young artists and myself were occupied in designing from the bassi-relievi of the Arch of Titus, when Roos passing by, was particularly struck with some picturesque object which had caught his attention, and he requested one of the students to accommodate him with a crayon and paper. What was our surprise when, in half an hour, he produced an admirable drawing, finished with accuracy and finesse." To facilitate his studies, he established himself at Tivoli (whence his name of Rosa da Tivoli), where he kept a kind of menagerie, and on account of the number and variety of the animals, his house was called Noah's Ark. He designed everything from nature, not only his animals, but the sites of his landscapes, ruins, buildings, rocks, rivers, &c.

His pictures usually represent pastoral subjects, with herdsmen and cattle, or shepherds with sheep and goats, which he frequently painted nearly as large as life. His groups are composed with great judgment and taste, and his landscape, back-grounds, skies, and distances, are treated in a masterly style. His cattle and animals, in particular, are designed with wonderful truth and spirit; his coloring is full of force, his lights and shadows are distributed with judgment, and his touch is remarkably firm, free and spirited. It is erroneously said by most of his biographers, that though he wrought with wonderful rapidity, yet his pictures show no appearance of negligence or inattention. There is indeed a wonderful difference in his works, as will readily be perceived by inspecting them, and by comparing the criticisms of the Dutch and Italian writers. The whole history of art does not show an example of such rapid execution, without its being accompanied with more or less defects, both in design and execution. In fact, the later productions of Rosa da Tivoli do not compare with his earlier works. He unfortunately fell into dissipated and extravagant habits, which frequently caused him great inconvenience; and, in order to supply his wants, he multiplied his pictures to such an extent as to depreciate their value. It is related that he would sit down, dispatch a large picture in a few hours, and send it directly to be sold, at any price; but his servant, possessing more discretion, usually paid him the highest price offered by the dealers, and kept the pictures himself, till he could dispose of them to more advantage. It is also related that Count Martinetz, the Imperial Ambassador, laid a wager with a Swedish General, that Roos would paint a picture of three-quarters size, while they were playing a game at cards; and in less than half an hour the picture was finished, though it consisted of a landscape, a figure, and several sheep and goats. Lanzi says, "we ought not to rest our decision of his merits on those hasty performances, which abound in Rome, but should examine his choicest pictures, conducted at his leisure, which are to be found in the galleries of princes." His best works are in the royal collections of Vienna, Dresden, and other cities of Germany, as well as in the best collections of Rome and Florence. There are also many of his works in England. Roos died at Rome in 1705. Huber says that he executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, which are extremely scarce.

ROOS, JOHN MELCHIOR, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Frankfort in 1659. After studying with his father, he went to Italy, and resided there several years. He afterwards returned to Germany, and settled at Nuremberg, where he painted history and portraits with considerable encouragement; but his taste leading him to landscapes and cattle, in the style of his brother, he soon devoted himself entirely to that branch. His principal patron was the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, who employed him for many years, and gave the commissions for some of his choicest works. Roos painted subjects similar to those of Philip, but his coloring and handling were very different; he lacked his agreeable coloring and free, flowing pencil, and he laid on his colors with a body that seemed more like modeling than painting. Yet his pictures, at a distance, have a natural appearance, and produce a fine effect. There is an etching of a Bull by him, signed J. M. Roos fec. 1685; the only one known, and extremely scarce. He died in 1731.

ROOS, JOSEPH, a German painter, born at Vienna in 1728. He painted landscapes and cattle with considerable reputation, and was much employed by the Elector of Saxony. He was chosen a member of the Academy of Dresden, and afterwards was appointed Keeper of the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. His principal works are in the castle of Schoenbrunn. He executed a few neat and spirited etchings from his own designs, among which are a set of six plates of various animals, and another of ten plates of sheep and goats.

ROPER, an English painter of sporting pieces, race horses, dogs, and dead game, who died about 1762.

ROSA, ANIELLA, or ANNELLA DI, a Neapolitan paintress, born at Naples, according to Dominici, in 1613. She first studied under her uncle, Francesco di Rosa, and afterwards with the Cav. Massimo Stanzioni; at the same time, Agostino Beltrano was her fellow-student, whom she married. They wrought together, and prepared many pictures, which their master afterwards finished, and sold as his own. Some pictures, however, pass under her own name, and are highly extolled, as the Birth and Death of the Virgin at the Pietà; not however without a suspicion that Stanzioni had a share in their execution. She left numerous original drawings, which prove that she had a good knowledge of design, and several cotemporaneous artists and writers extol her as an excellent artist.

She has been compared to Elizabeth Sirani for her talents, beauty, and tragical death; the fair Bolognese was inhumanly poisoned by some envious artist, and Aniella was murdered by a jealous husband in 1649.

ROSA, CRISTOFORO, a painter born at Brescia about 1520, and died of the plague at Venice in 1576. He excelled in painting perspective and architectural views, and lived upon terms of intimacy with Titian, who occasionally employed him to paint the architecture in some of his pictures. There are several of his works in the public edifices of Venice, particularly some perspective pieces, in the antechamber of the Library of St. Mark, so admirably executed that they deceive the eye by their relief, and surprise by their air of grandeur. He had a brother named Stefano, also an excellent painter in the same branch, who assisted him in his works. They established a school in their native city, which continued to flourish many years after their decease. They also executed many admirable works in oil and fresco, for the churches and public edifices of Brescia.

ROSA, PIETRO, was the son of Cristoforo R. He studied under Titian, and was instructed by him with great care, on account of his friendship for Pietro's father. This extraordinary care was rewarded with excellent results, and few artists have approached so near the admirable principles of coloring practised by that great master. He executed several works for the churches of Brescia, which gained him great reputation. Unfortunately for the art, he fell a victim to the plague in the flower of his life, in 1576, the year of his father's death.

ROSA, FRANCESCO, a Genoese painter, who flourished about 1670. According to Zanetti, he was a pupil of Pietro da Cortona. He painted several frescos and oil paintings for the churches, which Lanzi says show him to have been a follower of a different style; they resemble the works of Tommaso Luini and other dark mannerists of the age. He also painted in other cities. Lanzi says one of his best works is the Miracle of St. Anthony, in the church of the Frari at Venice, a grand composition of many figures, designed more in the style of the Caracci than of Cortona; displaying much knowledge of the naked figure, beautiful architecture, a fine effect of chiaro-scuro, with great vivacity in the heads.

ROSA, FRANCESCO DI, called also PACICCO or PACECCO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, was one of the ablest scholars of the Cav. Massimo Stanzioni. Lanzi says he is one of the few painters commemorated by Paolo de' Matteis, who never admits any inferior artists. "He declares the style of Rosa almost inimitable, not only from his correct design, but from the rare beauty of his extremities, and still more from the dignity and grace of his countenances. He had in his three nieces the most perfect models of beauty, and he possessed a sublimity of sentiment which elevated his mind to a high sense of excellence. His coloring, though conducted with exquisite sweetness, had a strong body, and his pictures preserve a fresh and clear tone." His style, like most of the scholars of Stanzioni, was founded on that of Guido, whose works he frequently copied, under the direction of his instructor, in the early part of his course. He lived to an advanced age, and executed a great many easel pictures, which are now preserved with high estimation in the collections of the Neapolitan nobility. He also painted some beautiful altar-pieces for the churches. He died at Naples in 1654.

ROSA, GIOVANNI, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1591. According to Soprani, he went early to Rome, and acquired great reputation for his exquisite paintings of landscapes and animals. Lanzi says he studied at Rome, and was a happy imitator of nature in her most agreeable forms, especially animals. "Many artists of this period attached themselves to the painting of animals. Castiglione distinguished himself in this line; but he resided for the most part of his time in another country. Giovanni Rosa of Flanders is the most known at Rome, and in the State, for the great number of his paintings of animals, in which he possessed extraordinary talent. It is said of him that he painted hares so naturally as to deceive the dogs, thus reviving the wonderful story of Zeuxis, so much boasted of by Pliny. Two of his largest and finest pictures are in the Bolognetti collection. We must not confound this artist with Rosa da Tivoli, also an excellent animal painter, but not so celebrated in Italy." He afterwards established himself at Genoa, where he left many works, taught some pupils, and died in 1638. This artist is not mentioned by any of the Dutch or Flemish writers, doubtless because he passed his whole artistic life in Italy.

ROSA, GIUSEPPE. This artist is briefly mentioned by Lanzi in a note to his life of Rosa da Tivoli, of whom he was a descendant. He was appointed Director of the Imperial Gallery at Vienna, and published a catalogue of the Italian and Flemish pictures in 1784.

R ROSA, SALVATORE. This celebrated painter was born at Renella, a small village near Naples, in 1615. His father, an architect and land surveyor, intended him for the church, and gave him a liberal education; but young Rosa left the Seminary of his own accord at the age of sixteen, and devoting himself to musical studies, became a skilful musician and a good composer. His eldest sister having married Francesco Francanzani, a painter of considerable talent, Salvator imbibed an inclination for painting from frequenting his studio, and commenced studying under his brother-in-law. There is so much fiction mingled with the early history of this great artist, that it is impossible to arrive at the truth. It is certain, however, that he passed his early days in poverty, that he was compelled to support himself by his pencil, that he exposed his juvenile performances for sale in the public markets, and often sold them to the dealers for the smallest prices. To the honor of Cav. Lanfranco, it is related that while riding in his carriage one day along the streets of Naples, he observed one of Salvator's pictures exposed for sale in a shop window, and surprised at the uncommon genius which it displayed, he purchased the picture, and inquired the name of the young artist. The picture-dealer, who had probably found Salvator's necessities quite profitable to himself, refused to communicate the desired information, whereupon Lanfranco directed his scholars to watch for his pictures, and seek him out. When he had found him, he generously relieved his wants, and encouraged him in the pursuit of his studies. After receiving some instructions from Aniello Falcone, an eminent painter of battle-pieces, he was admitted, through the influence of Lanfranco, into the academy of Giuseppe Ribera, called Il Spagnoletto, and remained there until the age of twenty, when he accompanied that master to Rome. The Cardinal Brancacci, having become acquainted with his merits at Naples, took him under his protection, and conducted him to his bishopric of Viterbo, where Salvator painted several historical works, and an altar-piece for the Cathedral, representing the Incredulity of St. Thomas. On his return to Rome, the prince Gio. Carlo de' Medici employed him to execute several important works, and afterwards invited him to Florence. During a residence of nine years in that city, he greatly distinguished himself as a painter, and also as a satirical and dramatic poet; his Satires, composed in Florence, have passed through several editions. His wit, lively disposition, and unusual conversational powers, drew around him many choice spirits, and his house was the great centre of attraction for the connoisseurs and literati of Florence. He fitted up a private theatre, and was accustomed to perform the principal parts in his comedies, in which he displayed extraordinary talents. He painted many of his choicest pictures for the Grand Duke, who nobly rewarded him; also for the noble family of the Maffei, for their palace at Volterra. After his return to Rome, he demanded exorbitant prices for his works, and though his greatest talent lay in landscape painting, he affected to despise that branch, being ambitious of shining as an historical painter. He painted some altar-pieces and other subjects for the churches, the chief of which are four pictures in S. Maria di Monte Santo, representing Daniel in the Lion's Den, Tobit and the Angel, the Resurrection of Christ, and the Raising of Lazarus; the Martyrdom of St. Cosimo and St. Damiano, in the church of S. Giovanni.

The brightest era of landscape painting is said with truth to have been in the time of pope Urban VIII., when flourished Claude Lorraine, Gaspar Poussin, and Salvator Rosa. Of these, Salvator was the most distinguished, though certainly not the best; each was the head of a perfectly original school, which had many followers, and each observed nature on the side in which he felt impelled to imitate her. The first admired and represented nature in her sweetest appearance; the second, in her most gorgeous array; and the third in her most convulsed and terrific aspects. Salvator Rosa painted history, landscape, battle-pieces, and sea-ports; and of these he was most eminent in landscape. The scholar of Spagnoletto, he attached himself to the strong natural style and dark coloring of that master, which well accords with his subjects. In his landscapes, instead of selecting the cultured amenity which captivates in the views of Claude or Poussin, he made choice of the lonely haunts of wolves and robbers; instead of the delightful vistas of Tivoli and the Campagna, he adopted the savage scenery of the Alps, rocky precipices, caves, with wild thickets and desert plains; his trees are shattered, or torn up by the roots, and in the atmosphere itself he seldom introduced a cheerful hue, except occasionally a solitary sunbeam. These gloomy regions are peopled with congenial inhabitants, ferocious banditti, assassins, and outlaws. In his marines, he followed the same taste; they represent the desolate and shelvy shores of Calabria, whose dreary aspect is sometimes heightened by terrific tempests, with all the horrors of shipwreck. His battles and attacks of cavalry also partake of the same principle of wild beauty; the fury of the combatants, and the fiery animation of the horses are depicted with a truth and effect that strikes the mind with horror. Notwithstanding the singularity and fierceness of his style, he captivates by the unbounded wildness of his fancy, and the picturesque solemnity of his scenes. "He gives us," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "a peculiar cast of nature, which, though void of grace, elegance, and simplicity, though it has nothing of that elevation and dignity which belongs to the grand style, yet has that sort of dignity which belongs to savage and uncultivated nature; but what is most to be admired in him is, the perfect correspondence which he observed between the subjects he chose, and his manner of treating them. Everything is of a piece; his rocks, trees, skies, even to his handling, have the same rude and wild character which animates his figures."

Although Salvator Rosa possessed a lively and inventive genius, his powers were better adapted to the scale of easel pictures than to more extensive compositions, with figures of large dimensions. "Owing to his frequent practice," says Lanzi, "he had more merit in his smaller than his larger figures. He was accustomed to insert them in his landscapes; and he composed his historical pictures in the same style as the Regulus, so highly praised, in the Colonna palace (this picture is now in the possession of the Earl of Darnley); also fancy subjects, as the Witchcrafts, specimens of which are to be seen in the Campidoglio, and in many private collections. In these he is never select, not always correct, but displays great spirit, freedom of execution, skill, and harmony of color. In other respects he has proved, on several occasions, that his genius was not confined to small compositions, evinced by some well conceived altar-pieces, executed with powerful effect, particularly when the subject demands an expression of terror, as in a Martyrdom of Saints in the church of S. Gio. de' Fiorentini at Rome, and in the Purgatory in S. Gio. delle Case Rotte at Milan. We have also some profane subjects by him, finely executed on a large scale; such is the Conspiracy of Catiline, in the possession of the noble family of Martelli in Florence, commended by Bottari as one of his best works." Salvator Rosa wrought with wonderful facility, and could paint a well finished landscape and insert all the figures in one day; it is impossible to inspect one of his bold, rapid sketches, without being struck with the fertility of his invention, and the skill of his hand that rivalled in execution the activity of his mind. He was also an excellent portrait painter. A portrait of himself is in the church degli Angeli, where his remains were interred, and he introduced his own portrait into several of his pictures, one of which is in the Chigi gallery, representing a wild scene with a poet in a sitting attitude (with the features of Salvator); before him stands a satyr, allusive to his satiric style of poetry. During his life-time, his works were much sought after by princes and nobles, and they are now to be found in the choicest collections of Italy and of Europe. There is a landscape in the English National Gallery which cost 1800 guineas; a picture in the collection of Sir Mark Sykes brought the enormous sum of 2100 guineas. Salvator Rosa also produced about ninety etchings from his own designs, executed in a spirited and masterly style. They are distinguished by intelligent management of the chiaro-scuro, and uncommon vivacity and expression in the heads. They are usually marked with a monogram of his initials, as above. He also sometimes signed his paintings with the same mark. The following are his principal prints. He died at Rome in 1673.

A set of sixty-two Prints of banditti, soldiers, and other figures; single and in groups. The Fall of the Giants. The Death of Attilius Regulus. The finding of Œdipus. Democritus meditating. The Execution of Polyxenes. Glaucus and Sylla. Jason charming the Dragon. Alexander with Apelles. Alexander and Diogenes. Diogenes throwing away his Bowl. Plato discoursing with his Disciples. Apollo and a Nymph. An allegorical subject; called The Genius of Salvator. A set of six Plates, in the form of friezes, representing Tritons, Sea Nymphs, &c.

ROSA, SIGISMONDO, a Roman painter, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. He studied under Giuseppe Chiari, and adopted his style. He was a reputable artist, and executed a few works for the churches, but mostly painted easel pictures.

ROSA, SISTO. See BADALOCCHIO.

ROSA, DA TIVOLI. See PHILIP ROOS.

ROSALBA, CARRIERA, a celebrated Italian paintress, born at Chiozza, near Venice, in 1675. She was instructed in art by Giovanni Diamantini, and practised oil painting for some time, but afterwards abandoned it for miniature and crayons, in which last branch she became very eminent. In 1709, Frederick IV., King of Denmark, passing through Venice, sat to her for his portrait, which she executed so much to his satisfaction that he ordered several copies, and subsequently employed her to paint the portraits of twelve Venetian ladies, for which he rewarded her with princely liberality. She visited Paris in company with Pellegrini, her brother-in-law, where she painted the royal family, the princes of the blood, and the principal personages of the court. She was elected a member of the French Academy, and presented, as her reception-piece, a picture of one of the Muses. She was subsequently employed at several of the courts of Europe, and everywhere left many proofs of her extraordinary ability. On returning to Venice, she continued to practise her profession with undiminished success until the age of seventy, when, from incessant application, her eyesight completely failed. Few artists have equalled Rosalba in crayon painting. Her portraits, especially those of females, are gracefully designed, full of life and spirit, exceedingly natural, with an agreeable resemblance to the persons represented. Her coloring is soft, tender, and delicate, her tints are clear and admirably blended. She died at Venice in 1757.

ROSALIBA, ANTONELLO, a Sicilian painter, who flourished at Messina in the first part of the 16th century. He executed some works for the churches, which, according to Hackert, are gracefully designed and well colored.

ROSASPINA, FRANCESCO, an eminent Italian engraver, born at Bologna in 1760. His instructor is not mentioned, but he was equally skilful in operating with the burin, in the chalk manner, and in aquatinta. His drawing is very correct, and his plates are beautifully executed, with a fine effect of chiaro-scuro; they are also esteemed for the fidelity with which he copied the expression and characteristics of his originals. Among his most esteemed prints are, the Dance of Cupids, after Albano; the Dead Christ, after Correggio; St. Francis, after Domenichino; Cupid bending his Bow, after Franceschini; several portraits of illustrious Italians; and a series of twenty-five prints, after Parmigiano, engraved in the crayon and tinted manner, in the finest taste. Rosaspina also engraved some of the Battles of Napoleon, after the designs of Appiani, in the style of bassi-relievi. He is also entitled to great credit for his able superintendence of the engraving and publishing of the work entitled La Pinacoteca, consisting of about seventy plates after the best paintings in the Academy of the Fine Arts at Bologna, of which institution he was professor. In these prints, the drawing and character of the originals are preserved with the greatest exactness. The time of his death is not recorded.

ROSATI, ROSATO, an Italian sculptor and architect, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. According to Milizia, he erected the church of the Jesuits in his native city, and the main portion of the church of S. Carlo de' Catenari at Rome, a Greek cross of one nave, with a cupola, to which was added a façade by Giovanni Battista Soria.

ROSE, NICHOLAS. See LIENAEKER.

ROSE, SUSAN PENELOPE, an English paintress of miniatures, who, according to Lord Orford, was the daughter of Richard Gibson, called the Dwarf. She was born in 1652, and died in 1700. Her miniatures were of unusually large size, and are said to have possessed considerable merit.

ROSEL, JOHN AUGUSTUS, a German painter of noble descent, born at Arnstadt in 1705. He at first practised as a miniature painter at Nuremberg, but afterwards devoted himself to the representation of insects, which he depicted with all the truth and accuracy of nature. He studied and wrote upon Entomology, and in 1746, published his celebrated work on that subject, entitled Insekten-Belustigungen, in 4 vols., 4to., illustrated with numerous plates from his own designs. He died at Nuremberg in 1759.

ROSELLI, NICCOLO, a painter who flourished at Ferrara about 1568. Baruffaldi supposes that he was a scholar of the Dossi, but Lanzi says this is quite uncertain, as he could imitate many different masters. He executed many works for the churches at Ferrara. In his altar-piece of Christ with two Angels, at the Battuti Bianchi, he followed the Dossi, but in his twelve altar-pieces at the Certosa, he imitated Benvenuto Garofolo, Il Bagnacavallo, and several other artists.

ROSELLINI, BERNARDO, a distinguished Italian architect, who flourished at Rome about 1450. He was highly esteemed by Pope Nicholas V., and was employed to execute many excellent edifices, among which were the church of S. Francesco at Fabriano; S. Benedetto, at Gualdo; and S. Francesco at Assisi. He also restored and embellished the Basilica of S. Giovanni Laterano, of S. Paolo, and S. Lorenzo without the walls, at Rome, and the Baths at Viterbo. By a commission from the same pontiff, Rosellini repaired a great part of the walls of Rome, furnished them with towers, strengthened the Castle of St. Angelo, and restored the fortifications at Civita Vecchia, Narni, and Spoleto. Nicholas was a munificent patron of the Fine Arts, and conceived the idea of an immense architectural work in the suburbs of Rome, which was designed by Rosellini. It included a magnificent temple to St. Peter, with superb palaces for the pope and cardinals, beautiful villas, gardens and fountains. The death of the pope, in 1455, prevented the execution of this splendid project.

ROSER, M., a German painter, born at Heidelberg in 1737. After learning the rudiments of art, he studied under Louthembourg. In 1764, he went to Paris, and chiefly devoted himself to copying the works of the Flemish painters, which he did with great success. His happy talent of imitating the touch and coloring of different masters, peculiarly fitted him for repairing ancient pictures, in which he met with considerable employment. He restored Raffaele's painting of the Virgin of Foligno, and several works by Correggio, Titian, and other great masters. He died at Paris in 1804.

ROSETTI, DOMENICO, a painter and engraver, born at Venice about 1690. It is not known under whom he studied. He painted perspective and architectural pieces with considerable success, but is chiefly known by his works as an engraver. He was invited by the Elector Palatine to Dusseldorf, where he engraved twelve large plates of the History of Alexander, after the works of Gerard Lairesse; these prints are now very scarce, as few impressions were taken. He executed some of the plates for a collection of prints after the most celebrated pictures at Venice, published by Domenico Louisa in that city, in 1720. He is said to have engraved a set of plates for a History of the Bible, printed at Venice in 1696; also a variety of plates after Palma Vecchio, Bassano, Tintoretto, P. Liberi, and others. Some of these bear a still earlier date, and Zani says he operated in 1675. He died about 1760. It is probable from the above dates, that there were two engravers of this name.

ROSI, ALESSANDRO, a Florentine painter, born, according to Orlandi, in 1627. He studied under Cesare Dandini, and painted history with considerable reputation. He executed several works for the churches of Florence, and in the state, but painted more for the collections. In the cathedral at Prato, is a fine picture by him, of St. Francesco di Paolo, and in the collection of the Grand Duke, are two Bacchanalian subjects, executed with great beauty and spirit. He died at Florence in 1697.

ROSI, ZANONI, a Florentine painter, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. According to Baldinucci, he studied under Cristofano Allori, whose style he closely imitated, and at the death of that master, he completed some of his unfinished works. Lanzi says he never obtained any reputation for originality of invention, but he was one of those artists to whom we owe the duplicates of Allori's most celebrated pictures, numerous in Florence, and over all Italy.

ROSI, GIOVANNI, a Florentine painter of landscapes, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. Baldinucci says he closely imitated Gaspere Falgani, which see.

ROSIGNOLI, JACOPO, a painter born at Leghorn, of whom little is known. According to Lanzi, his works are frequently to be met with in Piedmont, resembling the style of Pierino del Vaga, especially in his grotesques. He attained sufficient reputation to be appointed painter of the court at Turin, where he died in 1604. He was buried in the church of S. Tommaso, and a monument, with a laudatory epitaph, was erected to his memory.

ROSITI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter of Forli, who flourished about 1500. Lanzi mentions only one picture by him, well designed and colored, in the church of S. Maria dell'Orto, at Vetrari, representing the Virgin with the Infant Jesus in her arms. It is signed Jo. Baptista de Rositis de Forlivo pinxit, I. S. O. O. de Mense Martii, 1500.

ROSLER, MICHAEL, an obscure German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg in the first part of the 17th century. He engraved several plates for a folio volume, published in that city in 1626, entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum.

ROSS, JAMES, an English engraver, who flourished about 1778. He engraved some views of the city of Hereford, neatly executed; also some plates after drawings by G. Powle.

ROSSELLI, COSIMO, a Florentine painter, born about 1416, who acquired great distinction without possessing commensurate merit. There is much discrepancy about his history, and his instructor is not mentioned. After acquiring considerable reputation in his native city, he was invited to Rome by Sixtus IV., to assist in ornamenting the Sistine chapel, in conjunction with Domenico Ghirlandajo, Pietro Perugino, Sandro Botticelli, and other eminent artists. Lanzi says of his works at Rome, "Being unable to rival his competitors in design, he loaded his pictures with brilliant colors and gilded ornaments, which practice, though condemned at that time by an improving taste, yet pleased the pontiff, who commended and rewarded him beyond all other artists. Perhaps his best work there is Christ preaching on the Mount, in which the landscape is said to be the work of Pier di Cosimo, a painter more remarkable for his coloring than his design, as is evident from his picture in the church of the Innocents, and his Perseus, in the Florentine gallery. They are both, however, celebrated in history, Rosselli, as the master of Baccio della Porta, and Cosimo, of Andrea del Sarto." Most of the works Rosselli executed in Florence have perished; there is, however, a fresco in the church of S. Ambrogio, representing the Miracle of the Sacrament, full of fine portraits, which discover variety, character, and truth. Lanzi says he was living in 1496; Zani, that he died in 1506; others, that he was born in 1416, and died in 1484. Pier di Cosimo was born in 1441, and died in 1521, which see.

ROSSELLI, MATTEO, a Florentine painter, born in 1578. He first studied with Gregorio Paganì, and afterwards with Passignano, whom he accompanied to Rome, and gained improvement by studying the works of Raffaele, Polidoro da Caravaggio, and other masters. On finishing his studies he returned to Florence, where he passed the remainder of his life, and acquired so much reputation, that he was invited to the court of the Duke of Modena. He remained, however, in the service of Cosimo II., Grand Duke of Tuscany, by whom he was much employed; he embellished his palace of the Villa di Coggio with several fine frescos, representing the history of the family of the Medici. He also executed many works for the churches and public edifices. The works of Rosselli are not distinguished by the vigorous design and animated expression which characterize the productions of some Florentine artists. His merit lies in correctness of design, and a close imitation of nature, with a peculiar harmony pervading the whole, which render his pictures agreeable and attractive, even when compared with works of the most brilliant coloring. He excelled in dignity of character; some of the heads of his apostles so strongly resemble the works of the Caracci, that even connoisseurs have sometimes been deceived. At other times he imitated the style of Lodovico Cardi, called Cigoli, as seen in his fine picture of the Nativity, in S. Gaetano, considered his most capital performance, and the martyrdom of St. Andrea at the Ognissanti, which has been engraved. His fresco paintings are greatly admired, and preserve their brilliancy, even to the present time. In the cloister of the Nunziata, are several semi-circular pieces by him, representing Alexander IV. confirming the Order of the Servi, which were considered grand productions by Passignano and Cortona. He opened a school at Florence, and instructed many pupils. Lanzi says he had few equals in the art of teaching; he possessed a remarkable talent for communicating instruction, and a judicious method of discovering the talents of each pupil and of directing his studies accordingly, so that his school, like that of the Caracci, produced almost as many different styles as he had scholars; he also preserved a fatherly regard for his pupils, who greatly loved and respected him. He died in 1650.

ROSSET, JOSEPH, a French sculptor, born at St. Claude, in Franche Comté, in 1706. He acquired a knowledge of the art without a master, by studying and modeling various works of sculpture. He was patronized by Voltaire, and executed several busts of that celebrated author. His subjects are principally of a religious character, some executed in ivory; among them are a number of beautiful statues of the Virgin; and one of St. Jerome, highly praised by Falconet, who supposed from its excellence, that the artist had studied in Italy. Rosset practised the art for many years in his native place, and died in 1786.

ROSSETTI, CESARE, a painter born at Rome, who, according to Baglioni, studied under Giuseppe Cesari, whom he assisted in many of his works, and whose manner he adopted. He also executed many works of his own for the churches, as well as for the collections. He flourished about 1630.

ROSSETTI, GIOVANNI PAOLO, a painter born at Volterra, who flourished about 1568. He was a nephew of Daniele Ricciarelli, with whom he studied at Rome, and, according to Vasari, painted history with considerable reputation. After the death of his uncle, he returned to Volterra, where he executed some altar-pieces for the churches, one of the most esteemed of which is the Descent from the Cross in S. Dalmasio. Zani says he operated in 1600.

ROSSETTI, PAOLO, a painter of Cento, who, according to Baglioni, was an eminent painter in mosaic, and executed many beautiful works. He died in 1621, at an advanced age.

ROSSETTI. See ROVERE.

ROSSI, ANDREA, an Italian engraver, born at Rome in 1726, and died in 1790. He engraved several portraits of Popes and royal personages, and other subjects after various Italian masters, among which are the portraits of the Emperor Joseph II. of Austria, and the Archduke Leopold, after Pompeo Battoni; a Bust of the Virgin, after Carlo Dolci, and St. Margaret of Cortona, after Pietro da Cortona.

ROSSI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Bologna in 1700. He was the favorite disciple of the Cav. Marc' Antonio Franceschini, who recommended him, in preference to his other pupils, to execute many of the commissions which he was obliged to decline on account of his constant occupation. He executed numerous works for the churches and public edifices at Bologna, one of the most esteemed of which is the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, in S. Domenico. He was much employed in decorating with his figures, the architectural and perspective pieces of Orlandi and F. Brizzio. He died, according to Crespi and Lanzi, in 1753; others place his birth in 1697, and death in 1750.

ROSSI, ANIELLO, a Neapolitan painter, born about 1660, and died in 1719. According to Dominici, he was one of the favorite scholars of Luca Giordano, whose style he adopted. He accompanied his instructor to Spain, assisted him in the execution of his numerous works at Madrid, and returned with him to Naples, with a pension from the king that enabled him to pass the rest of his days in leisure and independence.

ROSSI, ANTONIO, called DE RUBEIS, a painter of the Venetian school, who, according to Lanzi, was a native of Cadore, flourished in the latter part of the 15th century, and from various authorities found in that city, is supposed to have been the instructor of Titian. He describes three pictures by him, inferior in design to Jacopo Bellini, though similar in style, and perhaps equal to the works of that master in elegance of coloring.

ROSSI, or ROSSIS, ANGELO, a Florentine painter, born in 1742. It is not mentioned under whom he studied, but according to Lanzi, he acquired distinction as an architectural and ornamental painter, and was much employed at Florence, Bologna, and at Venice.

ROSSI, D. ANGELO, a painter born in the Genoese territory, according to Ratti, in 1694, and died in 1755. Lanzi says he was the most distinguished scholar of Domenico Parodi, and a good follower of the style of Carlo Maratti. He executed but few works for the churches, but excelled in painting easel pictures of humorous subjects.

ROSSI, CARLO ANTONIO, a Milanese painter, born, according to Orlandi, about 1580, and died in 1648. He was educated in the school of the Procaccini, and executed some works for the churches, especially in the cathedral of Pavia, "painted in the best Procaccini taste." He is described in the Abbecedario, as an eccentric man, but well versed in his art.

ROSSI, ENEA, a Bolognese painter, who flourished about 1600, and, according to Malvasia, studied in the school of the Caracci. He was a skilful artist, and executed some fine works for the churches at Bologna and in the state.

ROSSI, FRANCESCO. See SALVIATI.

ROSSI, GABRIELE, a Bolognese painter of architecture and perspective, who flourished, according to Baruffaldi, about 1650. He attained eminence in that branch in his day, but his works have mostly perished. He was the instructor of Francesco Ferrari.

ROSSI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, called IL GOBBINO (humpback), a painter of Verona, who, according to Pozzo, was an excellent disciple of Alessandro Turchi, surnamed Orbetto. He executed several works for the churches of Verona, but painted more for the collections. He flourished about 1630.

ROSSI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Rovigo about 1627, and died about 1680. He studied under Dario Varotari, called Padovanino, and adopted his style. He executed a few works for the churches at Padua and Venice, which are extolled by Boschini, but was mostly employed in painting for the collections.

ROSSI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Roman engraver, who flourished about 1640. He published in that year a set of perspective views of Rome.

ROSSI, GIOVANNI STEFANO, a Genoese painter, born in 1719. He studied successively under Semini, Sorri, and Strozzi. He acquired considerable reputation, as a painter of history, and executed some works for the churches and convents. He died at Genoa in 1769.

ROSSI, GIROLAMO, a painter born at Brescia, who flourished about 1640. He is supposed from his style, to have studied under Camillo Rama, whose style he imitated, as appears from his altar-piece of the Virgin between various Saints, in the church of S. Alessandro, in his native city. Lanzi says he was either a pupil or an imitator of Rama, and displayed that master's manner better than any of his other pupils.

ROSSI, GIROLAMO, a Bolognese painter and engraver, who, according to Malvasia, was a pupil of Flaminio Torre, and flourished about 1660. Lanzi says he succeeded better in engraving than in painting. Perhaps he is the same as the following artist, though the accounts do not agree.

ROSSI, GIROLAMO, called DE RUBEIS THE ELDER, a painter and engraver, born at Rome about 1630. He studied at Bologna, under Simone Cantarini. Little is said of his works as a painter; he executed some spirited etchings after the Italian masters, which are marked Hieronimus de Rubeis pictor, delineavit incidit, or fecit. Bartsch asserts that his etchings amount only to six, but more are described by other writers.

ROSSI, GIROLAMO, called DE RUBEIS THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding; born at Rome about 1680. He studied with his father, and executed a number of plates after various Italian masters, also several for a set of portraits of the Cardinals of his time, which was afterwards continued by Pazzi, and others. His plates are engraved in a feeble style. Nagler gives a list of twenty-one prints by him. Zani says he operated as late as 1749.

ROSSI, LORENZO, a Florentine painter, who, according to Orlandi, was a pupil of Pietro Dandini. He did not follow the style of that master, but painted elegant small pictures, following the manner of Livio Mehus, which see. He died at Florence in 1702.

ROSSI, MUZIO, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1626. According to Crespi, he studied with the Cav. Massimo Stanzioni, and afterwards entered the academy of Guido at Bologna. He possessed such extraordinary talents, that, at the age of eighteen, he was employed in competition with the first masters at the Certosa, where he painted an altar-piece of the Nativity, which was considered a prodigy of youthful ability, and is still held in high estimation. On his return to Naples, he was employed to paint the Tribune of St. Pietro in Majella, which he did not live to complete. He died in the flower of his life, deeply lamented, in 1651.

ROSSI, NICCOLO MARIA, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1645. According to Dominici, he studied under Luca Giordano, and became an excellent designer and colorist in the style of that master. He painted the ceiling of the Royal chapel, assisted by the designs of Giordano. He executed some works for the churches, which are commended in the Guida di Napoli, particularly several fine paintings in distemper, in Santi Sepolcri and Quarantore. There are several of his easel pictures in the collections, which are much esteemed for their correctness of design and spirited execution; he excelled in his representations of animals, in which branch he was considered next to the Cav. Giuseppe Recco. He died at Naples in 1700.

ROSSI, PASQUALE, called PASQUALINO DA VICENZA, a painter born at Vicenza in 1641. According to Orlandi, he reached a respectable rank in historical painting, without the aid of a master, by studying the works of the best Roman and Venetian painters; but he early left his native city and passed many years at Rome, where he executed many excellent works for the churches, and is classed by Lanzi with the painters of the Roman school. Among his most esteemed pictures, are Christ praying in the Garden, in S. Carlo al Corso, and the Baptism of Christ, in S. Maria del Popolo at Rome; the Madonna and Child, at the Silvestrini in Fabriano, which Lanzi says is truly beautiful, and a picture of St. Gregory liberating souls from Purgatory, in the Cathedral at Matelica, one of his best works, executed in the style of Guercino. He also painted many cabinet pictures, representing gaming parties, conversations, concerts, and similar subjects, which are esteemed in the best collections. Lanzi says, "they are carefully finished, and little inferior to the Flemish pictures. I have met with numerous specimens of his cabinet pictures in various places, but in no place have I admired this artist so much as in the Royal gallery at Turin, where are several of his works, some of them of considerable size, chiefly scriptural subjects, executed in an animated and vigorous style, and with so much of the Roman school, that one would think them to be by some other master." Lanzi and several other writers say he was living in 1718; Zani, that he died in 1725; others place his death in 1700, but there are pictures by him bearing a later date.

ROSSI, JOHN CHARLES FELIX, an eminent English sculptor, was the son of an Italian of Siena, a resident of Nottingham, and was born in that town in 1762. He first studied sculpture under Luccatella, and afterwards visited London for improvement. He entered the Royal Academy as a student, and in 1781 gained the silver medal; in 1784 he drew the gold medal, which entitled him to a residence of three years at Rome, with a snitable pension. He went to Italy the succeeding year, where he studied with great assiduity, and in 1788 returned to England. He soon attained distinction, and received several commissions which decided his excellence. In 1800 he was chosen an Associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1802, a member. He executed many works of a classical description, as well as several celebrated monuments. Among the first, are a marble statue of Mercury, executed at Rome; a recumbent statue of Eve; Musidora; Zephyrus and Aurora; and Venus and Cupid. Sir Robert Peel owned his statue of the poet Thomson; and in the Exchange at Liverpool, is his statue of Britannia. These, however, are not the works by which Rossi is best known. His style is not remarkable for refinement of taste or delicacy of execution, but is distinguished for vigor and grandeur of effect. His peculiar talents are best displayed in his noble monuments in St. Paul's cathedral, upon which his reputation chiefly rests. They are the monuments of Lord Cornwallis, in the nave; Captain Faulkner, and Lord Heathfield, in the south transept; Lord Rodney, Capt. Riou and Capt. Mosse, in the north transept. The principal of these are those of Lords Cornwallis, Heathfield, and Rodney, and of Capt. Faulkner; all of which, excepting the second, are groups of three or more figures of the heroic size, in a grand style. The statue of Cornwallis stands on a pedestal forming the apex of a pyramid; below are three allegorical figures, Britannia, and impersonifications of the rivers Begareth and Ganges, denoting the British empire in the East. Lord Heathfield's is a single statue, represented in his regimentals; on the pedestal is an alto-relievo of Victory, descending from a castellated rock to crown a warrior on the sea-shore with laurel. In the monument to Capt. Faulkner, Neptune is represented seated upon a rock, in the act of catching the naked figure of a dying sailor, while Victory is about to crown him with laurel. Lord Rodney's monument is a pyramidal group, the statue of the Admiral forming the apex; below is Fame communicating with History.

Rossi was appointed sculptor to the Prince Regent, and was employed at Buckingham Palace. He was subsequently appointed sculptor to King William IV. He died in 1839.

ROSSI, ANGELO DE, an Italian sculptor, born at Genoa in 1671. He studied under Filippo Parodi, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement. He gained considerable reputation in that city, and was chosen a member of the Academy of St. Luke. Among his principal works, are a part of the sculptures of the Mausoleum of Alexander VII., in St. Peter's. His admirable bas-relief, which decorates this monument, was so highly esteemed by Louis XIV., that he ordered a model of it to be placed in the French Academy at Rome, as a study for the scholars. Among the other works of Rossi, are a number of sculptures in the chapel of S. Ignazio in the church del Gesu at Rome. He died in 1715.

ROSSI, MATTEO DE, an eminent Italian architect, born at Rome in 1637. He was the son of Marc' Antonio Rossi, a reputable architect, from whom he received some instructions, and afterwards entered the school of Bernini, who esteemed him more highly than any of his other disciples. Selected to accompany that master to France, he assisted him in all of his principal works, and shared in his honors and rewards. He was also employed by Clement IX., at Lamporecchio, and upon the church of the Scolopi, at Monterrano. His style was characterized by correctness of design, lively imagination, and excellent taste. At the death of Bernini, Rossi succeeded, according to Milizia, to the greater part of his employments, particularly to the appointment of architect of St. Peter's. He executed many works at Rome, such as the sepulchre of Clement X., in the Vatican temple; the façade of the church of Santa Galia; the custom house of Ripa Grande; and the Palazzo Monte Citorio. For the Prince Pamfili he built the cathedral of Valmontone. Rossi was greatly esteemed by Pope Innocent XII., and was presented by him with the cross of the order di Cristo. He died in 1695.

ROSSI, GIUSEPPE DE, a distinguished Italian architect and writer upon the art, was born at Rome in 1760. He was probably a descendant of Matteo de Rossi, as the Biographie Universelle says that his father and grand-father were both architects. While very young he was taken to Florence, where he acquired a knowledge of the art, and attained considerable distinction in the employment of Leopold I., the Grand Duke of Tuscany. In 1790 he visited Rome for improvement. The city of Siena, in 1798, having been seriously injured by an earthquake, Rossi was commissioned to superintend the principal restorations. At Florence, he restored the Palazzo Vecchio, the aqueducts, the Theatre, two towers of St. Maria Novella, a college, and a number of fountains. At Fiesole, he restored the ancient church of S. Fiesole. Rossi was appointed Professor of Architecture in the Florentine Academy, and was made a cavalier of the order of St. Giuseppe. His writings on the art are very numerous. He died in 1831.

ROSSI, GIO. ANTONIO DE, an Italian architect, the son of Lazzaro de' Rossi, was born at Rome in 1616. According to Milizia, he received the first rudiments of architecture from an obscure master; and, although defective in the elements of design, he attained considerable excellence by studying and copying the finest Roman edifices. His style of architecture was grand; he was ingenious in the distribution of his lights, in the solidity of his ornaments, and in adapting his building to its situation, to which, though it were really narrow, he succeeded in giving the appearance of much greater extension. He was much employed at Rome, and erected many works, such as the Palazzo d'Este, now called the Rinuccini, the façade of which is esteemed a masterpiece of art. He also erected the majestic Palazzo Altieri, on the Piazza Gesu, which is justly deemed one of the finest edifices in Rome. Among his other works, are the Palazzi Astalli and Muti, near the Capitol; the Hospital delle Donne, at St. Giovanni Laterano; the church of S. Pantaleo; and the elegant chapel of the Monte della Pietà. Rossi died at Rome in 1695.

ROSSMAESSLER, JOHN AUGUSTUS, a German designer and engraver, born at Leipsic in 1752. He studied under Frederick Oeser, and engraved a great variety of vignettes and other book-plates, which are admired for the spirit and neatness of their execution. He also engraved a set of Views in the environs of Leipsic. He died in the flower of his life, much regretted, in 1783.

ROSSO, IL, called by the French MAITRE ROUX, was an eminent painter, born at Florence in 1496. It is not known from whom he received his first instructions, but by the efforts of his own genius, he arrived at distinction. He was intimate with Andrea del Sarto, and admired his manner. Lanzi says he was the most eminent disciple of his school, though he never studied with him as a pupil. He afterwards gained improvement by studying the works of Michael Angelo and Parmiggiano. Endowed with a ready invention, he scorned to be a servile imitator, even of Buonarotti, and at an early age he ventured to compete with the ablest of his cotemporaries in the cloister of La Nunziata, where he painted a picture of the Assumption of the Virgin, less distinguished for elegance and grace than for its great dimensions, and novel and intrepid style. After painting several other works for the churches of Florence, particularly the Marriage of the Virgin in S. Lorenzo, he went to Rome, where his talents were already known, and was commissioned to paint an altar-piece for the church of S. Maria della Pace, and the Decollation of St. John, for that of S. Salviati. These works increased his reputation; but the sacking of Rome by the Spaniards in 1527, compelled every eminent artist to quit that city, and Il Rosso sought refuge at Volterra, where he painted a picture of the Deposition from the Cross, one of his finest productions, for the Oratorio di St. Carlo. He next went to Venice, where he painted for Pietro Aretino, his celebrated picture of Mars and Venus, which was engraved by his disciple Domenico del Barbieri. Not meeting in Italy with the success he anticipated, he resolved to go to the court of Francis I. of France, who at that time was the great patron of art. He met a favorable reception from that monarch, who immediately engaged him in his service, and as he was skilled in architecture, he appointed him superintendent of the great works at the palace of Fontainebleau. He built the great gallery in that palace, and decorated it with twenty-four pictures, emblematic of the principal actions in the life of Francis I., some of which were subsequently destroyed to make way for the works of Primaticcio.

The style of Il Rosso, though singular, is characterized by grandeur, much originality, and dignity of character, animated expression in his heads, a tasteful arrangement of his draperies and ornaments, lively coloring, free and firm pencilling, with a broad and effective distribution of his light and shadow. The works of Il Rosso are very scarce, as he did not execute many in Italy, and those in France are confined to the palace of Fontainebleau. Thirteen of the latter still remain, and are fully described by the Abbé Guget, in his Memoir on the Royal Academy of France. Of these, the most remarkable is Ignorance banished by Francis I.; a picture that has been several times engraved. He was assisted in these works by several artists, among whom were Domenico del Barbieri, Bartolomeo Miniati, and Luca Penni. The death of Il Rosso happened from a singular circumstance, when he was in full possession of royal favor and public estimation. He had contracted a friendship with Francesco Pellegrini, a Florentine painter, who paid him frequent visits. His house happening to be robbed of a considerable sum, he suspected his friend, and rashly accused him of the robbery; Pellegrini was put to the rack to extort confession, but he endured the torture with heroic fortitude, constantly protesting his innocence, and was acquitted. Pellegrini then published an account of his case, and appealed for justice; whereupon Il Rosso, struck with shame and remorse, poisoned himself in 1541. See Primaticcio.

NR or M.  ROTA, MARTINO, an eminent engraver, born at Sebenico, in Dalmatia. His instructor is not mentioned, and there is much contradiction about the time of his birth; the dates on his prints range from 1558 to 1586. He passed most of his artistic life at Rome and Venice. His design of the figure is remarkably correct, and his extremities are drawn with great precision. His plates are executed entirely with the graver; and though not very highly finished, they are wrought in a neat, clear style. Bartsch describes 114 prints by him, and considers it a complete list. His most celebrated print is the Last Judgment, after Michael Angelo, which is held in the highest estimation, not only for its neatness of execution, but for its faithful representation of the drawing, expression, and other characteristics of the original; it is inscribed Martinus Rota, 1569. This admirable plate has been very closely copied by Leonard Gaultier, though the copy may be easily distinguished by the inferiority of its execution, and by the small oval portrait of Angelo at the top, the face of which is turned towards the left, but in the original towards the right. There is also another inferior copy by J. Wierix. Some of Rota's plates are from his own designs, but the majority are after the principal Italian painters. He sometimes marked his plates with his name in full, with and without the date, and sometimes with the monogram composed of the letter M, with a wheel, which is the Latin signification of Rota. The following are among his most esteemed plates:

ROTAMER. See JOHN ROTTENHAMER.

ROTARI, CONTE PIETRO, a painter of a noble family, born at Verona in 1707. He first studied design merely as an accomplishment, but he became so passionately attached to art, that he entered the school of Antonio Balestra, who, perceiving his talents, took unusual care in his instruction, and foretold his future excellence. Rotari remained with Balestra till the age of eighteen, and then went to Venice, where he spent two years in studying and copying the works of Titian and Paul Veronese. In 1727 he went to Rome, entered the school of Francesco Trevisani, and devoted four years to the study of the antique, and the works of the best masters. From Rome he travelled to Naples, to profit by the advice of Francesco Solimena, with whom he resided three years. By this course of study he acquired an elegant taste of design and composition, an uncommon correctness of drawing, and a very beautiful style of coloring, unsurpassed by any artist of his time. At first he confined himself to works for the churches, which gained him great applause, and princes soon became solicitous to possess his pictures. He visited some of the principal courts of Europe, and was every where received with the respect due to his talents. At Dresden he painted the portraits of the Electoral and Imperial family. At Vienna, his works gave so much satisfaction to the Emperor, that he ordered Rotari's portrait to be painted, and placed in the Florentine gallery. At St. Petersburg, he painted the Empress Catherine, and other members of the Imperial family; was appointed her principal painter, and received many marks of favor. He continued in the Imperial service the remainder of his life, and painted for the Empress, several subjects from sacred and profane history. He died at St. Petersburg in 1762. His most admirable works in Italy are the Annunciation at Guastalla, and the Birth of the Virgin at Padua. He executed several etchings from his own designs, and after Antonio Balestra, among which are the following:

The Portrait of Filippo Baldinucci. 1726. St. Francis kneeling before a Crucifix; from his own design. The Education of the Virgin; do.

ROTTENHAMER, JOHN, a German painter, born at Munich in 1564. He received his first instruction from an obscure artist in his native city, named Donnaver, and afterwards went while young to Rome. He there distinguished himself by his small paintings on copper, delicately pencilled and agreeably colored; and at length he received a commission to paint a large picture, representing several Saints, with a glory of Angels. The ability he displayed on this occasion excited universal surprise, and inspired him with a strong desire to distinguish himself as a grand historical painter. To improve himself in coloring, he proceeded to Venice, where he made the works of Tintoretto his model, and imitated his style with great success. He painted in that city the Annunciation, in the church of S. Bartolomeo, and a picture of St. Christina in the Hospital of the Incurabili; and probably some works for individuals. The Duke of Mantua next employed him in several considerable works, the most admired of which was one representing a Dance of Nymphs. After a residence of many years in Italy, he returned to his own country with a high reputation, and established himself at Augsburg, where he received abundant employment from private individuals. His most remarkable work at Augsburg is an altarpiece in the church of the Holy Cross, representing an Assemblage of Saints, considered one of his most capital performances. He was patronized by the Emperor Rodolph II., for whom he painted an admirable picture, representing the Feast of the Gods, a grand composition of many figures, gracefully designed, with the rich coloring of the Venetian school.

Rottenhamer painted both in oil and fresco, preferring the latter for his great works. Though he had studied many years in Italy, he never entirely divested himself of the German taste; his design is formal and mannered, and frequently incorrect. He was fond of decorating his pictures with rich and splendid accessories, and of introducing the naked figure, which he piqued himself on designing with taste and coloring with delicacy. He had a lively invention, and usually made choice of agreeable subjects; his attitudes are graceful, and the airs of his heads expressive, though not sufficiently varied. His best works are his small cabinet pictures, often on copper, in which the back-grounds were frequently painted by John Breughel, and sometimes by Paul Brill; these are the most esteemed, and in his life-time commanded very high prices. Rottenhamer, notwithstanding his professional merits and abundant employment, died at Augsburg in 1606, so extremely poor from his reckless extravagance, that his funeral expenses were defrayed by some of his brother artists. His name is frequently written Rottenhamer, and the Italian writers call him Rò, Rotamer, and Rothenamer.

ROUBILLIAC, LOUIS FRANÇOIS, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Lyons about the commencement of the 18th century. He probably acquired a knowledge of the art in his native country; after which he visited England, and was first employed to execute several busts for Trinity College, Dublin, at the recommendation of Sir Edward Walpole, who afterwards procured him the commission for the monument of John, Duke of Argyle. In the latter work he was so successful that his claims to the honors of the profession were at once admitted, and he received a great many commissions, so as to surpass in his practice the most distinguished artists of his time. Among his principal works are the monuments of Mr. Nightingale and his lady; the statue of Eloquence in the Argyle monument; the draped figure in Bishop Hough's monument; and the statue of Sir Isaac Newton. These productions evince great fertility of invention, truth of expression, and finished execution; but they are deficient in the repose, unity, and simplicity, essential to lasting remembrance. In the statue of Newton, the drapery is divided into many folds, and the attitude of the figure is by no means that of a philosopher. Among the other works of Roubilliac, is the monument of Sir Peter Warren, which, with the two others above mentioned, is in Westminster Abbey; also that of the Duke and Duchess of Montague, in Northamptonshire; the statue of Handel, the Composer, in Westminster Abbey; that of George II., in Golden Square, London; those of the Duke of Somerset, George I., and Sir Isaac Newton, at Cambridge. He also executed numerous busts. Roubilliac died in 1762.

ROULLET, JEAN LOUIS, an eminent French engraver, born at Arles, in Provence, in 1645. He went to Paris, and first studied with Jean Lenfant, after which he entered the school of Francis Poilly the elder, and became the ablest of his scholars. On leaving that master, he went to Italy, where he resided ten years, and acquired a remarkable purity and correctness of drawing. His prints are neatly executed with the graver, faithfully representing the expression, and other characteristics of the originals. His print of the Marys with the Dead Christ, after the celebrated picture by Annibale Caracci, formerly in the Orleans Gallery, now in the possession of the Earl of Carlisle, is considered one of the most admirable productions of the art for correctness of drawing, firmness and beauty of the graver, and faithful preservation of the fine expression in the original. The following are his most esteemed prints. He died at Paris in 1698.

ROULLIERE, LA, a French engraver on wood, who flourished, according to Papillon, about 1700, and executed some cuts which possess considerable merit. He does not specify any of his works.

ROUSSEAU, JACQUES, a French painter, born at Paris in 1630. After studying the elements of design, he went to Rome, and applied himself to the study of perspective and landscape, designing the most remarkable views in the vicinity of that metropolis. Here he formed an intimacy with Hermann Swanevelt, whose sister he married, and assisted by the advice and instruction of that able scholar of Claude Lorraine, he became an eminent and excellent painter of landscapes and perspective pieces. On his return to Paris, he was employed by Louis XIV. in decorating the chateaux of Marly and St. Germain en Laie, and was elected a member of the Royal Academy. At the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he had attained the height of his reputation; but, being a staunch Protestant, he was obliged to leave France, and sought refuge in Holland. So intolerant was the spirit of bigotry, that his name was expunged from the Academy roll, by order of the Court. He visited England, at the invitation of the Duke of Montague, who employed him, in conjunction with Charles de la Fosse and Jean Baptiste Monnoyer, to decorate his mansion of Montague House, now the British Museum. He was employed in painting some landscape and perspective pieces for the palace of Hampton Court.

The landscapes of Rousseau generally represent select and classic scenery, embellished with magnificent architecture and ruins, in which he appears to have imitated the admirable productions of Nicolo Poussin, though his coloring is more warm and glowing. His figures are well designed, his perspective excellent, and his pictures have the appearance of classic elegance, nature, and truth combined. His works are rare, and when offered for sale they command high prices. He was a man of piety, integrity, and benevolence, and at his death he bequeathed the greater part of his property for the relief of his countrymen in England, who, like himself, had been exiled on account of their religion. He died at London in 1693. Dumesnil mentions eight masterly etchings by Rousseau, from his own designs, and eleven fine pictures in the cabinet of Jabach; the former are finished with the graver, in a bold style.

ROUSSEAU, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1760. He engraved a great number of vignettes and other book plates, after the French masters; also a few other subjects, among which are the Virgin and Infant, after Vanderwerf; and St. Jerome, after Mola.

ROUSSELLET, GILES, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1614. It is not known under whom he studied, but his style resembles that of Cornelius Bloemaert. His drawing is correct, and his prints possess considerable merit, though in some of them the lights are too much covered, which gives a heaviness to the general appearance. Nagler gives a list of seventy-four prints by him; the following are the most esteemed. He died in 1686.

ROUSSELET, MARIE ANNE. This lady, probably a relative of the preceding, engraved a number of plates for Buffon's Natural History; also some sea-pieces and other subjects, after Backhuysen, William Vandervelde, Joseph Vernet, and Charles Vanloo. She married Peter Tardieu, the engraver. Her prints are dated from about 1760 to 1770.

ROUSSIERE, FRANÇOIS DE LA, an obscure French engraver, who flourished about 1650. Little is known of him, except by a few indifferent portraits.

ROUX, MAÎTRE. See IL Rosso.

ROVERE, RICARDO, a Flemish painter, who settled at Milan about 1565. He painted landscapes, but did not acquire much reputation, and is chiefly known as the father of several artists, sometimes called Rossetti, but more frequently termed Fiamminghini.

ROVERE, GIOVANNI MAURO, called IL FIAMMINGHINO, the son of the preceding, was born at Milan in 1570. According to Orlandi, he was educated in the school of the Procaccini, whose style he followed with distinction. Lanzi says he exchanged the manner of Camillo for that of Giulio Cesare P., and might be accounted a worthy disciple of the school of the Procaccini, had he not been induced by his impetuous temper to produce works of a careless execution. "He had all that fire which, when directed by judgment, is the soul of painting, but when abused, destroys the beauty of the art. It was very seldom that he was able to command it, though in a Supper of our Lord at S. Angelo, in which he used great care, he obtained corresponding success." He gained considerable reputation, however, and was much employed in decorating the churches and private houses with frescos. He also painted easel pictures of histories, perspectives, landscapes, and battle-pieces, which possess considerable merit. There are by him several spirited etchings, from his own designs, marked with the initials of his name, and F. for fecit, thus J. M. R. F.

ROVERE, GIOVANNI BATTISTA and MARCO, called also FIAMMINGHINI, were the brothers of the preceding, whom they assisted in his numerous frescos. Lanzi says, "besides some works they left in fresco, they painted histories in oil, perspectives, battle-pieces, and landscapes, which are to be met with in almost every corner of Milan."

ROVERE, GIOVANNI BATTISTA DELLA, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished at Turin about 1626, and whose name occurs in the registers for several years after that date. Some of his works are also mentioned in the Turin Guide. There was another artist, cotemporary, of the same name, whose style was entirely different. Lanzi mentions only one picture by him, in the convent of St. Francis at Turin. The subject represented is the origin of death by the transgression of Adam and Eve, a picture of very original invention, in which, though sacred and profane ideas are confounded together, much ability is displayed. It is signed Jo. Bapt. a Ruere, Taur. f. 1627.

ROVERE, GIROLAMO, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished at Turin in the first part of the 17th century. According to Baglioni, he was a good artist in history, and received the appointment of court painter.

ROVIGO, DA URBINO, a celebrated painter on porcelain, who flourished at Urbino about 1530.

ROVIRA Y BROCANDEL, HIPOLITO, a Spanish painter and engraver, born at Valencia in 1693. It is not known under whom he first studied, but according to Palomino, he attained excellence in engraving by frequenting the studio of Evaristo Munoz. At the age of thirty he went to Rome, and devoted himself with such enthusiasm to the study of the antique, that he passed whole days and nights in copying, without any other sustenance than bread and water. He acquired such facility of handling that he frequently said he had copied all the pictures at Rome which had given him pleasure. His great enthusiasm, and his fine copies in chiaro-scuro of all the works in the Farnese palace, elicited the admiration of the professors, who highly commended them, and Sebastiano Conca publicly declared that Annibale Caracci could not have done better. After acquiring considerable reputation at Rome for several original works, he returned to Spain, and was invited to the court at Madrid; but soon after his arrival in that city, there began to appear the effects of his midnight studies, fastings, and other privations, on his physical and mental faculties, and all his bright prospects became speedily blasted. He gradually lost his reason, and died in the Hospital di Misericordia at Valencia, in 1765.

ROWLANDSON, THOMAS, an English designer and etcher of caricatures, was born at London in 1756, and died there in 1827. He was educated in the Royal Academy, and afterwards studied at Paris. He had great talents, a lively imagination, and wonderful facility of execution; but he squandered a fortune, reduced himself to want, and wrought only when his necessities compelled him. His principal works are the illustrations, designed and executed by himself, for those popular volumes, "The Travels of Dr. Syntax," "The Dance of Death," "The Dance of Life," &c., published by Ackermann & Co.

ROY, CLAUDE LE, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1709, and executed several portraits, among which are those of Fleury, Boileau, Bossuet, and Cardinal Dubois, after H. Rigaud.

ROY, HENRY LE, an obscure French engraver, by whom there is a set of six plates of butterflies, beetles, and other insects, inscribed Henry le Roy, fecit, Æ. 72. 1651.

ROY, JOHN BAPTIST DE, commonly called De Roy of Brussels, an eminent painter of landscapes and cattle, born at Brussels in 1759. Manifesting an early inclination for art, his father took him to Holland, that he might have the opportunity of studying the works of the best Dutch masters, which he is said to have done with assiduity, making the works of Paul Potter, Cuyp, and Berghem his models. He attentively studied nature, and formed a style of his own, more analagous to that of Ommeganck than to any other of the cattle-painters of the Dutch school. His subjects were generally horned cattle, standing in groups, grazing in meadows, or ruminating during meridian heat, accurately designed and skilfully grouped. His coloring is more warm and glowing than is usual with the Dutch school; he acquired a high reputation, and instructed several pupils. He died in 1839, and left numerous sketches and studies, which are highly esteemed. His pictures are to be found in most of the best modern collections in Belgium.

ROYER, JEAN LE and AURIN OLIVIER, brothers-in-law, were French wood engravers, mentioned by Dumesnil, and flourished about the middle of the 16th century; they were also employed in the service of King Henry II., the former as a medalist, the latter as a printer. They executed in concert about sixty beautiful geometrical illustrations for Jean Cousin's "Book of Perspective." This work was printed and published in 1560, by Jean le Royer, who executed many vignettes and other illustrations for the various works which he published.

ROZEE, MADEMOISELLE, a Dutch paintress, born at Leyden in 1632. She gained great distinction by many exquisite imitations of oil paintings, executed with different colored threads of silk floss, or other material, so artfully disposed as to deceive the eye at a short distance. She united, softened, and blended the different colors with such consummate art as to rival nature, and to acquire the cognomen of "Sorceress." Her portraits were particularly admired; one of them in the Florentine Gallery, is considered a curiosity of art. She executed representations of landscape and animals with equal success, one of which sold for 500 florins. She died in 1682.

RUBBIANI, FELICE, a painter born at Modena in 1677. According to Tiraboschi, he studied under Domenico Bettini, and adopted his style. He accompanied Bettini in his travels, and, like him, painted fruit, flowers, birds, fish, &c., in which he excelled. Lanzi says he was a great favorite at the court of Modena, and in the cities of its vicinity. He was patronized by the Duke, and the Marchesi Riva of Mantua gave him commissions for thirty-six pictures, all of which he varied in an astonishing manner, and executed with a force and truth that rivalled nature.

RUBENS, PETER PAUL. This preëminent painter, accomplished scholar, and skilful diplomatist, was the son of John Rubens and Mary Pipelings, both descended from distinguished families in the city of Antwerp. His father was one of the principal magistrates of that city, at the time when the civil war obliged him to quit the Low Countries, about 1570, and seek refuge at Cologne. Rubens was born in that city in 1577, on the feast-day of St. Peter and St. Paul, for which reason he received, at the baptismal font, the names of those Apostles. When the city of Antwerp again came under the dominion of Spain, John Rubens returned to his native city, and renewed the administration of his office. Young Rubens, in his earliest years, discovered uncommon ability and vivacity of genius, literary taste, and a mild and docile disposition. His father gave him a very liberal education, and after the completion of his studies, placed him as a page with the Countess of Lalain, in order that his son might acquire graceful and accomplished manners, so important to success in a professional career. His father dying soon afterwards, Rubens obtained the permission of his mother to pursue the bent of the inclination he had discovered for painting, and she placed him under the instruction of Tobias Verhaecht, an eminent artist in landscape; but his genius inclining to historical painting, he soon left that master, and entered the school of Adam van Oort, whose works were then in high repute. The vulgarity and depravity of this master disgusted Rubens, and he soon left his school for that of Otho Venius, or van Veen, then one of the most eminent painters of the Flemish school, distinguished alike for pictorial talents, amiable and polished manners, and extensive literary attainments. These qualities, so congenial to the feelings of Rubens, rendered his engagement with Venius exceedingly pleasant; he conceived for his instructor profound respect and veneration, and ever maintained towards him the strongest attachment. It was from this master that he acquired that taste for allegory for which he was remarkable through life, though it certainly did not constitute his greatest merit. When he had reached his twenty-third year, Venius frankly assured him that his instructions could be of no further service to him, and that nothing more remained for his improvement but a journey to Italy, which he recommended as the surest means of ripening his extraordinary talents to the greatest perfection. Rubens had already contemplated such a project, and in following the advice of his master, he consulted also his own inclinations. There is a little discrepancy among authors about this part of Rubens' life, but Sandrart, who was intimately acquainted with him and traveled through Holland in his company, says that "the Archduke Albert, Governor of the Netherlands, who had conceived a high opinion of his talents, employed him to paint several fine pictures for his palace, and forwarded his designs by recommending him in the most honorable manner to the Duke of Mantua, that at his court he might have constant access to his admirable collection of paintings and antique statues, and thus have an opportunity of improving himself by studying as well as copying the former, and designing after the latter." At all events, he set out for Italy in 1600, and after spending a short time at Venice in examining the works of the Venetian masters, he proceeded to Mantua, and was received with the most marked distinction by the Duke, who took him into his service, and appointed him one of the gentlemen of his chamber, an honor which was the more acceptable to Rubens, as it gave him greater facilities for studying the great works of Giulio Romano in the Palazzo del Te, which were the objects of his particular admiration. Giulio's masterly illustrations of the sublime poetry of Homer excited his emulation to the highest degree, and it is related that while he was engaged in painting the history of Turnus and Æneas, in order to warm his imagination with poetic rapture, he repeated with energy the lines of Virgil, commencing

The Duke, overhearing his recitations, entered the apartment, and was surprised to find the young artist's mind richly stored with classic literature. After having spent two years in the service of the Duke of Mantua, he requested and received permission to revisit Venice, for the purpose of studying the works of Titian and Paul Veronese, from which he acquired that splendid manner of coloring so much admired in his works. On his return to Mantua, he painted three magnificent pictures for the church of the Jesuits, which evince the progress he made at Venice, and are considered among his finest works. The Duke commissioned Rubens to visit Rome, to execute copies of several celebrated works, which he performed in such admirable style, that his patron esteemed them little inferior to the originals. At the same time Rubens gladly availed himself of the opportunity of studying all the best works of art in that metropolis. He was also employed by the Archduke Albert to paint three pictures for the church of S. Croce in Gerusalemme, representing the Finding of the Cross by St. Helena, Christ bearing his Cross, and the Crucifixion. The two last are considered among his most admirable productions.

In 1605, the Duke of Mantua, having occasion to send an envoy to the court of Spain, employed Rubens, as a person eminently fitted for the delicate mission. He successfully accomplished the negociations confided to him, painted the portrait of Philip III., and received from that monarch the most flattering marks of distinction. Soon after his return from this embassy, he again proceeded to Rome, and painted three admirable pictures for the tribune in the church of S. Maria in Vallicella, in which he appears to have adopted the style of Veronese. He next visited Genoa, where his distinguished reputation excited public curiosity, and he was employed to execute several works, which increased his celebrity; particularly two pictures in the church of the Jesuits, representing the Circumcision, and St. Ignatius working a Miracle, which were highly applauded. Rubens, having now been absent eight years, was suddenly recalled to Antwerp in 1608, by the severe illness of his mother, who died before his arrival. The loss of his dearly beloved parent was a severe affliction to him. He then concluded to return to Italy, but the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella induced him to abandon his intention. He settled at Antwerp, where he married, built a magnificent house with a saloon in the form of a rotunda, which he embellished with antique statues, busts, vases, and pictures by the most celebrated painters. Amidst these select productions of art, he passed about twelve years in the tranquil exercise of his great abilities, producing an astonishing number of admirable pictures for the churches and public edifices of the Low Countries. He also instructed numerous pupils. In order to continue his mental improvement, to enjoy the sweets of friendly intercourse, and to economize his precious time, he regulated his affairs with a precision which nothing was permitted to derange. He received company at stated times, and it is said he never painted without having some one read to him from a work of history or poetry. He possessed an extraordinary memory, and understood the ancient and several modern languages, writing and speaking them with fluency. His familiar acquaintance with ancient and modern literature, had enriched his mind with inexhaustible resources. His great popularity naturally excited envy and created enemies; although generous and affable to all, and a liberal encourager of art, he found himself assailed by those who were most indebted to him for assistance. With the most audacious effrontery, they insinuated that he owed the best part of his reputation in the great variety of his works, for which he was celebrated, to the talents of two of his disciples, Snyders and Wildens, whom he employed occasionally in forwarding the animals and landscapes in his pictures. The principal of these vilifiers were Abraham Janssens, Cornelius Schut, and Theodore Rombouts; the first had the hardihood to challenge him to paint a picture in competition with him. Rubens treated these attacks with a dignity and philanthropy that shows his exalted mind, and the goodness of his heart; he relieved the necessities of his accusers, and exposed his immortal production of the Descent from the Cross.

In 1620, Mary of Medicis commissioned Rubens to decorate the Gallery of the Luxembourg with a series of emblematical paintings, in twenty-four compartments, illustrative of the principal events of her life. The series was painted at Antwerp, except two pictures, which he finished at Paris in 1623, when he arranged the whole in the gallery. These great works, executed in less than three years, are alone sufficient to attest the abundant fertility of his genius, and the wonderful facility of his hand. It was at this time that he became acquainted with the Duke of Buckingham, as that nobleman was passing through France on his way to Madrid, who afterwards gave him £10,000 for his collection of antiques and paintings. On his return to Antwerp, his time was occupied in executing numerous commissions, till 1628, when the Infanta Isabella dispatched him on a delicate political mission to the court of Spain, relative to the critical state of the government of the Low Countries, and for instructions preparatory to a negociation for peace between Spain and England. On his arrival at the Spanish capital, he was received in the most gracious manner by Philip IV., acquitted himself in his diplomatic mission to the entire satisfaction of the Infanta and of the King, and completely captivated the monarch and his minister, the Duke de Olivares, by his magnificent productions. The Duke had just founded the convent of the Carmelites at Loeches, near Madrid, for which the king, as a mark of favor to his minister, commissioned Rubens to paint four pictures of large dimensions, which are not surpassed by any of his other works for admirable composition, grandeur of design, and richness of coloring. The first is an allegorical subject of the Triumph of the New Law, which he personified in the most beautiful and graceful manner. The figure of Religion is seated on a superb triumphal car, drawn by four Angels, with others bearing the Cross, with characteristic symbols; four figures expressive of the various characters of Infidelity or Ignorance, over which Religion is supposed to triumph, follow the car like slaves or captives, bound with chains. The group is crowned with beautiful cherubim, hovering in the air, with chaplets in their hands, disposed with singular art, the whole producing the most charming effect. The companion picture represents the Interview between Abraham and Melchisedech. In the drapery of the priests and the armor of the soldiers, Rubens seems to have exhausted every resource that his rich fund of coloring could supply. The other two compositions, of equal size and not inferior in excellence, are distinguished for indescribable majesty and expression; they represent the Four Doctors of the Church, and the Four Evangelists, with their distinctive emblems. He also painted eight grand pictures for the royal palace at Madrid, which are regarded as matchless specimens of his coloring. They represent the Rape of the Sabines; the Battle between the Romans and the Sabines; Diana and her Nymphs bathing; Perseus and Andromeda; the Rape of Helen; the Contest between Juno, Minerva, and Venus; the Judgment of Paris; and the Triumph of Bacchus. He likewise painted an equestrian portrait of the king, and a picture of the Martyrdom of St. Andrew. For these great works he was munificently rewarded, received the honor of knighthood, and was presented with the golden key, as Gentleman of the Royal bed-chamber.

In 1627 he returned to Flanders, and was immediately dispatched to England on a secret mission by the Infanta, to ascertain the disposition of the government on the subject of peace. The king, Charles I., an ardent lover of the fine arts, received the illustrious painter with every mark of distinction, and immediately employed him in painting the ceiling of the Banqueting House at Whitehall, where he represented the Apotheosis of his father, James I., for which he received £3000. Here Rubens showed himself no less skilful as a diplomatist than as a painter. In one of the frequent visits with which the king honored him during the execution of the work, he alluded with infinite delicacy and address to the subject of a peace with Spain, and finding the monarch not averse to such a measure, he immediately produced his credentials. Charles at once appointed some members of his council to negotiate with him, and a pacification was soon effected. The king was so highly pleased with the productions of his pencil, and particularly with his conduct in this diplomatic emergency, that he gave him a munificent reward, and conferred upon him the honor of knighthood, Feb. 21, 1630. On this occasion, the king presented Rubens with his own sword, enriched with diamonds, his hat-band of jewels, valued at 10,000 crowns, and a gold chain, which Rubens wore ever afterwards. He also painted the portrait of Charles I. in the character of St. George, and that of his queen, Henrietta Maria, as Cleodelinde, with a view of Richmond and the Thames in the distance. Having thus happily accomplished the object of his mission, he returned to Antwerp, and was received with all the honors and distinction due to his services and exalted merit. He still continued to exercise his pencil with undiminished industry and reputation till 1635, when he experienced some aggravated attacks of the gout, to which he had been subjected, succeeded by an infirmity and trembling of the hand, which obliged him to decline executing all works of large dimensions. Though he had now reached his fifty-eighth year, and was loaded with deserved honors and wealth, he nevertheless continued to instruct his pupils, to correspond with his cherished friends, and to paint easel pictures when his torturing malady would permit, till his death, in 1640, aged 63 years. He was buried with extraordinary pomp and solemnity in the church of St. James, under the altar of his private chapel, which he had decorated with one of his finest pictures. A superb monument was erected to his memory.

There is an astonishing contrariety of opinion among writers, as to the real merits of this illustrious painter. While his countrymen generally account him the greatest of modern painters, the Italians refuse him the merit of an able designer. In order to arrive at a just conclusion, it is necessary to take many things into consideration, such as his genius, manner, habits; the genuineness of his works, and the changes that have taken place in them from the effects of time, together with frequent cleaning, restoring, and retouching of parts; his numerous scholars and their assistance in his works. Genius is always bold and daring, and while it commands attention and admiration, is sure to provoke criticism. The styles of the three greatest modern painters, Michael Angelo, Raffaele, and Rubens, were entirely different, and it is very certain that, had they adopted any other, they never would have reached the excellence and renown which they achieved.

Rubens was undoubtedly one of the most original painters that ever lived, and his subjects were unlimited. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, animals, fruit and flowers, with such excellence, that it is difficult to decide in which he most excelled. He possessed inexhaustible fertility of invention, never copying himself or any other master, in so many and various productions, though accused of it in his famous Descent from the Cross, in which he is said to have exactly copied a print marked Peter Passen invenit; Hieronymus Wierix sculpsit; but this wants authentication. If he adopted the design of this picture, he certainly did it to show a skill in coloring that no one but a great painter would dare to attempt. His extensive knowledge of classical and polite literature, enabled him to excel in emblematical and allegorical compositions, of which he was very fond. His genius was adapted to the grandest compositions, and his powers appear to have expanded in proportion to the scale on which they were called to act. He did not, like Raffaele, possess that mild inspiration of sentiment which manifests itself in dignified and noble, or graceful and beautiful forms, but he was animated with a poetic fire that displays itself in surprising and astonishing effects. The powers of his imagination were so abundant, that his most extensive compositions seem to have been produced without effort, and creation appears an operation of his will. This is evident from his admirable productions in the Luxembourg, and many other works too well known to need description. He is generally allowed to have carried the art of coloring to its highest excellence; he thoroughly understood the principles of chiaro-scuro, and managed it with such art as to give the utmost roundness, relief, and harmony to each particular figure, and the greatest effect to the whole composition; his groups are disposed with such skill as to conduct the eye of the spectator at once to the principal object. His draperies are simple, broad, and grand; his carnations have the appearance of nature, and the warmth of life. His greatest excellence appears in his grand compositions, for, as these were to be seen at a distance, he laid on a proper body of color with uncommon freedom, and fixed all his tints in their proper places, never impairing their lustre, by breaking them, but touching them only in such a manner as to give them lasting force, beauty and harmony. He is less chaste in his coloring than Titian, but is more brilliant, and excites our admiration by the splendor of his tints. Rubens, beyond comparison, was the most rapid of the great masters, and so many pictures bear his name, that it is impossible not to partially accord credit to what was asserted in his own day, that the greater portion of many of them were executed by his pupils. Rubens has been accused as defective in design, and it is generally allowed that he was frequently incorrect in his drawing, and that his figures, particularly those of females and children, are devoid of elegance, grace and beauty. There are apologies, however, to palliate, if not to excuse, these defects. He did not attempt the ideal, nor imitate the antique, but adopted the models of his own country from choice, not ignorance, for he could not have been deficient in knowledge of the antique and Roman schools. His beau-ideal of Venus and Cupid seems to have been a dumpy fat woman, with an equally fat child, as seen in his Judgment of Paris. It cannot be denied that he preferred brilliancy of effect to beauty of form, and frequently sacrificed correctness of design to the magic of coloring, probably from his impetuosity of conception and rapidity of execution. His drawing is generally grand and facile, his outline free and flowing, and he had a competent knowledge of anatomy. Some of his naked figures are as excellent for their design and drawing as for their inimitable coloring, as seen in his admirable picture of the Fallen Angels in the Dusseldorf gallery, of which Sir Joshua Reynolds says, "If we consider the fruitfulness of invention which is discovered in this work, or the skill which is shown in composing such an infinite number of figures, or the art of the distribution of light and shadow, the freedom of hand, the facility with which it is performed, and what is most extraordinary, the correctness and admirable taste of drawing of figures foreshortened in attitudes the most difficult to execute, we must pronounce this picture to be one of the greatest efforts of genius, that the art has produced." The same author thus sums up his admirable criticism on the works of Rubens, in his Journal of a Journey to Flanders and Holland: "The works of Rubens have that peculiar property always attendant on genius, to attract attention, and enforce admiration in spite of all their faults. It is owing to this fascinating power that the performances of those painters with which he is surrounded, though they have perhaps fewer defects, yet appear spiritless, tame and insipid, such as the altar-pieces of Crayer, Schut, Seghers, Huysum, Tyssens, Van Balen, and the rest. They are done by men whose hands, and indeed all their faculties, appear to have been cramped and confined; and it is evident that every thing they did was the effect of great labor and pains. The productions of Rubens, on the contrary, seem to flow with a freedom and prodigality, as if they cost him nothing; and to the general animation of the composition there is always a correspondent spirit in the execution of the work. The striking brilliancy of his colors, and their lively opposition to each other, the flowing liberty and freedom of his outline, the animated pencil, with which every object is touched, all contribute to awaken and keep alive the attention of the spectator; awaken in him, in some measure, correspondent sensations, and make him feel a degree of that enthusiasm with which the painter was carried away. To this we may add the complete uniformity of all the parts of the work, so that the whole seems to be conducted, and grow out of one mind: every thing is of a piece, and fits its place. Even his taste of drawing and of form appears to correspond better with his coloring and composition, than if he had adopted any other manner, though that manner, simply considered, might be better: it is here as in personal attractions; there is frequently found a certain agreement and correspondence in the whole together, which is often more captivating than mere regular beauty.

"Rubens appears to have had that confidence in himself, which it is necessary for every artist to assume, when he has finished his studies, and may venture in some measure to throw aside the fetters of authority; to consider the rules as subject to his control, and not himself subject to the rules; to risk and to dare extraordinary attempts without a guide, abandoning himself to his own sensations, and depending upon them. To this confidence must be imputed that originality of manner by which he may be truly said to have extended the limits of the art. After Rubens had made up his manner, he never looked out of himself for assistance: there is consequently very little in his works, that appears to be taken from other masters. If he has borrowed any thing, he has had the address to change and adapt it so well to the rest of his work, that the theft is not discoverable." Reynolds also says he possessed in an eminent degree the true art of imitation. He saw the objects of nature with a painter's eye, and caught at once the predominant features by which every object is known and distinguished, and as soon as seen, executed them with astonishing facility. "This power," says he, "which Rubens possessed in the highest degree, enabled him to represent whatever he undertook, better than any other painter. His animals, particularly lions and horses, are so admirable, that it may be said they were never properly represented but by him. His portraits rank with the painters who have made that branch of the art the sole business of their lives; and of these he left a great variety of specimens. The same may be said of his landscapes; and though Claude Lorraine finished more minutely, as became a professor in any particular branch, yet there is such an airiness and facility in the landscapes of Rubens, that a painter would as soon wish to be the author of them as those of Claude or any other artist whatever.

"The pictures of Rubens have this effect on the spectator, that he feels himself in no wise disposed to pick out and dwell on his defects. The criticisms which are made on him are indeed often unreasonable. His style ought no more to be blamed for not having the sublimity of Michael Angelo than Ovid should be censured because he is not like Virgil. However, it must be acknowledged that he wanted many excellencies which would have perfectly united with his style. Among these we may reckon beauty in his female forms sometimes indeed they make approaches to it, they are healthy and comely women, but seldom if ever possess any degree of excellence. The same may be said of his young men and children; his old men have that sort of dignity which a bushy beard will confer, but he never possessed a poetical conception of character. In his representation of the highest characters in the christian or the fabulous world, instead of something above humanity, which might fill the idea which is conceived of such beings, the spectator finds little more than mere mortals, such as he meets with every day.

"The incorrectness of Rubens in regard to his outline, oftener proceeds from haste and carelessness, than from inability: there are in his great works, to which he seems to have paid more particular attention, naked figures as eminent for their drawing as for their coloring. He appears to have entertained a great abhorrence of the meagre, dry manner of his predecessors, the old German and Flemish painters, to avoid which, he kept his outline large and flowing; this carried to extreme produced that heaviness which is so frequently found in his figures. Another defect of this great painter is his inattention to the foldings of his drapery, especially that of women; it is scarcely ever cast with any choice or skill." Algarotti says "Rubens was more moderate in his movement than Tintoretto, more soft in his chiaro-scuro than Caravaggio; but not so rich in his composition, nor so light in his touches as Veronese. His carnations are always less true than those of Titian, and less delicate than those of Vandyck; yet he contrived to give his colors the utmost transparency, and no less harmony, notwithstanding their extraordinary depth."

The number of works executed by Rubens is truly astonishing; Smith in his Catalogue raisonné, vols. II and IX., describes about 1800 considered genuine by him, in the different public and private collections of Europe. There can be no doubt that a great number of these were executed by his numerous scholars and assistants, under his direction, from his designs, and then finished by himself. It is well known that he employed his pupils in forwarding many of his pictures, and that Wildens, van Uden, and Mompers, in particular, assisted him in his landscapes, and Snyders, in his animals. His principal scholars were Anthony Vandyck, Justus van Egmont, Theodore van Thulden, Abraham Diepenbeck, Jacob Jordaens, Peter van Mol, Cornelius Schut, John van Hoeck, Simon de Vos, Peter Sontman, Deodato Delmont, Erasmus Quellinus, Francis Wouters, Francis Snyders, John Wildens, Lucas van Uden, and Jodocus Mompers. Several other distinguished Flemish painters of the period, who were not his pupils, imitated his style; the most eminent of whom were Gerard Seghers, Gaspar de Crayer, and Martin Pepin. Besides the genuine paintings of Rubens, there are a multitude of doubtful authenticity, attributed to him, most of which were executed by his pupils and imitators. Many such, fine pictures, are in the United States. There are upwards of 1200 engravings after works attributed to Rubens; some of which, however, are of doubtful authenticity. Those executed by the Bolswerts, Paul Pontius, and other cotemporary engravers who worked under Rubens' supervision, are undoubtedly genuine. There are a great number of his works in England in the public galleries and the collections of the nobility; there are nine in the National gallery, fourteen in the Dulwich gallery, and others at Windsor, Hampton Court, and Whitehall. The enormous value set upon his works at the present time, may be seen by referring to the catalogue of the National gallery; thus, the Brazen Serpent cost £1260; a Landscape, called Rubens' Chateau, £1500; Peace and War, £3000; the Rape of the Sabines, £3000; and the Judgment of Paris, 4000 guineas. Many of the works of Rubens, like those of other great masters, have suffered greatly from the effects of time, but more from improper cleaning and unskilful restoration, especially in retouching injured parts, by which the original harmony of coloring has been destroyed. Thus his pictures in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, have been three times cleaned, repaired and painted over, so that little of the original splendor of coloring remains.

Rubens occasionally amused himself with the point, and executed a few etchings in a bold and masterly style, which show his profound knowledge of chiaro-scuro. It is well known that the masterly effects of light and shade, and characteristic expression, in the prints of Bolswert, were owing to the instructions and assistance he received from Rubens.—(See S. A. Bolswert.) The following etchings are by him:

St. Francis receiving the Stigmata. Mary Magdalen Penitent. St. Catherine; a design for a ceiling. An old Woman holding a lighted Candle, with a Boy lighting another by it. When Rubens had etched the plate, a few impressions only were taken off, which are now become extremely scarce. There is a copy of this print by Cornelius Visscher. The Portrait of an English Minister; signed P. P. Rubens, fecit.

RUBENSTEIN, or RIJEBENSTEIN, a reputable German painter of still-life, dead game, and portraits. He went to England, and resided several years at London, where he died about 1763.

RUBIALES, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, born in the province of Estremadura. He went to Italy and studied under Francesco Salviati, whom he assisted in many of his works. He afterwards became the assistant of Giorgio Vasari. He resided chiefly at Rome and Florence, and executed some works by himself for the churches, the best of which is the Conversion of St. Paul in S. Spirito in Sassia at Rome. There are notices of him from 1545 to 1560. He is little known in his own country, and probably passed most of his life in Italy.

RUBINI, a Piedmontese painter who, according to Federici, flourished at Treviso about 1650. He executed some works for the church of S. Vito in that city, which are commended by that author.

RUBIRA, DON ANDRES DE, a Spanish painter, born at Escacena del Campo. He studied under Domingo Martinez at Seville, whom he assisted in several works for the cathedral of that city. When Francisco Vieira, painter to the King of Portugal, was passing through Seville on his way from Rome to Lisbon, he invited Rubira to accompany him home, where he profited greatly by the instructions of that excellent master. On his return to Seville, he was employed in executing several important works for the churches and convents. He also painted conversation pieces, drolls, and interiors, in a style of excellence. There is a picture of a blind man by him, singing and playing on the guitar, painted with such truth and power, that, at first view, it might be attributed to Velasquez. He died at Seville in 1760.

RUBIRA, JOSÉ DE, the son of the preceding, was born at Seville in 1747. He is said to have had no other instruction than what he received from his father, though he was only thirteen at his death. By diligently studying the works of Murillo, he became a good imitator of his manner, and an excellent copyist. Among others, he copied a magnificent picture of the Holy Family by Murillo, for Don Francisco de Bruno, so admirably executed, that many connoisseurs have taken it for the original. He died in 1787.

RUCHOLLE, PIERRE, a French engraver, who flourished about 1690. He engraved a few indifferent portraits, among which are Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, after Vandyck, and Louis XIV., after Rigaud.

RUEDA, GABRIEL DE, a Spanish painter whose history is little known. He is said to have executed some excellent works for the churches at Granada and Toledo. He was appointed painter to the Holy church at Toledo in 1633, and died in 1641.

RUFO, JOSÉ MARTIN, a Spanish historical and portrait painter, was born at Madrid and educated in the academy of S. Ferdinando, from which institution he drew several prizes by the superiority of his productions. He executed many works for the public edifices, particularly a series of histories of the life of S. Juan de la Cruz in the cloister of the Carmelitas Descalzos. His portrait of Ferdinand VI., formerly in the monastery del Paular, is in the Royal collection at Madrid. He flourished in the second half of the 18th century.

RUGENDAS, GEORGE PHILIP, a German painter and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1666. He studied under Isaac Fischer, a painter of history, with whom he continued five years; but his genius leading him rather to painting battles and skirmishes of cavalry, he formed his style by studying the works of Borgognone, and the prints of Antonio Tempesta. He had already acquired considerable reputation in his native city, when he went to Italy in 1692. He stopped some time at Venice, where he received some instruction and advice from Gio. Battista Molinari. From Venice he proceeded to Rome, where his talents soon became known, and he met with such flattering encouragement that he thought of establishing himself in that city, when he was suddenly recalled to Augsburg in 1695, by the death of his father. He then settled in his native city, where he passed the rest of his life, and executed a great many works, which are highly esteemed, and are found in the choicest collections of Europe.

Rugendas is reckoned among the good battle painters. He possessed an abundant imagination, he composed his subjects with taste, his design is correct, his perspective excellent, his coloring good, his pencilling free and spirited, and his execution exceedingly rapid. He had three manners. In the first he was less attentive to design than to the charm of coloring; in the second, his drawing is more correct, and his touch more free and animated, but his coloring is less attractive; in his last and best manner, he successfully combined harmonious coloring with accuracy of design and uncommon freedom of pencilling. During the bombardment of Augsburg by the French and Bavarians in 1703, when the citizens were overwhelmed with alarm, confusion and despair, Rugendas sallied forth with his pencils and sketch-book, to contemplate with a painter's eye, the attacks of the besiegers, exposed himself to the most imminent danger, and amidst the carnage and destruction, designed the military operations of the French and Bavarian armies in a very spirited and accurate manner, which he afterwards engraved and published. He could work with equal facility with both hands, on account of a disease of his right hand, which for some years compelled him to exercise his left. It is said that the most illustrious personages of Germany employed his pencil; if so, they illy rewarded him, for it is well known that he practised engraving to support his family; he devoted a considerable portion of his time to engraving; some say the whole of it, from 1719 to 1735, when he returned to painting. He executed a great number of etchings and mezzotinto plates after his own designs. He died at Augsburg in 1742. He was the ancestor of several painters and engravers of this name, some of whom are living at the present time. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

ETCHINGS.

A set of six Plates; entitled, Capricci di Giorgio Filippo Rugendas. 1698. Eight Plates; entitled Diversi Pensieri fatto per Giorgio Filippo Rugendas, Pittore. 1699. A set of eight plates, representing horsemen. Six Plates of Cavalry marching. The military operations of the French and Bavarian armies at the siege of Augsburg; in six plates. 1704.

MEZZOTINTO.

Four plates of Skirmishes between the Prussian and Hungarian Hussars. Four plates of Huntings of the Lion, Tiger, &c.

RUGENDAS, CHRISTIAN, was the son of the preceding, born at Augsburg in 1708, and died there in 1781. He engraved in mezzotinto about sixty plates after the designs of his father, representing marches, halts, battles, &c. He also executed about thirty etchings from his own designs, which are highly esteemed.

RUGGIERI, DA BRUGGIA. See ROGER OF BRUGES.

RUGGIERI, ANTONIO, a Florentine painter, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. According to Baldinucci, he studied under Ottavio Vannini, was a good painter of cabinet pictures of historical subjects, and wrought much for the collections. There is a picture of St. Andrew by him in the church of S. Gaetano at Florence.

RUGGIERI, ANTONIO MARIA, a Milanese painter, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. He formed an intimate friendship with Francesco Bianchi, in conjunction with whom he executed many works in fresco for the churches and public edifices of Milan and other cities. Lanz considers them mediocre artists, more intent on gain than applause. Ruggieri also painted in oil.

RUGGIERI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, called also GIO. BATTISTA DEL GESSI, a Bolognese painter who first studied under Domenichino, and afterwards became the disciple of Francesco Gessi the pupil of Guido, whose style he adopted. He accompanied that master to Naples, and assisted him in some of his principal works in that city and at Bologna. He afterwards visited Rome, where he was patronized by the Marchese Giustiniani, and executed some works for the churches and the palaces of the nobility. His principal works at Bologna, are the Assumption of the Virgin, the Adoration of the Magi, and the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in the church of S. Barbaziano which have sometimes been mistaken for the works of Guido. His most esteemed works at Rome are a picture of the Nativity in S. Maria della Minerva one of his finest works, and a fresco, representing Mary Magdalen and St. Catherine, with several other saints, in S. Caterina a Monte Magnanapoli. There is much discrepancy as to the time of his birth and death. According to Baglioni, he died aged thirty-two, in the pontificate of Urban VIII. Lanzi asserts the same, and says he was an artist of rare merit, particularly esteemed by Cortona, in whose arms he breathed his last. Zani says he was born in 1606, and died in 1640. Others say he was born in 1595, and died at Rome in 1659. Domini says he was enticed on board a galley at Naples kidnapped, and never heard of afterwards. See Lorenzo Menini.

RUGGIERI, ERCOLE, called also ERCOLINO DE GESSI, or ERCOLINO DA BOLOGNA, was the brother of the preceding, and a scholar of Francesco Gessi whose style he followed, according to Malvasia with so much success, that, at first sight, his works are often mistaken for those of his master. Such are his pictures of the Death of St. Joseph, in the church of S. Cristina di Pietralata, and the Virgin and Infant, with several saints, at the Servi, at Bologna. The time of his birth or death is not known, but he is supposed to have died young.

RUGGIERI, GIROLAMO, a painter born at Vicenza in 1662. According to Pozzo, he studied with Cornelius Dusman, a Flemish painter, who had settled at Vicenza. Lanzi says Ruggieri established himself at Verona, where he painted history, landscapes, and battle-pieces, in the Flemish style. He died there about 1717.

RUGGIERI.
RF or R or RF ▲ GUIDO, called also RUGGIERO
RUGGIERI, a Bolognese painter and engraver, who flourished about 1550. He studied under Francesco Raibolini, called Il Francia, and accompanied Primaticcio to France, where he assisted him in his great works at Fontainebleau. He is, however, better known as an engraver, and executed some plates after the designs of Primaticcio, in a style somewhat resembling that of Marco da Ravenna, from whom it is not improbable that he learned the art. His plates after Primaticcio are usually marked with a monogram composed of a F and an R, joined together, with F for fecit. There are other etchings attributed to him, bearing various marks, and partaking of the manner of Giulio Bonasone, Giorgio Ghisi, and Caraglio; but there is great uncertainty respecting them. Bartsch classes twenty-two under the monogram F. G. (No. 86, tom ix.) and mentions others with different marks, all of which Nagler attributes to Guido Ruggieri.

RUHL, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a German sculptor, born in Hesse Cassel in 1764. He studied sculpture under Nahl, and in 1787 drew the grand prize of the Academy at Cassel, which entitled him to travel at the expense of the state. He spent one year at Paris, studying in the atelier of Pajou, and then visited Rome, where he was rejoined by his instructor Nahl. He copied many sculptures in that city, and executed a marble statue of Achilles lying, which is highly praised by Goethe. On returning to Cassel, in 1790, he was chosen an Academician, and was commissioned to execute a number of works. Among them were the monument to the Hessians who fell at the Siege of Frankfort, in 1792; and the Tomb of Baron de Hayn. At the establishment of the ephemeral kingdom of Westphalia, Ruhl was appointed sculptor to the court, and made many busts of King Jerome. After a career of half a century, he died, in 1842.

RUIDIMAN, or REUTTIMAN, or REUTLMANN, JOHN CONRAD, a German goldsmith and engraver, who flourished at Augsburg in the first part of the 17th century, and designed and engraved some plates of ornaments for goldsmiths.

RUINA, GASPARO, an Italian wood engraver, who flourished towards the end of the 16th century. There are a variety of historical, mythological, and allegorical prints attributed to him, executed in a peculiar manner; the shadows are produced by numerous fine hatchings, which make them in many places appear too black, and out of harmony. His prints are sometimes marked with the above monogram, and at others variously signed Gasparo, f.; Gaspar or Gasparo Ruina, f., or fecit. Zani and Brulliot say he was the engraver who marked his prints with three darts crossed, sometimes accompanied by the letter G.

RUISCH, or RUYSCH, RACHEL, a celebrated Dutch paintress of fruit and flowers, born at Amsterdam in 1664. She was the daughter of Frederick Ruisch, the celebrated professor of anatomy. She early showed an extraordinary taste for depicting flowers, which induced her father to procure for her the instruction of William van Aelst, an eminent flower painter. She not only surpassed her instructor, but some have not hesitated to equal, and even prefer her works to those of John van Huysum. She grouped her flowers in the most tasteful and picturesque manner, and depicted them with a force and brilliancy that rivalled nature; Descamps says that, "in her pictures of flowers and fruit, she surpassed nature herself." The extraordinary talents of this lady recommended her to the patronage of the Elector Palatine—a great admirer of her pictures—for whom she executed a considerable portion of her finest works, and received a munificent reward. She was admitted a member of the academy at the Hague in 1701. Though she is said to have exercised her talents to an advanced age, her works are exceedingly rare, so great was the labor she bestowed upon them. She spent seven years in painting two pictures, a fruit and a flower piece, which she presented to one of her daughters, as her marriage portion. She married Jurian Pool, an eminent portrait painter, by whom she had ten children; she is frequently called by his name, though she always signed her pictures with her maiden name. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné, vols. vi. and ix., gives a description of only about thirty pieces by her—a proof of their great rarity. They now command very high prices when offered for sale. She died at Amsterdam in 1750, aged 86 years.

RUIZ DE LA IGLESIA, FRANCISCO IGNACIO, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid about 1640. He first studied with Francisco Canillo, and afterwards perfected himself in coloring, in the school of Juan Carreño. He acquired distinction, was appointed painter to Philip V. in 1689, and painted his portrait several times. He was employed in conjunction with Antonio Palomino in decorating several of the churches and public edifices at Madrid, with paintings both in oil and fresco. He died in 1704.

RUIZ GIXON, JUAN CARLOS, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville about 1677. He is supposed to have studied under the younger Herrera, whose style he adopted. There is a grand picture by him of the Immaculate Conception, in the Cathedral of Seville, of which the grand taste, fine coloring, and bold execution, would make it pass for a work by Herrera, were it not signed with the name of Ruiz, as was his custom in all his productions.

RUIZ GONZALES, DON PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1633. He did not commence the study of painting until the age of thirty, when he placed himself under the instruction of Juan Antonio Escalante. On the death of that master, he became the disciple of Juan Carreno, under whose able instruction he made rapid progress, acquired considerable distinction, and was much employed by the nobility and the churches.

There are many fine works by him in the churches and convents at Madrid. He particularly excelled in cabinet pictures, which he colored with all the richness of the Venetian masters. His works are found in the best collections in Spain, and are highly esteemed. Though he commenced painting so late in life, he acquired great facility of hand, executed many works, and acquired a fortune. He died at Madrid in 1709.

RUIZ, FERDINANDO, a Spanish architect of the 16th century. He gained considerable distinction at Seville, and erected there a church and several other edifices, but was most distinguished for his restoration of the tower Giralda. This famous structure is said to have been commenced in the 11th century by Geber, to whom is attributed the invention of Algebra, and the design of two similar towers at Rabata and Morocco. It was originally two hundred and fifty feet high, but was increased by Ruiz to the height of three hundred and fifty feet. In the centre is another tower, higher than the exterior one, and twenty-three feet thick; the interval between the towers is twenty-three feet, and serves for the ascent, by which two horsemen can mount abreast. The edifice is adorned with one hundred and forty columns, and the entablature is crowned by four large globes of gilt bronze, so resplendent that in the sunshine they were visible for twenty-four miles. In the earthquake of 1395 the globes fell, and the tower remained in its mutilated state until 1568, when Ruiz was employed to restore it. He performed his commission in the most admirable manner, and the Giralda still remains secure, notwithstanding the frequent earthquakes.

RUMALDE, an ancient French architect, who flourished about 840, in the time of Louis the Pious. According to Felibien, he erected the old Cathedral at Rheims, which is celebrated as the most magnificent of the age. Rumalde is said to have used for materials the ancient city walls, previously demolished by Charles Martel.

RUMOHR, CARL FRIEDRICH LUDWIG FELIX, a distinguished German writer upon art, born at Reinhardsgrimma, his father's estate near Dresden, in 1785. He was educated at the high school of Holzmünden, in Brunswick, and was afterwards sent to the University of Gottingen; but already, at the age of fifteen, he neglected every other study for that of art, and finally quitted the University to place himself under J. D. Fiorillo, well known as the author of a general history of modern painting. After acquiring a good knowledge of the art, he visited many collections, particularly the Dresden Gallery, where he was particularly struck with the works of Raffaele and Paul Veronese. In 1804, at the age of twenty, he first went to Italy, and visited various cities, enjoying at Rome the friendship of Wilhelm and Alexander von Humboldt, Thorwaldsen, and other distinguished individuals. In 1805 he returned to Germany, in the company of Ludwig Tieck, and was honored with the confidence of the crown prince, afterwards King of Bavaria. His literary activity commenced about 1811. In 1815 he revisited Italy, and commenced his labors at Florence, for his celebrated work, the Italienische Forschungen, or Italian Researches, a critical work on the history of art, compiled exclusively from the archives and other original MSS. at Florence. It is in three volumes; the first two were published at Berlin in 1827, and relate to modern art in Italy generally, from its origin to its decline in the 16th century; many errors of Vasari are corrected; much obscurity of the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries is cleared up by authentic documents. The third volume was published in 1831, divided under two heads, which treat chiefly of Raffaele and the architecture of the Middle Ages. It is a work of great interest, abounding in excellent critical and theoretical reflections, and has gained for its author a wide celebrity. Rumohr visited Italy again in 1828, and also in 1837. His taste and judgment in the Fine Arts were frequently consulted by German princes. He wrote a large number of works relating to painting and engraving, which are much esteemed. He died at Dresden in 1843.

RUNCIMAN, ALEXANDER, a Scotch painter, born at Edinburgh in 1736. The accounts of his early life are conflicting. Some say that he was the son of an architect, who instructed him in the rudiments of design, and then apprenticed him to two landscape painters, named Norries. Fuseli says he served his apprenticeship to a coach maker; but at all events, he first painted landscapes. In 1766 he went to Italy with his younger brother John, who was also a painter, and died at Rome. Alexander resided there several years, and pursued his studies under the patronage of Sir James Clerk. On his return, he exhibited some pictures in 1772. The following year he settled at Edinburgh, where he conducted the Academy of Arts recently established in that city. He executed a few historical works, among which are Ulysses surprising Nausicaa at play with her Maids, the Ascension, Lear and his Daughters, and Agrippina carrying the Ashes of Germanicus. He also painted some subjects from Ossian for Sir James Clerk; and executed a few etchings. He died in 1780.

RUOPPOLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Neapolitan painter of fruit, flowers, fish, shells, and other marine objects. According to Dominici, he studied under Paolo Porpora, whom he excelled in fruits, particularly grapes, and was little inferior to him in other subjects. He died about 1685.

RUOPPOLI, GIUSEPPE, a Neapolitan painter, born in 1600, and died in 1659. He studied with Giovanni Baptistello, and painted fruit and flower pieces in a style of excellence.

RUPERT, PRINCE PALATINE OF THE RHINE, was for a long time considered the inventor of the art of engraving in mezzotinto; but Baron Heineken has shown with tolerable clearness that he learned the art of Lient. Colonel de Siegen, an officer in the service of the Landgrave of Hesse, who first engraved in this manner, and executed a portrait of Amelia Elizabeth, Princess of Hesse, as early as 1643. Prince Rupert learned the secret of this gentleman, and introduced the art into England when he went over the second time with Charles II. Laborde also asserts the same thing in his Histoire de la Gravure en manière Noire, Paris, 1839. See article SIEGEN.

Prince Rupert amused himself with etching and mezzotinting. Nagler describes sixteen prints by him, which are very rare. They are usually marked with one of his monograms. There are several of his prints in the British Museum; one, an etching, is dated 1636, and another, a mezzotint called the Executioner, is dated 1658.

RUPPRECHT, FREDERICK CHARLES. a German painter, engraver, and architect, born at Oberzenn, near Anspach, in 1779, and died in 1831. After receiving some instruction at Nuremberg, he went to Dresden, and improved himself by studying the works of the great masters in the Dresden Gallery, particularly those of Claude, Titian, and Paul Potter. He also studied perspective and architecture. In 1802, he made a journey through the south of Germany to study landscape, which was his delight, after nature; but to support himself, he was compelled to have recourse to portrait painting. In his travels, he became acquainted with General Drouet, whose portrait he painted, and those of several of his officers, and accompanied that commander through Germany in the capacity of interpreter.

His best pictures are his landscapes, which are painted both in oil and water-colors. They are drawn with great minuteness, and finished like miniatures; yet they are not mannered, and have the appearance of originality and freedom. His works as a painter are little known out of his country. As an engraver, he executed about twenty-five spirited etchings, mostly from his own designs, which are highly esteemed, and about fifty wooden cuts, a few of them in chiaro-scuro, with two blocks. They are sometimes marked with his name in full, and sometimes with his initials, as F. C. R. f., C. R. f., or R. f. As an architect, he was employed to restore the old Cathedral of Bamberg to its primitive state, and he prepared the plans, drawings, and models for that purpose, but did not live to see the work completed. The Cathedral possesses about one hundred and thirty of his drawings, many of them interesting to the antiquary, as representing many curious objects of ancient date, destroyed or discovered during the progress of the restorations. An account of his life and works, with a portrait, was published at Bamberg in 1843, written by J. Heller.

RUSCHEWEYH, FERDINAND, an eminent modern German designer, engraver, and lithographer, born at Mecklenburg about 1785. He has distinguished himself by his masterly engravings after the works of the most distinguished painters of the modern German school, as Overbeck, Cornelius, Steinle, Schadow, Bendemann, Wagner, and others, whose fame has been widely diffused by his burin. He first studied at Berlin, and afterwards passed some time at Vienna. In 1808 he went to Rome, where he pursued his studies with enthusiasm and assiduity, associating with his talented countrymen, whose tastes were congenial to his own. He resided at Rome till about 1832, and distinguished himself by many admirable productions after Raffaele, Michael Angelo, Giulio Romano, Fiesole, and the antique bassi-relievi, in which he imitated the manner of Marc' Antonio. He also engraved some beautiful plates of illustrations for Goethe's Faust, after designs by Cornelius; of Schiller's Eleusinian Festivals, after Wagner; some sacred and ecclesiastical subjects, after Overbeck; and some plates after the sculptures of Thorwaldsen. In 1832 he returned to his own country, since which time he has executed some admirable plates after the great modern German masters, among which are Christ in the Temple, and Ruth and Boaz, after Overbeck; and the Jews in Exile, after Bendemann. See Frederick Overbeck.

RUSCHI, or RUSCA, FRANCESCO. a Roman painter, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. According to Zanetti, he was a disciple of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, whose manner he adopted, both in his forms and his style of coloring. He is little known at Rome, but he acquired considerable reputation at Venice, Vicenza, and Treviso. Lanzi says his pictures are to be met with in quite good preservation, and are admitted into the collections.

RUSS, CHARLES, a German painter and engraver, born at Vienna in 1779. He acquired some knowledge of the art from two painters named Drechsler and Brand, and afterwards visited Munich in 1804, where he designed about one hundred pictures in the Gallery. On returning to Vienna, he devoted his energies to historical painting, and produced his picture of Tiresias foretelling to Almena the destiny of Hercules, which gained him several commissions from the Archduke John. In 1809, he drew the second prize in the Imperial Academy, for his picture of Hecuba on the Coast of Thrace. In 1810 he was appointed cabinet painter to the Archduke, and in 1818 Keeper of the Belvidere Gallery. He executed many drawings of subjects from Austrian history. His works are lacking in originality; but they evince great application, and profound acquaintance with the principles of art. Russ died in 1843.

RUSSELL, JOHN, an English portrait painter, chiefly in crayons, born at Guildford in 1744. He studied with Francis Cotes, whose style he imitated. He published a work on crayon painting, which was considered valuable in his time, and went through two editions. He was also fond of Astronomy, and constructed a model showing the appearance of the moon, for which he obtained a patent, and published a description, with plates engraved by himself. In 1788, he was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and died in 1806.

RUSSI, GIOVANNI DE, a miniature painter of Mantua, who flourished about 1455. He illustrated for the Duke of Modena the Bible of Este, in large folio, which Lanzi says is one of the rarest specimens of the art in the distinguished collection of that prince.

RUSSO, GIOVANNI PIETRO, a painter of Capua, who died in 1667. According to Dominici, after studying in various schools, visiting Rome, Naples, Venice, and Florence, he settled in his native city, where he executed many excellent altar-pieces, and other subjects, for the churches and public edifices. He is also commended by Lanzi.

RUSTICI, called IL RUSTICO, a painter of Siena, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century. He studied under the Cav. Gio. Antonio Razzi. Lanzi says "he was an excellent painter of grotesque subjects, with which he filled Siena." He had a son named Cristoforo, who also excelled in the same line, and obtained great reputation. There was another painter, named Vincenzo R., who excelled in the same branch, and is supposed to have been a son of Il Rustico.

RUSTICI, FRANCESCO, called IL RUSTICINO, was the son of Cristoforo R., born at Siena about 1595. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with Francesco Vanni. He afterwards went to Rome, where he studied the works of Annibale Caracci, Guido, and Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, and formed an original and graceful style of his own. He possessed great talents, and executed a few choice pictures, but died in the flower of his life in 1625. In the collection of the Grand Duke of Tuscany is a fine picture by him, of an expiring Magdalen, and in the Palazzo Borghese at Rome, an admired picture of St. Sebastian. He also painted some torch-light pieces in the manner of Gherardo dalle Notti.

RUSTICI, GIO. FRANCESCO, a Florentine sculptor of the 16th century, who studied under Verocchio, at the same time with Leonardo da Vinci. Among his principal works are mentioned the statues of Leda, of Neptune, and of Europa; a figure of a woman, and a mounted horseman, both of colossal size. Rustici quitted Florence in 1528, on account of the civil commotions, and went to the court of Francis I., who employed him on the works at Fontainebleau. He remained in France during the rest of his life; the time of his death is not recorded.

RUTA, CLEMENTE, a painter born at Parma in 1688. According to Oretti, he is supposed to have studied first with Ilario Spolverini, a painter of battles, &c. He afterwards studied in the school of Carlo Cignani, at Bologna. After his return to his native state, he entered the service of the Infant Charles of Bourbon, and accompanied that prince to Naples, where he executed many excellent works. He subsequently returned to Parma, where Lanzi says he continued to practise his profession with credit till he lost the use of his eyes, at an advanced age. He painted easel pictures of histories, battles, skirmishes of cavalry, banditti, &c., and his pictures hold a high rank in the collections of Parma. He died there in 1767.

RUVIALE, FRANCISCO, called IL POLIDORINO, a Spanish painter who, according to Dominici, went to Naples, and studied under Polidoro da Caravaggio. This must have been about 1527, as Caravaggio fled to Naples at the sacking of Rome, which happened in that year. He made great progress, imitated his master very happily, and assisted him in his works in the Palazzo Orsini, with subjects illustrative of the history of that noble family. After Caravaggio left Naples, he continued to reside there, and executed some works for the churches and public edifices, the principal of which are a picture of a dead Christ, with the Virgin Mary and St. John, in the chapel of the Royal Tribunal; the Descent from the Cross, in that of the Vicaria Criminale; and others at Monte Oliveto. The greater part of his works have perished, as happened to those of Caravaggio at Rome, from the use of improper grounds or colors.

RUVIALE, SPAGNUOLO, a Spanish painter, who studied under Il Salviati, at Rome, and afterwards assisted Vasari in his works in the Chancery, on which occasion Vasari says he formed himself into a good painter. This was in 1544. Nothing more is known of him; Palomino does not mention him, therefore it is probable he did not return to Spain.

painter, born at Haerlem, according to Houbraken and others, in 1636, though probably at an earlier date, as there are pictures by him dated in 1645. Balkema says he was born in 1640, a glaring error. There is also much uncertainty respecting his history. It is not known under whom he studied, but it is highly probable that he received instruction from his fellow townsman, Nicholas Berghem, who was born in 1624; and it is certain that he was intimate with that artist. Houbraken says that, though he had given extraordinary proof of his ability as a painter at the early age of fourteen, he did not follow the art as a profession till some years later, but devoted himself to the study and practise of surgery; that he afterwards lived in habits of intimacy with Nicholas Berghem, who advised him to devote his attention entirely to painting. Some say that he early showed the most extraordinary talents for painting, and that, at twelve years of age, he produced pictures that were the astonishment of artists; that Berghem and Ruysdael went to Italy, and improved their taste by studying at Rome, and designing from the beautiful scenery in its environs; but others maintain that neither one nor the other was ever in that country. The only thing that seems to favor this supposition is that there are some of Ruysdael's works in the collection of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the Palazzo Riccardi at Florence. Amid all this confusion, when we consider his subjects, style, place of nativity, time of birth, &c., there can be little doubt that he received instruction from Berghem, and afterwards, by an assiduous study of nature, formed a style of his own. However, there is little dispute about his works.

Ruysdael is justly considered one of the most eminent landscape painters of the Dutch school. His pictures generally represent the most interesting views in the vicinity of Haerlem, where he resided most of his life; or occasionally the rocky borders of the Rhine, with cascades and waterfalls, which he treated in a style so admirably picturesque, that in these last subjects he may be said to be unrivalled. He rarely painted a picture without a river, brook, or pool of water, and his general subjects are views of the banks of rivers, with windmills or watermills; hilly grounds, with brooks and cascades, a country interspersed with cottages and huts; solemn scenes of woods and groves, with roads through them, &c. It is evident in his pictures that he designed everything from nature, and he is uncommonly happy in his selections. His grounds are agreeably broken, his trees are of the most pleasing forms and delicately handled, his skies are clear, with light floating clouds, and there is an agreeable freshness in his verdure. He perfectly understood the principles of chiaro-scuro and perspective; his distances have always a fine effect, and his masses of light and shadow are distributed with such judgment as equally to delight the eye and charm the imagination. His coloring is chaste and clear, and his pencilling free and spirited, yet delicate. His talents were not confined to landscapes; he painted sea-pieces with equal success, and his pictures of fresh breezes and gales of wind are admirable. His scenes of torrents and waterfalls are depicted with wonderful force, truth, and grandeur. The pictures of this admired painter are numerous, and are held in the highest esteem. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné of the Dutch and Flemish masters, vols. vi. and ix., gives a descriptive account of 448 pictures by him, but doubtless there are many more which have not come under his notice. His works have also been largely imitated. He did not design the human figure with elegance, and frequently employed Ostade, Vandervelde, and Wouwerman to insert the figures, and such pictures are the most valuable. He also executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, which, though slightly etched, produce a very natural and masterly effect. He died at Haerlem in 1681.

RUYSDAEL, SOLOMON, was the elder brother of the preceding, born at Haerlem in 1616, and died in 1670, according to Houbraken, though there appears to be no certainty about it, as there are pictures by him dated 1673, and most Dutch writers say he was about twenty years older than his brother. He painted landscapes and river views, in which he imitated the manner of John van Goyen, and some suppose him to have been a pupil of that master. His pictures are poor affairs, and are not admitted into choice collections; but he imitated variegated marbles with exact precision.

RUYTER, N. DE, a Flemish engraver of little note, who flourished about 1688. He engraved a few plates, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Paul Pontius, but with no great success.

RUYVEN, PETER VAN. See REUVEN.

RY, PETER DANKERS VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1605. He was a good portrait painter, and went to Stockholm, where he met with much employment, and was appointed court painter to the King Ladislaus IV. He died in 1659.

RYCK, PETER CORNELIUS DE, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1566. He first studied with James Willems, next, with Hubert Jacobs, and afterwards went to Italy, where he studied the works of Giacomo Bassano. On his return to Delft, he painted historical and pastoral subjects in the manner of Bassano, which were esteemed in his day. He died at Delft in 1628.

RYCKAERT, MARTIN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1591. Discovering an early taste for painting, he was placed under the tuition of Tobias Verhaecht, an eminent landscape painter. On leaving his master he went to Italy, where he resided several years, and filled his portfolio with choice designs of the most interesting scenery and objects he met with in his travels, particularly at Rome, and in its vicinity. On his return to Antwerp, he distinguished himself as one of the ablest landscape painters of his time. His pictures, especially in the scenery, resemble the Italian, more than the Flemish school, and he embellished them with architecture, ruins, rocks, mountains, waterfalls, &c., pleasingly diversified. His works are occasionally decorated with figures by John Breughel. He lived on terms of intimacy with Vandyck, who painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country. He died at Antwerp in 1636.

RYCKAERT, DAVID, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1615, according to the best authorities. He was instructed in landscape painting by his father, but the great estimation in which the works of Teniers, Brouwer, and Ostade, were held, induced him to paint similar subjects, in which he was eminently successful. His pictures usually represent conversations, musical parties, assemblies of peasants regaling themselves, chemists' laboratories, &c., though he sometimes adopted subjects of a more elevated character. He gave a lively and expressive character to his heads, his coloring is clear and transparent, and his pencil is light and spirited. He was very fond of representing subjects by candle-light and flambeaux, in which he had a peculiar manner of managing the lights, so as to give them an extraordinary effect. He acquired great reputation, and his works were so much admired, that he could scarcely supply the demand. The Archduke Leopold, a great encourager of art, favored him with his particular protection. In 1651 he was appointed Director of the Academy of Antwerp. Towards the latter part of his life, he frequently painted grotesque and fantastical subjects, such as spectres, incantations, assemblies of witches and devils, and the Temptations of St. Anthony, somewhat in the manner of Peter Breughel. Notwithstanding the disagreeableness of these subjects, he treated them with so much spirit, beauty of penciling and coloring, liveliness of imagination, variety and humor of expression, that they had many admirers, and were eagerly purchased, even by princes. His first works were not so well colored as his later ones, the former being rather too gray, but the latter having a remarkable truth and warmth. The heads of his figures are painted with great art and precision, but he was negligent of his hands and extremities; doubtless to save labor. His pictures are found in the best collections of Flanders and Brabant, but they are rare out of those countries. He died at Antwerp in 1677.

RYCKMAN, NICHOLAS, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about 1620. He engraved some plates after Rubens and other masters, in a style resembling that of Paul Pontius, and probably was a pupil of that master. They are executed with the graver in a neat but formal manner, and his drawing is generally incorrect. The following are among his best prints:

The Adoration of the Magi; after Rubens. The best impressions are before the address of either Gas. Huberti, or Corn. van Merlen. The Entombing of Christ; do. The Holy Family; do. Christ and the Twelve Apostles; do.; thirteen plates. The best impressions are before the address of E. Coninck. Achilles discovered by Ulysses at the court of Lyeomedes; do.

RYDER, THOMAS, an English engraver, born in 1746, and died in 1810. He studied under Bartolozzi, and executed quite a number of plates after the works of Wright, West, Fuseli, Northcote, Stothard, Smirke, Ramberg, Rigaud, Hamilton, and other eminent painters of his day. He was one of the artists employed by Boydell, to engrave the Shakspeare Gallery, for which he executed eight of the large plates. His plates are usually executed in the dotted manner, but sometimes with a combination of the line and stipple, and possess great merit.

RYLAND, WILLIAM WYNNE, an eminent English engraver, born at London in 1732. He first studied with Ravenet, who was at that time established in England. On leaving that master, he went to Paris, and studied design under François Boucher, and engraving with J. P. le Bas. On his return to his native city he acquired distinction in his profession, and was appointed engraver to the King, with a pension of £200 per annum. He was the first who practised chalk engraving (lines composed of dots in imitation of drawings), in England. He executed a large number of prints of various subjects, after the old Italian and modern English masters, which are highly esteemed. He engraved a great many plates after the works of Angelica Kauffmann, which has been regretted, as there is little variety in them, and his time could have been better employed. He engraved fifty-seven plates for the work entitled "A Collection of Prints in imitation of Drawings," published by Charles Rogers, in 2 vols. folio. These, with few exceptions, are after the old Italian masters. He also executed some spirited etchings, sometimes finished with the graver, which Watelet says, one would suppose to be the work of a painter. He left many unfinished plates at his death. This eminent artist, having become involved in pecuniary difficulties, committed forgery, and though there were many mitigating circumstances, he was condemned and executed in 1783, as Dr. Dodd had been about six years before for a like offence. The following are his principal plates :

PORTRAITS.

Fourteen plates engraved for the edition of Walton's Angler, published by Sir John Hawkins in 1760.

RYN, or RHYN, REMBRANDT VAN. See REMBRANDT.

RYNE, JOHN VAN, a Dutch engraver, born in 1712. Little is known of him ; he went to London about 1750, where he resided several years, and executed some plates of views in England and the East Indies. He died in 1760.

RYSBRACK, G., a Dutch painter of flowers, dead game, and still life, who flourished about 1650. Nothing is known of him, further than by his pictures, which are well executed and signed with his name and the date.

RYSBRAECK, or RYSBRECHTS, PETER, a Flemish painter born at Antwerp in 1657. He studied under François Milé, whom he accompanied to Paris. Following the example of his instructor, he studied the works of Niccolo Poussin, and made them his models, which is discernible in all his works. His pictures were so much admired at Paris, that he was solicited to settle in that city ; but though he met with the most flattering encouragement, he preferred to return to his native city, where he exercised his talents with great reputation, and was made Director of the Academy there in 1713. The landscapes of Rysbraeck, are distinguished by a grandeur of style, which, though founded on that of Poussin, possesses sufficient originality to acquit him of the imputation of plagiarism. His coloring is clear and harmonious, his touch broad and free, his figures well designed, and he possessed great facility of hand. There is, however, a want of variety and classic elegance, which, together with a certain monotony in his pictures, places them in a very inferior rank to those of Poussin. There are six etchings by this artist from his own designs ; they are marked P. Rysbraeck pinx. fecit et excudit. He died in 1716. This artist must not be confounded with another painter of the same name, who flourished at Brussels, and painted landscapes, in a style entirely different, possessing little merit.

RYSBRACK, MICHAEL, an eminent Flemish sculptor, the son of Peter Rysbraeck the painter, was born at Antwerp, according to Rogers, in 1693. He studied design under his father, and subsequently acquired a knowledge of sculpture under Michael vander Vorst, with whom he remained about six years. In 1720, he visited England, and first distinguished himself by his small models in clay. At that time, no sculptor had ever been extensively employed in England, but the admirable productions of Rysbraeck soon roused the dormant taste for fine sculptures. The first production that brought him into general notice was his bust of the Earl of Nottingham. He was for some time engaged by Gibbs, who contracted with the original parties for monuments, greatly to his own advantage, and undoubtedly for the artist. The latter, however, shook off all connection with Gibbs, and obtained an extensive practice. He studied exclusively nature and the antique ; his figures are well disposed, and characterized by simplicity and grandeur. He wrought with the greatest energy and constancy, and executed a large number of works. For a period of nearly forty years, he was very extensively employed, and there was scarcely an important work of sculpture undertaken in England, that was not entrusted to his direction.

The first great public work of Rysbrack, was the bronze equestrian statue of William III., erected in Queen's Square at Bristol, in 1733. Scheemakers also competed for this statue, and produced so excellent a model that he was presented with £50 ; although it was rejected for the design of Rysbrack, who received, according to Walpole, £1800 for the work, though another authority says £3000. The monument to Sir Isaac Newton in Westminster Abbey, was executed by Rysbrack from a design of Kent. In 1735, he finished a colossal statue of George II., for the parade of Greenwich Hospital. His most celebrated work, however, is the monument to John, Duke of Marlborough, and his Duchess, at Blenheim. They are represented with their two sons, who died young, supported by History and Fame; in the lower part is a bas-relief representing the surrender of Marshal Tallard. In Westminster Abbey there are also several other monuments by Rysbrack, among which are those of Admiral Vernon, and Richard Kane, governor of Minorca, in the north transept; James, Earl Stanhope, in the north aisle; Sir Godfrey Kneller, in the nave; John Gay, Ben Jonson, and John Milton, in the south transept, or Poet's Corner. Rysbrack also executed a large number of statues of nobles and distinguished personages, among which are those of the Duke of Somerset, at Cambridge; Sir Hans Sloane, in the Botanical Garden at Chelsea; Dr. Radcliffe at Oxford; Charles I., for George Selwyn. Among his principal busts, are those of Alex. Pope, the Duke and Duchess of Argyle, Cromwell, Milton, etc. During the latter years of his life, the practice of Rysbrack sensibly declined, in consequence of the rising fame of Scheemakers and Roubilliac. At the age of seventy, when he relinquished his profession, he was by no means wealthy, notwithstanding his extensive practice; and he disposed of his remaining works at a general sale, also his collection of prints, pictures, drawings, marbles, models, casts, &c., including a large number of his own drawings, which, according to Walpole, were designed in the true taste of the Italian masters. His chief amusement during the last three years of his life, was in making such drawings in bistre. Rysbrack died in 1770.

RYSEN, WERNARD, or WERNER VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Bommel about 1600. He studied under Cornelius Poelemborg, and afterwards went to Italy, where he resided some time. On his return to Holland, he painted landscapes with historical figures, in the style of his instructor, with considerable success. According to Descamps, he abandoned painting, and became a dealer in diamonds and jewels, in which capacity he went to Spain.

RYTHER, AUGUSTINE, an English engraver and printseller, who flourished at London in 1590. He engraved some plates of the Spanish invasion, a curious map of Yorkshire, with views of York and Hull in the corners, and a large plan or bird's-eye view of London and Westminster, engraved on wood, about six feet long by four in height; do. of Cambridge, four feet by three; do. of Oxford on metal, dated 1578. The plates representing the Spanish fleets, and some plans of fortifications and batteries on the river Thames for the protection of London, heretofore attributed to Robert Adams the architect, are clearly shown by Stanley to have been executed by Rytther.

RYX, or RYCKX, NICOLAS, a Flemish painter, born at Bruges in 1637. It is not known under whom he studied, but after having learned the art, he embarked for the Mediterranean, and traveled through several eastern countries, sketching the manners, customs, and habiliments of Oriental people, especially their caravans, camels and modes of traveling. He spent some time in Palestine, and made designs of the most memorable places, especially Jerusalem, and scenes in its vicinity. On his return to Bruges, he painted pictures of those subjects, much in the manner of Vander Kabel, which were much esteemed. He wrought with great facility, executed many works, and was received into the Academy at Bruges in 1667, where he died in 1695.

SAAL, T., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1672. He engraved a variety of vignettes and other book-plates, which are indifferently executed with the graver.

SABBATINI, ANDREA, called also ANDREA DA SALERNO, an eminent painter, born at Salerno, about 1480. According to Dominici, he was the son of an opulent merchant, who intended him for the same profession, but discovering in him a passion for painting, he took him to Naples and placed him under the instruction of Raimo Epifanio, a painter of little celebrity, with whom he continued some time. He was so much captivated with the Assumption of the Virgin by Pietro Perugino in the cathedral, which excited universal applause, that he solicited and received permission of his father to go to Perugia and study with that master. On his way, he met some artists, who recommended him to go to Rome, and place himself under Raffaello, who had then begun to distinguish himself by his great works in the Vatican. He accordingly proceeded to Rome, entered the school of that illustrious painter, where he made such rapid progress, and showed so much ability, that he was entrusted by Raffaello to execute from his designs some of the frescos in the Vatican, in S. Maria della Pace, and in La Torre di Borgia. Here too, he formed an intimate acquaintance with Polidoro da Caravaggio. While he was prosecuting his studies with eminent success, he was summoned to Salerno to attend the death-bed of his father, and he left Rome much sooner than he had intended; yet he had so thoroughly imbibed the principles of Raffaello, that he became a successful emulator of his style. He afterwards established himself at Naples, where he distinguished himself by many works both in oil and fresco, painted for the churches and public edifices; also at Salerno, at Gaeta, and in other cities in the kingdom. He likewise painted much for the collections. Lanzi says, "he was an accomplished copyist of his master's works, and a successful emulator of his style. Compared with his fellow scholars, although he did not rival Giulio Romano, he yet surpassed Raffaellino del Colle and others of that class. He had correctness in his design, selection in his heads and attitudes, a depth of shade, and the muscles rather strongly developed; a breadth in the folding of his drapery, and a coloring that still preserves its freshness after the lapse of so many years." Most of his frescos have unfortunately perished, but there are many oil paintings by him which fully sustain his reputation: of these, the following are among the most esteemed, at Naples; the Assumption of the Virgin in the Cathedral; the Adoration of the Magi in S. Spirito; and the Madonna and Child, with St. Elizabeth and other saints, in S. Domenico Maggiore. His easel pictures of Madonnas, Magdalens, Holy Families, &c., of enchanting beauty, are frequently to be met with in the collections at Naples. He died about 1545, aged 65 years. There is a slight disagreement among writers as to the exact time of his birth and death, but the above dates are given by Dominici, Lanzi, and Zani.

Others place his birth about 1485, and death in 1550.

SABBATINI, LORENZO, called also LORENZO DA BOLOGNA, an eminent painter, born at Bologna, according to Malvasia, Lanzi, and others, about 1540; but Ticozzi says he was born in 1530, and Zani that he operated as early as 1553. It is not known under whom he studied. There is also some discrepancy as to his style and merits. The following sketch by Lanzi is to the point: "Lorenzo Sabbatini, called also Lorenzo da Bologna, was one of the most graceful and delicate painters of his age. I have heard him enumerated among the pupils of Raffaello by keepers of galleries, deceived doubtless by his Holy Families, designed and composed in the best Roman taste, although invariably more feebly colored. I have also seen some of his Holy Virgins and Angels, painted for private ornament, which resemble Parmiggiano. Nor were his altar-pieces inferior, the most celebrated of which is that of St. Michael, engraved by Agostino Caracci, from an altar of S. Giacomo Maggiore, and which he held as an example of gracefulness and beauty to his whole school. He was moreover a fine fresco painter, correct in design, copious in invention, a universal master in the subjects of the piece; and what is still more remarkable, he was very rapid in point of execution. Endowed with such qualities, he was engaged by many noble houses in his native place. On proceeding to Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., according to Baglione, he met with so much success, that even his fleshes and naked figures were highly commended, though this was by no means a branch of his pursuits at Bologna. In the Cappella Paolina, he represented the histories of St. Paul; in the Sala Regia, the picture of Faith, triumphing over Infidelity; in the gallery and lodges of the Vatican, a variety of other pieces, always in competition with the best masters, and always with equal applause. Hence, in the immense list of artists, at that period congregated at Rome, he was selected by the Pope to preside over the works going on in the Vatican, in the enjoyment of which honorable post, he died at an early age in 1577." His most esteemed works in the churches at Bologna, are the Crucifixion in S. Maria delle Grazie; the Assumption of the Virgin in la Morte; St. Gioachino and St. Anna in S. Martino Maggiore; the Four Evangelists, the Four Doctors of the Church, and St. Michael vanquishing the Rebel Angels in S. Giacomo. Lanzi says he painted a Pietà for the sacristy of the church of S. Pietro, from a design by Michael Angelo, a work attributed by some to that master. It is abundantly evident that he possessed great imitative, as well as original powers, and made the works of Michael Angelo, Raffaele, and Parmiggiano his models.

SABBATINI, FRANCESCO, an eminent Sicilian architect, born at Palermo in 1722. After acquiring a liberal education, he studied architecture in his native city, and then visited Rome for improvement. He subsequently visited Naples, where he married the daughter of Luigi Vanvitelli, and was employed by him as superintendent of the magnificent Palazzo Caserta. He was also honored by the King with a lieutenancy in the artillery, and commissioned to erect the Arsenal Armory, and the Cavalry Barracks near the Ponte della Maddalena. When the King succeeded to the Spanish throne as Charles III., at the death of his brother Ferdinand, Sabbatini settled at Madrid, in 1759, under the Royal protection, and was very extensively encouraged. He was highly esteemed for his correct taste, and great professional judgment and skill. He made some additions and alterations at the royal palaces at Madrid, Aranjuez, and at the Prado. Among his chief works in the capitol, are the Custom-House, the magnificent gates of the Alcala and of S. Vincente, and the royal porcelain manufactory at the Buon Retiro. He also designed the mausoleum of Ferdinand VI., in the church de las Salesas; the chapel in honor of Palafox, in the cathedral of Osma; the grand altar in the cathedral at Segovia; besides making many designs for edifices erected in Spanish America, among which were a number of churches, and the Arsenal at Caraccas. Sabbatini rose to considerable military ranks in the Spanish army, being appointed lieutenant-general in 1790, and inspector-general in 1792. He died at Madrid in 1798.

SABINESE, IL. See GENEROLI.

SABLON, PIERRE, a French designer and engraver, born at Chartres, in the department d'Eure et Loire, in 1584. There are only three known prints by him, viz., Lamech and Cain, after Lucas van Leyden; the Good Samaritan, and a medallion portrait of Rabelais.

SACCHETTI, GIO. BATTISTA, an Italian architect, was born at Turin in the early part of the 18th century, and a disciple of Ivora. The latter was employed by King Philip V. of Spain to rebuild the royal palace at Madrid which had been destroyed by fire in 1734, but was prevented by death from completing it, and therefore recommended Sacchetti as his successor. Accordingly, the King invited him to Madrid in 1736. The original design of Ivora was upon a most extraordinary scale, the plan being 1700 feet square; but as the King insisted that the new palace should be precisely as large as the old one, Sacchetti made a new design of 470 feet square, which pleased the monarch. The height of the entablature is 100 feet, although in some parts, owing to the inequalities of the ground, it is 150 feet. There are four projections at the four angles, and another in the centre of the northern façade, which contains the chapel. The ground story is a rustic basement, on which rises a species of order resembling the Ionic, containing three stories; this order consists of half columns, and pilasters on pedestals. In the whole edifice there are no less than nine different floors, which render it too much cut up or crowded, and give it an appearance of littleness, greatly impairing its grandeur. The whole is of granite, except the window ornaments, which are of white Colmenar stone. This great work occupied the attention of Sacchetti so entirely, as to leave him little leisure for any other works of importance, except completing the façade of the palace of St. Ildefonso from the design of Ivora. He was appointed director of the public architectural school at Madrid; and in 1752, at the establishment of the Academy of S. Ferdinando, he was appointed honorary director of that institution, being unable, on account of his various avocations to discharge the duties of an acting director. In 1760, on account of ill health, he was obliged to relinquish the practice of his profession. He died in 1764.

SACCHI, ANDREA, an eminent painter, born at Rome, according to Passeri in 1600, and died in 1661; Pascoli copied the inscription on his tomb in full, by which it appears he died 21st June, 1661, aged 62; Lanzi says "his epitaph in the Stato della Ch. Lateran, gives his age 63 years, 4 months. Others place his birth in 1594 and 1599, but all agree that he died in 1661. He was the son of Benedetto Sacchi, a painter of little note, who instructed him in the rudiments of design. He afterwards studied under Francesco Albano, and was his most distinguished disciple. On leaving the school of Albano, he improved himself by studying the works of Raffaele, Polidoro da Caravaggio, and the antique marbles. Lanzi says he was profoundly skilled in the theory of art, and after its chief, the best colorist of the Roman school. He was slow in his execution, as it was a maxim with him that "the merit of a painter does not consist in giving to the world a large number of works of mediocrity, but a few perfect ones"; hence his pictures are rare. "His compositions," says Lanzi, "do not abound with figures, but every figure appears appropriate to its place, and the attitudes seem not so much chosen by the artist as regulated by the subject itself. Though he did not shun the graceful, he seems to have been born for the grand style—grave miens, majestic attitudes, draperies with broad and simple folds, a sober coloring, and a general tone which gave all his objects a pleasing harmony and a grateful repose to the eye. He seems to have disdained minuteness, and after the example of the ancient sculptors, to have left some parts unfinished; so at least his admirers assert." Mengs, however, is of a different opinion, and ranks Sacchi nearly on a level with Pietro da Cortona; but this is contrary to the opinion of several excellent authors, and certainly, when judged by the strict rules of art, there can be no just comparison between them. The characteristics of Cortona are copiousness, magnificence, and brilliant coloring, to charm the eye, and he was often negligent of design; of Sacchi, simplicity, majesty, sober coloring, and correctness of design, which mainly constitute greatness in art. There was a strong competition between these eminent artists, both men of genius, equally ambitious of immortalizing themselves by their works. Sacchi formed for himself a manner which had no resemblance to that of any other master, and always adhered to it. He distinguished himself so much by his fresco paintings, that he was accounted to have no superior at that time. He was favored with the protection of the Cardinal Barberini, whose palace he decorated with several allegorical works in fresco, which were greatly admired. Several of the churches and public edifices of Rome are embellished with his oil paintings, some of which are ranked among the most admired productions of the Roman school. Such are his celebrated picture of the Death of St. Anna, in S. Carlo; the Angel appearing to St. Joseph in a Dream, the principal altar-piece in S. Giuseppe; St. Andrew, in the Quirinal; St. Augustine, in St. Peter's; and his famous St. Romualdo, in the church of that Saint, which is considered his masterpiece, and is ranked as one of the four great paintings at Rome. This picture was removed from its place by the French, to decorate the Louvre, but was restored by the allies in 1815. It represents the venerable St. Romualdo seated in a solitary valley in the Appennines, surrounded by the monks of his order, expounding to them his reasons for retiring from the world. The subject was a very difficult one to treat (the dress of the order being white), as the great quantity of white drapery tended to produce a sameness of color. The means which he adopted on this occasion to obviate the difficulty have always been admired. He placed a large tree near the foreground, the shade of which serves to break the uniformity, and produce a pleasing variety in the colors, which otherwise would have been monotonous. Everything in the picture seems to breathe tranquillity and repose, the expression in the heads is admirable, and, taken altogether, this picture is the wonder and admiration of artists. There are also some beautiful altar-pieces by him at Perugia, Foligno, Camerino, and other places, which Lanzi says are the pride of those cities. He was a perfect master of perspective, and executed some fine compositions, with a multitude of figures and admirable architecture (perhaps to show that his usual manner was one of choice), which procured him as much applause as his other performances. One of these represented the military sports of the Roman youth on horseback, which was publicly exhibited by order of the pope. He had a great many scholars, and always enjoyed the reputation of a learned, able, and amiable instructor. He had a son named Giuseppe whom he instructed in the art, but he became a conventual monk. There is one of his pictures in the Sacristy of the Apostles at Rome.

SACCHI, ANTONIO, a painter of Como, who, according to Orlandi, studied at Rome, and possessed good abilities. On his return to Lombardy, he undertook to paint the cupola of a church in his native city, but fixing on too high a point of perspective, he made his figures appear so gigantic that the ridicule and mortification he experienced threw him into a fever, of which he died in 1694.

SACCHI, CARLO, a painter born at Pavia in 1617. According to Orlandi, he studied with Il Rosso of Pavia, but Lanzi thinks rather with Carlo Antonio Rossi, a Milanese painter, who wrought in the Cathedral at Pavia about that time. He afterwards went to Rome, where he studied some time, and thence proceeded to Venice, where the works of Paul Veronese were the particular objects of his admiration and imitation, in which he was successful. There is a fine picture by him at the church of the Osservanti at Pavia, representing the Miracle of the Dead resuscitated by St. Jacopo, in which Lanzi says he succeeded admirably in imitating the manner of Veronese, showing himself an excellent colorist, splendid in ornament, and spirited in his attitudes, though somewhat extravagant. He painted mostly easel pictures for individuals, and Lanzi mentions an exquisite picture of Adam and Eve, he saw in the possession of the Cav. Brambilla at Pavia, which he says is entitled to a place in that fine collection. He executed a few etchings, among which are the Adoration of the Shepherds, after Tintoretto; and the Adoration of the Magi, after Veronese. He died at Pavia in 1706, at the great age of 89 years.

SACCHI, GASPARE, a painter born at Imola, who flourished in the first part of the 16th century. There is an altar-piece by him in the sacristy of Castel S. Pietro, in his native city, dated 1517, and another in S. Francesco in Tavola, at Bologna, dated 1521. According to Orlandi, he executed many works for the churches and convents at Ravenna, and other places in the Romagna.

SACCHI, M., a Piedmontese painter, and a native of Casale, commended by Della Valle as one of the ablest scholars of Guglielmo Caccia, called Il Moncalvo, whose style he followed. There are two of his works in the churches of his native city, which, according to Lanzi, show a more energetic pencil, and perhaps a more learned design than his master possessed. He flourished about 1625.

SACCHI, PIETRO FRANCESCO, called IL PAVESE, and by Lomazzo PIERFRANCESCO PAVESE, a painter born at Pavia, of whom there are notices at Milan about 1460, and at Genoa from 1512 to 1526. Lanzi says the style of Sacchi resembles that of Carlo del Mantegna. He was a good perspective painter, delightful in landscape, and a diligent and correct designer in history. There is an altar-piece by him of the Four Doctors of the Church in the Oratory of St. Ugo at Genoa. Lanzi thinks there is some error in the dates given, or that there were two artists of this name.

SACCHI, a family of Mosaic painters, who were employed in the monastery of the Carthusians at Pavia for many years previous to 1783. Lanzi says "they filled the great church of that convent with beautiful mosaic works."

SACCHIATI, PIETRO, an engraver on wood, born at Ravenna about 1598. According to Basan, he executed some wood-cuts, part of them printed in chiaro-scuro, after various masters, but he does not specify them, nor is he mentioned by any other writer.

SACCO, SCIPIONE, a painter born at Cesena, who, according to Francesco Scannelli, was a pupil of Raffaele, though this rests on tradition. There is a picture of St. Gregory, painted in a grand style by him, in the Cathedral of Cesena, inscribed Cæsenas 1545, and another of the Death of St. Peter the Martyr, in the church of S. Domenico. Lanzi says he was doubtless of the school of Raffaele, but not remembered out of Romagna.

SACHTLEVEN, or ZACHTLEVEN. See SAFTLEVEN.

SADELER, JOHN, an eminent Flemish engraver, born at Brussels in 1550. His father was an ornamental engraver on steel and iron, to be inlaid with gold and silver, and brought up his son to the same business. At an early period he applied himself to the study of design, and he drew the human figure correctly, but with the stiffness and formality of his time and country. At the age of twenty he began to engrave on copper, and executed some plates after the designs of Crispin vander Broeck, which met with so much success, that he devoted himself entirely to engraving. He traveled through Germany and Italy, and finally settled at Venice, where he divested himself in a great measure of the dry, hard manner discernible in his earliest works. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear, and masterly style; his drawing is generally correct, and he gave a fine expression to his heads. His works are numerous and highly esteemed. His death is variously placed in 1600 and 1610, but the latest date found on his prints is one executed at Venice in 1600. His prints are sometimes marked with his name, and sometimes with the above monogram. The following are his most esteemed prints. For a full list the reader is referred to Nagler's Lexicon.

SADELER, RAPHAEL, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Brussels in 1555, and brought up to the same business under his father. The success John S. met with as an engraver, induced Raphael to turn his thoughts to the same pursuit, and he became his disciple, traveled with him, and settled with him at Venice, where he died in 1616. His prints are nearly as numerous as those of his brother, equally esteemed, and like them, they are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with boldness and precision. His drawing is generally correct, his extremities carefully marked, and the expression of his heads excellent. The following are his principal plates:

SADELER, EGIDIUS or GILES. This eminent engraver was the nephew and disciple of the two preceding artists, though Zani thinks that he was their brother, born at Antwerp in 1570. He excelled his instructors in design, taste, and command of the graver. He passed some time in Italy, and engraved several plates after the Italian masters. He was afterwards invited to Prague by the Emperor Rodolphus II., who retained him in his service, and assigned him a pension, which he enjoyed till his death, in 1629. He handled the graver with commanding facility, sometimes finishing his plates very highly when the subject required it; at other times his burin is bold and free. His plates are very numerous, many of them from his own designs, and are highly esteemed, particularly his portraits, which are executed in an admirable style, full of expression. The following are his best prints:

SADELER, MARCUS, is supposed to have been a son of John Sadeler, and born at Munich, but there is great uncertainty respecting his paternity and whether he was an engraver at all. This much is certain, that he resided a long time at Venice, where he carried on the business of a print-seller, and it is probable that he inherited the plates of John, Raphael, and Giles S., as many of them were subsequently published by him; none of the first impressions bear his name. Heller ascribes to him a set of fifteen plates copied from Albert Durer's series of Christ's passion; but there is no certainty about this, as the prints are without any signature or date, and no other author mentions any prints by him. The prints referred to are easily distinguished from the originals by their being reversed.

SADELER, RAPHAEL, the Younger, was the son and pupil of the elder Raphael S. Little is known of him, and neither the time of his birth or death are recorded. He accompanied his father to Munich, and assisted him in many of his works, particularly in the illustrations for Rader's "Bavaria Sancta et Pia." He also engraved some plates by himself, which are tastefully executed. His works are so blended with those of his father that it is difficult to distinguish them, but the following are particularized:

The Annunciation; after C. Schwarz. The Virgin and St. Anne embracing the infant Jesus; do. The Holy Family, with his name and date 1613. Venus endeavoring to dissuade Adonis from the Chase; after Titian. Forest Scenery; after Breughel.

SADELER, TOBIAS, is supposed to have been a son of Giles S. He flourished at Vienna about 1675. The following prints are by him. There were several other engravers and publishers of the name of Sadeler, of whom little is known; probably they were the descendants of those already mentioned.

Johann Christian Schulz, ambassador of Wurtemberg, dated 1675. Three pictures of the Virgin in the church of St. Francis at Beehin in Bohemia. The picture of the Virgin in the Dominican church at Budweis in Bohemia. The dancing Peasant and the young Bride; after S. Beham's drawing; signed Tobias Sadeler sc. 1670. This is described as a finely engraved and brilliant piece. The Vignettes to the first part of Priorata's History of Frederick III.

S or S SAENREDAM, JOHN, a Dutch designer and engraver, born, according to the best authorities, at Leyden in 1565, and died in 1607. According to Huber, he studied first under Henry Goltzius, and afterwards with James de Gheyn. He engraved a great number of plates, many of them from his own designs, executed entirely with the graver, in a clear, neat style, and, though his drawing is not very correct, he handled the burin in a very masterly manner. The plates from his own compositions prove him to have been an able and tasteful designer. Bartsch gives a catalogue of one hundred and twenty-three prints by him, of which the following are the most esteemed :

PORTRAITS.

SAENREDAM, PETER, a Dutch painter, was the son of the preceding, born at Assendelft about 1597. He studied under Francis Peter de Greber, but he did not follow the style of that master. He painted architectural pieces, particularly the interiors of churches, in a very neat and correct manner, which were highly esteemed in his own time, and are now extremely rare. He painted a View of the Town House of Haerlem, enlivened by a multitude of figures, representing the solemn entry of Prince Maurice; and in the Museum at Amsterdam, is another fine picture by him, representing the interior of the great church at Haerlem. There are few particulars recorded of him. He died in 1666. His name is sometimes erroneously written Zaenredam or Zaanredam. He signed his pictures P. Saenredam.

SAFTLEVEN, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1606. His name is variously written Saftleven, Sachtleven, Zachtleven, and Zastleven; the first is correct. It is not known under whom he studied, but he settled at Antwerp, where he acquired considerable reputation. He painted drolls and drunken frolics, in which he imitated the style of Adrian Brower; interiors of farm-houses and kitchens, village sports and festivals, in which he emulated David Teniers. Some of his best pictures represent corps de gardes, soldiers playing at cards or amusing themselves, embellished with armor, helmets, and other warlike implements in the foregrounds. These are well designed and drawn, and executed with great spirit. Though his coloring is less clear and harmonious, and his pencil less delicate and spirited than in the productions of the two eminent artists whose styles he followed, his pictures are esteemed, and thought worthy of a place in the best collections. He executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, among which are a set of five grotesque subjects, representing the Five Senses; twelve small plates of Dogs, Cats, Fowls, &c.; and a Landscape, with Goats and a Goatherd, etched in a bold and masterly style. He died in 1673, though writers differ as to the exact time of his birth and death. He marked his prints with one of the following monograms :

C S or C L, or C S
1650 or 1673

SAFTLEVEN, HERMANN
H. inventer was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Rotterdam in 1609. He studied under John van Goyen but he did not follow the style of that master. He diligently studied nature, and applied himself to designing the most picturesque views on the borders of the Rhine and the Meuse; the windings of the rivers, the antique edifices, the woods, the waterfalls, broken grounds, and everything affording picturesque and agreeable materials for embellishing his landscapes, which he painted in a very neat and highly finished style. He decorated his pictures with numerous figures and boats, which are correctly drawn and touched with great neatness and spirit. His coloring is clear and transparent, his skies light and floating and his distances recede with a pleasing and natural degradation. His works are highly esteemed and are found in the choicest collections. His drawings also enrich the portfolios of connoisseurs. He executed a considerable number of spirited and masterly etchings from his own designs, of which Bartsch describes thirty-six, and several more are mentioned by other authors. He resided the greater part of his life at Utrecht, where he died in 1685.

SAGRESTANI, GIOVANNI CAMILLO, a Florentine painter and poet, born in 1660. Lanzi says he studied under Antonio Giusti, and that he was esteemed at Florence, even in the life time of Gabbiani and Gherardini. To profit by the instruction of the best masters, he visited different schools, and for some time attended that of Carlo Cignani, whose manner he adopted. There are some of his works in the churches and public edifices of his native city, having much of the ideal in the heads, and a more florid coloring than was usual with his cotemporaries of the Florentine school. Such is one of his Holy Families in the Madonna de' Ricci. He died in 1731.

SAHLER, OTHO CHRISTIAN, an obscure German goldsmith and engraver, who flourished in the 18th century. He executed some prints in imitation of drawings. There was a C. Sahler, who engraved some portraits.

SAILLIAR, LOUIS, a French engraver, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century. He engraved a few plates, mostly portraits, after various masters. He went to England, where he was employed by the Messrs. Boydell.

SAILMAKER, ISAAC, an English painter of marine subjects, born in 1633, and died in 1721. All that is known of him is that he was employed by Cromwell to paint a view of the fleet before Mardyke. It is also said that he painted a picture of the combined fleet, under the command of Sir George Rooke engaging the French, commanded by the Count de Toulouse, which was engraved in 1714.

SAINT ANDRÉ. See RENARD.

SAINT AUBIN. See AUBIN.

SAINT NON. See NON.

SAINT MAURICE, P. DE, a French amateur engraver, who is said to have etched a few prints, among which is one of an old man playing on the flute, surrounded by five children. He was an officer in the French Guard.

SAINT OURS, a distinguished Swiss painter, born at Geneva, according to the Biographie Universelle, in 1762. After acquiring the elements of the art from his father, who was an excellent designer, he visited Paris at the age of sixteen, and entered the school of Vien. His progress was rapid; in the following year he drew a medal at the exhibition of the French Academy; and in one year afterwards he gained the grand prize for his picture of the Rape of the Sabines. Visiting Rome with the royal pension, he diligently studied the great works of art, and produced several esteemed pictures, among which was a contest of wrestlers, at the Olympic Games. He settled at Geneva in 1792, and executed many estimable historical subjects, as well as portraits. He also painted the representation of an earthquake, distinguished for fine conception and great vigor of penciling. Saint Ours died at Geneva in 1809.

SAITER, or SEITER, CAV. DANIELLO, a German painter, born at Vienna in 1649. He went early to Italy, where he seems to have spent the rest of his life. He first stopped at Venice, where he resided twelve years, and studied under Carlo Loth. From Venice he proceeded to Rome, where he executed several works for the churches, which Pascoli says are incorrect in design, though finely colored. He was next invited to Turin, where he was employed by the court for several years, and distinguished himself so much that he received the honor of knighthood. He painted both in oil and fresco. Lanzi says his cupola in the great Hospital is one of the finest frescos in that capital. He executed many works for the churches at Turin and in various places in the state, and decorated the palaces and villas of the nobility. Lanzi says he formed a style of his own, by studying in all the schools of Italy, and that in his works at Turin we do not find that incorrectness of design attributed to him by Pascoli. "His works in oil are found in the palaces and in the villas, and he has no occasion to fear the proximity of Giovanni Miel himself. He yields to the latter indeed, in grace and beauty, but is superior to him and others in the force and magic of his coloring. His oil pictures are by far the most highly finished of his works, as is seen in a Pietà in the royal collection, which we should say was designed in the Academy of the Caracci." His best works at Rome are St. John preaching in the Wilderness in the church of S. Maria in Vallicella, and a fine picture of the Death of Lucretia in the Spada Palace. He also painted at Venice, but his best works are at Turin. He died in 1705. Some writers call his name Seuter, place his birth in 1642, and say that he painted portraits and engraved; but it is evident that they refer to another artist.

SAITER, SEITER, or SEUTER, JOHN GOTTFRIED, a German designer and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1718. He was instructed in design by J. E. Ridinger, and in engraving by G. M. Preissler. He afterwards went to Italy, and was employed at Florence in engraving a part of the plates from the pictures in the collection of the Marchese Gerini; in the Florentine gallery, and that of Sans Souci. He also copied some mythological prints from Agostino Caracci, published at Venice, which he signed G. G. Saiter; this has led to some confusion (see table of christian names.) He simply rendered his name into Italian. He afterwards returned to his own country, and died in the hospital at Augsburg in 1800. Nagler gives a list of fifty-three prints by him. His name is variously written by authors, as above.

SALA, VITALE, an Italian painter, was born at Cernusco, near Cano, in 1803. At the age of fourteen he visited Milan, and studied under the Professor Mazzola, who lost his right hand at the age of fifty, and afterwards painted with his left. In 1822 and 1823. Sala drew the grand golden medal at the exhibition of the Academy. Among his principal works are mentioned the Arrest of Bernado Visconti; the Departure of Regulus; the Battle of Landriano; and several pictures for the churches. Sala died at Milan in 1835, aged 32 years.

 or  or  SALAERT, or SALLAERTS, ANTHONY, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Brussels in 1571. It is not known under whom he studied, but he acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, and executed several works for the churches in his native city, as well as many others for individuals. One of these, representing a procession of the Company of Archers, possessed sufficient merit to induce the French to carry it to Paris to embellish the Louvre. He also engraved on wood, and executed some cuts in a bold, free style, marked with one of the above monograms. There is some dispute about these prints, but they are considered genuine by the best connoisseurs. He died in 1632.

SALAI, or SALAINO. See SOLARI.

SALAMANCA, ANTONIO, a celebrated Italian print publisher, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century. There is some dispute whether he engraved or not. There is a plate of a Pietà after Michael Angelo, signed Antonius Salamanca

Quod Potuit Imitatus Exculpavit. Two more have been ascribed to him; a portrait of Baccio Bandinelli, and the Creation of Animals, after Raffaele. All other prints with his name have excudit, or excudebat, or A. S., i. e., Antonius Scudebat. He restored many plates by the old masters. The lovers of the fine arts are greatly indebted to Salamanca, Lafreri, and the three Rossi of Rome, for the preservation of many fine works by the old Italian engravers, and for the many engravings each had executed after works that might otherwise have been lost to posterity.

SALERNO, ANDREA DA. See SABBATINI.

SALIMBENI, ARCANGIOLO, a painter born at Siena, whose history is mixed up in the most admirable confusion. Baldinucci expressly says he was born in 1500, and studied under Federigo Zuccaro. Lanzi thinks he might rather have received instructions of Gio. del Tozzo, or Marco Bigio, two Siennese painters, as his principles are entirely different from those of Zuccaro. "He loved precision, more than fulness, in design, and we may even observe in him an attachment to the manner of Pietro Perugino, as has been observed by Della Valle, with regard to a Crucifixion with six saints in the parish church of Lusingnano." It is known, however, that he studied at Rome, and during his residence in that city, he might have contracted a friendship with Zuccaro. He executed many works for the churches and convents of his native city, as well as for individuals. In these, Lanzi says he appears wholly modern, as in his picture of St. Peter the Martyr, in the convent of the Dominicans, which is dated 1579. "This date, says Lanzi, must be false, as the widow of Archangiolo married again, and bore Francesco Vanni in 1565, consequently the latter could not have been a scholar of Archangiolo, though such an idea is prevalent, and he could give lessons only for a short time to his son Ventura," (born in 1557! so carelessly do the best authors sometimes write), "or to Sorri and Casolani, if the period of their birth is true." Zani places his birth in 1536, and his death in 1583. Others place his death in 1563. The truth doubtless is, that Salimbeni married the widow of Vanni, as is expressly stated by several writers in the life of the Cav. Francesco Vanni, which reconciles the contradictory statements. See Vanni.

SALIMBENI, CAVALIERE VENTURA, called also IL CAV. BEVILACQUA, was the son of the preceding, born at Siena in 1557. There is some discrepancy respecting the early history of this eminent artist, about which there is no certainty, and which is of no importance. All are agreed that he received his first instructions from his father, and afterwards improved himself by visiting the different cities of Lombardy, and sketching the works of the best masters, especially those of Correggio and Parmiggiano at Parma and Modena. He afterwards went to Rome, where he executed many works for the churches, and was employed by Sixtus V. in the Library of the Vatican, and in the palace of St. John of Lateran. Baglioni enumerates several of his works at Rome, the principal of which are the Baptism of Christ, and Abraham entertaining the Angels in del Gesù; the Circumcision in S. Simeone de Lancellotti; and the Annunciation in S. Maria Maggiore. He also painted some ceilings in conjunction with his half-brother Francesco Vanni. He next visited Florence, where, in competition with Bernardino Barbatelli, called Il Poccetti, he painted several pictures of the history of the Virgin in the cloister of the Servi. He also executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Siena, Perugia, Foligno, Lucca, Pavia, Genoa, and other cities. His Marriage of the Virgin, in the cathedral of Foligno; and his St. Gregory in the church of S. Pietro at Perugia, are highly commended.

Cav. Ventura possessed a ready and fertile invention, an elegant and graceful taste in design, and a delicate, sweet, and harmonious coloring. Lanzi says, "in conjunction with Vanni, he executed some ceilings, and, perhaps, derived advantage from observing his practice. In many of his works he resembles him in his imitation of Baroccio, and hardly yields to him in grace of contour, in expression, and in delicacy and clearness of coloring." There is, however, a great difference in his works, as he fell into dissipated habits. He lived on terms of intimacy with Agostino Tassi, and that artist sometimes painted the landscape and backgrounds of his pictures, especially those he executed at Genoa. He is sometimes called Il Bevilacqua, a surname conferred upon him by the Cardinal Bevilacqua, when he knighted him in Perugia. He also executed a few masterly etchings from his own designs; Bartsch gives a list of only seven, which he thinks is complete, as follows: the Marriage of the Virgin, the Salutation, the Baptism of Christ, the Destination of the Holy Virgin, the Virgin and Infant, St. Agnes and Sts. Anne and Joachim. He died at Siena in 1613.

SALINCORNO, MIRABELLO DA, called also CAVALORI, a Florentine painter, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century. He studied under Ridolfo Ghirlandajo, and painted chiefly cabinet pictures. Lanzi mentions one of the Annunciation, dated 1565. He also assisted in the decorations for the obsequies of Michael Angelo. Zani says he operated as late as 1578.

SALINI, CAV. TOMMASO, a painter born at Rome about 1560. He was the son of a Florentine sculptor, who placed him under the instruction of Baccio Pintelli, a painter of little note. Without the advantage of superior instruction, by studying the works of the best masters, he became an excellent painter of history, and particularly excelled in flowers and fruits. He executed several works for the churches at Rome, which are commended by Baglioni, the principal of which are an altar-piece of the Martyrdom of St. Agnes in the church of that saint; St. Tommaso da Villanova giving alms to the Poor, and a picture of St. Nicholas, in that of S. Agostino. Lanzi says, "he was the first who composed vases of flowers, accompanied with beautiful groups of corresponding foliage and other elegant designs." He was principally employed in painting easel pictures for the collections, which were eagerly sought after, and purchased at high prices. He died at Rome in 1625. The above dates are given by Lanzi; Zani says he was born in 1581, and died in 1631. Others place his birth in 1575, and death in 1625.

SALIS, CARLO, a painter born at Verona in 1680. He first studied under Giuseppe dal Sole at Bologna, and afterwards with Antonio Balestra at Venice, whose style he adopted with success. He executed several works for the churches in the Venetian states. One of his most esteemed productions, is an altar-piece representing St. Vincenzo administering to the sick, in the church of that saint, at Bergamo, which Lanzi says "is finely mellowed, and uncommonly spirited, approaching very near to Balestra's style, especially in the handling of his colors." He died in 1763.

SALLIETH, MATHIAS DE, a German designer and engraver, born at Prague in 1749. He first studied with J. E. Mansfeld at Vienna, and afterwards at Paris with J. Ph. le Bas. He resided several years at Paris, and engraved some of the plates for Choiseul-Gouffier's Voyage pittoresque en France; and for La Gallerie de le Brun. He afterwards went to Holland, and there engraved some marines and battle-pieces from his own designs and after the Dutch masters. The time of his death is not known.

SALM, A. VAN, a Dutch painter of marines and views in Holland, in black and white, in imitation of pen-drawings. His pictures are neatly executed, but have little more effect than a print. The elder Vander Velde designed many marines in a similar manner. They are esteemed by some as curiosities of art. Salm flourished about 1650.

SALMEGGIA, ENEA, called IL TALPINO, (the Mole, slow.) an eminent painter, born at Bergamo about 1556. After studying in the schools of the Campi at Cremona, and of the Procaccini at Milan, he proceeded to Rome, where, according to Orlandi, he devoted himself fourteen years to the models of Raffaello, and emulated his manner during the rest of his life. Orlandi and other writers extol his picture of S. Vittore at the Olivetani at Milan, and some of his other works, as worthy of the school of Raffaello, to whom they have even been ascribed. He executed many works for the churches at Bergamo and Milan; in the former city, the most remarkable are the St. Vitore before mentioned; the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Maria Maggiore; the Martyrdom of St. Agatha, at the Teatini; the Descent from the Cross, in S. Leonardo; the great altar-piece in Santa Grata, representing the Virgin and infant Jesus in the Clouds, crowned with glory, with a choir of Angels, and several Saints below; another grand altar-piece of the same subject, in Santa Marta. In both the last named works he observed the same general composition; in that of Santa Marta, Lanzi says, "he introduced a splendid variety of foreshortenings, of attitudes, and of lineaments; he even inserted the city of Bergamo, with some fine architecture, in the style of Paolo Veronese. The figures are arranged with extreme care, among which appears a bishop, in his sacred paraphernalia, that reminds us of Titian himself." At Milan, in the church of La Passione, are two of his finest works, representing Christ's Sermon on the Mount, and the Flagellation. His pictures for private ornament are rare, extremely valuable, and only to be found in the collections of Bergamo and Milan; there are several in the Royal Gallery in the latter city. "Whoever attentively examines the best works of Salmeggia," says Lanzi, "will not feel inclined to refuse him one of the most distinguished places in the ranks of the followers of Raffaello. The clearness of his contours, though sometimes bordering on the minute, the expression of his youthful countenances, the smoothness of his pencil, and the flow of his drapery, together with a certain graceful air in the expressions and the motions, sufficiently mark him for an admirer of that sovereign master, how much soever inferior to him in point of dignity, in imitation of the antique, and in felicity of composition. His method of coloring was also different; he affects a greater variety of colors in his draperies; the tints in a large portion of his works are at present faded, and the shades, as in the works of other painters of the same period, are much changed; yet it is probable that this great artist, as it has been observed of Poussin and of Raffaello himself, did not always bestow the same degree of care upon his coloring, satisfied with displaying, from time to time, his surpassing excellence in this department." He died at Bergamo, according to Tassi, in 1626; Lanzi says he died old, in 1626; and Zani places his death in 1610.

SALMEGGIA, FRANCESCO and CHIARA, were the son and daughter of the preceding. Lanzi says of them, "although educated by their father, they succeeded rather in imitating his studies and his figures, than in thoroughly penetrating into the principles of his art. The fruits of a good education are sufficiently apparent in them, and when placed in competition with some of their contemporaries they appear, if not very animated, at least very sedulous artists, and greatly exempt from the faults of the mannerists. Bergamo is in possession of many of their public works, in some of the best of which the father is supposed to have afforded them his assistance." They are also commended by the Conte Tassi, in his Vite de Pittori Bergamaschi. The times of their birth and death are not known. Several of their works are dated from 1624 to 1628.

SALMERON, CRISTOBAL GARCIA, a Spanish painter, born at Cuenca in 1603. He studied under Pedro Orrente, and acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history and animals. He executed some works for the churches, one of the most esteemed of which is a picture of the Nativity, in the church of San Francisco at Cuenca. He also painted a celebrated picture of a Bull Fight, by the order of Philip IV., given in honor of the birth-day of Charles II. of Spain. He died in 1666.

SALMERON, FRANCISCO, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Cuenca in 1608, and died in 1632. The account given of him by Cean Bermudez, is ridiculous. He studied under Pedro Orrente, and afterwards, "by analyzing the works of Titian, Veronese, Tintoretto, and the Bassans, he formed for himself a style of coloring so brilliant, that no other palette was ever equal to it; it was in effect dazzling."

SALMINCIO, ANDREA, a Bolognese engraver, who studied under Gio. Luigi Valesio, and flourished about 1640. He engraved some plates, both on wood and copper, marked with the above monogram. They are indifferently executed.

SALOMON, JEAN, called by the Italians, GIOVANNI GALLO, JOHANNES GALLUS, L' INFANTE GALLO, and by other appellations indicative of his country. According to Zani, this artist was the son of Solomon Bernard, called little Bernard, whose real name he says was Bernard Salomon. He says that the elder Salomon operated from 1547 to 1580, and the younger from 1550 to 1590.

He denies that Bernard ever engraved on wood, but he calls Jean "the prince of the little masters on wood, or the Callot of engraving on wood." He pursues the subject con amore, but does not advance anything conclusive, as no prints are mentioned bearing his signature or mark. The Italian writers mention Bernardo Gallo, a Frenchman, as an engraver on wood, and it is evident that the prints attributed to him were executed by Solomon Bernard. See Solomon Bernard, and Bernardo Gallo.

SALTARELLO, LUCA, a painter born at Genoa in 1610. He studied under Domenico Fiasella, and gave early proofs of extraordinary talents. Soon after leaving his master, he went to Rome in search of improvement, where he fell a victim to his unremitting assiduity, in the flower of his life, about 1635. Lanzi says "he left a picture of St. Benedetto restoring a dead person to life, in the church of S. Stefano at Genoa, a picture of sober coloring, beautifully harmonized, and full of expression and knowledge, which sufficiently proves that he had capacity to have formed an epoch in his school, had he lived."

SALTZBURGER, P., a German engraver on wood, who flourished about 1580. He executed some cuts, mostly after the designs of Jost Amman. They are usually marked with one of the above monograms, but sometimes with his initials, P. S., separate.

SALVESTRINI, BARTOLOMEO, a Florentine painter who, according to Baldinucci, studied under Giovanni Bilivert, and was one of the most successful imitators of his style; but he was cut off in the prime of life by the great plague, in 1630, so disastrous to Italy and to art.

SALVETTI, FRANCESCO, a Florentine painter, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. According to Lanzi, he studied under Antonio Domenico Gabbiani, and was a successful imitator of his style. Little more is known of him.

SALVI, TARQUINIO, a painter born at the castle of Sassoferrato, near Urbino, whose history is very obscure. There is a large picture in the church of the Eremitani at Sassoferrato, representing some monks at their devotions, dated 1573.

SALVI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, called IL SASSOFERRATO, from the place of his nativity. Though this eminent painter acquired distinction in his time, and his works are held in high estimation, especially in Italy, there is a surprising contradiction among writers, even of his own country, as to the time of his birth and death, history and merits; therefore, we shall give Lanzi's account, who, considering the life of this painter a desideratum, went to Sassoferrato after he had published the first edition of his History of Painting, where, assisted by the researches of Monsignore Massajoli Bishop of Nocera, he obtained much valuable and long desired information. He was the son of Tarquinio Salvi, was born at Sassoferrato, on the 11th of July, 1605, and died at Rome on the 8th of August, 1685. In his life of Carlo Dolci, he says, "Dolci holds the same rank in the Florentine as Sassoferrato does in the Roman school. Both, though destitute of great powers of invention, obtained high reputation for Madonnas and similar small subjects, which have now become extremely valuable; for the wealthy, desirous of possessing pictures at once so estimable and religious, to hang up in their oratories, have brought these masters into great request. Carlo is not so celebrated for beauty (for he was a mere naturalist), as for the exquisite pains with which he finished everything, and the genuine expression of certain affecting emotions, such as the patient sufferings of Christ or of the Virgin Mary, the penitential compunctions of a Saint, or the holy confidence of a martyr, devoting himself as a victim to the living God. The coloring and general tone of his pictures accord with the idea of the passion; nothing is turgid or bold; all is modesty, repose, and placid harmony."

Again, in his life of Sassoferrato, he says: "Sassoferrato excelled Dolci in the beauty of his Madonnas, but yields to him in the fineness of his pencil. Their styles were dissimilar, Salvi having formed himself on different models. He first studied under his father Tarquinio in his native place, then in Rome, and afterwards at Naples; it is not known precisely under what masters, except in his MS. Memoirs we read of one Domenico, at Naples. The period in which Salvi studied corresponds in a remarkable manner with the time in which Domenichino was employed at Naples, and his manner of painting shows that he adopted the style of that master, though not exclusively. I have seen in the possession of his heirs at Sassoferrato, many copies from the first masters, which he executed for his own pleasure. I observed several from Albano, Guido, Barocci, and Raffaele, reduced to a small size, and painted, as one may say, all in one breath. There are also some landscapes of his composition, and a vast number of portraits; several of St. John the Baptist, but more than all, of the Madonna. Though not possessing the ideal of the Greeks, he has yet a style of countenance peculiarly appropriate to the Virgin, in which an air of humility predominates, and the simplicity of the dress and the attire of the head corresponds with the expression of the features, without at the same time lessening the dignity of the character. He painted with a flowing pencil, and had a fine relief and chiaro-scuro; but in his local tints he is somewhat hard. He delighted most in designing heads with a part of the bust, which frequently occur in collections; his portraits are very often of the size of life, and of that size, or larger, is a Madonna by him, with the infant Christ, in the Casali palace at Rome. The picture of the Rosario, which he painted at S. Sabina, is one of the smallest pictures in Rome. It is nevertheless well composed, and conducted with unusual spirit, and is regarded as a gem. In other places, the largest picture by him is to be seen in an altarpiece in the Cathedral of Montefiascone." The above admirable account is entirely different from that given by any other author, and perfectly accords with his genuine works. There was another Sassoferrato, a disciple of Gio. Francesco Penni, born in 1504, and died in 1590. It is evident that many of the works attributed to Il Sassoferrato, "executed in a dry manner," were the productions of his father, or the other Sassoferrato. It also reconciles the contradictory accounts of those writers who state that he flourished at a much earlier period.

SALVI, NICCOLO, an eminent Roman architect, was born in 1699. After acquiring a liberal education, he entered the school of Antonio Cannevari, where he studied the maxims of Vitruvius, and the best models, both ancient and modern. After making considerable progress, he was entrusted with the erection of a temporary edifice for a festal occasion, representing the Temple of Glory, one hundred and ninety feet high, with four façades of architecture in relief. Cannevari being invited to Portugal by King John V., all of his employments were entrusted to his pupil Salvi, who was appointed pontifical architect. He executed a large number of works at Rome, in a slender, elegant, and simple style, not exempt from defects; among which were the Baptistery of St. Paolo, without the walls; the grand altar of St. Eustachio; and the church of S. Maria in Grado, for the Dominicans of Viterbo. His greatest work, however, was the fountain of Trevi, erected during the pontificate of Clement XII. The Ocean is represented by a gigantic figure standing on a shell, drawn by two marine horses, guided by Tritons; these are in the midst of an immense mass of rocks, from which the water flows in various ways. In the centre is a beautiful niche, with Ionic columns, from which the principal figure appears to issue; on each side are two Corinthian columns, which contain two stories; and between the intercolumniations are the statues and bas-reliefs. Over the entablature are four statues, plumb with the four columns; above, there is an attic with the arms of the Corsini family, and a balustrade at the sides; receding a little on each side are four Corinthian columns, containing two orders of windows; and over the entablature is an attic, lower than that of the centre, with small windows, between which are festoons. According to Milizia, this fountain is rich, superb, and magnificent, justly considered the best work produced at Rome during the 18th century. It occupied Salvi thirteen years, partially in consequence of the intrigues of his enemies, who caused continual interruptions; in order to complete it, he declined designing the façade of the Cathedral at Milan, the superintendence of the royal edifice of the Caserta, and the Reclusorio; he also refused the invitation of the Turin court, to continue the works left unfinished by Ivara. Being constantly obliged to enter the aqueducts of the Acqua Virgine, his naturally delicate constitution was enfeebled by the exposure; he became paralytic, and died in 1751. Among his pupils was Signor Giansimone, afterwards architect of Rome.

SALVIATI, FRANCESCO ROSSI, called also IL SALVIATI, and sometimes CECCHINO DE' SALVIATI, an eminent Florentine painter, born in 1510. He was a fellow-student with Giorgio Vasari, first under Andrea del Sarto, and next under Baccio Bandinelli. The two young friends afterwards pursued their studies at Rome with the same intimacy, and adopted similar principles. The genius of Salviati, however, directed him to a more correct design, and to a grander and more animated style than that of his companion, and Vasari himself celebrates him as one of the ablest artists of his time. He soon acquired distinction, and was taken under the protection of the Cardinal Salviati, and permitted to bear the name of his patron. He painted the Annunciation, and Christ appearing to St. Peter, in the church of La Pace, and soon afterwards embellished the vault of the chapel of his patron with a series of frescos representing the History of St. John the Baptist, which added greatly to his reputation. He was employed by the Prince Farnese to execute the cartoons for the tapestry of his palace, in which he represented the History of Alexander. In conjunction with Vasari, he was employed by Pius IV. to decorate the apartments of the Cancellaria with several frescos; and it was the intention of the pope to have confided all the works in the Sala Regia to Salviati, but at the intercession of Michael Angelo, in order to expedite the work, he gave one-half to Salviati, and the other to Ricciarelli. From Rome Salviati proceeded to Venice, where he executed several works for the public edifices, and others for individuals; the most remarkable of which is the History of Psyche, in the Palazzo Grimaldi, and which Vasari, with a partiality for his friend and countryman, styles La piu bell' opera de pittura che sia in tutta Venezia. He afterwards traveled through Lombardy, and made some stay at Mantua, where he was delighted with the works of Giulio Romano in the Palazzo del Te. He next visited Florence, and was employed by the Grand Duke to decorate a saloon in the Palazzo Vecchio, where he represented the Victory and Triumph of Furius Camillus. These works are designed and painted with great genius and spirit, and the accuracy with which he delineated the costumes, habiliments, and arms of the ancient Romans, is worthy of a learned antiquary. At the invitation of the Cardinal de Lorraine, he accompanied that prelate to France, where Francis I. had engaged some of the ablest artists of Italy in the decoration of the Palace at Fontainebleau. He was received with distinction by the French monarch, and treated with great kindness by Primaticcio, the superintendent of the works. He painted a fine picture of the Descent from the Cross, in the church of the Celestines, and was afterwards employed in the palace at Fontainebleau; but he soon quarrelled with his associates, and returned to Rome, where he fell into new contentions with Daniello da Volterra, Pietro Ligorio, and most of the artists of the time. He was a man naturally of a proud, haughty, overbearing, and turbulent disposition, which led him into continual strifes with his cotemporaries, and is said to have shortened his life. The continued agitation of his mind brought on a fever, of which he died at Rome, in 1563.

Salviati painted with equal success in fresco, in distemper, and in oil. His restless disposition did not permit him to remain long in one place after he first left Rome, and his works are widely scattered throughout Italy, in the public edifices, as well as in the palaces of the nobility. He also painted portraits with great success, and his picture of Arcino, the satirist, which was sent to Francis I., gained him immense applause. He possessed a rich and fertile invention, his compositions are original and abundant, and he embellished his works with magnificent architecture. He was one of the few who have been able to combine celerity of pencil with correctness of design, for which he was distinguished, though sometimes bordering on the gigantic. Although he is more esteemed as a designer than a colorist, his carnations are delicate and tender, his figures graceful, and the folding of his draperies broad and simple, without concealing the beauty of his forms. He particuarly excelled in the naked. With the possession of such powers, which might, perhaps, have placed him at the head of all his cotemporaries, his rancorous and envious disposition prompted him to vilify the works of others, and to extol his own, and by the injustice and impolicy of his conduct, he frequently had the mortification to find rivals preferred to him whose talents were unworthy of his competition.

SALVIATI, GIUSEPPE DEL. See GIUSEPPE PORTA.

SALVIONI, ROSALBA MARIA, a Roman painter, born in 1658 and died in 1708. She studied under Sebastiano Conca, but devoted herself entirely to portraits, which she executed in a style of excellence and truthfulness that gained her considerable distinction.

SALVOLINI. See EPISCOPIO.

SALVUCCI, MATTEO, a painter who, according to Pascoli, was born at Perugia about 1570, and died about 1628. After acquiring considerable reputation in his native city, he went to Rome, where he was kindly received by the Pope; yet from his inconstant disposition he did not remain long there. No authentic works are mentioned by his biographer.

SALWAY, N., an English mezzotinto engraver, who flourished about 1760, and executed some portraits, which possess considerable merit.

SALY, JACQUES FRANÇOIS, a French sculptor, born at Valenciennes in 1717. He was invited to the Court of Denmark, where he executed an equestrian statue of King Frederick V., of which there is a print by J. M. Preissler. He also executed several other statues in marble and bronze. He etched, in a spirited style, a set of thirty plates of vases, and four of monuments, from his own designs. He died in 1776.

SAM, ENGEL or ANGELO, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1699, and died in 1769. He was a good portrait painter, and is said to have excelled in familiar subjects, in which he imitated the manners of Vanderwerf and Metz, two very opposite masters, with great success.

SAMBIN, HUGUES, a French architect, a native of Dijon, who flourished in the latter half of the 16th century. According to the Biographie Universelle, he was a scholar of Michael Angelo. In concert with his son-in-law, Gaudrillet, he executed several good works at Dijon, among which were the beautiful portal of the church of S. Michael, and the domes surmounting its three arcades, erected after his designs. In 1572, Sambin published a folio work at Lyons, embellished with thirty-six plates, entitled Œuvre de la diversité des termes dont on use en architecture.

SAMACCHINI, ORAZIO, an eminent painter, born at Bologna in 1532. According to Malvasia, he was a disciple of Pellegrino Tibaldi, but improved himself by studying the works of Correggio, whose style he emulated with success. He was employed to paint in fresco the great chapel in the Cathedral at Parma, contiguous to the famous cupola by that distinguished master. He was invited to Rome by Pius IV., and employed in conjunction with Marco da Siena, and other artists of distinction, to decorate the Sala Regia.

Having completed this engagement he returned to his native city, where he executed many admirable works for the churches and palaces, both in oil and fresco. The most remarkable are the Coronation of the Virgin in the church of Sts. Naborre e Felice, so much applauded by the Caracci; the famous Presentation in S. Giacomo Maggiore; the Crucifixion, in La Trinita; an altar-piece of the Last Supper, in the Certosa; and the Fall of Icarus, in the Palazzo Lambertini. The following admirable critique is condensed from Lanzi:

"He more nearly approached Correggio than any Bolognese artist of that age. On proceeding to Rome, he succeeded in catching a taste of the Roman school, for which he was praised by Vasari, and afterwards by Borghini and Lomazzo. In this new style, however, he contrived to please others more than himself, and on his return to Bologna he was accustomed to lament that he had ever removed from upper Italy, where he might have carried his early manner to greater perfection. Still he had no reason to be dissatisfied with what he had gathered and moulded by his own genius, so as to exhibit something novel and singular in every character. In his altar-piece of the Purification, in S. Jacopo, all is exquisite delicacy; the leading figures enchant us by a majestic yet tender expression of piety, while those of the infant figures, seen conversing near the altar, and that of a young girl holding a little basket with two doves, gazing on them in so peculiar a manner, delight us with their mingled simplicity and grace. Skillful judges, even, can take no exceptions, unless it be too great diligence, with which, during several years, he had studied and polished this single picture. This work, as one of the most celebrated of its school, was engraved by Agostino Caracci; and even Guido seems to have availed himself of it, in his Presentation in the Cathedral at Modena. Yet Samacchini was an equally powerful artist when his subject required it. His chapel in the Cathedral at Parma is highly commended, though his most vigorous effort is shown in the ceiling of the church of S. Abbondio, at Cremona. The grand and the terrible seem to strive for the mastery in the figures of the prophets, in all their actions and positions; the most difficult from confinement of space, yet the best arranged and imagined. There is, moreover, a truth in the shortenings, and a skilful use of the sotto in su (fore-shortening of the figures), which appears in this instance as though he had purposely selected the most difficult portion of the art in order to triumph over it. His forte is believed to have consisted in grand undertakings in fresco, on which he impressed, as it were, the seal of a vast spirit, at once resolute and earnest, without altering it by corrections and retouches, with which he labored his oil paintings." He died in 1577, in the prime of life. Vasari erroneously calls his name Fumaccini, and Lomazzo Somachino.

SAMENGO, AMBROGIO, a Genoese painter, who, according to Soprani, studied under Gio. Andrea Ferrari, and was an excellent landscape painter. Lanzi commends his landscapes, which are rare, as he died at an early age.

SAMELING, BENJAMIN, a Flemish painter, born at Ghent in 1520, and died in 1571. He studied under Francis Floris, and painted history and portraits in the style of his instructor.

SAMMARTINO. SAN MARTINO, or SANMARCHI, MARCO, an Italian painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He painted landscapes and history, but particularly excelled in landscapes, ornamented with beautiful little figures in exquisite taste. Lanzi says his works are frequently to be met with throughout Romagna, particularly at Rimini, where he resided some time. He also attempted more extensive works, as seen in his Baptism of Constantine, in the Cathedral of Rimini, and St. John preaching in the Desert, in the College of S. Vincenzio at Venice. He was less successful in these. There is some question as to his real name, and place of nativity. According to the Guida di Rimino, he was a Neapolitan, named Sammartino, and his picture in the Cathedral is dated 1680. Zanetti and Guarienti call him by the same name, and say that he was a Venetian; and the last declares that he passed most of his life at Venice. Guarienti, in his next article, gives the name of Marco Sanmarchi, a Venetian who flourished at the same time, and extols him as an excellent landscape and figure painter on a small scale. Malvasia gives the same account. Lanzi has no doubt but they are one and the same artist.

SAN-ANTONIO, FRAY BARTOLOMÉ DE, a Spanish painter, born at Cienpozuelos in 1708. At the age of fifteen he became a monk of the order of the Trinitarios descalzos, at Madrid, and after studying philosophy and theology, he went to Rome to study painting, the elements of which he had already acquired at Madrid, having a taste and talent for painting. After a residence of six years in Italy, he returned to his convent in 1740, where he spent the rest of his life in embellishing it with many works of a sacred character, both in oil and fresco, which are said to possess great merit.—Those old monks were shrewd fellows; knowing the advantages which superb works of art conferred on their convents, and how much money they brought into their coffers by attracting visitors, they were always liberal patrons of artists, especially when they found a superstitious one, who would exchange his services for their prayers; or a talented novice, whom they could educate. San Antonio died in 1782.

SAN BERNARDO, IL VECCHIO DI. See MINZOCCHI.

SANCHEZ, ALONZO, a Spanish painter who, according to Bermudez, was employed in conjunction with three other artists, in painting the beautiful frescos in the University of Alcalá de Henares, founded by Cardinal Cisneros. In 1508 he was employed, in conjunction with Diego Lopez and Luis de Medina, in decorating the Cathedral of Toledo.

SANCHEZ, CLEMENTE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Valladolid about 1620. He executed some works for the churches and convents, which prove him to have been an able designer and a good colorist. He painted several pictures for the convent of the Dominicans, among which are the Visitation of the Virgin, the Marriage of the Virgin, the Virgin of the Rosary, a Magdalen, and a small oratory, representing the Virgin and Infant, with the infant St. John and other Saints.

SANCHEZ-COELLO. See COELLO.

SANCHEZ-COTAN, FRAY JUAN, an eminent Spanish painter, born at Alcázar de San Juan in 1561. He studied at Toledo, under Blas de Prado, whose style he is said to have imitated. He excelled in painting subjects of still-life, called by the Spanish bodegones, consisting of fruit, flowers, fish, game, and vegetables of all sorts, profusely collected in the larder, like those of Snyders, De Vos, Van Utrecht, and other Dutch and Flemish masters. He also painted Madonnas with chaplets of flowers and other similar subjects.—The account of him is so bombastic and confused that no correct opinion can be formed of his merits. His principal works are in the Carthusian monasteries at Paular and Granada; at the Agustinos Calzados in the latter city, and at the Merced Calzada at Seville. He painted many subjects relating to the passion of Christ, the sorrows of the Virgin, sufferings and persecutions of saints, &c. According to Palomino, he painted a picture of the Crucifixion so naturally that (like Zeuxis' grapes) the birds came to light on the cross; and when he painted St. Ildefonso receiving the Miraculous Chasuble from the Virgin, she descended from heaven and honored the painter with a sitting (related on the authority of the monks of the convent). Vincenzio Carducho made a journey from Madrid to Granada, expressly to see him and his works, and he at once singled him out among the monks as the painter he sought for, from the serenity of his countenance being in accordance with the style of his pictures. "This amiable man and excellent artist died at Granada in 1627; he was reckoned one of the most venerable monks, and also one of the best painters of Spain."

SANCHEZ, FELIPE, a Spanish architect, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. His principal work is mentioned by Milizia—the celebrated Pantheon or sepulchral chapel of the illustrious family dell' Infantado, in the church of S. Francisco at Guadalajara. The chapel is elliptical, containing twenty-six urns, placed between eight pilasters, also a smaller chapel with four jasper columns; it is composed of the richest materials, and is said to have cost 2,000,000 crowns. Sanchez died in 1696.

SAN DANIELLO, PELLEGRINO DI. See UDINE.

SANDBY, PAUL, an eminent English painter in water-colors, and engraver in aquatinta, was born at Nottingham in 1732. He went to London at the age of fourteen, and obtained admission into the drawing-room of the Tower, where he studied two years, and made such progress that the Duke of Cambridge, wishing to have a survey made of the north and west parts of the Highlands of Scotland, engaged him as draughtsman to accompany the expedition. During this tour, he made many drawings of the most beautiful and romantic scenery with which those regions abound. From these designs he made etchings, which were published on his return to London, by Messrs. Ryland and Bryce. In 1752 he went to Windsor, where he spent some time, and executed seventy drawings of the scenery, so accurately and tastefully designed that Sir Joseph Banks purchased them all at a liberal price. His reputation was now established, and he executed a great number of scenes in England and Wales, and views of the seats of the nobility and gentry, some of which he engraved himself in aquatinta, and others were engraved by Middiman, Milton, Byrne, and other artists. On the foundation of the Royal Academy, he was elected one of the first forty members. About the same time he was appointed chief drawing master of the Military Academy at Woolwich, which situation he held till his death. He contributed much to the English school of landscape painting, and especially in bringing into vogue water-colored designs, which branch is now highly esteemed in that country. His drawings are still admired, and are only to be found in the choice collections of his country. He also made improvements in the method of engraving in aquatinta. He died in 1809.

SANDRART, JOACHIM DE, an eminent German painter and writer on art, was born at Frankfort in 1606. He was instructed in the elements of design by Matthew Merian and Theodore de Brye. At the age of fourteen he went to Prague, where for some time he devoted himself to engraving under Giles Sadeler, who, finding his genius better adapted to painting than engraving, recommended him to change the graver for the pencil. He accordingly proceeded to Utrecht, and became the disciple of Gerard Honthorst, under whose able instruction he made great progress, and being already well grounded in the first principles of the art, he was soon able to assist him in his works. Descamps asserts that when Honthorst was invited to England by Charles I., Sandrart accompanied him to that court, where he remained till 1627, and executed several works for the king; but this is discredited by Bryan, on the ground that none of his pictures are mentioned in King Charles' collection; what renders it still more improbable, is the fact that Sandrart takes no notice of it in his life of Honthorst, though he mentions that artists's journey to England, and gives an account of the works he executed there. It is certain that he went early in life to Italy, where he resided many years. He first stopped at Venice, where he copied the finest pictures of Titian and Paul Veronese. From Venice he proceeded to Rome, where he acquired a high reputation, as is evident from the fact that when the king of Spain sent an order to Rome for twelve pictures of equal size, to be executed by twelve of the most eminent masters in Italy, Sandrart was selected as one of them, on which occasion he produced his admired picture of the Death of Seneca. The distinguished twelve were Guido, Domenichino, Guercino, Cortona, Lanfranco, Valentino, Poussin, Sacchi, Gentileschi, D'Arpino, Massimi, and Sandrart. To be numbered with such artists was a high honor. Previous to this, however, he obtained the patronage of the Cardinal Barberini, through whose influence he had the honor of painting the portrait of Urban VIII. He was also employed by the Prince Giustiniani, and was entrusted with the superintendance of the engravings of the statues in his gallery. After a long residence at Rome, Sandrart went to Naples, thence to Sicily and Malta, returning by way of Lombardy to Frankfort, where he married. From that city he went to Augsburg, and lastly to Nuremberg, where he permanently settled and established an academy of painting. He executed several works for the Emperor Ferdinand, and for Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria. Here, towards the close of his life, he published several works on the fine arts, for which he had, during his life, been collecting materials, as follows: Academia Tedesca della Architettura, Scultura, e Pittura, 4 vols in 2, folio, Nuremberg, 1675—79; Iconologia Deorum, 1680; Admiranda Scultura Veteris Vestigia, 1680; Roma antiqua et nova Theatrum, 1684; and Academia Artis Pictoriae, 1683, collected from Vasari, Ridolfi, and Van Mander; this last is a Latin translation and abridgment of the Academia Tedesca. A uniform edition of all his works was published at Nuremberg in 8 vols. folio, in German. 1769—75. He executed many works, well designed and colored, which are to be found in Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries. During his residence abroad, he made a multitude of sketches of views after nature, buildings, antiquities, statues, &c., which together with his pictures and curiosities, brought at public sale after his death 22,721 florins. He died at Nuremberg in 1688, aged 72.

SANDRART, JACOB VON, a German engraver, was the nephew of Joachim de S., born at Frankfort in 1630. He first studied with Cornelius Dankerts, and afterwards with William Hondius. He engraved a large number of plates of various subjects, executed with the graver in a neat, clear style. His portraits are his best prints, among which are those of the Emperors Rodolphus II., Ferdinand II., Ferdinand III., Frederick, Prince of Norway, Princess Sophia of Saxony; Ferdinand Maria, Duke of Bavaria; Joachim Sandrart, painter; and Joannes Paulus Auer, painter. A list of his works may be found in Nagler's Lexicon. He died at Nuremberg in 1708.

JJS SANDRART, JOHN JACOB VON, was the son of the preceding, born at Ratisbon in 1655. He was instructed in engraving by his father, and derived much advantage in designing, from the lessons of his great uncle Joachim de S. He was an able designer as well as an expert engraver, and possessed a ready and fertile invention. He engraved a considerable number of plates, some of them from his own designs, executed with the graver in a neat, tasteful style. He engraved several of the plates for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna. He also executed a number of spirited etchings which embellish the publications of Joachim de S. He died at Nuremberg in 1698. The following are among his most esteemed plates, a full list of which may be found in Nagler:

PORTRAITS.

Elizabeth Henrietta, Princess of Brandenburg; after A. le Clerc. Silvius Jacob de Dunkelmann; do.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Holy Family; after Joachim de Sandrart. Two subjects of the Origin of Painting; do. Two subjects of the Customs and Amusements of the ancient Germans; do. Aeneas saving his father Anchises from the burning of Troy; from his own design.

SANDRART, LAWRENCE. The name of this artist is affixed to a frontispiece to a set of prints from Ovid's Metamorphoses, by Engelbrecht, published in 1700. He was probably of the same family as the preceding. There was a painter in enamel of this name, who was living in 1710, supposed to be the same artist.

SANDRART, SUSAN MARIA VON, was the daughter of Jacob von S., born at Nuremberg in 1658.

She was instructed in the art by her father, and executed several plates to illustrate the works of Joachim de Sandrart. She also engraved a few other subjects, among which are the following: The Assembly of the Gods on the Marriage of Cupid and Psyche, after Raffaello; the Nozze Aldobrandi, after a design by Bartoli; a Bacchanalian subject inscribed Immoderatum dulce Amorum. She died in 1718.

SANDRO, JACOPO DE', a Florentine painter mentioned by Vasari, as an assistant of Buonarrotti, in the Sistine chapel. Lanzi says he is the same as Sandro Botticelli, which see.

SANDRINO, TOMMASO, a painter born at Brescia in 1575. He distinguished himself as a perspective architectural painter in fresco, and was a good painter of history. His great works are the ceilings of the cathedral, and the churches of S. Domenico and S. Faustino at Brescia. There are several of his works of a sacred character in the public edifices at Brescia, Milan, and Ferrara, skilfully composed, and well designed and colored. He died in 1630.

SANDYS, EDWIN, an obscure English engraver, mentioned by Strutt, by whom there is a portrait of Sir William Petty.

SANFELICE, FERDINANDO, a noble Neapolitan painter and architect, descended from the Normans, was born at Montagna in 1675. He studied under Solimena, and painted a number of good historical works; he also attained great excellence in representing fruit, landscapes, and perspective views. He patronized Solimena, who painted a saloon in his palace, which afterwards became a gallery for young artists, and was called The Sanfelice, after its original possessor. About the time when Philip V. succeeded to the Spanish throne, Sanfelice applied himself to architecture, and made many excellent designs for the festal decorations on the arrival of the monarch at Naples. He afterwards attained a high reputation, and was extensively employed. Among his principal works were the Palazzo Serra; the enlargement of the Palazzo Monteleone; two palaces in the Borgo delle Vergine, and near the Seggio di Montagna; and the façade of St. Lorenzo. He died in 1759.

SAN FRIANO, MASO DI. See MANZUOLI.

SANGALLO, or SAN GALLO, DA, a family of eminent Italian architects, whose original name was Giamberti. Giuliano Giamberti, born at Florence in 1443, was the son of Francesco G., an architect of some repute in the service of Cosmo de' Medici. In concert with his brother Antonio, he first practised carving in wood, and attained some celebrity. Giuliano was next employed in the capacity of a military engineer, by Lorenzo de' Medici, who highly esteemed his abilities. He afterwards devoted himself to architecture, and was employed to erect the cloister of the court of S. Maria Madalena de' Pazzi at Florence, where he introduced an Ionic order, with capitals remarkable for an ornamental necking, at that time an innovation, but copied, according to Milizia, from an ancient capital found near Florence. While in the service of Lorenzo, he visited Naples to present the King a model for some architectural works near the Castel Nuovo; and the monarch was so highly pleased, that he offered him a rich present of horses, clothes, and other valuables, among them, a silver cup, containing a hundred ducats. The architect declined the gifts, saying that he was in the service of Lorenzo de' Medici, who did not value riches. The king, surprised at his honorable independence, insisted on his selecting whatever pleased him, and he therefore chose three antiques—a head of Adrian, a naked female figure, and a sleeping cupid—which, on his return to Florence, he presented to Lorenzo. He was afterwards commissioned by that nobleman to erect a large convent near the gate of San Gallo; whence he obtained the name of da San Gallo, at first jestingly bestowed by his patron, but subsequently adopted by himself and all his family. In 1490, Sangallo commenced the Palazzo Gondi for a wealthy merchant of that name, which is highly praised for the beauty of its façade and the elegance of its general proportions. He also erected the Palazzo Imperiale, and was invited to Milan, to build a palace for the Duke, but was prevented by the civil commotions. Sangallo was much patronized by Cardinal della Rovere, for whom he erected a palace at Savona, and several other edifices. During the pontificate of Alexander VI., he restored the soffite of St. Maria Maggiore; and adorned the national church dell' Anima with a square façade of three orders of pilasters. When his patron, the Cardinal della Rovere, became Pope Julius II., Sangallo expected to be appointed architect of St. Peter's; and when Bramante was chosen, he retired in disgust to Florence. He was afterwards recalled by the Pope, and returned to Rome; but not being successful in any important work, he returned to Florence. At the accession of Leo X., Sangallo returned to Rome, and was offered the appointment of architect of St. Peter's; but he declined it, on account of his age and infirmities. He died two years afterwards at Florence, in 1517, aged 74. His abilities were very great, and were very highly esteemed in an age so fruitful in eminent architects. Vasari mentions Francesco Sangallo, a son of Giuliano S., as a skillful sculptor. One of his principal works was the mausoleum erected at Monte Cassino, by order of Clement VII., in honor of Pietro de' Medici.

SANGALLO, ANTONIO, the brother of Giuliano S., probably born at Florence about 1450. In concert with the latter, he practised wood carving for some time, but was at length induced by him to study architecture. He completed the palace commenced by Giuliano at Savona, and afterwards visited Rome, during the Pontificate of Alexander VI., who commissioned him to convert the mausoleum of the Emperor Hadrian into a fortress, called the Castle of St. Angelo. Sangallo displayed such excellent abilities in this work, that his reputation was immediately established, and Duke Valentino, the Pope's son, employed him to erect the fortress of Civita Castellana, and afterwards that of Montefiascone. Among his other works, was a beautiful temple to the Madonna at Montepulciano, and several churches at Monte Sansovino. Sangallo was intimately acquainted with the antique, and improved the Doric order. In the latter part of his life, he relinquished the practice of his profession, on account of bodily infirmities, and devoted himself to agriculture. He died at an advanced age, in 1534.

SANGALLO, ANTONIO, an eminent Italian architect, the son of Bartolomeo Picconi, was born at Mugello, in the Florentine state, about 1482. He was the nephew, on the maternal side, of the two preceding architects, and adopted their surname. He first learned the carpenter's trade, but dazzled by the fame of his uncles, he went to Rome, and entered their school, where he remained until they left Rome. He afterwards studied under Bramante, to whom, then advanced in years, he soon became of great assistance. According to Milizia, his first work was the church of the Madonna di Loretto, near Trajan's column. His talents attracted the attention of several distinguished personages, among whom was Cardinal Alexander Farnese, (afterwards Pope Paul III.,) who employed him to rebuild his palace in the Campo de' Fiori, the first beginning of that splendid pile, which alone would have established his fame. He afterwards greatly extended it when his patron became Pope, and carried it up to the majestic cornice, which was subsequently added by Michael Angelo. This noble structure is one of the most magnificent edifices of Rome, and has received the applause of all succeeding ages. The Reform Club House, Pall-Mall, London, though differing in several details, is a good imitation of the Farnese Palace. Sangallo also erected a palace for the Marquis Baldassini, and the Palazzo Pasquino di Santo Buono. In the great island of Lake Bolsena he constructed two small temples, one octangular without, and circular within, the other square without and octangular within, with four niches, at the side faces, with a beautiful altar. In concert with Sanmicheli, he was sent by Clement VII. to fortify Parma and Piacenza. When the Emperor Charles V. passed through Rome, Sangallo directed all the festivals given in honor of that monarch. Before the palace of St. Mark at Venice, he erected a triumphal arch of four Corinthian columns, between which were two victories. In the pediment were two figures in relief, representing emperors of the house of Austria. It was a most superb work, for invention, proportions, and embellishments in painting and sculpture. For the Duke de Castro he built the fortress of Nepi, raised the streets of that city, and designed a number of private mansions for the citizens. At Rome he executed a number of bastions, and the gate of St. Spirito, a solid and magnificent work, resembling a structure of antiquity. Among his other works at Rome, were the restoration of the Vatican, the erection of the elegant Pauline chapel, so greatly admired for its exact proportions, and a noble palace for himself in the Strada Giulia, now belonging to the Marquis Sacchetti. He was a masterly architect, not only for his taste and elegance, but particularly for the solidity of his works.

At the death of Baldassare Peruzzi, in 1536, Sangallo was appointed sole architect of St. Peter's. With the view of preventing those changes introduced by the preceding architects, the Pope ordered him to prepare a model so large and expensive, that there was no danger of its ever being destroyed or forgotten. After several years, it was completed, at the expense of 4184 crowns; it is fifty-five Roman palms in length (about twenty-eight and a half English feet), and is now preserved in the Vatican. Although Sangallo did not complete the edifice, he enlarged the piers of its foundations, and filled them with a very large amount of solid material, which greatly contributes to the firmness of this immense edifice. In the first volume of Wood's Letters of an Architect, there is an elevation of Sangallo's model, which appears very different from the building as subsequently completed. The cupola would have had two orders, one around the tambour, another carried up above the spring of the dome, which also would have been of much lower proportions than the present one; while two lofty and tapering campanili would have been very conspicuous, contrasting, yet harmonizing with the cupola. Although the design was broken into a multiplicity of parts, yet they were agreeably proportioned, tastefully combined, and consistent in character; which is more than can be properly affirmed of the present façade, by Carlo Maderno (q. v.), in which there is a want of agreement between the order itself and the other parts, and also a deficiency in variety of outline. In the latter part of his life, Sangallo was sent by the Pope to settle the disagreement between the inhabitants of Terni and Rieti, concerning their right to the Lake of Marmora. He terminated the strife with extreme difficulty, by dividing the lake between them. While remaining at Terni, he was taken ill, and died in 1546. His remains were removed to Rome, and were deposited with great pomp in St. Peter's, near the Sistine chapel.

According to Milizia, Sangallo had a brother, Antonio Battista Gobbo S., who attained considerable excellence in the art, and usually assisted him in his numerous commissions. He published an edition of Vitruvius, with many marginal notes and well drawn figures.

SANGALLO, BASTIANO DA, called ARISTOTILE, from his skill in perspective, an Italian painter and architect, was a cousin of the more eminent Antonio S., and born at Florence in 1481. He first studied painting under Pietro Perugino; but after seeing Michael Angelo's cartoon of Pisa, he left the studio of his master, and, like many other artists, commenced studying and copying that celebrated production. Besides copying the principal parts separately, in detail, he made a copy of the entire composition, on a reduced scale, which after a few years became extremely valuable, the original having been destroyed by Baccio Bandinelli. According to Lanzi, he exercised himself for several years in figure painting; he copied several subjects from Michael Angelo and Raffaele, and executed many Madonnas and other pictures of his own composition. At the instance of his friend Vasari, Sangallo afterwards painted a copy in oil, in chiaro-scuro, of Buonarrotti's cartoon, and sent it to Francis I., who, with his usual liberality, rewarded the artist in munificent style. The latter work is now in the Earl of Leicester's collection at Holkham, and is engraved in Forster's "British Gallery." In the meanwhile, Bastiano began to apply himself to architecture, and joined his brother Giovanni Francesco at Rome, where the latter, then engaged upon the works at St. Peter's, employed him, to oversee his business concerns. During his stay at Rome Bastiano frequently visited Raffaele, to whom he had been introduced by Giannozzo Pandolfini bishop of Troia; and when the latter built himself a house at Florence, from the designs of Raffaele, Giovanni Francesco was employed to conduct the work, which devolved upon Bastiano at his brother's death in 1530. This edifice, the Palazzo Pandolfini, is considered a master piece of art; but its excellence cannot properly be attributed to Bastiano, who was always employed upon works of a temporary character.

Upon settling at Florence, after his return from Rome, Sangallo applied himself to architectural and perspective painting. He was chiefly employed in designing and executing the decorations for numerous festivals, in which he displayed great skill. He afterwards visited Rome, and was employed by his cousin Antonio to superintend some of his works at Castro. For the Cardinal Farnese he executed a fine perspective, and then returned to Florence in 1547, where he died in 1551.

SAN GIMIGNANO, VINCENTIO DI, a Tuscan painter, who studied at Rome, and was a very successful imitator of Raffaello. Vasari highly commends him for some façades he painted in fresco at Rome, which have now perished. According to the author above referred to, he returned to his own country on the sacking of Rome in 1527, so broken-hearted and dispirited that we have no account of his subsequent works.

SAN GIORGIO, EUSEBIO DI, a painter who, according to Pascoli, was born at Perugia about 1478, and died about 1550. He was a pupil and imitator of Pietro Perugino, and executed some works for the churches at Perugia and other places, designed in the style of his master, but more feebly colored.

SAN GIOVANNI, ERCOLE DA. See MARIA.

SAN GIOVANNI, OLIVIERO DA, a painter who flourished at Ferrara about 1450. He painted both in oil and fresco, and, according to Baruffaldi, executed many works for the churches. His Madonnas and similar subjects were numerous, and much admired.

SANLUCANO, NOVELLA DA, a Neapolitan architect, who studied at Rome, and flourished in the latter part of the 15th century. He restored the church of S. Domenico at Naples, removing many of the Gothic parts. His principal work, however, was the palace of Roberto Sanseverino, prince of Salerno, who gave no other direction to the architect than to produce the most sumptuous edifice that had ever been seen. After ten years, in 1480, the palace was completed; it was built of travertine stone, worked so as to resemble the points of a diamond. The princess Isabella Feltri della Rovere afterwards presented this superb edifice to the Jesuitical order.

SANMARCHI. See SAMMARTINO.

SANMICHELE, MICHELE, a celebrated Italian architect, equally famous in both the civil and military branches of the art, was born at Verona in 1484. He acquired some knowledge of architecture from his father Giovanni and his uncle Bartolomeo, but gained the most improvement by studying the amphitheatre and other remains of antiquity in his native city. At the age of sixteen he visited Rome, where he prosecuted his studies with great assiduity for many years, living on terms of intimacy with Bramante, Michael Angelo, the Sangalli, Sansovino, and others. His first works in that part of Italy, were the cathedral of Monte Fiascone, octangular, beautifully proportioned, with a graceful cupola (subsequently injured by fire, and restored in a very inferior style); the famous temple of St. Domenico at Orvieto; and a number of beautiful small palaces in both cities. Having acquired considerable reputation, Sanmicheli was sent, by Clement VII. in company with Antonio Sangallo, to visit the fortifications of the Ecclesiastical States. Having executed this commission, he revisited his native Venetian territory about 1525, and was employed by the republic to construct the new fortifications at Verona, where he introduced a number of improvements, which have been universally adopted throughout Europe, and have totally changed the system of military architecture. Before the time of Sanmicheli, the bastions were always either round or square. He introduced the triangular and pentangular bastions, with plain fosses, flanks, and square bases, which doubled the support. The particular feature of his improvement consists in defending every part of the wall by flanks, rendering the operations of besieging much more hazardous and difficult. Blondel, Vauban, and others, have modified the inventions of Sanmicheli, and have thereby gained a part of the glory which justly belonged to the original inventor. At Verona, he constructed five or six bastions in this manner, which have remained for more than 200 years. His military works are constructed with such solidity, that not a stone has moved. Not content with his first inventions, he went on making other improvements, instructed by his own works, until his fame increased to such a degree that the Duke of Milan repeatedly requested his services of the Venetian Senate, who at length granted him for three months only. While in the Milanese state, he visited Casale de Monferrato, to inspect that city and its strong castle, erected by his cousin Matteo Sanmicheli, an excellent sculptor and architect, who executed the noble marble sepulchre at the church of S. Francesco in that city. The Duke was so highly pleased with his designs and advice, that he loaded him with gifts and honors. Sanmicheli next visited all the fortifications of the Venetian state, restoring and improving them everywhere. At Zara, in Dalmatia, he left his designs to the execution of his nephew Gio. Girolamo S., who, after fortifying the city, erected the admirable fortress of St. Niccolo at the port of Sebenico. Michele also fortified Corfu, Cyprus, Candia, and other islands belonging to the Venetians. Perhaps his most famous military edifice, is the Castello di St. Andrea, built of Istrian stone, with a stately rusticated façade, on the shore of Venice. It appeared impossible that, on so marshy a situation, exposed to the ebb and flow of the tide, an immense fortress could be erected with any hope of security. Accordingly, when the structure was completed, it was reported, and generally believed, that the firing of heavy artillery would destroy the work; whereupon Sanmicheli requested that the fort should be supplied with two tier of the largest cannon, and that they all might be fired at the same moment; which was accordingly done, but without moving a single stone in the building. The Emperor Charles V., and Francis I. of France, invited him and his nephew to enter their service, but they declined the alluring offers.

As a civil architect, according to Milizia, the genius of Sanmicheli was sublime. Solidity and convenience, unity, simplicity, and harmony, are conspicuous in all his works. Like Palladio, Michael Angelo, and other great architects, he was faulty in details, particularly in the use of the orders. Milizia says, "his Tuscan architrave and capital are composed of so many members, that they resemble the Doric. The flutes of his Doric columns are too small for the solidity of that order. To the Corinthian he invariably gave modillions and dentils. He also attached his columns in the walls, and placed them on pedestals, higher than those of Vignola, that is, more than a third of the height of the order. Finally, to the Doric he put immense pedestals, with a profusion of ornaments." His interior arrangements are often inconvenient, and sometimes very irregular. Notwithstanding these faults, his exterior architecture exhibits less mannerism, and more of invention and fine taste, than that of Palladio, particularly in his lofty and majestic rusticated basements. Among his principal edifices at Verona, are the Palazzo Canossa; the Palazzo Bevilacqua, of which the façade is beautifully ornamented; the Palazzo Verzi, and the Palazzo Pompeii, designed in excellent taste. His Capella Guareschi, or Pellegrini, in St. Bernardino is greatly admired, and deserves a particular description. It is a small round Corinthian temple, with three altars, and four niches for statues. The altars, pedestals, pediments, cornices, and the arches themselves, are all circular. The light is admitted by four apertures, each decorated with two columns. Of the eight columns, four have flutes in the regular manner, and the others are entirely plain; all are plain to within about one-third of their length from the bottom, that they might be less liable to injury. The chapel is adorned with beautiful statues. Among his other works at Verona, is the beautiful church of the Madonna di Campagna. At Venice, he erected the Palazzo Grimani, and the Palazzo Cornaro at S. Paolo.

During the latter part of his life, Sanmicheli enjoyed in tranquillity the honorable fruits of his labors, esteemed by all for his excellent character, and admired for his surpassing talents. He was suddenly surprised by intelligence of the death of his beloved nephew and pupil Gio. Girolamo Sanmicheli, at the age of forty-four, in the island of Cyprus. Overwhelmed by the shock of this affliction, his powers rapidly failed, and he died a few days after, in 1559, aged 75. His remains were deposited in the church of S. Francesco at Verona.

SANTA-CROCE, FRANCESCO RIZZO DA. According to Tassi, this painter was a native of Santa Croce, in the Bergamese territory, and flourished from 1507 to 1529; Zani says from 1507 to 1545; Lanzi says the last date of which he can find any account is on a picture in the parochial church of Chirignano, dated 1541. In one of his pictures in the parish church of Endine, he signs himself Franciscus Rizus Bergomeusis habitator Venetiis, 1529; and another in the parochial church of Serina, Francesco da Rizo Santa Croce depense, 1518. Without entering further into the disputes about this artist, suffice it to say that he studied at Venice, under Vittore Carpaccio, and, following the example of his instructor, he adopted a more modern style than was practised by his predecessors, the Bellini. He painted some altar-pieces, which are gracefully composed, delicately colored, and enriched with noble architecture. Zanetti divides him into two artists, but Lanzi says he is evidently in error.

SANTA-CROCE, GIROLAMO RIZZO DA, was doubtless of the same family as the preceding; Federici says he was the father of Francesco; Ridolfi, that they were of the same family; and Tassi, that the dates on his pictures commence later and are traced up later than those of Francesco, viz., from 1520 to 1549; Zani gives the date of one 1549, and says he operated in 1552. Zanetti says he approached nearer to the styles of Giorgione and Titian than any other artist of his time. Others accuse him of retaining something of the ancient Venetian style, but Lanzi vindicates him from this charge, especially in his cabinet pictures of bacchanalian and other subjects. "They display a grace of composition, study of foreshortening and of the naked parts, and a harmony of coloring, forming a mixture of different schools, in which the Roman predominates, and least of all the Venetian. In his celebrated picture of the Martyrdom of St. Lorenzo, he availed himself of the engravings of Marc' Antonio, after Bandinelli and others, but without appearing a mere copyist, for he varied his figures, and especially his landscape, in which he was very skillful." There are several of his works in the churches at Venice, and in the State, the chief of which are the Martyrdom of St. Lorenzo, in the church of S. Francesco della Vigna, and the Last Supper in S. Martino at Venice; the latter is inscribed Hieronimo de Sancta Croce, MDXXXVIII.

SANTA-CROCE, PIETRO PAOLO, a painter who flourished at Padua about 1591. According to the Guida di Padova, he was of the same family as the preceding. There are some of his works in the churches of Padua, which Lanzi says show that he was attached to the school of Cavagna, or at least to the less mannered class of Venetian artists. He also painted pictures of Madonnas, Holy Families, &c., for the collections. There were several other artists of this name, of little note.

SANTAFEDE, FRANCESCO, a Neapolitan painter who, according to Dominici, was the disciple of Andrea Sabbatini, whose style he followed with great success. He executed many works for the churches, which are well designed; his attitudes are elegant and select, his coloring fresh and vigorous, and his masses of light and shadow conducted with intelligence. Lanzi says that, in point of coloring, he has few equals in the Neapolitan school, and his works possess a singular uniformity of style. One of his best works is the Coronation of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria la Nuova. He flourished in the last half of the 16th century.

SANTAFEDE, FABRIZIO, was the son of the preceding, born at Naples in 1560. After receiving instruction from his father, he became the scholar of Francesco Curia, and next went to Rome, where he devoted two years to the study of the works of the best masters. On his return to Naples he acquired a high reputation, and was employed in executing many works for the churches and public edifices, which are highly commended by Dominici in his Lives of the Neapolitan Artists. The principal of these are the Nativity, and the Angel appearing to the Shepherds, in La Nunziata; the Adoration of the Magi, in S. Maria de Con-stantinopoli; and the Deposition from the Cross, in the possession of the Prince di Somma. Though he acquired a higher reputation than his father, the experienced discover in the works of the latter more vigor of expression, and a better effect of light and shadow. He died in 1636.

SANTAGOSTINO, GIACOMO ANTONIO, a Milanese painter, born, according to Orlandi, about 1588, and died in 1648. He studied under Giulio Cesare Procaccini, whose style he adopted. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed several works for the churches at Milan, particularly in S. Lorenzo Maggiore, S. Maria del Lantazio, and in S. Vittore; but he wrought more for individuals. He had two sons, Agostino and Giacinto, both of whom he instructed in the art. Lanzi says they were good artists, and distinguished above most of their cotemporaries. They sometimes wrought together, as in the church of S. Fedele, where they painted two grand histories; at other times separately, and each executed several works for the churches. Agostino was the most distinguished; he wrote a work upon the paintings of Milan, entitled L'Immortalità e Gloria del Pennello. Lanzi says "his pictures exhibit him in the light of a good painter of his time; in particular a Holy Family in St. Alessandro, and a few others among the more highly finished, in which he displays expression, beauty, and harmony, although he is somewhat too minute."

SANTARELLI, GAETANO, a painter of noble birth, and a native of Pescia. Having a passion and a talent for painting, he studied with Ottaviano Dandini at Florence, under whom he made great progress. He next went to Rome for improvement, and executed some works which gave earnest of distinction, had he not died there in the flower of his life.

SANTARELLI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, a distinguished Italian engraver on gems, was born at Manoppello, in the territory of Abruzzo, in 1759. He was placed at an early age under a painter of Chieti; but having little inclination for that art, he determined to learn to engrave on gems, and accordingly set out for Rome. On arriving in that city, he made several attempts, which excited the admiration of Pikler, and Santarelli was admitted to the studio of that artist, who is said to have frequently attached his own signature to the works of his pupil. After remaining several years under Pikler, he established a studio at Rome, and soon attained distinction. Among his principal productions are the heads of Dante, Petrarch, Boecaccio, Michael Angelo, and Machiavelli, which are now in the Louvre; also a number of medals. In 1797 he visited Florence, and was appointed a Professor in the Academy of Fine Arts. He was honored with the knighthood of the Order of the Reunion by Napoleon, and with membership in the Legion of Honor by Louis XVIII.; was associated to the academies of Berlin, Vienna, and St. Luke at Rome. Santarelli resided many years at Florence, instructing his pupils in the art, until 1826, when he died.

SANTELLI, FELICE, a painter of Rome, of whom little is known. He painted in competition with the Cav. Giovanni Baglioni, in the church of the P. P. Spagnuoli del Riscatto Scalzi at Rome. There are also some of his works in churches in the State, particularly in S. Rosa at Viterbo, which Lanzi says show a painter full of truth. He flourished in the first part of the 17th century.

SANTERRE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter, born at Magny, in Pontoise, in 1651. He was a pupil of Bon Boullongne, and, though deficient in readiness and fertility of invention, he studied after nature with great assiduity, and attained considerable excellence. He painted women and young girls with success, in portraits and domestic subjects, carefully and correctly designed, and colored with greater harmony than the works of his cotemporaries. He also painted several historical works, among which are St. Theresa, in the chapel at Versailles; a penitent Magdalene, in the King's collection; and Susanna and the Elders, his reception-piece at the Academy, formerly in the hall of that institution, and now in the Louvre. Santerre died at Paris in 1717.

SANTI, or SANTO, DE TITI. See TITI.

SANTI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Rimini, who studied with Carlo Cignani at Bologna. Lanzi says there are some of his works at Rimini, where he is extolled as one of the best pupils of his master. He died young at Venice in 1700.

SANTI, BARTOLOMEO, a painter of Lucca, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. He was an imitator of Pietro da Cortona, and excelled in ornamental and perspective painting. He was much employed in theatrical and other decorations.

SANTI, DOMENICO, called IL MENGAZZINO, an eminent perspective and architectural painter, born at Bologna, according to Orlandi, in 1621, and died in 1694. He studied under Agostino Metelli, whom he very nearly equalled. He executed many perspective and architectural pieces for the churches and palaces, in which the figures were sometimes inserted by Giuseppe Metelli, Gio. Antonio Burrini, but oftener by Domenico Maria Canuti. He also painted many pictures of a smaller size for the collections at Bologna, which are highly esteemed, and frequently mistaken for the works of his master. Bartsch attributes to him four prints, viz.: the portraits of Simone Cantarini, and of Lodovico, Agostino, and Annibale Caracci; the first only has his name in full, the second and third are marked Canutus, and the fourth with the word Libertas.

SANTIAGO-POLMÁRES, DON FRANCISCO XAVIER DE, a Spanish painter and designer, born at Toledo in 1728, and died at Madrid in 1796. He painted, in oil, four views of Toledo, a number of landscapes, and several portraits of distinguished persons. He also designed many frontispieces, which embellish the books published in Spain in the last half of the 18th century.

SANTINI, called THE ELDER and THE YOUNGER, two painters, father and son, who flourished at Arezzo in the 17th century. Lanzi says there are some of their works in the churches at Arezzo, executed in a style much resembling that of the Florentine painters of the same epoch.

SANTIS, ORAZIO DI, an Italian engraver, supposed to have been a native of Aquila, and flourished, according to the dates on his prints, from about 1568 to 1584. Bartsch describes 17 prints by him, mostly after Pompeo dell' Aquila, and supposes there are others which have not come to his knowledge. Nagler says that, in conjunction with Cherubino Alberti, he engraved a set of seventy-four plates after the antique statues in Rome, published in 1584. There is great inequality in the prints of this artist, both in the management of the burin, and the care with which they are executed; yet they have such a striking resemblance, in general effect, to those of Alberti, that they may easily be mistaken for his works, and it is very probable he was a pupil of that master.

SANTISSIMO-SACRAMENTO, FRAY JUAN DEL, a Spanish painter, born at Puente de Don Gonzalo in Cordova, in 1611. His real name was Juan de Guzman. After studying at Cordova, he went to Rome, where he does not seem to have profited much from the study of the antique, or the works of Raffaele. He returned to Spain in 1634, and went to reside at Seville, where, taking part in a revolt, he was obliged to seek refuge in the convent of the Carmelites Calzados (shod Carmelites), and assume the habit of the order with the above name. His restless and turbulent disposition soon caused his superior to send him to the convent of the Carmelites Descalzos (bare-footed Carmelites), at Aguilar, where a severe discipline converted him into a humble and pious monk. He was employed in decorating that convent and others of his order. In 1666 he went to Cordova, and spent eleven years in executing works for the convent of his order, and for the palace of the bishop, and other places in his diocese. He returned to Aguilar in 1677, where he died in 1680. His works gave great satisfaction to his brethren, but they possess little merit beyond brilliant coloring, in which he is said to have emulated Rubens and Vandyck. He had a poor invention, and made up his compositions by plagiarisms from prints, and his drawing is very defective.

SANTO-DOMINGO, FRAY VINCENTE DE, a Spanish painter who died about 1550. Little is known of him. He was a monk of the order of the Geronomytes, decorated the walls of his cloister with chiaro-scuros, and executed some paintings for the convent of S. Catalina de Talavera de la Reyna at Logrono. He was the first instructor of the illustrious Navarette, called El Mudo. The four superb paintings in the church de la Estrella, formerly attributed to Santo Domingo, are now ascertained to have been painted by El Mudo while he resided at Logrono, for the benefit of his health, by the permission of Philip II., in 1569.

SANTOS, JUAN, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Cadiz about 1662. No idea can be formed of his style or merits from the account given by his biographer, Bermudez, which is, in substance, that he was a fresco painter, and much employed in painting standards for vessels sent to Spanish America and elsewhere. "He also painted pretty little pictures to please certain ladies of Andalusia, who in point of taste are not inferior to those of any country, and consequently such pictures taxed both the ingenuity and delicacy of the painter to give satisfaction to his amiable employers." He probably decorated their fans.

SANTO, GIROLAMO DA. See PADOVA.

SANTVOORT, ANTHONY. There were two obscure Dutch painters of this name; the first flourished about 1550, and the second about 1661. Strutt mentions a print representing an Almanac-seller, with a town and church in the back-ground, neatly etched in a style resembling that of Hollar, signed A. Santvoort.

SANTVOORT, DIRK VAN, a Dutch painter, supposed to have been a son of the latter Anthony S.; but this is very doubtful, as there are prints after his works by Theodore Matham and Jonas Suyderhoef, which show that he must have flourished long before the death of his supposed father. He painted history and portraits, somewhat in the manner of Rembrandt. The accounts of him are very meagre. There were two other obscure painters named Santvoort, who flourished at a later period.

SANUTO, or SANUTUS, GIULIO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Venice from about 1530 to 1540, and probably later. Zani says he was living in 1580. He engraved quite a number of prints, which are executed in a coarse, heavy style, with single strokes without any hatching, resembling a wooden cut. The following are all that are mentioned by Bartsch, Nagler, and others:

A print of the Birth of a monstrous Child, inscribed Jul. Sanutus Venet. fec. Venus and Adonis; after Titian. Apollo and Marsyas; after Correggio; in three sheets. The Marriage of the Virgin; after Raffaele; with the engraver's mark. The Massacre of the Innocents, signed BACCIUS BRANDIN INVEN., and Marc' Antonio's cipher. The monstrous Child, signed Jul. Sannutus Venet. Fac. The birth of this monstrous child took place at Venice in 1540; the mother was a German. Two winged Genii in the air, supporting a Globe, on which Cupid stands discharging an Arrow to the left of the print; no name of engraver. Dance of Bacchanals in a Wood; signed JULIUS SANNUTUS. F. Apollo and Marsyas, after Correggio, with the Parnassus, after Raffaele, in three sheets. The story of Apollo and Marsyas, from which the engraving was taken, ornamented the case of a harpsichord. The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence. St. John the Baptist. The Tree of Life. Venus restraining Adonis. A Vase with two handles, ornamented with festoons and figures. The Punishment of Tantalus. The dead body of Christ supported by the Virgin and Angels; after Michael Angelo; it is in the collection of H. R. Willet, Esq.

SANZ, AUGUSTIN, an eminent Spanish architect, born at Saragossa in 1724. He studied the theory of his profession in the School of Design established in his native city at the expense of the sculptor Ramirez, and acquired a knowledge of the practical part under Raymundo Cortes, surveyor-general of the public buildings. He gained his greatest advantage, however, from the advice and instruction of Ventura Rodriguez, when the latter was engaged at Saragossa in erecting the chapel del Pilar. His reputation gradually increased, and he was employed by government and by private individuals. In 1775 he was chosen a member of the Academy of S. Ferdinando, and in 1792, at the formation of the Academy of St. Luis, he was appointed Director of that institution. He discharged the duties of his important office with fidelity, doing much towards eradicating the prejudices and corrupt taste of the preceding period, and towards introducing a better style. He was appointed by government to inspect all designs for public buildings proposed to be erected in Arragon. Among his principal works are the churches at Urrea and Binaces; and the church of Santa Cruz at Saragossa, in the form of a Greek cross, of the Corinthian order. Sanz died in 1801, leaving a son named Matias S., who was also an architect. He erected, among other works, the facade of the church at Epila, left incomplete by his father.

SANZIO, RAFFAELLE. See RAFFAELLE.

SARABIA, DIEGO SANCHEZ, a Spanish architectural designer and painter of familiar subjects, who resided at Granada, and in 1762 was elected a member of the Academy of San Fernando in that city. By the desire of that body, he made plans of that magnificent monument of Moorish art, the Alhambra, and of the elegant Greco-Roman Circus of Charles V. at Granada. He also copied all the ornaments, bassi-relievi, and ancient oil paintings that adorn those edifices. These works were presented to Charles III., who was so pleased with their execution, that he commanded the originals to be preserved in the Academy, and copies to be made for himself. Sarabia executed some cabinet pictures of various subjects, in all of which his predilection for architecture is exhibited. He died at Granada in 1779.

SARABIA, JOSÉ DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1618, according to Palomino, but Bermudez says in 1608. He first studied with Augustin del Castillo, and, on the death of that master, with Francisco Zurbaran. He acquired a high reputation in his day, and executed many works for the churches and convents of Seville and Cordova. Though he was not deficient in merit, he was a shameless plagiarist. He frequently took his subjects from the prints of the Sadlers and others, and imposed them on the ignorant as his own inventions. He thus copied the Nativity and another picture from prints after Rubens, for the monastery of S. Francisco at Seville, and the Elevation of the Cross, by the same master, for the convent de Arrizaffa. His best original work is the Flight into Egypt, in the convent de la Victoria at Seville. It is so beautifully designed, colored, and handled, as to cause regret that he had not avoided such glaring acts of piracy, and confined himself entirely to his own compositions. He died at Cordova in 1669.

SARACINO, or SARACENI, CARLO, called also from his birth-place, CARLO VENEZIANO, a painter born at Venice, according to Orlandi, in 1585. He first studied at Venice, and then went to Rome, and placed himself under the instruction of Camillo Mariani, but he afterwards adopted the manner of Caravaggio. He acquired considerable reputation, and was employed to execute many works, both in oil and fresco, for the churches of Rome, and the palaces of the nobility. Lanzi says he displayed a Venetian taste in his figures, dressing them richly in the Levant fashion, and was fond of introducing into his compositions corpulent persons, eunuchs, and shaven heads. In conjunction with the Cav. Lanfranco, he painted several frescos for the pontifical palace of Monte Cavallo, which are considered his best performances. His other principal works at Rome are the Death of the Virgin, in the church of S. Maria in Trastevere; and the Virgin and Infant, with St. Anne, an altar-piece in a chapel of the church of S. Simone. He was next invited back to Venice, to paint a grand picture in the Council Chamber, but he did not live to finish it. He died in 1625. Bagnioni says he died in 1585, aged about 40—evidently an error or a misprint into which others have fallen, as Lanfranco was born in 1581. Zani says he was born in 1585, and died in 1625, which dates are doubtless correct. He is said to have executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, but there is no certainty with regard to the prints attributed to him.

SARAZIN, JACQUES, a French sculptor, born at Noyon in 1590. He studied under the elder Guillaïn at Paris; and afterwards visited Italy for improvement. Finding a protector in the Cardinal Aldobrandini, nephew of Clement VIII., he was commissioned to execute for the villa of that prelate, at Frascati, two colossal statues of Atlas and Polypheme. He studied the works of Michael Angelo, and was assisted by the counsel of Domenichino, when executing some sculptures at the portal of S. Andrea della Valle, while the latter was engaged in painting the vault of that church. After a residence of eighteen years at Rome, Sarazin returned to France, and while stopping at Lyons, executed the statues of St. John and St. Bruno, for the Carthusian monastery. On arriving at Paris, in 1628, he soon gained reputation, and was employed by the Cardinal de Richelieu, the Marechal d'Effiat, and others. At the instance of Desnoyers, he executed eight grouped Caryatides for the Louvre, which were distinguished for lightness and elegance of the figures, and gained for the artist a pension from the king, with apartments in the Louvre. Queen Anne of Austria commissioned him to execute a group in gold and silver, of an Angel presenting the Infant to the Virgin; and in 1643 he modelled the statues of two Angels in silver, supporting the heart of Louis XIII., in the church of S. Louis de la Rue St. Antoine, distinguished for elegant proportions and beautiful draperies. Sarazin acted an important part in the establishment of the Royal Academy of Painting, and was appointed Rector, at the establishment of that office in 1655. Besides the works already mentioned, he executed the following, highly praised by French writers. The mausoleum of Cardinal de Berulle, adorned with bas-reliefs representing the Sacrifice of Noah; two groups of Children playing with goats, formerly at Marly; the mausoleum of Henry de Bourbon, Prince of Condé, decorated with figures of Religion, Justice, Piety, and Strength, and several bas-reliefs of the Triumphs of Fame, Time, Death, and Eternity. Sarazin made some attempts at painting, and produced several pictures of very inferior merit. He died at Paris in 1660.

SARDI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian architect, was a native of Morco, near Como, and flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He was appointed architect to the Venetian republic, and executed a number of works in that city, among which were the façades of the church of the Carmelites, of S. Maria de Zobenigo, and of the Beggar's Hospital. Sardi died in 1699.

SARRABAT, D., a French painter, was born at Paris in 1667. He flourished chiefly at Lyons, where he left many historical paintings in oil and fresco. He died at Lyons in 1747.

SARRABAT, ISAAC, a French mezzotint engraver, born at Andely, according to Laborde, in 1670, though others say in 1680. One of his best prints, the portrait of M. Choiseul Praslin, is dated 1695. He was one of the earliest artists of his country who practised that method of engraving. Dumesnil gives descriptions of twenty-eight prints by him, mostly portraits. Bryan says his prints are indifferently executed, but Laborde ranks him among the most eminent engravers in mezzotinto.

SARRAGON, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1645. Only two prints are known by him, the portraits of Adrian Hoffer, and G. U. Bergzomius. They are neatly executed in the style of James William Delft.

SARTI, ANTONIO, a painter who, according to Baldassini, flourished about 1600, and executed some good works for the churches in Romagna. Lanzi also commends him particularly for his picture of the Circumcision in the collegiate church of Massaccio.

SARTI, ERCOLE, called IL MUTO DI FICAROLO, an eminent painter born at Ficarolo, in the duchy of Ferrara, in 1593. He was deaf and dumb from his nativity, and, notwithstanding this misfortune, he early exhibited a passion for the fine arts, and the only amusement that seemed to interest him was the attempt to imitate prints and other objects that fell in his way. At the age of fifteen, without any aid or assistance, and without the knowledge of any person, he painted a picture representing the Adoration of the Magi, and on the occasion of a festival and grand procession, he placed it in front of his father's house. The excellence of the production, under the circumstances, excited universal admiration and astonishment, and the young aspirant was immediately placed in the school of Carlo Bononi, an eminent historical painter at Ferrara, under whose instruction he made rapid progress. He afterwards studied with Ippolito Scarsellino, whose works he particularly admired. He acquired a high reputation for the merit of his works under the singularity of his circumstances, and his praise was celebrated by the poets of his country. He executed several works for the churches of Ferrara and Ficarolo, particularly for the church of the Benedictines in the latter city. His best works are said to combine the correct design of Bononi with the rich coloring of Scarsellino. He also excelled in portraits, and was much employed by the nobility and wealthy citizens of Ferrara. The time of his death is not exactly known; some place it in 1637; Zani says he was living in 1650.

SARTO, ANDREA VANNUCHI DEL, a celebrated painter, born at Florence in 1488. His real name was Andrea Vannuchi, but he was called del Sarto from the occupation of his father, who was a tailor. Showing an early taste for drawing and designing, he was placed with a goldsmith, to learn ornamental plate engraving. In this situation he was found by Gio. Barile, a wood engraver and a painter of little note, who persuaded his father to entrust his son to his instruction. He studied with this master three years, and then became the disciple of Pietro di Cosimo. He, however, derived more advantage from studying the works of Masaccio, Il Ghirlandaio, Leonardo da Vinci, and Michael Angelo, particularly the two latter, than from his instructors. While with Cosimo, it was his custom to devote every holy-day to designing after the cartoons of da Vinci and Buonarrotti. On leaving Cosimo, which the morose temper of that painter compelled him to do sooner than he would have done, he formed an intimacy with Francesco Bigio, who had been a disciple of Mariotto Albertinelli, and in conjunction with him, he executed several works for the churches and convents of Florence, both in oil and fresco, and each successive work showed decided improvement, and added to his reputation. Lanzi says, "this artist demonstrates the ascendancy of native genius over precept. When a boy, he was put under the tuition of Gio. Barile, a good carver on wood, employed on the ceilings and doors of the Vatican, after the designs of Raffaello, but a painter of no celebrity. While still a youth, he was consigned to Pier di Cosimo, a practical colorist, but by no means skillful in drawing or composition; hence the taste of Andrea in those arts was formed on the cartoons of Vinci and Buonarrotti, and as many circumstances indicate, on the frescos of Masaccio and Ghirlandaio, in which the subjects were more suited to his mild disposition; it is also certain that he went to Rome, and improved himself by contemplating the works of Raffaello. His progress from one perfection in art to another was thus not sudden, as has happened to some artists, but was gradually acquired during many years at Florence." This is illustrated in his frescos in the Compagnia dello Scalzo, and in the convent of the Servi, where his pictures executed at different periods are to be seen. At the Scalzo, he painted a series of twelve pictures from the Life of St. John the Baptist, in chiaro-scuro, the cartoons of which are still preserved in the Palazzo Rinuccini. The first of the series, the Baptism of Christ, discovers some palpable imitations, and even some whole figures, copied from Albert Durer; the Visitation of the Virgin, painted some years after, shows a conspicuous improvement; and the Nativity of St. John, the last of the series, is painted in his best and broadest manner. The same thing is to be observed in his works in the convent of the Servi, where he painted a series of ten pictures from the Life of St. Filippo Benizi, which Lanzi says are very beautiful productions, though among the earlier efforts of his genius. In the same edifice are his pictures of the Epiphany and the Birth of the Virgin, which are among his most finished works. Also the Madonna del Sacco, so called from the sack of grain on which St. Joseph leans, than which few pictures are more celebrated; it has frequently been engraved, but justice was never done to its merits till Raphael Morghen executed his famous print from it, as a companion to the Transfiguration of Raffaello. "Both prints," says Lanzi, "are in the best collections, and to those who have not been at Rome or Florence, Andrea appears rather a rival than an inferior to the prince of painters. On examining this picture closely, it affords an endless scope for observation; it is finished as if intended for a cabinet; every hair is distinguished, every middle tint lowered with consummate art, each outline marked with admirable variety and grace; and amidst all this diligence, a facility is conspicuous that makes the whole appear natural and unconstrained." There is a good deal of contradiction among writers as to the history of this artist's life. Some assert that immediately after he dissolved his connexion with Bigio, he was commissioned to execute the works at the Scalzo, before mentioned, and next the ten pictures from the life of St. Filippo Benizi for the Servi. But it is evident from the above account, taken from Lanzi, that they were executed at different times, and some of them when he was at the very height of his career. It has been erroneously asserted by some that he never went to Rome. Vasari expressly asserts that he did visit that city, though he does not mention the time, and that "on seeing the works of the scholars of Raffaello, his natural timidity induced him to despair of ever being able to equal them, so that he suddenly returned to Florence." Lanzi says, "he went to Rome, I know not in what year, but that he was there appears not, as in the case of Correggio, to admit of dispute." Others say that, notwithstanding his constant employment at Florence, he could not resist the temptation to see the works of Raffaele at Rome, whither he went, and examined everything with attention and a critical eye, not only the frescos of Raffaele, but those of Buonarrotti, and the antique sculptures. It is probable that he did not remain long in that metropolis, as it is not known that he executed any work there. It is said that soon after his return from Rome he executed his Descent of the Holy Ghost and the Birth of the Virgin, for the church of the Servi, and his Last Supper, for the monastery of St. Salvi, one of his greatest works. Lanzi reports of this picture, that, "at the siege of Florence in 1529, the soldiers, after having destroyed the suburbs of the city where the convent was situated, and demolished the church and a part of the monastery, on approaching the refectory they were astonished at beholding this Last Supper, and had not the resolution to destroy it; thus imitating Demetrius, who at the siege of Rhodes respected nothing but a picture of Protogenes."

He executed many works both in oil and fresco for the churches, convents, and palaces of Florence, and he received commissions from other cities. In the Ducal palace at Poggio a Caiano there is a fresco representing Cæsar seated in a grand hall, ornamented with statues, to whom a great variety of exotic birds and wild animals are presented as the tribute of his victories. Lanzi says, "this picture alone is sufficient to mark Andrea as a painter eminent in perspective, in a knowledge of the antique, and in every excellence in the art." There are also other frescos in the same edifice. The order for decorating this edifice came from Leo X.; and Andrea having for his competitors Francesco Bigio and Pontormo, exerted all his energies, and with such success, that they retired from the field. Francis I. of France gave him a commission for a picture, and he executed and transmitted to that monarch the admirable Pietà, or Dead Christ, with the Virgin, St. John, and Mary Magdalene, which now adorns the Louvre. This picture was universally admired at the court of France, and the King invited him to Paris. Andrea, at that time, reduced to a state of penury by the troubles of his country, and the small remuneration he was enabled to obtain for his works, or, perhaps, by the extravagance of a termagant wife, gladly accepted the alluring invitation of a prince characterized for his munificence and liberal encouragement of the arts. On his arrival at Paris, he was received with the most flattering distinction. He painted a portrait of the Dauphin, and an exquisite picture of Charity, now in the French Museum, for which he was munificently rewarded. He also executed some works for the nobility, and the Queen mother gave him a commission for a picture of St. Jerome. In the midst of all this prosperity, he received letters from his wife, which determined him to return to Florence. It is said that under pretext of his domestic affairs requiring his presence in Italy, he solicited and obtained the King's permission to depart with a promise of a speedy return with his family to Paris, and that the monarch, anxious to profit by his judgment and taste, confided to him a large sum to purchase for him rare works of art; that he forgot his engagements, violated every tie of honor, and squandered the King's money, till at length reduced to indigence and distress, and stung with the recollection of his folly, perfidy and ingratitude, he fell into a state of despondency, which was increased by his jealousy of his wife; that he was ultimately abandoned by her and all his false friends with whom he had wasted his substance, and that his miseries were finally terminated by the great plague which devastated Florence in 1530. The misfortunes of Andrea, could they be truly related, would doubtless vindicate his character in a great measure, and excite compassion for his lot. He was naturally of a mild and timid disposition. He married a woman of exquisite beauty, of whom he was passionately fond, and who ruled him with an iron rod. She was a very shrew; her extravagance kept him in continual poverty, and her conduct excited his jealousy. Vasari, who had been his pupil, and could not but know the truth, expressly says, in the first edition of his work, that, "Andrea was despised by his friends, and abandoned by his employers from the time of his marriage with this woman, (Lucrezia del Fede); the slave of her will, he left his father and mother to starve; through her arrogance and violence, none of his scholars could continue with him long." In his second edition, though he omitted this censure, he repeated, that she was a perpetual source of misfortune to her husband. He repeated that Andrea was invited to the French court by Francis I., "where, caressed and rewarded, he might have excited the envy of every artist, but influenced by the womanish complaints of Lucrezia, he returned to Florence, and remained in his own country, in violation of his faith solemnly pledged to that monarch. He afterwards repented, and was anxious to regain his former situation, but his efforts were ineffectual, and he dragged out a miserable existence amidst jealousy and domestic wretchedness, until abandoned by his wife, and every other individual, he was infected with the plague, and died in 1530, in the forty-second year of his age, and had a very mean funeral." Lanzi says, in concluding the life of this artist, "so much genius merited success; and a book written on the misfortunes of painters, as has already been done on those of authors, would awaken compassion for the fate of Andrea. The poverty of Correggio is exaggerated, or perhaps, untrue; the misery of Domenichino had a termination; the Caracci were illy rewarded, but they lived in easy circumstances; Andrea, from his marriage with Lucrezia del Fede, until his death was almost always pressed with griefs."

There is also considerable discrepancy as to the real merit of this painter. It has been asserted by some, that had he possessed the advantages of better early instruction, a longer residence at Rome, and more fortunate domestic relations, he would have equalled the greatest masters of the art; others declare that he was barren of invention, and that he wanted that elevation of conception, which constitutes the epic in painting as well as in poetry. Vasari says "he was the most faultless painter of the Florentine school. He perfectly understood the principles of chiaro-scuro, representing the indistinctness of objects in shadow, and painting with a sweetness truly natural. He taught how to give a perfect union to frescos, and in a great measure, obviated the necessity of retouching them when dry, a circumstance which gives all his works the appearance of having been finished in one day." Lanzi says "he undoubtedly wanted that grandeur of conception which constitutes the highest rank in painting. Deficient in this talent, Andrea is said to have been modest, elegant, and imbued with sensibility; and it appears that he impressed this character on nature, wherever he employed his pencil. The portico of the Nunziata, transferred by him into a gallery of inestimable value, is the fittest place to judge of his chaste outlines that procured him the surname of Andrea the faultless. Conceptions of graceful countenances, whose smiles remind us of the simplicity and grace of Correggio; appropriate architecture; draperies adapted to every condition, and cast with ease; popular expressions of curiosity, of astonishment, of confidence, of compassion, and of joy, never transgressing the bounds of decorum, understood at first sight, and greatly affecting the mind without agitating it, are charms that are more readily felt than expressed."

The fresco works of Andrea del Sarto abound in the churches, public edifices and palaces of Florence, and his easel pictures are numerous, and scattered throughout the principal galleries of Europe. He possessed an extraordinary talent for imitating and copying the works of other masters. Of this Vasari relates a remarkable instance, of which he himself was an eye witness, while studying with Andrea, and which affords a striking lesson to those connoisseurs who pretend to infallibility. Raffaele had painted for the Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, afterwards Clement VII., the portrait of Leo X., seated between that prelate and Cardinal Rossi. Frederick II., Duke of Mantua, in passing through Florence to Rome, having seen this picture, and being captivated with it, requested Clement VII. to give it to him, whereupon the Pope gave directions to Ottavio de' Medici to send it to Mantua. Unwilling to deprive Florence of so interesting a work, Ottavio employed Andrea to make a copy of it, which he sent to the Duke of Mantua, while Giulio Romano was in his service, who had painted the background and draperies in the original picture. No person suspected the deception; even Giulio himself was deceived, and could only be convinced of the fact, by Vasari's assuring him that he had seen it painted, and by his pointing out to him the private mark of Andrea del Sarto. There is an etching of a Holy Family, in which the Virgin is represented kneeling before the Infant Christ, with St. Joseph and St. John, inscribed Andrea del Sarto in Roma; though neatly executed, it is considered spurious.

SARTORIUS, FRANCIS, a painter of horses, dogs, and sporting pieces, who flourished in England in the latter part of the 18th century. Many of his pieces were engraved in mezzotinto and aquatinto.

SARTORIUS, JACOB CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg, according to the dates on his prints, from about 1670 to 1737; so that there were probably two engravers of this name, father and son. The prints referred to consist of portraits and other book illustrations indifferently executed.

SARZANA, IL. See FIASELLA.

SARZETTI, ANGILO, a painter of Rimini, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. According to the Guida di Rimini, he was a pupil of Carlo Cignani. There are some of his works both in oil and fresco, in the churches of that city. He was living in 1700

SAS, CHRISTIAN, a German engraver, who flourished, according to the dates on his prints, from about 1628 to 1660. He engraved a variety of plates after Pomarance and other masters; also a set of forty-five plates of the life of St. Filippo Neri, after Stella.

SASSI, CAV. GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Milanese painter, who, according to Orlandi, studied with great assiduity under Solimene at Naples, and acquired a high reputation. He painted both in oil and fresco, and executed many works for the churches of Milan, Pavia, Varese, and other places. Lanzi says he gained more reputation for his small pictures intended for private ornament, than for the works he produced for the churches. He was living in 1718.

SASSOFERRATO, IL. See SALVI.

SATYRUS, an ancient Greek architect, who flourished about B. C. 324. In conjunction with Pytheus, he had the direction of the famous tomb erected by Queen Artemisia, in memory of King Mausolus of Halicarnassus. These two artists made the designs for the work, and left a particular description of it; for which, see BRYAXIS.

§ SAUBERLICH, LAWRENCE, a German engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, engraved and published some wooden cuts at Wittemberg in 1599, bearing the above monogram. Very little is known of him; he is supposed to have died in 1613.

SAURUS. See BATRARCHUS.

SAUERWEID, ALEXANDER, a German painter and engraver, born at Courland in 1782. It is not known under whom he studied, but he is said to have received some instructions in the academy at Dresden. He painted battle-pieces and skirmishes of Cossack cavalry in a very spirited manner. He settled at St. Petersburg, where he passed most of his life; he was patronized by the Emperor Alexander, and died there in 1844. He is little known out of Russia, except by the numerous prints from his designs, executed in aquatint and colors, which are numerous and interesting, as faithful representations of European military costume, and lively records of warlike operations during the wars of Napoleon.

SAUVAGE, J. P., a French painter, born at Tournay in 1744. He studied in the academy at Antwerp, and adopted the style of painting in bas-relief, which art he is said to have carried to such a state of perfection, as to produce perfect illusion. He resided a long time at Paris, where his works were held in high estimation. He imitated marbles and ancient Terra-cottas with great success. He returned to Tournay in 1808, and died there in 1818.

SAUVÉ, JEAN, a French engraver, who according to Basan, flourished in the latter part of the 17th century, and executed some plates after Guido, Pietro da Cortona, and other masters; also a few portraits.

SAVAGE, J., an English engraver and print-seller, who flourished in London about 1680. Ho engraved a number of portraits of noted malefactors, and some of exemplary character, who fell in a better cause, for which reason they are interesting. The following are deserving of notice :

PORTRAITS.

SAVART, PETER, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1750. He engraved quite a number of plates, executed with the graver in a neat, finished style, among which are some portraits of illustrious personages of France. The following are his most esteemed prints :

PORTRAITS.

SAVERY, JAMES, a Flemish painter, born at Courtray about 1545. He studied under Hans Bol at Amsterdam, and painted landscapes and cattle in the style of his master. He finished his pictures with great labor and neatness, though in a hard dry style. He died of the plague at Amsterdam in 1602.

SAVERY, ROLAND, was the son of the preceding artist, born at Courtray in 1576. He was instructed by his father, and it has been supposed from his style, that he afterwards became the disciple of Paul Bril, but this cannot be reconciled with chronology, as that artist left Flanders for Italy when Savery was an infant, where he passed the rest of his life. The resemblance of his style to that of Bril is not more apparent than to that of Breughel or other eminent Flemish landscape painters of the time. He visited France in the reign of King Henry IV., and was employed by that monarch in decorating the royal palaces with his landscapes. He afterwards returned to the Low Countries, where he met with great encouragement. He was invited to Prague by the Emperor Rodolphus II., in whose service he passed the greater part of his life. By the direction of that monarch, he traveled through the grand and picturesque regions of the Tyrolese, and during a residence of two years in that country, filled his portfolio with numerous sketches of the most beautiful wild and romantic scenery. From these designs he executed for his patron many compositions, decorated with animals and figures, in a highly finished and effective style, with a pleasing and natural tone of coloring. His small easel pictures are the best, and in neatness of touch, are accounted little inferior to those of Bril or Breughel. On the death of the Emperor, he settled at Utrecht, where he died in 1639.

SAVERY, JOHN, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Courtray in 1597. According to Huber, he was a nephew of Roland S., and probably was his disciple, as he painted landscapes in his style, which, though inferior to them, possess considerable merit. He executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, among which are a set of six mountainous Landscapes, marked J. Savery, fec. Nic. de Clerc. exc. ; a Landscape, with a Stag-hunt, and a Landscape, with Samson killing the Lion. He died at Utrecht in 1655.

SAVERY, or SAVRY, SOLOMON, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1650. He engraved quite a number of plates of portraits and other subjects, mostly after the Dutch and Flemish masters, among which are a set of seventeen plates from Ovid's Metamorphoses. He also engraved several portraits of Englishmen, among which are Charles I., Oliver Cromwell, Lord Fairfax, and John Speed, the historian, from which circumstance it is supposed he went to England. A list of his prints may be found in Nagler's Lexicon.

SAVOLDO, GIROLAMO, an artist of Brescia, of a noble family, who painted in 1540. It is not known under whom he studied, but Lanzi classes him among the pupils and imitators of Titian, and says, "upon transferring his residence to Venice, he is known to have become one of Titian's most formidable rivals ; not, indeed, in works on a large scale, but in smaller pieces, conducted with an exquisite degree of care, which may, in a measure, be said to have been his chief characteristic ; with such as these, he beguiled his time, presenting them gratuitously to the churches." Paolo Pino ranks him among the best painters of his age. Zanetti describes his little Presepio, or Christ in the Manger, in the church of S. Giobbe, at Venice, "as a truly beautiful picture, exquisitely colored, and the whole composition conducted with singular care." Ridolfi says that in Venice, this painter is known under the name of Girolamo Bresciano, and that he cannot possibly be confounded with Romanino, or Muziano, as neither of those artists were ever employed in that city. Lanzi says his happiest production is an altar-piece painted for the church of the Predicatori at Pesaro, now in the I. R. Pinacoteca, at Milan. "Our Lord is seen placed on high, seated upon a cloud, which appears truly illuminated by the sun, and in the foreground are seen four saints drawn with a force of coloring that appears to bring them as near to the eye as the soft color of the perspective in the upper part of the picture, throws its objects into the distance. It is wholly Titianesque, and is only wanting in a more choice selection of the figures in the foreground." There is also a beautiful picture of the Transfiguration by him in the Florentine gallery. His works are very rare, as he only wrought for amusement. Zani says he operated in 1548, when he was very old ; others say he was living in 1590.

SAVOLINI, CRISTOFORO, a painter born at Cesena, who was living in 1678. According to Malvasia he studied with Cristoforo Serra, a faithful scholar and imitator of Guercino. He executed some works for the churches of his native place, and at Rimini. Lanzi classes him among the followers of the style of Guercino.

SAVONA, IL PRETE DI. See BARTOLOMEO GUIDOBONO.

SAVONANZI, EMILIO, a painter of noble descent, born at Bologna in 1580. He studied successively under Denis Calvart, Cremonini, Lodovico Caracci, and Guido at Bologna; next with Guercino at Cento, and lastly with Algardi the sculptor at Rome. Lanzi says, "by such means he became a good theorist, and an able lecturer, applauded in every particular of art, nor was he wanting in good practice, uniting many styles in one, in which, however, that of Guido most prevails. Still he was not exactly correct in all his pieces, even betraying feebleness of touch, and not scrupling to denominate himself an artist of many hands." He executed a variety of works for the churches at Ancona, at Camerino, and the adjacent cities. He afterwards went to Spain, where he met with great encouragement. He died at Bologna in 1660, aged 80, not in 1638, as erroneously stated by some writers.

SAVORELLI, SEBASTIANO, a painter of Forli, who, according to Guarienti, studied under Carlo Cignani, whose style he adopted, and executed some works for the churches of Forli, and the adjacent cities. He was a priest, and flourished in the latter part of the 17th century.

SAVOYE, or SAVOYEN, CHARLES VAN, a Flemish painter, who, according to Balkema, was born at Antwerp in 1619, and died in 1669. Zani says he was living in 1680. He was very fond of painting the nude figure, and he painted a great many small cabinet pictures of subjects taken from Ovid. His works are beautifully colored and highly finished, though his drawing is not very correct.

SAVOYE, DANIEL, a French painter, born at Grenoble in 1644, and died at Erlangen in 1716. He studied under Sebastien Bourdon, and painted portraits with reputation. He etched some small plates of soldiers, and costumes of the time of Louis XIII., marked D. S., sc. There is also a Repose in Egypt by him, in which the Virgin is seated near a fountain, attended with three angels; on the left an ass is tied to a tree.

SAY, WILLIAM, an eminent English engraver in mezzotinto, born at the small village of Lakenham, near Norwich, in 1768. He studied with James Ward, and executed a great number of plates, many of them of large dimensions. He engraved several plates after the old masters, but most of his prints are from the English school; many of them half and full length portraits, after Reynolds, and others; several for Turner's River Scenery, two of Brigands, after Eastlake; the Raising of Lazarus, after Hilton, &c. The whole number of his plates is about 330. He died in 1834.

SBARBI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Cremona, according to Zani, in 1661; others say he flourished from 1701 to 1750. He first studied under Bernasconi at Milan, and afterwards with Lorenzo Pasinelli at Bologna. He painted history and animals, but was most eminent in the latter, which he drew from life with great spirit and accuracy. He acquired sufficient reputation to induce the Duke Ranucci Farnese, to invite him to Piacenza, and take him into his service, for whom he executed some of his best works.

SCACCIANI, CAMILLO, a painter of Pesaro, who flourished there towards the latter part of the 18th century. He executed some works for the churches, but he wrought mostly for the collections. Lanzi says he was a good artist, and painted in the style of the Caracci, allied to the modern. There is a fine picture by him of St. Andrea Avelino, in the cathedral of Pesaro.

SCACCIATI, ANDREA, a painter born at Florence in 1642. He first studied under Marco Bassi, but afterwards with Lorenzo Lippi, who, perceiving that his genius was best adapted to the representation of fruit and flowers, persuaded him to devote himself entirely to that branch, which advice he followed, and became very eminent. He was much patronized by the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the principal nobility, and his pictures were sought after in foreign parts. He was living in 1704.

SCACCIATI, ANDREA, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence, according to Zani, in 1725, and died there in 1771. In 1766 he published a set of forty-one plates in aquatinta, after the works of the great masters in the collection of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. He also engraved some other plates after the Italian masters.

SCAGLIA, GIROLAMO, called IL PARMIGGIANO, a painter born at Lucca, who studied first with Pietro Paulini at Lucca, and afterwards with Giovanni Marracci. He executed some works for the churches of his native city and of Pisa, which Lanzi says exhibit extreme industry, but little taste; in his architecture, he imitated Pietro da Cortona, and in his coloring, he followed Paulini, particularly in his shadows, in which he approached Ricchi. He flourished in the latter part of the 17th century.

SCAICHI, GOTTFRED, a Florentine engraver, who flourished in 1623. There is a set of views of the palaces and gardens of the Grand Duke, by him, etched in a slight style.

SCAIARIO, ANTONIO, a painter of Bassano, who studied under Gio. Battista da Ponte, whose style he imitated, and whose daughter he married. He also inherited his property. For these reasons he sometimes signed his pictures Antonio da Ponte, and Antonio Bassano. His works are held in considerable esteem. He died, according to Verci, in 1640.

SCALABRINI, MARC' ANTONIO, a painter born at Verona, who flourished in 1565. He executed some works for the churches of his native city and elsewhere, in which he imitated the Venetian school in design and coloring. Pozzi says he distinguished himself, and particularly commends two altar-pieces of scriptural subjects by him, in the church of S. Zeno.

SCALABRINO, LO, a painter said to have been born at Siena, but probably was a native of Pistoja. He studied under the Cav. Gio. Antonio Razzi, called Il Sodoma, and is said by Della Valle to have excelled in grotesque subjects. In the church of S. Francesco, at Siena, without the Tuscan gate, are seven beautifully painted altar-pieces, inscribed Scalabrinus Pistoriensis. Lanzi says that Scalabrino was a man of genius, a poet, and a good painter. It is uncertain whether he was a native of Siena or Pistoja; if the altar-pieces referred to are not by the scholar of Razzi, then a skillful painter of Pistoja has been overlooked. He thinks, however, that there was but one artist of that name, and if he was a native of Siena, he preferred to be considered a Pistoiese.

SCALBERGE, PETER, a Flemish painter and engraver, of whom little is known, except by his prints. He resided at Paris about 1638, where he executed quite a number of plates from his own designs and after other masters. Dumesnil describes forty-seven prints by him. Zani says he operated as late as 1650.

SCALBERGE, or SCALLE BERGE, FREDERIC, a Flemish engraver, and probably painter, who flourished, according to the dates on his prints, from about 1623 to 1636. Four of his etchings are marked at Rome, 1623; others are dated at Paris, 1636. His prints consist mostly of landscapes, etched in a spirited manner; some of them in the style of Paul Bril, and others more nearly resemble that of Nicolas Moyaert. He variously signed his prints Scalberge, and Scalle Berge. He was probably a relative of the preceding artist, but his prints are executed in a more scientific manner.

SCALFURATIO, GIOVANNI, an Italian architect, who is merely mentioned by Milizia as the restorer of the church of S. Rocca at Venice, originally erected by Bartolomeo Buono, in 1495.—Scalfuratio died in 1764.

SCALIGERO, BARTOLOMEO, a painter born at Venice, according to Zani, in 1630, though Zanetti and others say he was a Paduan, and Lanzi, that he is claimed by the people of Padua as one of their fellow citizens. At all events, he studied under Alessandro Varotari, called Padovanino, and ranks among the most celebrated pupils and imitators of that master. He resided mostly at Venice, where he executed many works for the churches, the most beautiful of which, according to Lanzi, are at the Corpus Domini. There are four of his works at Padua. The time of his death is not known, and it is very probable that he was born much earlier than 1630. See Varotari.

SCALIGERO, LUCIA, a Venetian paintress, born at Venice in 1637. She was distinguished for her knowledge of the learned languages, skill in music and taste in painting. She is said to have studied painting under Alessandro Varotari; if so, it was at a tender age, as Varotari died in 1650. Boschini is of opinion that she learned the art of Chiara Dario, a celebrated paintress, much employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany. Lucia acquired considerable reputation for her portraits, was much employed by the nobility of Venice, and her beauty, merits and accomplishments, were extolled by the poets of her time. She also painted several pictures for the churches. She died in 1700.

SCALVATI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Bologna in 1559. He studied under Tommaso Lauretti, accompanied that master to Rome, when he was invited there by Gregory XIII., and assisted him in his works in the Sala di Constantino. Scavati was afterwards employed among other artists, by Sixtus V., in decorating the Library of the Vatican, and in the execution of several other important works. He however chiefly excelled in portraits, in which branch he was very distinguished, and during the pontificate of Clement VIII., Leo XI., and Paul V., he painted the portraits of many of the most distinguished personages at Rome, among whom was Clement VIII. He died in 1622.

SCAMINOSSI, RAFFAELLE, a painter born at Borgo San Sepolero, about 1570, though authors disagree on this point. He studied under Raffaellino del Colle, and painted history with considerable reputation, though he is more celebrated as an engraver. Orlandi commends a picture by him in the cathedral at Bologna, and Lanzi says his compositions display great simplicity; he drew his ideas chiefly from nature, and he attended sufficiently to coloring. Bartsch describes in Le Peintre Graveur tom. xvii., 137 prints by him. They are executed in a bold, effective style; his drawing is tolerably correct, and there is a fine expression in the heads; some of them are from his own designs, and others after other masters. He sometimes marked his prints with a monogram composed of R. A. S. F., as above; at others, with his name in full, variously written, Raphael Schaminossi, Schiaminossi, or Sciamonossi, frequently Latinized, as Raphael Schaminossius. Pictor. et Sculp. He is also called by writers, by all the above names, to which Scaminossi is added. The time of his death is not known; he was living in 1620, as appears from the dates on some of his prints.

SCAMOZZI, VINCENZIO, an eminent Italian architect, the cotemporary and countryman of Palladio, was born at Vicenza in 1552. He was the son and scholar of Giovanni Domenico S., an architect of small reputation, who practised at Vicenza. After displaying proofs of his taste and ability in several designs for Count Verlati and others, Scamozzi visited Venice, where he is said, though very improbably, to have studied under Palladio. He gained great improvement, however, by attentively studying the works of Palladio and Sansovino, then being erected at Venice; and Milizia says "he particularly admired Palladio," although in his writings Scamozzi rather detracts from the merit of that master. When seventeen years old, he was employed to remedy certain defects in the church of S. Salvatore at Venice, and at the age of twenty-two he composed a treatise on perspective, in ten books, enlarging particularly upon the subject of scene-painting. Not contented with his attainments in the art, he visited Rome in 1579, studied mathematics under the Padre Clavio, inspected the monuments of antiquity with the greatest assiduity, and made exact and elaborate drawings of the most famous edifices, especially the Coliseum, and the Baths of Antoninus and Diocletian. After spending about eighteen months at Rome, he revisited Venice, and studied the remains of antiquity in that city and its environs.

On returning to Venice, Scamozzi at first devoted his attention to the theoretical department of his art, and composed the explanations to a series of plates by Pittori, with an Essay in three chapters, relating to Roman antiquities. This work was received with great and deserved applause by the best judges of the time. The recent death of Sansovino and Palladio (1570 and 1580), were not unfavorable to his rising distinction, and he began to be considered as their successor in the public esteem. Accordingly, after completing his admirable monument to the Doge Niccolò da Ponte, in the church of S. Maria della Carità, Scamozzi was commissioned to complete the public library of S. Marco, commenced by Sansovino, and was afterwards employed in a similar commission on Palladio's Teatro Olimpico at Vicenza, adding a fixed scena, with its three avenues of buildings, shown in perspective, but executed in relief. In 1585, at the reception of the Eupress Maria of Austria at Vicenza, Scamozzi was appointed to direct the festivals. For Vespaziano Gonzaga, Duke of Sabionetta, he erected a theatre similar to that at Vicenza, which was honored by the perfect approbation of the learned, but has since been destroyed. In 1593, he erected the famous fortress of Palma, near Friuli.

A deputation being sent from the Venetian republic to congratulate Sigismund on his accession to the throne of Poland, Scamozzi availed himself of the offer of the Senator Duodo to visit that country, as well as various parts of Germany and France. During this journey, he studied every specimen of Gothic architecture with the greatest assiduity, and conceived the idea of his treatise on all the different styles of European architecture. While spending a short time at Saltzburg, he was presented to the archbishop, who subsequently employed him to design the Cathedral of that city. This celebrated edifice was completed from his design in 1628, and is described by Temanza as one of the noblest temples of modern times, greatly superior in architectural excellence to the world-renowned St. Peter's. Scamozzi was deeply learned in his profession; his edifices were simple, correct, and majestic. On returning to Venice from his northern tour, he was very extensively employed, and erected, among other edifices, the Palazzo Cornaro, in the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders at Venice; the church of S. Niccolo di Tolentino; and that of SS. Simone e Giuda. At Florence, he was employed upon the Strozzi palace; and at Genoa he superintended the Ravaschieri palace, of three stories, rustic, Ionic, and Corinthian. One of his most celebrated works, however, is the stately range of buildings on the south side of St. Mark's Place, called the Procuratie Nuove, commenced by him in 1586. The design itself, however, may be said to belong to Sansovino, all the lower part as far as the entablature of the second order being a continuation of the façade of the adjoining public library; while the excessively deep frieze and cornice of Sansovino's second order are moderated, and a beautiful Corinthian story is added to the whole, forming a most tasteful and elegant structure, sufficient alone to perpetuate the fame of the architect. Scamozzi was almost overwhelmed by commissions and applications for designs, from princes and distinguished individuals, so that he had little time to devote to the favorite project of his life, his Architettura Universale. This great undertaking was to have been completed in ten books, but only six appeared. The sixth treats on the different orders of architecture, and, according to Milizia, is a masterpiece, showing his deep knowledge of his profession. Scamozzi died in 1616, and his remains were deposited in the church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo, at Venice.

SCAMOZZI, OTTAVIO. See BERTOTTI.

SCANNABECCHI. See DALMASIO and MURATORI.

SCANNAVINI, or SCANNAVESI, MAURELIO, a painter born at Ferrara in 1655. He first studied under Francesco Ferrari, but afterwards visited Bologna, where he entered the school of the Cav. Carlo Cignani, and became one of his most distinguished disciples. Lanzi says, "he emulated his master with the most scrupulous exactness. He was naturally slow, and never could prevail on himself to send a picture from his studio till he beheld it complete in every respect; though impelled by domestic penury to greater haste, he never varied from this method; nor did he envy the more fortunate Avanzi, who abounded with commissions while he was destitute. The noble house of Bevilacqua assisted him much, and it redounds to its honor that, in remunerating him for some figures in an apartment where Aldrovandini had conducted the architecture, a very large sum was added to the price agreed upon." He painted both in oil and fresco, but he conducted only a few fresco pieces, as that method requires artists of a more expeditious hand. The greatest work of this master is in the refectory of the Dominicans at Ferrara, consisting of a series of fourteen pictures from the life of St. Dominic. His other principal works in the churches are, the Annunciation, in S. Stefano; St. Brigida swooning before a Crucifix, supported by an Angel, in S. Maria della Grazie; and St. Tommaso di Villanova distributing Alms to the Poor, at the Agostiniani Scalzi, which last is considered his most capital performance. He wrought much for the collections, and Lanzi says the noble families of Bevilacqua, Calcagnini, Rondinelli, and Trotti, possess several of his pictures, painted for private ornament, among which are portraits that display Maurelio's singular talents in that branch; and histories of half-length figures, in the manner of Cignani. "They possess gracefulness, union of coloring, and a strength of tints, which leaves him nothing to envy in the artists by whom he is surrounded, except their fortune." He died in 1698.

SCARAMUCCIA, GIO. ANTONIO, a painter born at Perugia in 1580. According to Pozzo, he studied under the Cav. Roncalli, whose manner he adopted. Lanzi says his works are frequently to be met with at Perugia. "The spirit and freedom of his pencil are more to be commended than his tints, which are too dark, and which in the churches easily distinguish him amidst a crowd of other artists. It is probable that he used too great a quantity of terra d'ombra, like others of his day." He died at Perugia in 1650.

SCARAMUCCIA, LUIGI, called IL PERUGINO, was the son of the preceding, born at Perugia in 1616. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Bologna, and entered the school of Guido, and, according to Malvasia, he afterwards studied with Guercino. He however founded his style on that of Guido. Lanzi says, "he displays grace and elegance in every part of his work, and if he does not soar, he never falls to the ground." He rose to eminence in his profession, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Perugia, Bologna, and Milan; he also painted much for the collections. Among his principal works are the Presentation, in the church of the Filippini, at Perugia; St. Barbara, in the church of S. Marco, at Milan; and the Coronation of the Emperor Charles V. by Clement VII. composed and designed in a grand style, in the Ducal palace at Bologna. Lanzi says his works abound at Perugia, both in public and private, and there are more at Milan than at Bologna. He executed a few etchings, in a free and spirited style, resembling that of Guido; only four, with their variations, are known, viz.: Christ crowned with Thorns, after Titian; St. Benedict praying, after L. Caracci; the Virgin, and Venus and Adonis, after Ann. Caracci. He died at Milan in 1680, though some say at Pavia.

SCARPACCIA, VITTORE, an old Venetian painter, born at Verona in 1410, and died at Verona in 1469. He was eminent in his time, both in history and portraits, and is said to have understood the principles of perspective.

SCARSELLA, SIGISMONDO, called IL MONDINO, a painter born at Ferrara in 1530. He went to Venice, studied in the school of Paul Veronese three years, and afterwards continued there thirteen years, engaged in studying the best works of the Venetian school, with the rules of perspective and architecture. He returned to Ferrara, where he acquired distinction, and was called by his fellow-citizens Il Mondino. He executed many works for the churches and public edifices, as well as for the collections of his native city, in which he imitated the manner of Veronese. Lanzi says, "he wrought in a good Paolesque style, but at a considerable distance as a disciple." Most of his works in public have perished, or been greatly injured by retouching. The only one retaining anything like its original beauty is the Visitation to St. Elizabeth, in the church of S. Croce. His easel pictures are in better preservation, and are highly esteemed; but Lanzi says they are mostly attributed to his son, Ippolito. He died in 1614.

SCARSELLA, IPPOLITO, called LO SCARSELLINO, an eminent painter, was the son of the preceding, born at Ferrara, according to Baruffaldi, in 1551. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Venice, where he became the pupil of Giacomo Bassano, and afterwards diligently studied the works of the great Venetian masters, particularly those of Paul Veronese. After a residence of six years at Venice, he returned to Ferrara, where he acquired an immense reputation. Lanzi says he "executed more pictures for the churches and individuals in his native city, than by many other artists together. His fellow-citizens call him the Paolo of their school, but his character is different; he seems the reformer of the paternal taste; his conceptions are more beautiful, and his tints more attractive. On comparison with Veronese, it is evident that his style is derived from that source, though it is different, being composed of the Venetian and the Lombard, of native and foreign schools, the offspring of an intellect well founded in the theory of the art, of a gay and animated fancy, of a hand, if not always equal, yet always prompt, spirited, and rapid. Hence we see a great number of his pictures in different cities of Lombardy and Romagna, to say nothing of those at Ferrara. There, his pictures of the Assumption and the Nuptials at Cana, at the Benedettini; the Pietà and the Decollation of St. John, in the church of the same convent; and the Noli me Tangere, at S. Niccolo, are among the most celebrated: also his Pentecost, his Annunciation, and his Epiphany, conducted in competition with the Presentation of Annibale Caracci, at the Oratorio della Scala. A number of repetitions or copies of these and others, on a smaller scale, are to be seen in private houses. His works, too, are frequently met with at Rome; some are at the Campidoglio, and at the palaces of the Albani, Borghesi, Corsini, and in greater number at the Lancellotti. I have sometimes examined them in company with professors who never ceased to extol them. They recognized various imitations of Veronese, in the inventions and the copiousness; of Parmiggiano in the lightness and grace of the figures; of Titian in the flesh, particularly in a Bacchanal at the Casa Albani; of Dossi and Carpi in the strength of color, in those fiery yellows, in those deep rose colors, and also in that bright tinge given to the clouds and the air. What sufficiently distinguishes him, too, are a few extremely graceful countenances, which he drew from two of his daughters; a light shade which envelopes the whole of his objects without obscuring them, and that slightness of design which borders almost upon the dry, in opposition perhaps to Bastiano Filippi, who is sometimes reproached with exhibiting coarse and heavy features." He also painted portraits with great success. Bartsch describes a single print by him, representing a female Saint with Angels, signed with his name, but without date. He died in 1621. The above dates are given by Baruffaldi and Lanzi, and are doubtless correct, though there is some disagreement on these points; Zani says he was born in 1551, and died in 1621; Ticozzi, that he died in 1621, aged 70; others place his birth about 1560 and 1570.

SCHADOW, JOHN GODFREY, a German sculptor, was born at Berlin in 1764. After acquiring a good knowledge of the art he married, and was enabled, through the liberality of his father-in-law, to visit Italy in 1785. After studying at Rome with assiduity for two years, Schadow was recalled to Berlin, and appointed sculptor to the court. His busts, statues, and monuments are quite numerous, and evince considerable talents. Among them are the colossal statue of Gen. Ziethon; that of Frederick the Great, at Stettin; the monument to Gen. Blucher, at Rostock; and the superb monument to the young Count de la Marche, the natural son of Frederick the Great; also the model of the four-horsed chariot over the Brandenburg gate at Berlin. Schadow left two sons; Frederick William, born in 1789, has attained considerable eminence in painting, and in 1826 was appointed Director of the Dusseldorf Academy. The elder son, John Rodolph, is the subject of the following article.

SCHADOW, JOHN RODOLPH. This sculptor was born at Rome in 1786. He was the son of Godfrey Schadow, an able German artist, who returned to Berlin in 1788, and was appointed sculptor to the king. The young Schadow acquired from his father the elements of the art, and executed, at the age of eighteen, a copy of the Apollo Belvidere. In 1810 he visited Rome with the royal pension, and studied with such great assiduity under Canova and Thorwaldsen that he soon gained distinction, and produced his graceful statue of Paris debating on his Decision, which was executed in bronze at Vienna, for Count Schoenborn Wiesentheid, a patron of the young artist. His next production was a marble statue of a Girl fastening her Sandals, greatly admired by connoisseurs for its simplicity, grace, and exquisite proportions; also two other figures, a young Girl spinning, and a winged Cupid hesitating which of the two he shall honor with a crown. Schadow received many commissions for single copies of these exquisite statues; some of them were in the collections of Prince Esterhazy and the King of Prussia, and several are in England. He commenced a work in the latter part of his life, said to have combined the grandeur of Thorwaldsen with the grace of Canova, representing Achilles protecting the body of Penthesilea. The Prince Hardenberg of Prussia offered him 64,000*fl.* for the complete work upon viewing the model; but, unfortunately for the art, Schadow died soon after, in 1822, universally regretted. Among his other works are a statue of St. John the Baptist; the Virgin bearing the infant Jesus; Diana; Bacchus; a Discobolus, or Quoit-Thrower; a bas-relief at the tomb of the Austrian general, Koller, representing that commander reclining on a couch, with Faith, Hope, and Charity above; also a similar bas-relief at the tomb of the Marquis of Lansdowne, with a representation of Night above, and a figure of Sleep and Death in her bosom. His group of Achilles and Penthesilea was completed in Carrara marble, by Wolf, the cousin of Schadow, and a scholar of his father.

HFF or ISL. SCHAERER, H. L., a Dutch engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, engraved a small landscape marked with a monogram composed of his initials, H. L. S., as above. He also copied some prints by Saftleven and J. Saenredam, which are signed H. L. Schaerer, sculp. There are other similar prints, signed A. L. Schaerer. He flourished about 1627.

ISL. SCHAEUFLEIN, HANS or JOHN, the Elder and Younger. There is much contradiction and uncertainty about these old German artists. Bartsch, after having examined the subject with his usual critical acumen, says, "that there were two artists of this name, an elder and a younger, seems to rest merely on conjecture." The curious inquirer, after having consulted that author, Nagler, Brulliot, Heineken, Jackson's History of Wood Engraving, and many others who have discussed the subject, will doubtless come to the same conclusion. Bartsch, in "Le Peintre Graveur," tom. vii., gives a descriptive account of one hundred and thirty-two prints, by or after the designs of Hans Schaeuflein, and Nagler has increased the number to one hundred and seventy-seven. They are mostly wooden cuts, dated from about 1515 to 1540. They are usually marked with one of the accompanying monograms, composed of an H. and an S., to which a baker's peel or shovel, often two crossed, are frequently added as a rebus to the name, Schaeuflein in German, signifying little shovel. These prints are designed in the dry, stiff, formal manner of the time, yet they are executed in a bold, spirited style. There is, however, a considerable difference in the merit of the prints; hence, Bartsch infers that many of them were executed by other engravers after his designs. It is certain that he was a coadjutor of Hans Burgkmair, in the work known as the "Adventures of Tewrdanck," published in 1517, the greater part of the designs for which he is supposed to have made for the engravers, and some of the cuts bear his mark, H. with S. on the cross-bar and a single peel. The same may be said of the "Triumphs of Maximilian." His principal works are, "The Life and Passion of Christ," in thirty-seven cuts, published at Frankfort in 1537; and "The Miracles, Parables, &c., of Christ," in thirty-six cuts. The generality of writers, especially the older German, mention only one Schaeuflein, but Huber and some others say there were two, the Elder and the Younger. The elder, they say, flourished about 1480, and they suppose, from the style of the prints they attribute to him, marked simply H. with an S. on the cross-bar, that he was a disciple of Martin Schoen. The younger was born at Nuremberg about 1487, and distinguished himself as a painter as well as an engraver on wood; and they suppose that he was a disciple of Albert Durer, whom he imitated both in his paintings and engravings. All this, however, rests merely on conjecture. If there were any good grounds for believing that there were two Schaeufleins, from history or style, Bartsch would not have failed to have made the distinction, and to have separated and classified their prints. The prints attributed to the younger S. are of little account, and of very doubtful authenticity. The name, too, is variously written Schaeuflein, Schaufflein, Schauffelin. The younger S. is said to have died at Nordlingen in 1539.

IS,  ro ISL ro SH

SCHAFFNABURG, or SCHAFFNABURGENSIS, MATTHEW or MATTHEUS, an old German engraver on wood, who executed the cuts for a bible published at Wittenberg, in 1545. He engraved some other pieces, which are marked with his name, or his initials M. S. on a tablet. There is little certainty about the prints attributed to this artist, as well as the works of several other German artists who flourished about 1550, and used the initials M. S. The accounts are exceedingly contradictory, and the information sought for is for the most part "as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff."

SCHAFFNER, MARTIN, a German painter, who flourished at Ulm from 1502 to 1539, as appears from the records of that city. He painted history and portraits, and ranks among the best German masters of that period. There are several of his works at Ulm, Nuremberg, Augsburg, Vienna, and other places. Some of his best works were in the Gallery at Schleissheim, among which are the Annunciation, the Presentation, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the Death of the Virgin. His pictures are well designed, with a fine expression in the heads, but his coloring is feeble and defective. He sometimes signed his pictures with a monogram composed of his initials, an M. with an S. in the centre, and sometimes with the letters MSMZV., which Brulliot interprets Martin Schaffner Mahler zu Ulm. This last mark is on a picture of the Annunciation, now in the collection of the king of Bavaria. Some of his works were formerly attributed to Martin Schoen or Schöngauer, from the similarity of mark.

SCHAGEN, GILES VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Alkmaer in 1616. He first studied with Solomon van Ravesteyn, and afterwards with Peter Verbeck. He traveled through Germany for improvement, and first went to Dantzic, where he resided some time, and painted interiors of kitchens, ale-houses, and conversations, in imitation of Ostade, with considerable success. At Elbing, he contracted an intimacy with Strobel, through whose influence he was introduced to Stanislaus, king of Poland, whose portrait he painted. Schagen next went to Paris, where he met with much encouragement, and his pictures were greatly admired. He was also employed in copying the works of the best Italian and Flemish painters, for which he possessed a remarkable talent. He copied a picture of the Virgin and Child after Rubens, with a force and brilliancy of coloring, and a freedom of penciling little inferior to the original. He afterwards returned to his native city, where he practised with equal success till his death. One of his most remarkable pictures was a representation of the engagement between the Dutch and Spanish fleets under admirals van Tromp and Oquendo, which he sketched during the fight, at the request of the Dutch admiral, it is said, but more probably it was his own desire, as he was an eccentric man, fond of novelty and excitement. The picture was executed with great spirit and freedom. He died in 1668.

SCHALCH, JOHN JACOB, a German landscape painter, born at Schaffhausen in 1723. Little is known of him. He is said to have painted landscapes, cattle, and figures, in the manner of Breughel. He visited Holland and England, and died in 1770. His works are unknown in England.

SCHALCKE, a Dutch painter of whom nothing is known except a few pictures of river scenery and landscapes, with cattle and figures, said to be "painted with the spirit and freedom of Teniers, and an effect of light similar to Rembrandt." There is a fine marine by him in the Gallery at Prague. Nagler suggests whether he is not the same as Godfrey Schalcken. He flourished in the second half of the 17th century.

SCHALCKEN, GODFREY, a Dutch historical and portrait painter, born at Dort in 1643. His father was rector of the college in that city, and intended to give his son a liberal education, but finding that he possessed a passion for painting, he allowed him to follow the bent of his genius, and placed him under the instruction of Solomon van Hoogstraten. He afterwards went to Leyden, and entered the school of Gerard Douw, with whom he continued some years, and acquired that delicacy of finishing, and that knowledge of the principles of the chiaro-scuro which distinguishes his works. At first he confined himself to small cabinet pictures, chiefly represented by candle-light, subjects which his instructor treated with distinguished success. On leaving the school of Douw, he attempted to aggrandize his style by studying the works of Rembrandt, but unequal to attain the vigorous touch and magical effect of that extraordinary artist, he pursued his first principles, and his pictures were sought after with avidity.

On settling in his native city, he soon gained a high reputation, and was much employed in painting portraits. He was remarkable for painting in a variety of ways, in all of which he excelled, but most in night subjects. He knew how to distribute the light of a flambeau or taper with extraordinary skill, so as to diffuse a brightness over his objects by a proper opposition of shadow, which only nature could equal; in this line he was without a competitor. Houbraken mentions one of his pictures of this sort which was exceedingly admired; the subject was St. Peter denying Christ, in which the maid is represented as holding up a light to the face of the apostle. It was a composition of many figures, more correctly designed, and with a better expression than was usual with him, and the whole picture, from the powerful distribution of light and shadow, produced a wonderful effect. To give the most natural effect to his night-pieces, it was his custom to arrange his models, or the objects he desired to paint, in a dark room attached to his studio, with the light properly adjusted; then, observing the effect through a small aperture, he painted what he saw in the darkened chamber. Schalcken met with the most flattering success at Dort, especially in small portraits; he had painted the principal families in that city, when the extraordinary success of his countryman, Sir Godfrey Kneller, in England, induced him to visit that country in the reign of King William. He had the honor of painting that monarch, but did not meet with much success, and soon left the country in disgust and settled at the Hague, where he found a prodigious demand for his small pictures, and sold them at a high price. A ridiculous and preposterous anecdote is related of the cause of his failure in England, on the authority of Campo Weyermans, which is not entitled to the least credit. "When Schalcken had the honor to paint King William III., it was the monarch's wish to be painted by candlelight, from the reputation the painter had acquired in pictures of that sort. Schalcken presented him with a taper to hold in a particular position, which, during the progress of the work, accidentally melted, and dropped on the fingers of the king, who, unwilling to disconcert the artist, bore it with great composure for some time. This ignorant and disrespectful conduct of Schalcken disgusted the courtiers, and entirely lost him their favor." The true causes doubtless were that Kneller and others monopolized the business of portraiture—the only branch which occupied public attention at that time in England, and to satisfy the taste of the country, he was obliged to paint his figures as large as life, to which he had not been accustomed, and in which he was not very successful.

The chief merits of the pictures of Schalcken consist in the neatness and spirit of his touch, the delicacy of his finishing, and a perfect intelligence of the chiaro-scuro, as it relates to objects under the influence of a fixed and local light. In his sun-light pictures, his pencilling has been compared to that of Mieris and Vanderwerf; his coloring was warm and gilded, and his tones sweet and harmonious. His works, however, are generally defective in design, expression, and drawing.—There is a great discrepancy among writers as to the real merits of Schalcken; and his works, or at least some of them, do not sustain his reputation. But this may be said of many of the old masters, for time often produces great changes in pictures, and this is the case with some of those of Schalcken. His works have also been largely imitated, and many considered genuine are doubtless spurious. It is said by some that he was an expert mechanical painter, who labored and finished his pictures with great care; but this objection might be urged against his instructor, Douw, and other eminent artists of his country. His daylight pictures are the rarest, and consequently bring the highest prices. His works are to be found in the choicest collections, and are highly esteemed. Some of them have been engraved by Wille and other eminent artists. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné, vol. iv., and Supplement, gives descriptions of one hundred and thirty-seven pictures by him. Brulliot ascribes to him a single etching, of a laughing peasant, hiding the greater part of his face with his right hand. It is a three-quarters bust, oval, inscribed Quam meminisse juvat. Balkema says he had a nephew named Jacob Schalcken, whom he instructed in the art, and who imitated his manner successfully. He also had a sister, named Maria, who practised painting, and was doubtless instructed by her brother. He died at the Hague in 1706. His name is often incorrectly written Scalcken.

SCHAPFF, JORG, one of the oldest German wood engravers. The Baron Heineken says he executed a part of the cuts for a book on Chiromancy, by Dr. Hartlieb, published in 1448. In his Idea of a complete collection of Prints, that author has given a copy of one of these cuts, and nothing can be more rudely executed. The book consists of twenty-four pages, printed on both sides, the discourse being cut on blocks of wood. The name of the engraver is inscribed on the bottom of one of the leaves, Jorg Schapff in Augsbourg, 1448. On the last page is Jorg Schapff zu Augsbourg.

SCHATEN, HUBERT, an engraver, who resided at Copenhagen, and engraved some portraits of distinguished Danish personages, which bear date from 1675 to 1694.

SCHIAUR, PHILIP, an engraver mentioned by Strutt, by whom there is an etching of an old Man with a bushy beard, in spectacles, mending a pen, with books and an hour-glass before him.

SCHEEMAKERS, a Flemish sculptor, who attained great celebrity in England. He was born at Antwerp in 1691. After studying under his father, and a sculptor named Delvaux, he went to Denmark, and wrought for some time as a journeyman. About 1728 he visited Rome for improvement, and before long went to England, where he obtained considerable employment.—About 1733 he revisited Rome, where he remained two years, and returned to England in 1735. At this time, Rysbrack and Roubilliac were flourishing; but Scheemakers gradually rose in public esteem, and received many important commissions. His numerous works are distinguished for elaborateness of design, beauty of execution, and vigor of effect. Among the principal are, in Westminster Abbey, the greatly admired monument of Shakspeare; also those of Dryden, the Duke of Albemarle, the Duke of Buckingham, Admiral Watson, &c. He executed several busts and other sculptures for the gardens of Stowe; also the statue of Sir John Barnard, in the old Royal Exchange; the statues in the India House of Admiral Pocock and Lord Clive; the bronze statue of Guy, in Guy's Hospital; and that of Edward VI. in St. Thomas' Hospital. In 1756 and 1757 there were two sales of his effects, in Covent Garden, among which was a beautiful small copy of the Laocoon in marble, purchased by the Earl of Lincoln. There have been many excellent casts made of this work. Smith, following the authority of Nollekens, a pupil of Scheemakers, says that he returned to Antwerp in 1770, and soon after died in that city.

SCHEINDEL, or SCHEYNDEL, GEORGE VAN, a Dutch designer and engraver, who flourished at Rotterdam, according to the dates on his prints, from about 1635 to 1660. He engraved quite a number of plates from his own designs, and after other masters, executed in a neat and agreeable style, resembling that of Callot. His landscapes with figures, correctly drawn and executed with spirit, are deservedly admired. He was a cotemporary of William van Buytenweg, and engraved some plates after his designs. Among other prints are the following by him:

A pair of Landscapes, with Peasants amusing themselves. The Tooth-drawer. A Village Festival, with Boors fighting. The Companion, with a Quack-doctor. A Winter piece, with Skaters on the ice. A Landscape, with a Waterfall. A Landscape, with a Bridge. A set of four views of a Castle and the environs, one of them with a Windmill. A set of twelve Landscapes, with a Dutch inscription. A set of twelve plates of European, Turkish and Grecian figures. Twelve plates of Habits of the Countrymen of the several Cantons of Holland.

SCHEITZ, MATTHEW, a German painter, born at Hamburg about 1646. According to Huber, he was a scholar of Philip Wouwerman, whose style and subjects he followed for some time, but afterwards abandoned them for those of David Teniers. He etched some plates from his own designs, executed in a bold, free style, among which are the following:

The Four Seasons, represented by the Sports of Children; in four plates; M. Scheitz fec. 1671. Two Landscapes, with figures dancing and amusing themselves. An old Man playing on the Violin, and a Woman singing before the door of a Cottage. The Spectacle Merchant.

SCHEITZ, ANDREW, a German engraver, was the son of the preceding. He executed some plates after the works of his father and others, which bear date from 1657 to 1678.

SCHELLENBERG, JOHN RUDOLPH, a Swiss designer and engraver, was born at Winterthur in 1740. He was the son and scholar of an obscure painter of portraits and landscapes, named John Ulric S., born in 1709, and died in 1770. Entomology being his favorite study, he made about 2000 colored designs of insects, and sold them to the king of Bavaria; after which he made a similar collection of 4500 designs of insects, making 60 vols. in 8vo. Among his principal plates are some in Lavater's work on Physiognomy, after the designs of Chodowiecki; several of the portraits and ornamental prints for the Lives of the Swiss painters, by J. C. Füessli; and twenty-four plates of insects, for a work entitled Les Caractères des Insectes, suivant le système de Linnée. Schellenberg died, according to Nagler, in 1806.

SCHELLENBERGER, or SCHOLLEMBERGER, JOHN JACOB, a German engraver, who flourished from about 1660 to 1674. He engraved some portraits of distinguished personages, and executed a part of those for Priorato's History of the Emperor Leopold.

SCHELLINKS, WILLIAM, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam, according to Descamps, in 1632. From the style of his pictures, he is supposed to have studied with John Lingelbach. He afterwards traveled through France, Switzerland, Italy, and England. He painted landscapes and seaports, decorated with figures well designed, and touched with great neatness and spirit. His animals are correctly drawn, and his groups are tastefully composed. The brilliant and sunny effect in some of his pictures reminds us of the charming productions of Karel du Jardin. He also had an excellent knowledge of perspective, as is evinced in some of his extensive views, in which the nicest gradations are observed. He resided chiefly at Amsterdam. His works are little known out of his own country, though there, they are to be found in the choicest collections, and are highly esteemed. He wrote his name, as appears from several of his drawings, Schellinks and Schellings; others write it Schellincks. He died in 1678.

SCHELLINKS, DANIEL, was the brother of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1638, and died in 1701. He is said to have been instructed in the art by William S., in whose style he painted landscapes and sea-ports with some reputation. The Dutch writers mention him very briefly.

SCHELTEMA, TACO, a Dutch painter, born at Harlingen in 1760. It is not known under whom he studied, but he improved himself by diligently studying after nature, and copying the works of the best masters, particularly those of Vandyck, whom he made his model. After visiting Dusseldorf and Dresden, in which places he painted the portraits of several persons of distinction, he returned to his own country, where he practised portrait painting with great success in the manner of Vandyck. He resided alternately at Amsterdam and Rotterdam. He painted numerous family pictures of life size, some of which he enriched with landscapes and various accessories. At Amsterdam, he painted the portraits of all the founders and directors of the Batavian Society, which are, or were in one of the chambers of the Bourse.

SCHEAU, JOHN ELEAZER, a German painter and engraver, who resided at Paris in 1765, where he etched a set of twelve plates with a frontispiece, which he published under the title of Achetez mes petites eaux fortes à la douzaine, 1765.

SCHENCK, PETER, a Dutch engraver, and an eminent printseller, born at Elberfeld in 1645. He went to Amsterdam, where he learned the art, and formed an intimacy with Gerard Valck, who taught him mezzotinto. In 1683 they became partners, and having purchased the stock of J. Jansens, then dead, they added their own, commenced business, and published a multitude of prints, engraved by themselves, as well as others; hence it is difficult to distinguish their actual performances. Their catalogue contains a list of several hundred prints, after Ochterveldt, Netscher, Toornvliet, Kneller, Lely, Terburg, Schaleken, Laresse, and others; also a set of 100 views in and near Rome, entitled Roma Aeterna, many of which were engraved by Schenck himself. The King of Poland, Augustus II., Elector of Saxony, honored him, by naming him engraver to his court. Nagler gives a list of his prints. He is more celebrated as a publisher, than for his skill as an engraver, though he was a very industrious man, and executed a multitude of plates himself, most of them in mezzotinto. He died at Amsterdam in 1715.

SCHENDEL, BERNARD, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1634. He studied with Hendrick Moimms, and painted conversations, merry-makings, markets, &c., in the style of his instructor. His pictures are correctly designed and well colored. He died about 1693.

SCHEVENHUYSEN, ANTHONY, a Dutch engraver who flourished about 1695. He engraved a set of 100 small plates, representing the different trades of Holland.

SCHIANTESCHI, DOMENICO, a painter born at Borgo San Sepolcro, who flourished there in the first part of the 18th century. He studied under Ferdinando Galli, called Bibiena, at Bologna, whose style he imitated. On his return to his native city he found some employment in painting perspective and architectural pieces for the public edifices, but he wrought mostly for individuals. Lanzi says "his perspectives are to be found in the houses of many of the nobility of Borgo San Sepolcro, where they are much esteemed."

SCHIAVONE, ANDREA, called MEDULA, a painter born at Sebenico, in Dalmatia, in 1522. He evinced a passion for painting, which exhibited itself in childhood, as he was walking through the streets of Venice with his father; nothing afforded him so much pleasure as the contemplation of pictures. There is some discrepancy about the history of his early life. Lanzi says that, "his father, as soon as he became aware of his passion, instantly applied to the artists, and devoted him to the profession, but fortune proving unfavorable to him, he was compelled by penury to obtain a subsistence rather as a daily hireling than as an artist." Others assert that his father being extremely poor, placed him as a servant, or assistant to a house painter. This much is certain, that being destitute of the means of procuring a technical education, he employed the best means within his reach to accomplish his object. He derived his knowledge of design from copying the etchings of Parmiggiano, and his taste of coloring from Titian and Tintoretto. For some years he continued to support himself by executing the ornamental parts for wall and house painters, decorating household furniture, and perhaps painting for the picture dealers. Some of these performances attracted the attention of Titian, who, perceiving his talents, and learning his wretched situation, took him into his academy, and subsequently employed him in conjunction with other artists, to assist him in his great works in the Library of S. Marco. There he had an opportunity of displaying his talents, and he executed three entire ceilings from the designs of Titian, which are still to be seen in that repository of art. In competition with Tintoretto, he painted his Visitation of the Virgin, in the church of the Padri della Santa Croce, and though he was unable to compete with his powerful antagonist from his imperfect knowledge of design, yet he retired from the contest with applause. His talents were highly respected by Tintoretto, who considered him one of the best colorists of the Venetian school, and he is said to have kept one of his pictures in his studio as a model in coloring, and he was accustomed to say that, "it would be well for colorists to follow Schiavone's example in coloring, though he would do ill not to design better than his model." Robusti, moreover, imitated him with such success in an altar-piece of the Circumcision, in the church of the Carmini, that Vasari mistook it for a work by Schiavone. Yet the same historian held him in such slight esteem, as to say that it was only by mistake that he occasionally painted a good picture; a sentence, says Bottari in his Life of Franco, severely criticised by Agostino Caracci, who considered him one of the greatest geniuses of the Venetian school. Notwithstanding the possession of such extraordinary talents, Schiavone passed his days in poverty, and his necessities compelled him to accept any commission offered to him, and even to work for speculators for the most paltry remuneration. Lanzi says, "his fame after his death increased, and his paintings, for the most part, of a mythological character, were removed from the chests and benches to adorn the cabinets of connoisseurs. Guarienti cites three of these in the collection of Dresden; and Rosa four in the Cesarean gallery at Vienna; I have seen several very graceful specimens in the Casa Pisani at San Stefano, and in almost every gallery in Venice. In Rimini, also, I saw two of his pictures painted as companions at the Padri Teatini; they represent the Nativity and the Assumption, and the figures, on the Poussin scale, are among the most beautiful he ever drew."

There is a great difference in the works of Schiavone. So slender was the emolument he received, that he was frequently obliged to adopt a slight and expeditious mode of operating; and he was confessedly deficient in drawing, hence his surname Medula, or Meldolla (faulty), and hence too, the diversity of opinion as to his merits. The deficiency of his early education, his poverty, and lack of appreciation, plead an ample apology for all his faults. His best works, with the single exception of correctness of design, possess almost every other excellence of the art. His compositions are copious and agreeable, his attitudes graceful and elegant, resembling those of Parmigiano, whose works he studied; his draperies are cast with judgment and taste; the heads of his females are beautiful, and those of his old men dignified and expressive, and his coloring had much of the glow of Titian, with the sweetness of Andrea del Sarto. He wrought with facility, and had a neat and flowing pencil. He possessed an excellent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, and gave his carnations such freshness, warmth, and relief, that his figures seemed to live and breathe. His works are now only to be found in the best collections in his own country and throughout Europe. There are several in the public galleries in England, and others in the collections of the nobility.

Schiavone executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, and after Titian. The names and the works of Andrea Schiavone and Andrea Meldolla have, until recently, been confounded together as one artist. Zani first discovered that Meldolla was a different artist from Schiavone, and many of the prints formerly attributed to the latter, are now given to the former.—(See Meldolla.) The similarity of names was the cause of this error. The only prints attributed to him by Bartsch (P. G. tom. xvi.) are the twelve Cæsars, after Titian, signed simply TIRIANO V., and twenty-one other subjects, apparently from his own designs, some of which are signed Andrea Schiaon. f. He died in 1582.

SCHIAVONE, GREGORIO, a painter born at Padua about 1430. He was a fellow pupil with Andrea Mantegna under Squarcione. Lanzi says he is a very pleasing artist, whose pictures are frequently to be met with in the collections, ornamented with architectural views, with fruit and flowers, and above all, with joyous little cherubs. His style is between those of Mantegna and the Bellini. He read the following inscription on a charming picture by him at Fossombrone, Opus Sclavonii Dalmatici Squarzonei S., the S. meaning Scholaris. Zani says he flourished from 1460 to 1490. Ridolfi erroneously calls him Girolamo.

SCHIAVONE, LUCA, a Milanese artist, who, according to Lomazzo, flourished about 1450. He carried the art of pictorial embroidery, then in great repute, to the highest degree of perfection. He executed in embroidery, not only portraits, but landscapes with animals, and histories. He was the instructor of Girolamo Delfinone, which see.

SCHIAVONETTI, LUIGI, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Bassano in 1765. He was the son of a stationer, and showing a taste for art, his father placed him under the tuition of Giulio Golini, a painter of some eminence at Bassano, by whom he was instructed in design; but preferring engraving, he devoted himself to that art, and with the assistance of an obscure engraver named Lorio, he acquired so much skill as to be enabled to execute a line plate of the Holy Family, after Carlo Maratti, so successfully as to procure him the patronage of Count Remaudini. The works of Bartolozzi, in the chalk manner, were then in great repute at Bassano, and Schiavonetti imitated his style. He went to England, and placed himself under Bartolozzi, and afterwards practiced in his style with great success. His prints are executed with spirit and freedom, his drawing is remarkably correct, and he faithfully gave the character and expression of his originals. He engraved quite a number of plates, some of them of large size, after the old masters, as well as others after the painters of the English school. He was much employed by Boydell, and he executed several plates for the Shakspeare Gallery. He died in 1810. The following are among his most admired prints:

Four plates, representing the most interesting events which preceded the murder of Louis XVI.; after the designs of Benzecch. The celebrated cartoon by M. Angelo Buonarroti, representing the Surprise of the Soldiers on the Banks of the Arno. The Portrait of Vandyck in the character of Paris. The Mater Dolorosa; after Vandyck. The Landing of the British troops in Egypt; after Loutherbourg. A set of etchings, illustrative of Blair's Grave; after the designs of Blake. The etching of the Canterbury Pilgrimage; after Stothard. Dead Christ; after Vandyck. The Portrait of Berehem; after Rembrandt. The Death of General Wolfe, engraved from a gem by Marchant, in the original unpublished Museum Worsleyanum. There is a copy of this print in the smaller edition. The Portrait of W. Blake; after T. Philips. Several in "The Italian School of Design," published by Ottley. Also, among the original designs of celebrated Italian masters, published by Chamberlaine; and several of the "Specimens of Ancient Sculpture," published by the Society of Dilettanti.

SCHIAVONETTI, NICCOLO, was a younger brother of the preceding, by whom he was instructed in engraving, and whom he assisted in many of his works. He also executed a few plates of his own in the style of his brother.

SCHIAVONI, NATALE, an Italian painter and distinguished engraver, born at Chiozza in 1774. He studied engraving under Raphael Morghen, and engraved a number of plates which gained him great reputation. His Assumption of the Virgin after Titian, is considered a master-piece of the art. His life has not yet been written, nor is it known whether he is now living.

SCHICK, GOTTLIEB, a German painter, born at Stuttgart in 1779. He went to Paris and entered the school of David, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he diligently studied the works of Raffaele and the antique. On his return to his native city, he acquired considerable reputation for his historical pictures, heroic landscapes, and portraits. His principal historical pictures are the Sacrifice of Noah, David playing before Saul, and Apollo with the Shepherds, which last is in the palace at Stuttgart. He excelled in portraiture, and executed the likenesses of several distinguished persons, among them, the Baron von Humboldt. His landscapes are embellished with subjects from the ancient poets. His works are highly commended by his countrymen for correctness of design and beauty of coloring. He possessed a fine imagination, and his pictures are generally distinguished for noble simplicity and purity of sentiment. His religious pictures, however, exhibit more of the poet than of the devout worshipper. He died at Stuttgart in 1818.

SCHIDONE, BARTOLOMEO, an eminent painter, born at Modena in 1560, according to Malvasia and others, though there seems to be no certainty about it. His early history is very contradictory. Malvasia says he studied in the school of the Caracci, but Lanzi is of a contrary opinion, as his works show few traces of the style of the Caracci; he says, "if such be the fact, we must conclude either that his first productions are not known, or that he merely saluted that school, as it were from the threshold." If he was born in 1560, it is not probable that he would have received his first instruction from the Caracci, as Lodovico was born in 1555, Agostino in 1558, and Annibale in 1560. Therefore it seems more probable, observes Lanzi, that he employed himself in following the successors of Raffaele in his native place, but more particularly Correggio, by whom there are many original pieces at Modena. Again, it is said that he had gained considerable reputation by some juvenile performances in the public edifices at Modena, when the Duke Ranuccio, a great patron of art, took him under his protection, and gave him his villa at Felegara, as a place of residence, that he might pursue his studies more commodiously, and with greater tranquillity. But the first pictures known to have been conducted by him in public, are the celebrated frescos of the history of Coriolanus, and the Seven Sisters, emblematic of Harmony, painted in competition with Ercole Abati, in the Palazzo Pubblico at Modena, about 1604, in which he emulated the grand style of Raffaele and Correggio. These works, and others in the same edifice, still exist, and sufficiently evince, that he was not then a juvenile artist, but that he had reached the full maturity of his powers. It is also agreed that he died in the latter part of 1615. Lanzi, Tiraboschi and others, say that he died young about the end of 1615; Zani, that he operated in 1604, and died in 1615.

If he was born in 1560, it cannot be said that he died young, at the age of fifty-five. As for the rest, and most important part, there is no dispute. His genius was noble and elevated, and he emulated the style of Correggio so closely, that some of his works have been mistaken for the productions of that great master; he approached very near him in the graceful and expressive airs of his heads, and in the elegant attitudes of his figures; his management of the chiaro-scuro exhibits the breadth and intelligence, and his coloring the purity and impasto, of that admirable painter; his touch is light and delicate, and he finished his pictures in an exquisite manner. Though his outlines are not always critically correct, he conceals the deficiency by the loveliness of his attitudes, and the enchanting harmony of his tones. He was accounted one of the ablest masters of his time. He was taken into the service of the Duke of Modena, for whom he executed many of his most admired works of subjects taken from the scriptures and ancient history; he also excelled in portraits, and painted those of the Duke, and all the members of his family. He painted both in oil and fresco; his coloring in the latter is very vivid and lively even at the present day; in oil, it is more subdued, but more harmonious, though not always free from the ill effects produced by the bad grounds usual in the age of the Caracci. His pictures on a large scale, such as his Pietà, now in the academy at Parma, and the Conception in S. Francesco at Piacenza, are extremely rare; also his historical pieces, as the Nativity of Christ and the Birth of the Virgin, placed for lateral ornaments to an altar-piece by Filippo Bellini. There are some of his Holy Families, Madonnas, and little sacred pieces in the galleries at Modena and elsewhere, which are held in the highest estimation, and are exceedingly valuable. Tiraboschi mentions the sum of 4000 crowns as having been paid for one of them. The court of Naples is extremely rich in his works, having purchased all those he executed for the Duke of Modena, his principal patron. In the cathedral at Modena is an admirable picture by him, representing St. Geminiano restoring a dead Child to life, which has often been mistaken for a work by Correggio. Two of his pictures, a Holy Family, and a sleeping Cupid, formerly in the Orleans collection, are now in the Dulwich gallery. His works are very rare, and only to be found in the collections of princes, though many spurious ones are attributed to him. Like Guido, he had a fatal passion for gaming, and it is said that his death was occasioned by the distress of mind brought on by losing a large sum of money, and more than he could pay, in a single night. Bartsch attributes an etching of a Holy Family to this artist, which he conjectures to be a youthful production; it is signed Barto. Schidono. His name is variously written Schidone, Schedone, Schedoni and Schidoni; the first is correct.

SCHINKEL, KARL FRIEDRICH, a Prussian painter and an eminent architect of the present century, was born in 1781, at Neu-Ruppin, in Brandenburg. He studied at Berlin, under David Gilly, an architect of reputation, but gained the most improvement from the advice and instruction of Friedrich Gilly, the son of David G., who returned from his travels about a year after Schinkel commenced his studies, and communicated to the young archifect liberal and enlightened views of the art. Gilly employed him to erect several buildings, from his designs, and at his death in 1800, Schinkel was employed, notwithstanding his youth, to complete several of his unfinished edifices. Instead of following the common course, he steadfastly continued his theoretical and artistic studies, supporting himself by making designs of various ornamental articles for modellers and artisans. In 1803 he visited Vienna, Prague, and Dresden; and then went to Italy; extended his travels to Naples and Sicily; and returned to Berlin in 1805. In consequence of the civil commotions, all architectural works were suspended, and Schinkel therefore applied himself to painting landscapes. The studies of scenery he had made in Italy, were of great use in his compositions, and he produced a number of excellent pictures, usually adorned with architecture, besides a large panorama of Palermo, and a number of scenes for the theatre, afterwards engraved and published, with those for the Zauberflote Die Brant von Messina, &c. His various artistical labors during this period, were of great service in developing his imagination, and refining his taste, so that he came to look upon architecture more in the light of a fine art, than did most of the German professors. At the general restoration of peace, Schinkel was employed by the King of Prussia to design a great national cathedral, in commemoration of that event; but, although his design excited general admiration, the work, for various reasons, was not erected. However, from the year 1815, he was incessantly employed. Among his earliest edifices at Berlin, were the Hauptwache Theatre, and Museum, all of them treated in the pure Grecian style. The façade of the Museum is particularly distinguished for severe simplicity of outline, with a fulness of refined ornament, unknown to any modern examples of what is termed the Grecian style. The external elevation consists merely of a single row of eighteen columns in antis (Erechtheum Ionic), raised on a lofty stylobate, with a flight of steps in the centre, enclosed by pedestal walls (in continuation of the stylobate), and forming the ascent to the colonnade. Great power and variety of effect is given to the whole design by the inner elevation, or background behind the outer row of columns, which present in the centre portion a second colonnade (four columns in antis), with a screen-wall rising about half its height, and beyond that the upper half of the open staircase; whereby the whole composition acquires singular movement and play of both perspective, and light and shade. In addition to this, Schinkel intended to have decorated the screen-wall with splendid frescos, and actually designed some masterly cartoons; but they were not completed. There is reason to suppose that his idea will be finished, Cornelius having been mentioned as the artist; and not till then, will the contemplated effect of this novel design be completely realized. The two other above mentioned edifices also, have not received their complement of sculpture, which is evident from Schinkel's Entwurfe, a publication containing a full and extensive series of designs for all his principal buildings, with ample explanations. He has been termed the Luther of Architecture; he effected much by his personal exertions, and perhaps more through his influence and example, since, by venturing to think for himself, he has led others to do the same. He has been criticised as being too limited in his reforms; but this probably resulted rather from the prejudices of the age, than from his own inclination. Among Schinkel's principal works, are the Werder Kirche (Gothic), Bauschule and Observatory, at Berlin; the Theatre at Hamburg; and the church of S. Nicholas, at Potsdam. The latter would have been a most imposing structure, had the original design been executed, instead of omitting the cupola. There are a number of magnificent designs in his Entwurfe, which, for various reasons, were never executed. Among these, were several for a monument to Frederick the Great, remarkable for freedom of imagination, and architectural luxuriance. Another publication, entitled Werke der Hoperen Baukunst, contains a series of designs for a palace at Athens, to be erected on the Acropolis, which was greatly superior to a similar design by Klenze. His latest poetical conception was a design for a summer palace at Orianda, in the Crimea, on a lofty eminence commanding a prospect of the Black Sea, and surrounded by terraces and hanging gardens. In 1839, Schinkel was promoted to the highest rank in his profession, that of Ober-Landes-Bau-director. He died in 1841.

SCHIVENOGLIA, Lo. See RAINIERI.

SCHIZZONE, a young artist commended by Vasari, as one of the most promising followers of the school of Raffaello. At the sacking of Rome in 1527, he was obliged to flee from the city; nothing more is recorded of him.

SCILEY, JACOB VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1715, and died there in 1779. He studied under Bernard Picart, in whose style he executed some portraits, and a variety of plates for the book-publishers. He also finished some plates by Picart, left incomplete at his death. Among others, are the following by him:

PORTRAITS

John Baptist Boyer, Marquis d' Argens; after van Pée. Anthony Bernard Prevot, Almoner to the Prince of Conti; do. Bernard Picart, Engraver; after M. des Angles. 1734. Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount de Turenne; do. The prints after Coypel, for the edition of Don Quixote, published at Amsterdam in 1746.

SCHLICHT, ABEL, a German painter, architect, and engraver, born at Manheim in 1754. He studied perspective under L. Quaglio, and was appointed professor in the Academy at Dusseldorf. Nothing is recorded of his works as a painter or an architect. As an engraver he executed some plates in aquatinta, among which are the following. He died in 1826.

A Storm and Shipwreck; after Vernet. A Calm; do. A Landscape, with cattle; after A. Vandevelde. A Landscape, with figures and animals; after Berghem. A Landscape; after Pynaker. Several architectural Views; after Bibiena, Pannini, and others.

SCHLOTTERBECK, WILLIAM FREDERICK, an eminent Swiss designer and engraver, born at Hartingen in 1777. He studied with C. von Mechel at Basle. He had a great predilection for the aquatinta style of engraving, which was then a novelty, and his great success may be said to have made that branch of the art very popular in Germany. He engraved many large plates in that manner, after the works of Claude, John Both, P. Hackert, and others, as well as many of views from his own designs. In 1798 he went to Dessau, where he joined the Chalcographic Institution, and engraved the four landscapes by Claude, then at Cassel, but now in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg. In 1801 he went to Vienna, and was employed several years in engraving for Mollo's Repository of Arts. From 1808, till the time of his death in 1818, he occupied his time in making drawings of the picturesque scenery in the Tyrol, at Salzburg, in various other parts of Germany, and in Hungary, from which he engraved many plates for Mollo. His prints are beautifully executed, producing a fine effect, and are highly esteemed. Dr. Giulio Ferrario, in his account of classical prints, describes two large prints by him in aquatinto, after J. Both, published at Vienna in 1804, which he considers very rare and fine, as he had not seen any others elsewhere. He writes his name erroneously, Scheletterbek.

SCHLOTTERBECK, CHRISTIAN JACOB, a German painter and engraver, born at Brehlingen in Wurtemberg in 1755. Little is known of him as a painter, but he executed a number of plates of portraits, some after antique sculptures, and a number of frontispieces, vignettes, and other book plates. Among his principal prints are, the portraits of Lavater, F. Kobell, J. J. Moser, Titian's Mistress, Herodias with the Head of St. John the Baptist, the Laocoon, Castor and Pollux, Minerva, Mercury, and Diana.

SCHLUTER, ANDREW, a German sculptor and architect, born at Hamburg in 1662. He acquired the elements of the art from a sculptor of Dantzic, named Sapovius, and is supposed to have completed his studies in Italy. In 1691, he was employed at Warsaw, by the king of Poland; and the Elector of Brandenburg invited him to Berlin in 1694, with a considerable pension. In the following year he was appointed a Director of the Academy of Fine Arts, and erected for Sophia Charlotte, the wife of his patron, the grand and beautiful chateau of Liezenburg, near that of Charlottenburg. In 1697 he executed his bronze statue of the Elector, and was appointed architect to the king. Charged with rebuilding the royal chateau, he proceeded in his work for some time; but, in consequence of the intrigues of his rivals, he lost his appointment of royal architect, although retaining that of sculptor. His works in the latter branch of art are distinguished for correctness of design, purity of outline, and truth of expression. Among the principal are the bronze statue of Frederick I.; that of Hohenzollern; and above all, his equestrian statue of the Grand Elector, distinguished for its noble expression, easy and lively attitude. Schluter visited St. Petersburg in 1713, and was commissioned by Peter the Great to erect several palaces; but he died there in the following year.

SCHMIDT, GEORGE FREDERICK, an eminent Prussian engraver, born at Berlin in 1712. He first studied under G. P. Busch, an obscure artist in that city. He afterwards went to Paris, where he became the pupil of Nicholas Larmessin. Under the able instruction of that eminent artist he acquired a skill in handling the graver, with a neatness and firmness seldom surpassed. In 1742 he was received into the Academy at Paris, and engraved for his reception-piece his fine portrait of P. Mignard. In 1744 he returned to Berlin, and was soon after appointed engraver to the king. In 1757 he went to St. Petersburg, at the invitation of the Empress Elizabeth, and executed several portraits and other plates, with great success. In 1762 he returned to Berlin, where he discovered a new talent in etching and engraving several plates in the manner of Rembrandt, which were greatly admired; he also engraved in the manner of Della Bella and Benedetto Castiglione, with equal success. He died at Berlin in 1775. His prints amount to about two hundred, of which the following are the most esteemed:

SCHMIDT, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1740. He first studied under John van Huysum, and afterwards with J. M. Quinkhart, with whom he continued six years. He did not acquire much reputation as a painter, though he executed some good landscapes in concert with Juriaan Andriessen. He devoted much of his time to teaching, poetry, and music. He was one of the founders of the Drawing Academy at Amsterdam in 1759, and continued to be a director till his death, in 1818.

SCHMITZ. This engraver was a native of Germany, and flourished about 1780. He studied design at Dusseldorf, under Lambert Krahe, whose daughter he afterwards married. Having completed his engagement with that master, he visited Paris, and studied engraving under J. G. Wille; after which he returned to Dusseldorf, and practised the art with reputation and success. He was honored with a pension from the Elector of Bavaria. Among his principal prints are the following, after pictures in the Dusseldorf Gallery: A Group of Children, after Rubens; Jesus and St. John, after Scarsellino; Jesus appearing to Mary Magdalene, after Baroccio. He died about 1791.

SCHMUTZ, JOHANN RUDOLF, a Swiss painter, born at Regensperg, in the canton of Zurich, in 1670. He studied under Mathias Füessli, and first applied himself to historical painting, but not meeting with much success, he bent his attention to portraiture. He went to England when Knel-ler was at his zenith, and, attaching himself to his style, he met with flattering success, and was rising rapidly into public favor when he died, in 1715.

SCHMUTZER, JOHN ADAM, a German engraver, the eldest son of an Austrian general, was born at Vienna about 1700. He did not attain much distinction in the art. He was commissioned to engrave several subjects after pictures in the Imperial Gallery; and his portraits of the three Empresses, Eleonora, Amelia, and Elizabeth, are not without merit. He died in 1739.

SCHMUTZER, JOSEPH AND ANDREW, German engravers, and younger brothers of the preceding, were born at Vienna about 1702. They frequently wrought together on the same plate; and their prints are sometimes signed Joseph-Andreas, and sometimes Andreas-Joseph. Andreas imitated the manner of van Dalen and Bolswert, and handled the graver in a clear, bold style. Among other prints by these artists are the following:

PORTRAITS.

The Emperor Charles VI.; after Meytens. The Empress Elizabeth Christina; after Averbach. Gustavus Adolphus, Baron de Gotter.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Two Views of a Temple; after G. Galli Bibiena. Three subjects from the History of Decius; after the pictures by Rubens in the gallery of the Prince of Lichtenstein.

SCHMUTZER, JACOB MATHIAS, a German engraver, the son of Andrew S., was born at Vienna in 1733. Losing his father when only eight years of age, he passed his youth in trials and struggles; acquired a knowledge of architecture through the patronage of Matthew Donner, an engraver of medals, and practised it in Hungary; and finally, through the kind offices of the Prince of Kaunitz, by order of the Empress Maria Theresa, he was sent to Paris, and placed in the school of J. G. Wille. After studying four years at Paris, Schmutzer returned to Vienna, and was appointed Director of the Academy established by Maria Theresa. He deserves to be ranked among the most famous engravers of his time; and several excellent scholars were produced under his instruction. His plates are executed very skillfully with the graver, in a neat, clear style, resembling that of his instructor. Nagler gives a list of forty-seven prints by him, among which are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Francis I., Emperor of Germany. Maria Theresa, his Empress. Joseph Wenceslaus, Prince of Lichtenstein. Wenceslaus, Prince of Kaunitz; very rare. Martin de Meytens, Painter to the Emperor. C. W. E. Dietriey, Painter.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Mutius Scævola before Porsenna; after Rubens. St. Gregory refusing the Emperor Theodosius the entrance into the church; do. Venus rising from the Sea; do.

SCHNEBBELIE, JACOB. This artist was the son of a Swiss officer, who went to England, and settled in the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, where Jacob was born in 1760. Having a taste for the fine arts, he learned drawing and landscape painting, without any other assistance than nature and books; for some time he taught drawing, and obtained considerable employment. While sketching in Hertfordshire, he attracted the notice of the Earl of Leicester, who became his patron, and gave him commissions for several landscapes from nature. In 1781, he began a set of views of St. Augustin's monastery; in 1788, he designed, engraved, and published four views of the town and abbey of St. Albans. Soon after this he set on foot a work entitled "The Antiquary's Museum," and he became an associate of Mr. Moore in the "Monastic Remains," &c. He was next engaged by the Society of Antiquaries, in designing for their "Vetusta Monumenta"; by Mr. Gough for his "Sepulchral Monuments in Great Britain," and by Mr. Nichols for his "History of Leicestershire." He projected a work under the title of the "Antique Dresses since William the Conqueror," but he did not live to complete it, and died in 1792.

SCHNELFHOLTZ, GABRIEL, a German designer and engraver, the accounts of whom are exceedingly contradictory. Some say he was born at Mersberg, others at Wittemberg, in 1536; others again that he flourished at Wittemberg about 1590. According to Nagler, he carried on the business of a printer and bookseller, as well as engraving, and published several books at Wittemberg in 1562 and 1563, one of which is entitled Illustrium Ducum Saxonie viva effigies ab anno nativitatis Christi 824 usque ad annum 1563. This work was reprinted in German in 1570. He marked his prints with an S. and an arrow placed perpendicularly, which is the rebus of his name. Zani says he was a wood engraver, and operated in 1590; Strutt that he engraved a considerable number of excellent prints, marked with the above monogram. His name is variously written, Schnellholtz, Schnellboltz, and Schnellbotz; the first is the correct spelling.

SCHNITZER, JOHN, an old German wood engraver, born at Arnshelm, who flourished at Ulm about 1486. He executed the cuts of the Geographical Chart for the edition of Ptolemy, published at Ulm in that year. The map of the world is ornamented with ten heads, representing the winds, rudely cut. It is inscribed, Insculptum est per Johannem Schnitzer de Arnshelm.

SCHNORR VON CAROLSFELD, JOHANN VEIT, commonly called HANS VEIT, a German artist, born at Schneeberg in 1764. His father was a member of the common council in that city, and gave his son a liberal education; he afterwards studied jurisprudence till he was twenty-five years of age, when his strong predilection for the fine arts induced him to abandon that profession, and he entered the school of Frederick Oeser, at Leipsic, an eminent painter and engraver. He distinguished himself by his multifarious works. He painted history and portraits, made designs and drew in chalk, India ink, sepia, and in water-colors. He modeled in clay and plaster, and in short exercised his abilities in every branch of art. He is known however, beyond the limits of his own country, only by his works as an engraver. He executed many spirited and beautiful plates in aquatint, and in the chalk manner. His subjects consist of portraits of distinguished persons, poetical illustrations and vignettes, from his own designs, antique statuary, bas-reliefs, &c., of which an ample list may be found in Nagler's Lexicon, with many interesting particulars. He died at Leipsic in 1842.

SCHOEN, or SCHONGAUER, MARTIN, an old German painter and engraver, about whose history and works there is a great deal of contradiction and uncertainty. His countrymen claim that he was one of the earliest engravers. His birth is variously placed about 1420, 1445, and 1453, and his death in 1486 and 1499; the place of his nativity, Culmbach, Colmar, and Augsburg. Huber calls him the father of engraving in Germany, and says he was born at Culmbach about 1420, and died at Colmar, where he chiefly resided, in 1486. Bartsch and Zani place his birth at Colmar, in or about 1445; Ottley in 1453, and they all concur that he died in 1499. Bartsch engraved the portrait of Martin Schongauer, and prefixed it to the sixth volume of "Le Peintre Graveur," taken from a painting formerly at Nuremberg, afterwards in the collection of Count Fries, and now at Schleissheim or Munich, on which is inscribed, Hipsch Martin Schongauer Maler, 1483, with an escutcheon of arms, bearing a crescent gules on a field argent. On the back of the picture is written, in old German characters, "Master Martin Schongauer, painter, called Hipsch (handsome) Martin on account of his art, born at Colmar, but of a citizen family of Augsburg. Noble by origin, &c. Died at Colmar, in the year 1499, the 2nd of February. May God show him mercy. And I, Hans Largkmair, was his disciple in the year 1488." Albert Durer is said to have had such a strong desire to be personally acquainted with Schongauer, that he went to Colmar in 1492 on purpose to see him, but was disappointed, Martin being absent from the city. Yet he was kindly received by his brothers, Gaspar, Paul, and Louis. The Baron Heineken describes a drawing in his possession, on the back of which is written in German. "This piece was designed by Hübisch Martin in 1470, being then a youth. I, Albert Durer, have learned that, and have written this to his honor, in the year 1517." Bartsch says that "all the prints of Martin Schongauer exhibit an almost equal perfection in the management of the burin, which induces the belief that he had not commenced engraving on copper, or rather that he had not taken impressions, till after he had acquired a thorough command of the instrument, by great practise in ornamenting plate; for it is said that he united the art of the goldsmith with that of the painter." Ottley remarks, on this supposition of Bartsch, "If the truth of this observation be acknowledged, it will follow, as highly probable at least, that none of the engravings of Schongauer now known appertain to a period more remote than about the year 1475; at all events, there seems every reason to believe that by far the greater portion of them were executed in the last twenty years of the century in which he lived." So much for supposition. This much appears certain, that he was one of the earliest, if not the very first German artist who engraved on copper-plates. Wood engraving had been practised many years before there is anything authentic concerning him. (See Introduction, page xii.) He carried the mechanical part of the art to an astonishing degree of perfection. Although his drawing is incorrect, and his compositions partake of the stiffness and formality which characterize the works of the old German artists, his productions prove that he possessed a fertile imagination, and exhibit both genius and judgment. In his print of the Death of the Virgin, there is a fine expression in the heads, and the accessories are finished with a beauty and delicacy of execution which has scarcely been surpassed. It is stated that Michael Angelo, in his youth, was so captivated with the wildness and variety of his print of St. Anthony tormented by Demons, that he copied it in colors. His prints are numerous, and are principally from his own designs. He usually marked them with one of the following monograms of his initials, an M. and an S. in the old German letter, with a kind of cross between them. With regard to his paintings there is much uncertainty. There are works attributed to him in the Galleries at Nuremberg, Munich, Schleissheim, and Vienna, but connoisseurs are divided as to the authenticity of several. There are two, doubtless genuine, in the church of the Hospital at Colmar, representing the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, both of which subjects he engraved. There is another, called the Virgin in the Rosebush, placed behind the altar in the Cathedral of the same city. It is celebrated for its large size, composition, and excellent state of preservation. It is painted on a gold ground, as almost all the works attributed to him are; the Virgin is represented seated among Roses, with the infant Jesus in her lap, while two Angels are in the act of crowning her. The figures are of life size, the whole picture is carefully executed, and the colors are so blended that the touch of the pencil is imperceptible. The Crucifixion, at Vienna, is also one of his approved pictures; it is full of expression, and is thought to partake of the school of Cologne. The following are his most esteemed prints:

SACRED SUBJECTS.

The Life of the Virgin; twelve plates. Twelve plates of the Passion of our Saviour. The Annunciation. The Nativity. The Adoration of the Magi. The Flight into Egypt. The Wise and the Foolish Virgins; ten plates. The Last Judgment Christ bearing his Cross. The Crucifixion. The Death of the Virgin; this was also engraved by Israel van Meeheln, Wenceslaus, and others. A small set of the Apostles. St. Anthony carried into the Air by Demons. St. Sebastian tied to a Tree.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

Two Alchymists fighting. A set of twelve subjects of Ornaments for goldsmiths. A Ciborium. An incense Cup, or Censer. Engraved also by J. van Meeheln. A Bishop's Crosier. The Battle of the Saracens against the Christians, in which St. James appears on the side of the latter. This was probably his last plate, as it was not entirely finished.

b x 8 SCHOEN, BARTHOLOMEW. According to Professor Christ, this artist was a brother of Martin Schoen, but Bartsch and others express a doubt of this, and even whether there was ever an artist of this name, as it is expressly said that the celebrated Martin S. had four brothers, Gaspar, Paul, Louis, and George, but there is no mention of Bartholomew; therefore they think that the prints bearing the above monogram were executed by an artist whose name has been lost. It would seem more probable, that he was the brother or a relative of Martin, inasmuch as there is a great similarity in their styles and marks, and he moreover copied some of his prints, particularly the twelve prints of the Passion of Christ. There are about thirty prints attributed to him by Bartsch and others, all of which bear the above monogram, composed of a B. and an S. in the old German characters, with a cross between them. They have a strong resemblance to those of Martin S., though they are not executed with so much neatness and expression. Prof. Christ mentions one with the date 1479.

SCHOEN, or SCHÖN, ERHARD, a German engraver on wood, who flourished at Nuremberg from 1516 to 1550, as appears from the dates of several books published there during that period, embellished with frontispieces or other engravings from his designs. Bartsch attributes thirty-three prints to him. In 1538 he published a book on the proportions of the human figure, for students, which, though illustrated with coarse wood cuts, had a great sale, and went through three editions in five years. Jackson, in his treatise on wood engraving, asserts that Erhard Schoen, like many others of the 16th century called wood engravers, only made the designs for the prints bearing his mark, and that he never engraved; this assertion, however, is founded on mere supposition, though there can be little doubt that several of the old German wood engravers employed assistants, as is done at the present day. Schoen marked his prints with a monogram composed of an E. and an S., with a knife underneath, as above.

J. H. S. P.

SCHOENFELD, or SCHOONFELD, JOHN HENRY, a German painter, born at Biberach, in Swabia, of a noble family, according to the best authorities, in 1609. After studying with John Sichelbein, an indifferent artist, in his native city, he traveled through Germany, and then went to Italy for improvement. At Rome he painted two altar-pieces, which gained him considerable reputation, and he was employed in executing some of the embellishments in the Palazzo Orsini. On his return to his own country, he distinguished himself as an historical painter, and executed many works at Vienna, Munich, Salzburg, and other cities. He was also much employed in portraiture, and painted landscapes, decorated with figures and architecture, which were greatly admired. Among his most esteemed historical works, are Christ conducted to Calvary, and the Descent from the Cross, in the church of the Holy Cross at Augsburg, where he resided in the latter part of his life. In the Senate-house of the same city, is another fine picture by him, representing the Race of Hippomenes and Atalanta. His works show a ready and fertile invention, and an extraordinary facility of hand; but his drawing is often incorrect, and his figures are generally too long; his coloring is vigorous, though occasionally crude and glaring. He executed quite a number of etchings from his own designs. Nagler gives a list of twenty-three prints by him, and there are others of landscapes with figures and rich architecture. They are etched in a slight style, and the figures, as in many of his pictures, are out of proportion to the other objects. Zani and Füessli place his death at Augsbourg in 1680; Nagler in 1675, and others, his birth in 1619, and his death in 1689. He marked his prints with initials as above.

SCHHOENMACKER, or SCHHOENMAKERS, JOHN PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1755, and died there in 1842. His life has not yet been written. He painted views of the cities of Holland in the manner of Vander Heyden, with great success, and his pictures are to be found in the best collections of his country, where they are highly esteemed. He was on intimate terms with several eminent artists of his country, and sometimes employed them to insert his figures and animals. In one of the exhibitions at Dort, there were four of his most admired pictures, in which the figures and vessels were painted by J. C. Schotel; these additions enhance their value.

SCHOEVAERDTS, M., a painter born about 1667. The accounts of this artist are very contradictory—some make him a native of Flanders or Holland; others of Germany. He painted village festivals, merry-makings, &c., in which he appears to have imitated Teniers, though there is little resemblance in their works except similarity of subjects. His pictures are generally crowded with figures in full activity, and he frequently introduced horses and wagons and horned cattle. His pictures are well designed, his touch is neat and spirited, his coloring pleasing, and his works, though very inferior to those of Teniers, are held in considerable estimation. There are two village scenes by him in the gallery of the Louvre, under the name of N. Schovaert. Balkema confounds him with Christopher Schwartz, a totally different artist. He signed his pictures and his etchings *M. Schoevaerdt*s; hence it is conjectured that his christian name was Martin or Michael. Some write his name Schovaerts. Two of his pictures have been engraved under the titles of Fête de campagne Hollandaise, and Retour de la Fête Hollandaise. He executed a few etchings in a slight, but spirited style, from his own designs and after other masters.

SCHOLLENBERG, H. J., a German engraver, who flourished about 1630, and engraved some portraits, executed in a neat, but hard and formal style. Nagler says his name was Hans Jacob Schollenberger, and that he flourished at Nuremberg from 1670 to 1690; but this artist was probably his son, as there are prints by Schollenberg dated 1630, and Zani says he operated from 1622, to 1674.

SCHOOONEBECK, ADRIAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1650. He studied under R. de Hooghe, whose manner he followed at first, but afterwards practised mostly in mezzotinto. He engraved a variety of frontispieces and other book plates; also the costumes of all the religious orders of Europe, published in two volumes. He went to Russia, and died at Moscow in 1714.

SCHOONJANS, ANTHONY, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, according to Descamps, in 1650. While young, he was placed under the tuition of Erasmus Quellinus, with whom he continued till he was nineteen years of age, when he went to Italy for the completion of his artistic education. During a residence of two years at Rome, he diligently applied himself to the study of the best works of art, and executed several pictures for the churches, which gained him so much reputation, that the Emperor Leopold I., invited him to Vienna in 1678, appointed him his cabinet painter, and honored him with a present of a gold chain and medal. He painted the portraits of the Emperor, of the Imperial family, and of the principal personages of the court, which were greatly admired. He also executed several grand altar-pieces and other works for the churches and convents. Having a desire to visit England, he obtained leave of the Emperor to absent himself for a time from his service, and he went to that country in the reign of William III., where he met with considerable employment in painting the portraits, and decorating the mansions of some of the nobility. In returning to Vienna, he passed some time at Dusseldorf, where he painted several pictures for the Elector Palatine, who munificently rewarded him, and presented him with a gold chain and medal. On his return to Vienna, he continued in the service of the Emperor till his death, in 1726. His pictures are correctly designed and carefully executed. He had a thorough knowledge of the principles of chiaro-scuro, which enabled him to give his pictures a remarkable roundness and relief.

SCHOOR, NICHOLAS VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1666. It is not known under whom he studied. He painted nymphs, genii, and children sporting, taken from fabulous history, which he represented in a pleasing and lively style; he was employed in introducing these subjects, as accessories, into the flower pieces of Nicholas Morell, and the landscapes of Rysbraeck. His chief business was in making designs for tapestry for the manufacturers at Antwerp and Brussels. In the Museum at Ghent, there is an equestrian portrait of Charles II. of Spain, by him, painted when that prince was about the age of eighteen. He is said to have died rich, at Antwerp, in 1726.

SCHOOORE, J. V., a Flemish engraver, who flourished about 1650. He executed a few plates, among which is one of St. Vincent, after Anthony Salaert.

SCHOOTEN, GEORGE VAN, a Dutch historical and portrait painter, born at Leyden in 1587. He was a scholar of Conrad vander Maas. He was a painter of considerable eminence in his time, though his works are little known at present except a few portraits. Snyderhoef engraved one of his portraits, and J. G. van Vliet, his picture of Christ and the Woman of Samaria, one of his best prints, which is inscribed J. (Jorg) van Schooten, 1635. He is supposed to have been one of the instructors of Rembrandt. He died in 1658.

SCHOOTER, FRANCIS VAN, a professor of mathematics and philosophy at Leyden, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He designed and engraved the portrait of Des Cartes, which is inscribed Franciscus a Schooten Pr. Mat. ut vivum delineavit et fecit, anno. 1644. It is prefixed to an edition of the "Geometria," published at Leyden in that year.

SCHOREL, or SCHOOOREEL, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Schooreel, a small village near Alkmacr, in 1495. There is a great deal of romance mixed up with his life, but there is not, according to Waagen, a single well authenticated picture in existence by him; therefore we shall be brief. After studying, as is said, successively with Cornelisz at Amsterdam, John de Mabuse at Utrecht, and Albert Durer at Nuremberg, he went to Venice, where, meeting with a number of pilgrims, and an ecclesiastic of Gouda, with whom he was acquainted, bound to Jerusalem, he was persuaded to accompany them. He designed some of the most interesting scenery in the Holy Land. In 1520, he embarked for the Isle of Rhodes, thence he sailed to Venice, and traveled to Rome, where he resided three years, designing after the antique, and the great Italian masters. He also painted the portrait of Pope Adrien VI. On his return to Holland, he settled at Utrecht, where he acquired great reputation for his scriptural subjects, embellished with the scenery he had sketched on the spot. Such were his celebrated pictures of Christ entering into Jerusalem, and the Baptism of Christ, in which he is said to have imitated the grand style of Raffaele. Many of his works were destroyed during the civil wars in the Low Countries. He was the first who attempted to reform the taste of his country by the introduction of a more elevated style. He died at Utrecht in 1562.

SCHORER, JOHN FREDERICK, a German designer and engraver, born at Augsburg, at what time is not known, but he flourished at Nuremberg about 1619. Nagler describes nine prints by him, representing the Four Elements, the Four Seasons, and an ornament for goldsmiths, dated from 1615 to 1619. Brulliot notices several drawings by him, marked with the above monogram, bearing dates from 1609 to 1639. He is supposed to have resided chiefly at Nuremberg and Cobourg, and from his initials to have been called Hans Friedrich Schorer.

SCHORN, CHARLES, an eminent German painter, born at Dusseldorf in 1803. He studied under Cornelius at Munich, and afterwards with Gros and Ingres, at Paris. Returning again to Munich, he assisted Cornelius in some of his important works, and was afterwards occupied in the atelier of Wach, in the same city. He gained distinction, and practised the art at Munich for many years, with great success. His imagination was discursive, and his invention ready and fertile. His works generally are not what may be termed historical, but rather from subjects like his two pictures of Monks carousing at a Tavern, and a Group of Puritans. He painted a large picture of Paul III. contemplating the portrait of Luther, for the Consul Waggener at Berlin; a fine composition, and full of dignified character. His picture of Salvator Rosa among the Brigands is a most admirable work. He was appointed Professor of the Academy at Munich, and was chosen by the king to form the collection of pictures for the Munich Gallery. He died in 1850.

SCHORQUEUS, JOHN VAN, a Dutch engraver, who went to Madrid, where he appears to have flourished from about 1600 to 1630, and executed many frontispieces and other plates for the book publishers. The Spanish writers call him Juan Scorquens, but he inscribed some of his plates J. van Schorqueus fecit in Madrid.

SCHOTTEL, JOHN CHRISTIAN, an eminent Dutch marine painter, born at Dort in 1787. He first studied with A. Meulemans, and afterwards with Martin Schouman, with whom he continued three years, and chiefly devoted his time to drawing in water colors and India ink, under the direction of that master. On quitting Schouman, he devoted himself to the study of nature with great assiduity, for which purpose he was accustomed to embark in an open boat, in all kinds of weather, and carefully sketch and note every appearance of the sea. His first exhibition of two pictures in oil at Amsterdam, was eminently successful; they were received by the artists as well as the public with applause, and were immediately purchased at high prices. This was a stimulus to still greater exertion, and made him emulous of rivaling his renowned countryman, Backhuysen. From 1814 to 1817, he executed two pictures representing the precipitous retreat of the French from before Dort, and the Bombardment of Algiers by the allied fleets in 1816. He soon rose to great distinction, and his works were eagerly sought after, not only by his own countrymen, but by foreigners. In 1827, he painted two magnificent pictures for the Prince of Orange, as a present to the Emperor of Russia. He received honors from his own sovereign, and other crowned heads, and was elected a member of several academies and societies of art.

Schotel designed everything from nature; hence it is that his pictures have an air of truth which excites universal admiration. In his calms and river views, he is said to have equalled the younger Vandevelde in the smoothness and transparency of the water, and in the reflections of his objects; and in his storm-pieces, almost to have rivalled Backhuysen in the sublime and terrific conflict of the elements. His pictures are distinguished for excellence of perspective, correct drawing, neatness and freedom of touch, and admirable chiaroscuro. He died at Dort in 1838. His son, Peter John Schotel, still lives at Dort, and practises marine painting in the style of his father; and, though his subjects are usually of smaller dimensions, representing breezes, calms, and river views, they very nearly approach the elder Schotel in excellence.

SCHOUMAN, ARTUS, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Dort in 1710. He studied under Adrian vander Burg, and painted history, portraits, and landscapes. His small cabinet pictures of histories and poetical subjects, chiefly taken from Ovid, and landscapes with figures and animals, are well designed and colored. He settled at the Hague, where he acquired considerable reputation. He also engraved some plates in mezzotinto, after the works of Gerard Douw, Paul Potter, Frank Hals, Schalcken, and others. He died in 1792.

SCHOUMAN, MARTIN, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Dort in the last part of the 18th, and the first part of the present century. His life has not yet been written. He painted landscapes, marines, and river views, with considerable reputation.

SCHRODER, HANS, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1600. Little is known of him, except that he engraved some ornamental plates of foliage, &c., for goldsmiths.

SCHROEDER, FREDERICK, a German engraver, born at Hesse Cassel in 1768, or, as some say, in 1772. He studied under Sebastian Ignatius Klauber at Nuremberg. He went to Paris, where he was employed to engrave for several publications of the day, as Le Musée Laurent et Robillard, and Le Voyage à Constantinople, &c. He confined himself chiefly to landscape, and engraved several plates after Swanevelt, Vernet, La Hire, Karel du Jardin, and Wm. van Bemmel. His plates are executed in a neat, pleasing style. He was living at Paris in 1831.

SCHROETER, FREDERICK CHARLES CONSTANTINE, a German painter, was the son of a veterinary surgeon in a Saxon regiment, born in 1794. He was early apprenticed to a carpenter, but having considerable inclination for design, he quitted that employment, and commenced studying painting in the Academy at Leipsic. Through the patronage of Keyl, the Receiver General of the provincial excise, Schroeter was sent for improvement to Dresden, where he gained two prizes at the exhibitions, and was admitted to the studio of Pochmann. After completing his studies, he settled at Leipsic, and painted many esteemed cabinet pictures of familiar subjects. He subsequently settled at Berlin, and exhibited, in 1828, two pictures, the Sermon and the Music Teacher, which were greatly admired for their fidelity to nature. In 1832 he painted a picture representing the Sale of the Effects of a deceased Painter, which is considered his masterpiece, the composition being abundant, the groups happily disposed, the expression animated, and the gradations of coloring extremely delicate. Schroeter practised the art at Berlin with success, for many years. He died in 1835.

SCHUBART, PETER, a German engraver, who went to Venice, where he flourished about 1696. Professor Christ attributes to him several plates, marked P. S. d E., which he interprets Peter Schubart de Ebrenberg.

SCHUBLER, A. G. J., a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg about 1626. He engraved some portraits for the booksellers; also a part of the plates for the work entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published at Altdorff and at Nuremberg in that year. His prints are indifferently executed.

SCHULZE, JOHANN GOTTFRIED, a German engraver, born at Dresden in 1749. After learning the rudiments of design of Charles Hutin, and engraving of Giuseppe Camerati, he went to Paris, and studied with J. G. Wille. On his return to his native city, he engraved some portraits and other subjects, particularly several plates for the Dresden Gallery, which are executed in a neat, firm style, and possess considerable merit. He died in 1818. Nagler calls his name Christian Gotfried, and gives a list of 36 prints by him.

SCHUMANN, JOHANN GOTTFRIED, a German engraver, born at Dresden in 1761. He studied design in the Academy in that city, and engraved a number of landscapes after Ruysdael, Klengel, Both, and others, executed in a neat, spirited style. He went to London, where he resided some time, and engraved some plates in conjunction with Byrne. He died at Dresden in 1810. Nagler gives a list of 26 prints by him.

SCHUPPEN, PETER VAN, the Elder, a Flemish designer and engraver, born at Antwerp in 1628, according to the best authorities, though some variously place it in 1623, 1625, and 1630. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Paris, where he studied with Nanteuil, and resided the most of his life. He engraved a large number of plates of portraits and other subjects, some of them from his own designs, executed with the graver in the style of his instructor. His design is correct, and he handled the graver with great dexterity and firmness. A list of 119 prints by him may be found in Nagler's Lexicon. His death is variously placed in 1702, 1710, and 1715.

SCHUPPEN, PETER VAN, the Younger, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris, according to Füssli and Zani in 1669, though others say in 1673. He studied painting under Nicholas de Largilliere, and acquired considerable reputation at Paris as an historical painter. He was invited to the court of Vienna, where he was appointed painter to the Emperor, whose portrait he painted, and those of the Imperial family, and the principal nobility. He was also appointed Director of the Academy in that city. He died there in 1751. Some writers call his name Jacques van S.

HSV SCHUPPEN, H. VAN, an engraver of whom nothing is known, except some prints of landscapes, after Giovanni Maggi, who flourished at Rome in the early part of the 17th century. Some of them are signed H. v. Schuppen, and others marked with a monogram composed of his initials, H. V. S., as above.

SCHURMANS, ANNA MARIA. This extraordinary lady, descended of a noble family, was born at Utrecht in 1607. If the half of what is recorded of her be true, she must be regarded as one of the most wonderful prodigies the world has produced. From her earliest infancy she discovered an extraordinary quickness of parts, and her father took every care to have her instructed, not only in every female accomplishment, but in the languages, literature, science, and arts. She not only understood the modern and dead languages, but spoke them with fluency, and corresponded in them with the most learned persons of her time. She spoke the German, Italian, French, and English; also the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. She made great progress in the Oriental languages, having an affinity to the Hebrew, as the Syriac, Arabic, Chaldean, and Ethiopic. She was also a poetess. She was well versed in ancient and modern literature, in geography, astronomy, the arts and sciences. She was deeply read in divinity and theology. She excelled in music, both vocal and instrumental. She embroidered beautifully; cut out of paper with her scissors, all kinds of images and objects. She painted history, portraits, flowers, birds, insects, and excelled in all; modelled in clay and wax, and executed several marble busts, said to be still preserved in the cabinets of the curious. She etched and engraved several plates of portraits and other subjects. Her hand-writing was very beautiful, of which there is abundant proof in the many existing letters, written in several languages, addressed to the most learned personages of her time. Her literary works, in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and French, have been published in one volume. Unfortunately none of her works in art are specified, except a bust and an engraved portrait of herself, inscribed Anna Maria Schurmans an. ætat. cix. cxl. A. M. S. fec., with these lines:

Cernitis hic pictâ nostras in imagine vultus;
Si negat Ars formam, gratia vestra dabit.

Her bust, modelled in wax by herself, is said to be preserved in Holland, to which she appended the following verses:

Non mihi propositum est humanam eludere sortem,
Aut vultus solido sculperè in ære meos:
Hæc nostra effigies, quam cerâ expressimus, ecce
Materiæ fragili, mox peritura, damus.

This learned lady died, unmarried, at Altona, in 1678.

NS SCHURTZ, CORNELIUS NICHOLAS, a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg from about 1670 to 1689, according to the dates on his prints. He engraved some plates of portraits, among which are several of eminent physicians; also some frontispieces, emblematical subjects, and other book plates, indifferently executed. His prints are sometimes marked with his name in full, and sometimes with his initials, C. N. S., or the same letters formed into a monogram, as above.

SCHUT, CORNELIUS, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp. There is a great deal of confusion and contradiction among writers as to the history of this artist, arising partly from the fact, unknown to some of them, that there were two artists of this name. His birth is variously placed in 1590 and 1600, and his death in 1649, 1660, and 1675; but, according to the best authorities, he was born in 1600, and died in 1660. It is also generally stated that he was a scholar, and one of the ablest and most distinguished followers of Rubens. Possessing a lively and inventive genius, disciplined by a liberal education, it was not long before he distinguished himself among his fellow-students. On leaving the school of Rubens, he was employed to execute several works for the churches, which gained him great reputation, and he was accounted worthy of the school in which he was educated. It is said by some that this success rendered him so self-sufficient and presumptuous that he had the temerity to offer himself as a rival to his illustrious instructor, whose works he criticised, accusing the author of a want of genius and invention, and asserted that the best part of his pictures were executed by his disciples. Others say that disappointment at the lack of appreciation and employment, inspired him with an implacable enmity towards his master, who, instead of expressing any resentment, commended his performances and procured him employment. It is hardly credible, that a pupil could be so rash and so ungrateful to an instructor who always treated his scholars with paternal regard. It would therefore seem more probable that he received at least his first instruction from some other master, and that Rubens, perceiving his talent, employed him as an assistant, as he did other painters of talents who were not strictly his pupils, in executing some of his numerous commissions. The manner in which his conduct towards Rubens is mentioned in the life of that master, would certainly lead to this conclusion; at all events the magnanimous conduct of Rubens conciliated him, which is another argument in favor of this supposition.

Schut had a poetic and fertile invention, and he generally chose to paint subjects from ancient fable, though he painted sacred and profane history with equal reputation. He had a free, firm pencil, and his coloring plainly indicates the school of Rubens, yet his works are depreciated by a prevailing greyish tint, an incorrectness in design and line, and a want of an attentive study of nature. He also had a facility of hand (dangerous to the reputation of most artists who practice it) which qualified him for the functions of a machinist. This is particularly evident in his frescos in the cupola of the Cathedral at Antwerp, and in other large works of that description in the public edifices of that city. Of his altar-pieces and other pictures in the churches, the most deserving of notice, are the Nativity, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of the Jesuits; a Dead Christ with the Virgin and St. John, in the church of James, often mistaken for a work by Vandyck; and the Martyrdom of St. George in the Cathedral at Antwerp. There are also some of his works in the churches at Ghent. He painted many historical and fabulous pieces for the collections, ingeniously composed, though occasionally the groups are too much scattered or confused. Schut etched a large number of plates from his own designs, executed in a spirited style, resembling that of Benedetto Castiglione, a list of which is given in Nagler's Lexicon.

SCHUT, CORNELIUS, the Younger. According to Bermudez, this artist was the son of Peter Schut, the brother of Cornelius, and born at Antwerp, at what time is not known. He studied with his uncle, and accompanied his father to Madrid, who was an engineer in the service of the king of Spain. He passed the rest of his life in that country, and settled at Seville, where he acquired a high reputation, and executed many works for the churches, which are highly commended by the author above cited. He also executed many drawings in imitation of Murillo, which frequently pass for the works of that master. He was one of the founders of the Academy at Seville, and contributed liberally to its support. He filled the office of consul to that institution from 1663 to 1666, and President from 1670 to 1674. He died there in 1675. It is said that the elder Schut visited his brother at Madrid, and painted a large picture in the Imperial College, representing St. Francis Xavier baptizing the Indians, but as it is said that the artist died in Spain in 1675, it was evidently executed by the nephew. There are also some battle-pieces attributed to Cornelius Schut, but as neither of the preceding artists are mentioned as ever having painted any such subjects, and as the name is spelled Schuyt, they were doubtless executed by another artist.

SCHUTER, an engraver, probably a German. He engraved the portrait of Rembrandt for the first volume of prints from the paintings in the collection of the Marquis Gerini, at Florence, dated 1760.

SCHUTZ, CHRISTIAN GEORGE, a German landscape painter and engraver, born at Floresheim, in the Electorate of Mentz, about 1730. He painted small cabinet pictures of landscapes and views on the Rhine, which are neatly touched and very highly finished, though the style is somewhat dry and hard. He also etched some plates from his own designs and after other masters.

SCHUUR, THEODORE VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1628. After learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went to Paris, and studied with Sebastian Bourdon three years, after which he proceeded to Italy. He arrived at Rome in 1651, and applied himself incessantly in copying and designing after the works of the best masters, particularly those of Raffaele and Giulio Romano, in which he succeeded so happily that his performances attracted the notice and commendation of the best judges. He had acquired considerable reputation by some historical works he had exhibited, when he was favored with the patronage of Christina, Queen of Sweden, who, on the abdication of her throne in favor of Prince Charles Gustavus, had taken up her residence at Rome. He executed for her several historical works, which were highly commended, and for which he was liberally rewarded. In 1665, after a residence of fourteen years at Rome, he returned to his native city, where he was received by his fellow-citizens with the most flattering distinction. He painted the ceiling of the hall of the Burgomasters in the Town House, representing emblematically Justice, Temperance, and Fortitude. This work was highly applauded, and gained him extraordinary honor. He executed many works for the churches and public edifices, and for individuals. One of his most esteemed works is a large picture in the Town House, representing the Officers of the Armed Citizens, painted in 1675. His works are designed rather in the Roman than in the Dutch style, his coloring is sweet and harmonious, and he had an excellent knowledge of perspective and architecture. He enriched his backgrounds with ruins of ancient Grecian and Roman edifices, introduced with the skill of a painter and the knowledge of an antiquary. He died at the Hague in 1705.

SCHUYT, CORNELIUS. See CORNELIUS SCHUT THE YOUNGER.

SCHWABE, LAMBERT. See SUAVIUS.

SCHWANTHALER, LEWIS, an eminent German sculptor, born in 1802. He was the son of Franz S., a sculptor of little note, who placed him in the Royal Academy at Munich. The young artist attracted the attention of King Maximilian, who engaged him to decorate a silver table-service with bassi-relievi, which represented the Entrance of the Younger Deities to Olympus. About this time the sculptor Cornelius arrived in Munich, and on seeing this table-service, he engaged Schwantaler to execute different bassi-relievi for the Glyptotheca. The career of the young artist was now opened; he immediately went to Rome, where he was cordially received by Thorwaldsen. In a year after, he returned with the elegant and beautiful bassi-relievi of "the Birth of Venus," and of "Cupid and Psyche," which are now in the Glyptotheca; and afterwards he executed the other relievi for the same edifice, the "Battles between the Trojans and the Greeks," and between "Achilles and Pantheus, and the other river-Gods." The first of his statues was that of Shakspeare, in the theatre at Munich, and the first great basso-relievo, that of the Triumph of Bacchus, for the palace of the Duke Maximilian. In 1832 he visited Rome a second time, and in 1835, was appointed Professor of the Academy at Munich. His imagination was inexhaustible, and his facility of execution almost incredible. He produced an immense number of works, among which, are twelve statues of the most celebrated ancestors of King Louis, to adorn the throne of the festal hall in his new palace at Munich; the Battle of Arminius, for the northern tympanum of the same palace, one of the finest works of modern art; and his celebrated shield of Hercules, in bronze, containing 136 figures, a master-piece of the finest taste, and full of beauty and fancy. He executed the monumental statues of Mozart, for Salzburg; of Jean Paul, for Bayreuth; of Goëthe, for Frankfurt; of the Grand Duke of Baden, for Carlsruhe; a beautiful fountain, for the city of Vienna; the Nymph of the Danube, for the Prince Schwartzburg; the statues of Venus, Diana, Vesta, Ceres, Apollo, etc., for the Duke of Nassau. In his latter days, he was occupied with the decoration of the celebrated Bavarian Ruhmeshalle, the two tympana of which, as well as the metopes, are ornamented with his bassi-relievi. He died in 1848.

SCHWARTS, CHRISTOPHER, a German painter, born at Ingolstadt in 1550. He learned the elements of the art in his native city, and then went to Venice and studied in the school of Titian. After a residence of several years in Italy, he returned to Germany, where he distinguished himself, and was invited to Munich by Albert V., Duke of Bavaria, who appointed him his court painter, in whose service he continued during the rest of his life. He executed many works for his patron; and many, both in oil and fresco, for the churches and public edifices at Munich; some of which have been engraved by John Sadeler. His countrymen honored him with the title of the Raffaelle of Germany, with what propriety it is difficult to discover; as his works have little of the dignity or grandeur of the Roman or Florentine schools. His principal merits consist in the abundance of his composition and the splendor of his coloring; the airs of his heads are neither beautiful nor expressive, his drawing is incorrect, and there is a national stiffness and formality in his design, of which he could never divest himself. His manner is a mixed one, partaking of the Venetian, Roman, and German schools. Two of his best works are the Virgin and Child in the grand hall of the Jesuits at Munich, and the Entombment, in the Dusseldorf gallery. He died at Munich in 1594.

SCHWARTS, a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg about 1626. He engraved some portraits and book plates, and a part of the plates for a work entitled Icones Bibliopolarum et Typographorum, published at Nuremberg in that year. His plates are indifferently executed.

SCHWARTZ, JOHANN, an old Dutch painter and engraver on wood, was born at Groningen in 1480. Zani denominates him Giovanni di Groningen, called Giovanni Vredeman. He visited Italy for improvement, and resided several years at Venice. On returning to Holland, he painted landscapes and history, and contrived to introduce somewhat of the Italian taste into his native country. He is said to have followed the style of Schorel in landscape; but as the latter was born in 1495, he more probably imitated Schwartz. He was residing at Gouda in 1522 and 1523. There are two of his landscapes in the Louvre, one of which is decorated with a large number of figures and animals. The Biographie Universelle, mentions two of his prints; Christ standing in a bark, preaching to the multitude on the shore; and a Troop of Turkish Cavaliers. Schwartz died in 1541.

SCHWARTZENBERG, MELCHIOR, an old German wood engraver, who flourished from 1530 to 1550. He executed some cuts of frontispieces and other subjects for Feyeraband, the bookseller.

SCHWEGMAN, HENDRIK, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Haerlem in 1761, and died there in 1816. He studied under P. van Loo, and painted flower pieces with considerable success. He etched some plates of landscapes after E. van Driest and others, in the style of Anthony Waterloo. He also engraved and colored the plates for the work entitled Icones Plantarum rariorum, &c.

SCHWEICKHARDT, HENRY WILLIAM, a German painter, born at Brandenburg in 1746. He painted landscapes and cattle, and particularly winter pieces, which were held in considerable estimation. He went to England in 1786, where he passed the rest of his life. He etched and published a set of plates of animals, which he dedicated to Mr. West, in 1788. He died at London in 1797.

SCHWEICKART, JOHN ADAM, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1722. After acquiring a knowledge of the art under George Martin Priesler, he visited Italy for improvement, and resided eighteen years at Florence, where he engraved among other plates, several of the antique gems in the cabinet of Stosch, and was admitted a member of the Academy of Fine Arts. He gained considerable distinction by his discovery of the method of imitating washed designs, by means of the graver.

SCHWEIZER, JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished at Heidelberg about 1660. He engraved some plates of portraits, and some of animals, after J. H. Roos. He also engraved the frontispiece and plates for a work entitled Parnassus Heidelbergensis, omnium illustrissimæ hujus academice professorum icones exhibens, some of which are from his own designs. His prints are indifferently executed.

SCHYNDAL, or SCHENDAL, BERNARD, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem, according to the best authorities, in 1659, and died in 1716, though some place his birth in 1634, and his death in 1693. He studied under Hendrick Mommers. He painted scenes from low life, such as assemblies of peasants regaling themselves, fairs, merry-makings, interiors of kitchens, ale-houses, &c., in the style of John Molinaer. He treated these subjects with much humor; his pictures are ingeniously composed, his coloring is rich and harmonious, and his penciling neat and clean; though his works are greatly inferior to the similar productions of Brouwer and Ostade, they are held in considerable estimation.

SCHYNVOET, JACOB, a Dutch engraver, of whom little is known. He went to London about 1700, where he engraved some birds-eye views of gentlemen's seats, from his own designs.

SCHIVENOGLIA, LO. See FRANCESCO RAINIERI.

SCIACCA, TOMMASO, a Sicilian painter, born at Mazzara in 1734. He studied under Antonio Cavalucci at Rome, and assisted him in some of his works. He also painted some large frescos in the cathedral, and in the church of the Olivetani at Rovigo. On his return to Sicily, according to Hackert, he executed "some vast works in fresco, which are to be seen in the churches at Palermo." He died in 1795.

SCIAMERONI, Lo. See FRANCESCO FURINI.

SCIARPELLONI. See LORENZO DI CREDI.

SCILLA, or SILLA, AGOSTINO, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina, according to Hackert, in 1629. He showed an early genius for painting, and studied under Antonio Ricci, called Il Barbalunga, at Messina, under whose able instructions he made rapid progress. His talents raised such high expectations in Barbalunga, that he procured a pension for him from the Senate, to enable him to visit Rome and study with Andrea Sacchi. After a residence of four years in that metropolis, where he diligently studied the antique and the works of Raffaele under the direction of Sacchi, he returned to Messina, an accomplished artist, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices in that city and elsewhere, both in oil and fresco. He also opened a school for the instruction of young artists, which was much frequented, till the stormy times of the revolution obliged him to fly from Messina in 1674. He then went back to Rome, where he does not seem to have met with much encouragement, at least in historical painting, though according to Orlandi, he was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1679. Lanzi says he excelled in figures and in heads, particularly in the heads of old men; he designed in the grand Roman style, and his coloring was rich and harmonious. He excelled in the inferior branches of the art, as landscapes, animals, fruit and flowers, and after his return to Rome, confined himself pretty much to those subjects, though he executed a few historical works. He went to Turin, where he was employed by the court to paint some frescos of the Cardinal Virtues. His principal works are his frescos in the churches of S. Domenico and the Nunziata di Teatini at Messina. One of his best works in oil, is St. Ilarione dying, in the church of S. Ursula, one of the most esteemed pictures in that city. He died at Rome in 1700.

SCILLA, GIACINTO, was a younger brother of the preceding, born at Messina. He studied first with Barbalunga, and afterwards with Agostino, whom he assisted in his numerous works at Messina, and accompanied him to Rome in 1674, where he painted easel pictures of landscapes and animals, in a style of excellence. He died there in 1711.

SCILLA, SAVERIO, was the son of Agostino. He was instructed by his father, in whose style he painted easel pictures of landscapes, animals, fruit, and flowers, but he did not reach the excellence of his father or his uncle. The time of his birth and death are not recorded.

SCIORINA, LORENZO DELLO, a Florentine painter, who flourished about 1568. He studied under Bronzino, and afterwards assisted Vasari in some of his works at Florence. Lanzi says that honorable mention is made of him among the academicians of Florence.

SCIPIONE, JACOPO, a painter born at Averara, in the Bergamese territory, who flourished at Bergamo from 1507 to 1529. According to Tassi, he executed some works for the churches in that city, "in a style between the ancient and the modern taste." His design was very simple, but his coloring very beautiful.

SCLAVO, LUCA, a painter born at Cremona, who flourished about 1460. Zaist briefly mentions him as one of the "excellent artists," of the Cremonese school of that period.

SCOLARI, GIUSEPPE, a painter generally supposed to have been born at Vicenza, though the Cav. Pozzo says he was a native of Verona. At all events, he studied with Gio. Battista Maganza at Vicenza, and executed many works for the churches in that city, Verona and Venice. Lanzi says "he excelled in works in fresco, and in chiaro-scuro, enlivened by certain yellowish tints, at that period in great vogue. He was a good designer, as appears from his works both at Vicenza and Verona; and he likewise produced several large pictures in oil at Venice, much commended by Zanetti." According to Papillon, he executed some wood cuts, which, though rudely executed, evince the hand of a master; among them are the Entombment, a Pietà, St. Jerome holding a crucifix, and the Rape of Proserpine.

SCOPAS, a celebrated Greek sculptor and architect, was a native of Paros, an island of the Ægean Sea. Pliny, (Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 8.), places him as cotemporary with Ageladas, Polyclethus, Myron, and other eminent artists who flourished about B. C. 430; but from various circumstances, he appears to have flourished during the succeeding century. The Temple of Minerva Alea, rebuilt by Scopas, was destroyed, according to Pausanias, about B. C., 388; and a part of his work upon the tomb of Mausolus, was performed after the death of Queen Artemisia, which happened B. C. 350.

The works of Scopas were held in the highest esteem by the ancients, and his talents seem to have been little inferior, if not fully equal, to those of Polyclethus or Myron. He was employed with three others, by Artemisia, Queen of Caria, in erecting a magnificent monument to the memory of her husband Mausolus, in the city of Halicarnassus, ranked among the seven wonders of the world. Each of the builders chose and undertook to complete one of the four sides—Bryaxis the North, Timotheus the South, Leochares the West, and Scopas the East. Before the work was finished, Artemisia died; but the architects determined, for the sake of their own fame, to complete it. Its dimensions on the north and south sides were sixty-three feet; the east and west sides were a little shorter, and the extreme height was one hundred and forty feet. It was surrounded with thirty-six splendid marble columns. A fifth sculptor was added to the others, named Pythis, who carried up the sides in a pyramidal form, and placed at the top a chariot and four horses in marble. Scopas was appointed to execute one of the columns for the Ephesian Temple of Diana, and his work is said to have been the most beautiful of the whole. His statues were very numerous; among the most remarkable, were those representing Love, Passion, and Desire, in the Temple of Venus at Megara, mentioned by Pausanias; also a statue mentioned by Strabo, called the Rat-killer, represented in the act of crushing a rat with his foot, in the temple of the god surnamed Smintheus, at Chrysa in the Troad. Many of his compositions were among the noblest ornaments of Rome in the days of Pliny, particularly a large group of figures, representing Neptune, Thetis, Achilles, Nereids riding on tritons and dolphins, with a train of marine monsters. It was preserved in the chapel of Cneius Domitius, in the circus Flaminius at Rome, and, according to Pliny, was a splendid work, (præclarum opus), sufficient for the fame of his whole life. His colossal image of Mars, and his beautiful statue of Venus, were also greatly admired at Rome, and the latter was preferred to a similar statue by Praxiteles, which is supposed to have furnished the idea of the Venus de Medicis. Pliny says there was a doubt in his time, whether some statues representing the dying children of Niobe (Niobe liberis morientes), in the Temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome, were by Scopas or Praxiteles. The well known group of this subject in the Florentine gallery, is generally believed to be the identical work mentioned by Pliny. Whether it be an original production of one of these great artists, or as some critics have supposed, only a copy, it will ever be considered worthy of their genius, as one of the sweetest manifestations of that deep and intense feeling of beauty which the Grecian artists delighted to preserve in the midst of suffering. The admirable criticism of Schlegel (Lectures on the Drama, III), develops the internal harmony of the work. "In the group of Niobe, there is the most perfect expression of terror and pity. The upturned looks of the mother, and the mouth half open in supplication, seem to accuse the invisible wrath of Heaven. The daughter, clinging in the agonies of death to the bosom of her mother, in her infantile innocence, can have no other fear than for herself; the innate impulse of self-preservation was never represented in a manner more tender and affecting. Can there, on the other hand, be exhibited to the senses, a more beautiful image of self-devoting, heroic magnanimity than Niobe, as she bends her body forward, that, if possible, she may alone receive the destructive bolt? Pride and repugnance are melted down in the most ardent maternal love. The more than earthly dignity of the features are the less disfigured by pain, as from the quick repetition of the shocks, she appears, as in the fable, to have become insensible and motionless. Before this figure, twice transformed into stone, and yet so inimitably animated—before this line of demarcation of all human suffering, the most callous beholder is dissolved in tears." Among the other works of Scopas, were a statue of Apollo, on the Palatine Mount; Vesta seated, with two female attendants sitting on the ground beside her, in the gardens of Servilins; also a group of the same description, and a Virgin bearing on her head a basket of relics, in the collection of Asinius Pollio.

Scopas seems to have possessed as great merits in architecture as in sculpture. According to Pausanias, the temple erected by him at Tegea, in honor of Minerva Alea, far exceeded in its dimensions and the excellence of its decorations, all the other temples of Peloponnesus. The outside was built in the Ionic order; the inside was decorated with Doric columns. In the pediment in front was represented the hunting of the Macedonian boar, with Atalanta, Meleager, Theseus, and numerous other figures. The other pediment exhibited the contest between Telephus and Achilles.

SCOPPA, ORAZIO, an Italian designer and engraver, who flourished at Naples about 1642. He engraved a set of fifteen plates of designs for chalices, crosses, and other ecclesiastical ornaments, etched in a spirited style.

SCOR, GIOVANNI PAOLO, a German painter, briefly mentioned by Lanzi and Taja among the foreign artists who resided at Rome about the middle of the 17th century, but in such a manner as to show that he was an artist of distinction. He excelled in landscapes and animals. He painted a picture representing Noah's Ark, in the Quirinal palace, which "excited the most enthusiastic encomiums." He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1653. Taja calls him Gian. Paolo Tedesco Scor, and commends him as one of the ablest artists of his time, in the branch of the art he followed. He had a brother named Egidius, who was employed for a considerable time in the Gallery of Alexander VII. These artists are not mentioned by the German or Dutch writers, therefore the name is wrongly spelled by the Italian writers, as frequently happens, or else they passed their whole artistic life in Italy.

SCORODOMOFF, GAWRIL (GABRIEL), a Russian designer and engraver, born at St. Petersburg about 1748. He went to England when young, and studied under Bartolozzi, whose manner he followed. While in that country, he engraved several plates after Reynolds, West, and others, and some from his own designs. On his return to St. Petersburg, he engraved the portraits of the Empress Catherine, the Grand Duke, and other princes of the country, after F. Rocotoff. He died there in 1792. He is said to be the first Russian who acquired any reputation as an engraver.

SCORZA, SINIBALDO, a painter born at Voltaggio, a small town near Geneva, in 1589. He studied under Gio. Battista Paggi, and excelled in painting landscapes, which he decorated with figures and animals, tastefully composed, and touched with great neatness and spirit. Lanzi says, "it would be difficult to find in Italy a pencil which engrafted so successfully the neatness of the Flemish execution with the taste of the Italians in design." He painted easel pictures of historical and fabulous subjects, in a style of excellence that procures their admission into the choicest collections at Genoa. He also excelled in drawing with pen and ink. He is said to have copied some of the prints of Albert Durer, with such accuracy that some of the best judges in Italy were deceived by them, and supposed they were original engravings by that master—a very questionable assertion.

SCORZINI, PIETRO, a painter of Lucca, who flourished about 1750, and acquired a great reputation for his elegant decorations of many theatres.

SCOTIN, GERARD, the Elder, a French engraver, born at Gonesse, near Paris, in 1642. He studied under Francis Poilly the elder, whose style he imitated with considerable success, though his works are very inferior to the admirable productions of that master. He died in 1718. The following are among his best prints: The Marriage of St. Catherine, after Alex. Veronese; the Communion of the Magdalene, after Domenichino; the Circumcision, after P. Mignard; the Baptism of Christ, do.; the Presentation in the Temple, after C. le Brun; the Country Life, after Dom. P'eti.

SCOTIN, GERARD, the Younger, was the nephew of the preceding, born at Paris in 1690. He studied with his uncle, and executed quite a number of plates, chiefly for the booksellers. He went to London, where he resided several years. In 1740, in conjunction with Ravenet and Baron, he engraved the six plates of the Marriage à la Mode, after Hogarth. Among other prints, are the following by him: The Birth of Adonis, after Boucher; Notre Dame des Victoires, do.; Belisarius, after the supposed picture by Vandyck at Chiswick. Vortigern and Rowena, after Blackney; Alfred receiving the account of the defeat of the Danes, do.

SCOTIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris in the first half of the 18th century. He engraved some prints after H. Rigaud, Boucher, Watteau, Lancret, and other French painters. Some of them are dated as early as 1710. He also engraved the anatomical plates for Boudon's Anatomy, published at Paris in 1734. He is supposed to have been the son of the elder Scotin.

SCOTT, JOHN, an English engraver, born at Newcastle in 1774. He went to London, and studied under Pollard, an engraver of little note. He engraved some plates for the publications by Tresham and Otley, Britton's Cathedral Antiquities, Westall's Illustrations for the Book of Common Prayer, and other works. His best prints are those he engraved for the "Sportsman's Cabinet," and a "Series of Horses and Dogs," in which he excels, as an engraver of animals, all the English artists that had preceded him. He died in 1828.

SCOTT, SAMUEL, an English marine painter, called the "English Vandervelde," whom he is said by Lord Orford and Pilkington to have equalled in marines, and to have excelled in sea-ports and buildings. He was born at London in 1710, and died there in 1772. Stanley says, "Scott was an excellent painter in his style, and his pictures are deserving of more attention than has been bestowed on them; but no comparison can be instituted between his works and those of W. Vandervelde."

SCOTTO, FELICE, a painter of the Milanese school, who flourished at Como in the latter part of the 15th century. Lanzi says "he painted a good deal for private individuals at Como, and left a number of pictures in fresco in the church of S. Croce, relating to the life of St. Bernardino. His genius is varied and expressive, he displays judgment in composition, and is one of the best artists of the 15th century in those parts. He was probably a pupil of some other school, his design being more elegant, and his coloring more clear and open, than those of the Milanese."

SCOTTO, STEFANO, a Milanese painter, who flourished in the last part of the 15th, and first part of the 16th centuries. According to Lomazzo, he painted history, both in oil and fresco, and particularly excelled in arabesques. He was one of the instructors of Gaudenzio Ferrari. Lanzi thinks he was of the same family as the preceding.

SCOTTO, or SCOTTI, FRANCESCO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Venice about 1760. He studied with Vincenzio Vangelisti. He engraved some fine prints after Raffaello, Leonardo da Vinci, and other masters. He is principally known by his admirable fac similes of original drawings by the celebrated Italian masters, particularly those of Raffaello. These, with others by Rosaspina, form the splendid work published by the Abate Celotti, under the title, "Disegni Originali di Raffaello per la prima volta publicata, esistenti nella Imp. Academ. di Belle Arti di Venetia." 1829, folio. The painter Bossi bought the drawings and plates after the death of Scotto, and intended to have published them, but dying, they fell into the hands of Celotti, who published them as above mentioned. The time of the death of Scotto is not recorded.

SCOTTO, or SCOTTI, GIROLAMO, an Italian engraver, born at Milan in 1780. He studied under Giuseppe Longhi, and was one of the ablest disciples of that distinguished master. He executed quite a number of plates in the style of his instructor, after the great Italian masters, among which are the following:

The Virgin in the Clouds, with the Child in her arms; after Raffaele. Madonna di Foligno (the Virgin and Child only); do. Mater pulchræ dilectionis, after a picture by Raffaele discovered at Genoa in 1823. Madonna with the Child in her lap, the young St. John, and another little Boy, from a picture by Raffaele, in the possession of the Duke of Terranuova. Mary Magdalene anointing the feet of Christ; after P. Veronese. The healing of the Children by virtue of the Garments of St. Philip; after A. del Sarto. This print is dedicated to Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, 1834.

SCRETA, CHARLES, an eminent German painter of a noble family, born at Prague in 1604. He showed an early passion for painting, and after learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went young to Italy, and studied several years at Venice, Bologna, and Florence. In 1634, he went to Rome in company with his friend William Bauer, where he diligently studied the antique and the works of the great masters. He also frequented the schools of eminent cotemporary artists, and studied their different manners. By his talents and application he acquired a high reputation in Italy, and was appointed one of the professors in the Academy at Bologna. On his return to his native country, he was received with distinction, and the Emperor Ferdinand III. and the nobility honored him with many commissions. In 1644, he was elected a member of the Academy at Prague, and in 1652 the president of the institution. The emperor confirmed the title of his family to nobility, and he spent the remainder of his life in that city, honored and admired.

He painted history, allegory, and portraits; his works are numerous, and many of them have been engraved. Several of his historical works are said to rank among the best productions of his time, though they are not so remarkable for originality of conception, as a judicious selection from the antique and the best modern masters. Like the eclectic philosophers of old, he was of opinion that excellence did not consist in propounding new theories or practices, but in a judicious selection and appropriation of old ones. He also had a remarkable talent of imitating the styles of the great masters of the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish schools, particularly in single half-length and three-quarters figures, some of which are said to be a perfect deception. They are not copies, but imitations. He imitated the Caracci, Guido, Domenichino, Lanfranco, Murillo, and Rubens, so as to deceive connoisseurs. He also imitated Raffaele, Titian, and Paul Veronese, but with less success. His works are numerous, and are to be found in the churches, palaces, and private collections at Prague, Vienna, Dresden, Salzburg, and Schleissheim. Many of his subjects are taken from sacred history, and legends of saints. In portraiture, he delighted to represent his sitters in imaginary characters. Thus it is said that he painted his own portrait twice under saintly guise—once as St. Giles, in the church of St. Martin; and again as St. Luke painting the Virgin, in the church of St. Mary at Prague. One of his portraits in the Gallery at Prague is particularly admired; it represents a lapidary and glass cutter in his workshop. He engraved a large philosophical thesis, on two plates, entitled Philosophia Universa in Universitati Pragensi. It is an allegory formed of busts and statues of the members of the house of Lobkowitz, signed Car. Scretate fec. 1666. He died at Prague in 1674.

SCRIVEN, EDWARD, an English engraver in the chalk and dotted manner, born in 1775. He studied under Bartolozzi, whose elegant style he adopted. He engraved a great many plates of portraits and other subjects, after the eminent painters of his time, and was much employed by Boydell and other publishers of prints. Among his principal works are "Specimens of Ancient Sculpture," published by the Dilettanti Society, in Dibdin's Aedes Althorpianae, in Tresham's Gallery of Pictures, and other expensive publications of the day; the Studies of Heads, from West's picture of Christ rejected; a series of portraits, chiefly after Sir Peter Lely, of the Ladies commemorated by Hamilton in his Memoirs de Grammont. Most of the expensive publications of the day were embellished with his prints. In all his works he faithfully preserved the character and expressions of the originals. He died in 1841.

SCUTELLARI, ANDREA, a reputable painter, born at Viadana, in the Cremonese territory, who, according to Zaist and others, flourished at Cremona about 1588, and executed some works for the churches. There was another painter of the same name, probably his brother, who resided at Cremona about the same period. Lanzi says "few of their works remain, and those of no great merit."

SCYLLIS. See DIPENOS.

SEBASTIANI, LAZZARO, a Venetian painter, who flourished in the early part of the 16th century. He studied under Vittore Carpaccio, and followed his style. He painted a number of pictures for the churches and public edifices of Venice, among which was the Entrance of Filippo Mazeri into Venice, bringing a piece of the true Cross, placed in the hall of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. In the church of S. Salvatore is a picture by him in five compartments, in one of which is represented St. Agostino surrounded by a great number of religious persons. According to Lanzi, although flourishing so near the golden period of Italian art, Sebastiani did not succeed in freeing himself from the influence of the old and uniform taste; for which reason his works are frequently confounded with those of Veglia, Mansueti, and other followers of Carpaccio. His pictures, however, possess much merit, being distinguished for several noble traces of the style of Gentile and Carpaccio, especially in the architecture; and although his coloring is considered cold and languid in the Venetian school, it would be termed, in several of the others, sufficiently soft and animated for that period.

SEBASTIANO, FRA. See PIOMBO.

SEBILLE, GYSBERT, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Weesp about the middle of the 17th century. There are several of his works in the Town House of that city, among which is a picture of the Judgment of Solomon, and another representing an Assembly of the Magistrates in 1652, of which he was a member. Nothing more is recorded of him.

SECANO, GERONIMO, a Spanish painter and sculptor, was born at Saragossa in 1638. After acquiring the elements of design from an obscure artist, he visited Madrid for improvement, and studied with great assiduity the best works of art in that city. On returning to Saragossa, he soon manifested uncommon abilities, by executing several pictures for the church of S. Pablo. He was also employed in S. Miguel, and painted several works for the government edifices, in oil and in fresco, distinguished for correct design and excellent coloring. At the age of fifty, he acquired a knowledge of sculpture, and practised it with ability. He established a school, in which were educated some able professors of both arts. Secano died at Saragossa in 1710.

SECCANTE, SEBASTIANO, a painter of the Venetian school, who flourished at Udine about 1576. According to Renaldi, he studied with Pomponco Amalteo, a painter of a noble family, which yet boasts its descendants at Uderzo. He married the daughter of his instructor, and settled in his native city, where he executed several altar-pieces and other works for the churches, and two grand historical pieces in the castle, embellished with several fine portraits. One of his most esteemed altar-pieces is in the church of S. Giorgio, "representing the Redeemer suffering under the Cross, between several figures of cherubs, holding other instruments of the Passion; a piece that displays all the excellent maxims derived from his education." He also painted many excellent works for individuals. Lanzi says: "This artist may be pronounced the last of the great school (the Venetian) whose productions do credit to a good collection." He had a brother named Giacomo, who practised the art at Udine in 1571, but he did not acquire much reputation. Giacomo had a son, called also Sebastiani, whom he instructed in the art, and of whom there are notices from 1571 to 1629. They had a relative, whom they instructed in the art, called Seccante de' Seccanti, who flourished at Udine about 1621. None of these last named painters acquired any distinction.

SECCHI, GIO. BATTISTA, called also IL CARAVAGGIO, a painter of the Milanese school, who flourished at Milan about 1619. He executed some few works for the churches in that city, in which Lanzi says he approaches the best of the Cerani. Little is known of him. In the Pittura d' Italia he is called Caravaggio, and he signed himself Jo. Bapt. Sic. de Caravag., which shows that he was a native of Caravaggio.

SECCHIARI, GIULIO, a painter born at Modena.

He first studied in the school of the Caracci at Bologna, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he diligently studied the works of the great masters, and acquired so much reputation that the Duke of Mantua invited him to his court. He executed for that Prince some of his best works, which were destroyed, or taken away in the sacking of Mantua in 1630. There are some of his works in the churches of his native city, which are commended by Tiraboschi, particularly an altarpiece representing the Death of the Virgin, in the Cathedral. Lanzi also commends him as an able disciple of the school of the Caracci, though his works are rare, and little known. He died in 1631.

SECU, or SEEUW, MARTIN DE, a German painter, born at Romerswalen in 1520. He studied under Francis Floris, and painted history with reputation. He settled at Middlebourg, where he met with considerable encouragement, and where his principal works are to be found. He had a free, delicate, and rapid pencil, and his compositions are not deficient in grace, though his drawing is frequently incorrect. He died in 1574.

SEDELMAYER, JEREMIAH JAMES, a German painter and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1704. He first studied engraving under Pfeffel, and attained considerable excellence in managing the point and the graver, combining the styles of Dorigny and Audran. Receiving some ill treatment from his instructor, Sedelmeyer fled to Vienna, and entered the school of his brother-in-law, Keukel, who instructed him in miniature painting. He formed an intimate friendship with Gaspar Füssli, in concert with whom he engraved a number of plates, and painted portraits in oil and miniature. He executed several plates of landscapes, after pictures in the Imperial Gallery, by Daniel Gran; also many plates of portraits and historical subjects.

SEGALA, GIOVANNI, a painter born at Venice in 1663. According to Zanetti, he studied with Antonio Zanchi, and acquired considerable reputation as a historical painter. He was a man of genius, and though, like his master, addicted to the use of strong shades, he possessed sufficient intelligence to derive some advantage from a wrong direction of his powers. Lanzi says, "he made use of dark grounds, which he contrasted with very spirited lights, and with a skill that enlivens, while it enchants us. His style seemed adapted to grand works, and he had genius enough to conduct them well." Lanzi particularly commends his picture of the Conception in the college of La Carità, in which he competes with, if he does not surpass, some of the first painters of the age. He died in 1720.

SEGERS, or SEGHERS, GERARD, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1589. After having studied successively with Henry van Balen and Abraham Janssens, he went to Rome, where, being captivated by the vigorous style of M. Angelo da Caravaggio, he became the disciple of Bartolomeo Manfredi, who had studied under that master, and whose manner he followed. To the striking opposition of light and shadow, and the broad relief of Caravaggio, he added the rich coloring of the Flemish school, and his pictures, though exhibiting a violence of contrast not authorized by a legitimate observance of nature, eclipsed in point of effect every work placed near them. Sandrart, who was intimately acquainted with him, observes that he avoided using the "bright blues, yellows, greens, and glaring colors, being always careful to observe a general harmony in his coloring; and yet his pictures have so great a degree of force that they make most other paintings look weak and faint." He acquired so much reputation at Rome that the Cardinal Zapara, the Spanish ambassador, invited him to accompany him to Madrid, and presented him to the king, who took him into his service, and gave him a liberal pension. He executed several historical works, musical conversations, and other subjects, which were greatly admired, and so much to the satisfaction of the monarch, that he liberally rewarded him, and made him several magnificent presents. After a residence of some years at the court of Madrid, the desire of revisiting his native country, where the reputation he had acquired both in Italy and Spain, rendered his fellow citizens impatient to possess his works, induced him to ask permission of the king to return to Flanders, who would gladly have retained him in his service. On his arrival at Antwerp, he executed several works for the churches, in imitation of the style of Caravaggio, which were not so favorably received by the public as he expected. The clear and brilliant coloring of Rubens and Vandyck were so deeply rooted in public estimation, that he was compelled to adopt a system more tender and agreeable than he had heretofore practised. The facility with which he effected this change in his manner, proves the flexibility of his powers, and some of his later works are ranked among the most estimable productions of the Flemish school, vieing in brilliancy and harmony of coloring with Rubens and Vandyck. Sandrart says that when he visited Segers, and first saw some of his later performances, he could scarcely believe them to be by his hand, till Segers declared that he was under the necessity of changing the style he most approved, to comply with the taste of the world, and to sacrifice his fame and fortune, as the public preferred the coloring of Rubens and Vandyck to the best artists of the Venetian and Roman schools. However this may be, the public certainly showed their good taste in preferring the rich and harmonious coloring of their own great masters to the artificial one of Caravaggio, and Segers also in knowing it; but he had no just cause to complain of lack of patronage, for he is said to have met with constant employment, and received such liberal prices that he was enabled to live splendidly, and to expend 60,000 florins in the purchase of the works of the great masters. He also painted conversation and musical parties, soldiers playing at cards, &c., which were exceedingly admired, and eagerly sought after. He composed his subjects well, was more correct in his design than the generality of his countrymen, and excellent in expression; his coloring was warm and full of force, and the oppositions of his lights and shadows evinced a perfect knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, which enabled him to give his figures a surprising roundness and relief. Among his most celebrated works at Antwerp are the famous Elevation of the Cross, in the church of the Jesuits; the Adoration of the Magi, in the Cathedral, admirably engraved by Vostermans; Peter denying Christ, engraved by Bolswert; and the Marriage of the Virgin, in the church of the Barefooted Carmelites, which is esteemed his masterpiece. It is asserted by Descamps and others that Segers visited England, but Bryan says there is no evidence of his ever having been in that country. Vandyck painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country. He died at Antwerp in 1651.

SEGERS, or SEGHERS, DANIEL, was the brother of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1590. Having a passion for depicting flowers when a youth, he was placed under the instruction of John Breughel, at that time famous for his flower-pieces, but afterwards more distinguished for his landscapes. At the age of sixteen he was persuaded to join the society of the Jesuits. When the time of his probation had expired, his superior, knowing his talents and alive to his interest, permitted him to visit Rome, where his brother had already distinguished himself. Wherever he traveled, he was curious to observe the flowers, fruits, plants, and insects peculiar to each place, all which he accurately designed and transferred to his portfolio, so that on his return to Flanders, he had an abundant supply of beautiful objects for his future compositions. During his residence at Rome, also, he diligently studied everything that could contribute to his own particular branch of the art, and the improvement he made proves that a sojourn in that metropolis of art is beneficial to every painter, whatever may be the department to which he devotes himself. Segers painted flower-pieces, elegantly and tastefully composed, and executed with a brilliancy, variety, and beauty that rivalled nature. His usual manner of disposing his subjects was in garlands or festoons, round elegant vases of marble, on which were often represented historical subjects by the most distinguished masters; even Rubens himself did not disdain to lend him his assistance. His pencil was light, his touch free and delicate, and his flowers have all the freshness and bloom of nature, sparkling with dew-drops. He particularly excelled in depicting lilies and roses. His tints are transparent and natural, and the insects and butterflies which he introduced among the flowers appeared as perfect as life. It was his custom to cultivate the most beautiful flowers for models, and he also made a large collection of insects for the same purpose. His pictures were eagerly sought after by princes and others, and proved a source of honor and profit to his confraternity. The Prince of Orange deputed Boschaert, his principal painter, to visit Segers and endeavor to procure a picture by him, on which occasion he painted two of his choicest works, which were presented in the name of the society to the Prince, who munificently repaid the gift. His most capital performance was in the church of the Jesuits at Antwerp. It represented a garland of the most beautiful flowers, in the centre of which was a picture of the Virgin and Child, painted by Rubens. He died in 1660. The works of Segers are very rare and valuable; the demand for them caused them to be largely imitated, and many are attributed to him which are totally unworthy of his pencil.

SEGERS, SEGHERS, or ZEGERS, a Dutch painter, born, according to Balkema, in 1625, and died in 1679, though others place his birth in 1629, and his death in 1675. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted landscapes and cattle, in which, according to some writers, he imitated Paul Potter; but others say that, like Potter, he only copied nature, and while he equalled that master in cattle, he greatly excelled him in landscape; the last part of this assertion might be readily granted, as Potter paid little attention to landscape, which he used only as an accessory; but the first part should be received with many scruples of allowance. However, he had a fine invention, a ready genius, and a clear judgment. His composition is rich, and full of pleasing variety of mountains, valleys, and villages; his aerial perspective is so excellent that his distances appear exceedingly remote, and the scene of his landscape uncommonly extensive; his play of light and shadow, according to the divisions, is scientifically true, and, like Jacob Ruysdael and Philip de Koningh, he made a flat country appear interesting by his artistic management. Every object is touched with delicacy and spirit, and the sweetness and harmony of his coloring was scarcely inferior to any artist of his time. Notwithstanding the possession of these excellencies, he lived in comparative obscurity, and it is said was oppressed with poverty all his days, his works not being appreciated during his lifetime, though after his decease they were more sought after and rose greatly in value. He is also said to have invented a method of stamping landscapes on cloth with colors, so that every object appeared of its natural color and in its proper place; but this wants authentication. In the British Museum there are nineteen etchings, with six variations, making twenty-five in all, by this artist. There are three more in the Bibliothèque at Paris, and doubtless more will be discovered; Stanley supposes that some of the prints now attributed to Rembrandt, on a critical examination, may be transferred to him. These prints are executed in a free and masterly, but peculiar style, and some of them appear to have been experiments. They are all from his own designs, and represent scenery similar to that in his landscapes.

SEGOVIA, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Madrid about 1650. Little is known of him. He painted marine pieces in a spirited style, which are held in high estimation in that capital.

SEGURA, ANTONIO DE, a Spanish painter and architect, of whom little is known. In 1580, Philip II. commissioned him to copy the celebrated picture by Titian, known as the Apotheosis of Charles V., or the Glory of Titian, as an altar-piece for the monastery of San Yuste. He died in 1605, and Philip III. settled a pension on his widow.

SEIBOLD, CHRISTIAN, a German painter, born at Mayence in 1697. He is said to have acquired his knowledge of art without the aid of an instructor. In 1759, he was appointed cabinet painter to the Empress Maria Theresa. His works are principally half-length portraits, with historical accessories; they deserve credit for their choice of attitudes and correctness of design. The portrait of Seibold, painted by himself, is in the Louvre. He died at Vienna in 1768.

SELLER, JOHN GEORGE, a German engraver, who flourished at Schaffhausen about the end of the 16th and commencement of the 17th centuries. His plates are said to be executed in mezzotinto.

if this is so, the claims of Prince Rupert and Lieutenant Colonel de Siegen to the invention of engraving in mezzotinto fall to the ground, unless there be some mistake as to the time he lived; for the earliest print mentioned by Siegen was the portrait of Amelia Elizabeth, Princess of Hesse, engraved in 1643. The invention, however, is not attributed to Seiller. Laborde specifies several of his prints, among which the following have his approbation: Portrait of the Emperor Joseph I. C'est un bon travail. Portrait of the Empress Eleonora. Bonne execution. Portrait of Kilian, the engraver. Belle planche. Portrait of J. H. Heidegger. Assez belle planche. A Monk attempting to kiss a Girl. Très bon travail. His prints are inscribed J. G. Seiller. fecit. or J. Georg Seiller fecit et ex., or Joh. Georg Seiller scalfusianus fecit.

SEIS, PAUL PONTIUS ANTHONY ROBERT DE, an artist, probably a painter, by whom there is a masterly etching, representing Lot and his Daughters, executed in the style of Rembrandt. It is inscribed P. P. A. Robert de Seis, fecit.

SELIGMAN, JOHANN MICHAEL, a distinguished German engraver on wood, was born at Nuremberg in 1720. He early manifested an inclination for design, and studied in the Academy of Painting, under the able tuition of two of the brothers Preisler. Rapidly attaining excellence in the art, he was invited to Rome in 1744, and afterwards to St. Petersburg. He subsequently settled in his native city, and was extensively employed, particularly upon works of natural history. Among his most esteemed productions were thirty-four engravings, representing the Nutritive Vessels in the Leaves of Trees, with explanations by C. J. Trew, published at Nuremberg in 1748; the Hortus Nitidissimus of the same author, embellished with one hundred and ninety plates; and a Collection of rare Birds, in nine volumes, folio, published at Nuremberg in 1749, and subsequent years. Seligman died in 1762.

SELLITTO, CARLO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. According to Dominici, he went to Rome and studied with Annibale Caracci, whose principles he adopted. Little more is known of him, though Guarienti records his name in the Abbecedario, and Lanzi says he finds him commended in some MS. notices of eminent artists of the Neapolitan school.

SELMA, FERNANDO, an eminent Spanish engraver, born at Valencia in 1750. He is said to have studied under Emanuel Salvador Carmona, and engraved a number of plates in a style of excellence, resembling that of Carmona, though in his latest manner he is said to have imitated Edelinck. He engraved several fine plates after the great masters in the Escorial, among which the most celebrated are La Madonna del Pesce, the Virgin and Child, and Christ bearing the Cross, called Lo Spasimo di Sicilia, after Raffaele; and the portrait of the Emperor Charles V., after Titian. He also engraved several portraits of distinguished personages, as Cortes, Solis, Magellan, and others. He engraved the plates for the "Maritime Atlas of Spain," which occupied him several years. He was also a man of considerable literary acquirements. He died at Madrid in 1810.

SEMENTI, or SEMENZA, GIOVANNI GIACOMO, a painter born at Bologna, according to Bagliani, in 1580. He was a fellow-student with Francesco Gessi, first under Denis Calvart, and afterwards with Guido Reni. According to Malvasia, he was one of the most successful followers of the style of Guido, and painted several works for the churches at Bologna, which have sometimes been mistaken for the productions of that master. Such are his pictures of the Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, in S. Elena; the Marriage of St. Catherine, in S. Francesco; and the Crucifixion, in S. Gregorio. He went to Rome in the pontificate of Urban VIII., and was favored with the protection of Cardinal Prince Maurice of Savoy, for whom he executed several admired works. He also painted some pictures for the churches. There are several fine frescos by him in S. Carlo a Catinari, and an oil painting, representing the Virgin and Infant, with Sts. Gregory and Francis, in the Capella Cavalieri. The authors above cited, and Lanzi, say he died at Rome in the prime of life; others place his death in 1638.

SEMINI, or SEMINO, ANTONIO, a painter born at Genoa in 1485. He was a pupil of Lodovico Brea, but afterwards studied the works of Pietro Perugino, according to Soprani, and was a successful imitator of his style. He executed several works for the churches at Genoa. His picture of the Nativity, in the church of S. Domenico at Savona, has been compared to the best productions of that master, and even to the early performances of Raffaelle. He died at Genoa in 1549.

SEMINI, ANDREA, was the son of the preceding, born at Genoa in 1510. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with Pierino del Vaga, who had sought refuge at Genoa after the sacking of Rome in 1527. He showed such talents that Vaga advised him to visit Rome, whither he proceeded, and during a residence of eight years in that city made the works of Raffaelle the especial objects of his study. On his return to Genoa, he acquired considerable reputation, and executed several works for the churches and public edifices, the most esteemed of which are the Nativity, in S. Francesco; and the Adoration of the Magi, in La Nunziata. In these, as well as his other productions, he was a faithful follower of Raffaelle, though not always sufficiently correct in his design. According to Baldinucci, he painted portraits with great success. He died in 1578.

SEMINI, OTTAVIO, was the younger son of Antonio S., born at Genoa in 1515. He also studied under Pierino del Vaga, and accompanied his brother to Rome; and, like him, he studied the works of Raffaelle. He also copied the antique bas-reliefs of Trajan's column with great accuracy. He returned to Genoa with Andrea, and assisted him in several of his works. He also decorated the façade of the Palazzo Doria with statues and architecture, designed in the finest taste, and painted some frescos in the interior, particularly the Rape of the Sabines, so much in the style of Raffaelle that, according to Soprani, it was mistaken by Giulio Cesare Procaccini for a work of that master. He was invited to the court of Milan, where he passed the rest of his days and executed some of his principal works. He decorated the chapel of St. Girolamo in S. Angelo with several choice works, the most admired of which was a noble composition of the obsequies of that Saint. He was more correct in his design, and possessed a more lively imagination than his brother. He died at Milan in 1604.

SEMINI, MICHELE, a Roman painter, who was a pupil and imitator of the Cav. Carlo Maratti, whom he assisted in some of his works. He is commended in the life of that eminent artist, but Lanzi says little is known of him or his works.

SEMITECOLO, NICCOLO, an old Venetian painter, by whom there is a picture of the Virgin, with some histories of St. Sebastian, in the Chapter Library at Padua, signed Niccolo Semitecolo da Venetia impense 1367. This picture is in excellent preservation, and a fine specimen of the time and school. Lanzi says, "the naked parts are tolerably well drawn, and the proportions of the figures, though somewhat extravagant, are bold and free; and what is more important, the picture discovers no resemblance to the style of Giotto, being inferior in design, though equal to him in coloring."

SEMOLEI, IL. See FRANCO.

SEMPELIUS, D. G., a German engraver, who flourished about 1580. He copied some of the prints of Albert Durer with great success; one of the best is the Descent of Christ into Hell, from the set of plates of the Life of Christ, by that master. It bears the date of the original, 1512, as well as the year in which it was engraved, 1580.

SEMPlice, FRA. See DA VERONA.

SENAVE, JACOB ALBERT, a distinguished Belgian painter, was born at Loo in 1758. The Canon of the Abbey of Loo perceiving in him a strong inclination for art, prevailed upon his father to send him to the Academy of Painting at Dunkirk. After studying there for three years, he gained the first prize, and then visited Paris for improvement. On returning to Belgium, he received several commissions from the Bishop of Ypres; after which he revisited Paris; frequented the Royal Academy; received the counsels of Suvée; and finally settled in that city. His pictures are distinguished for originality of composition, purity of design, and faithful imitation of nature. They generally represent feasts of the peasantry and other scenes from low life; they are highly esteemed, and have been extensively purchased for the collections of Belgium, France, Germany, Russia, Switzerland, England, and the United States. In 1821, Senave visited Belgium, and painted a picture representing a Reunion of Artists in the Studio of Rembrandt, for the Academy at Ypres, which chose him an honorary director. In the church at Loo is another work by him, representing the Seven Works of Mercy. In 1822, the Royal Society of Literature and the Fine Arts honored him with a membership in that institution. He had one son, who gave fair promise of great excellence in the art, but died at the age of twenty-two. Senave died at Paris in 1823.

SENEFELDER, ALOIS, the inventor of lithography, was the son of a performer at the Royal theatre of Munich, where he was born in 1771. His father placed him in the University of Ingolstadt, as a student of jurisprudence, but after his death, he attempted a theatrical career in 1791; not succeeding in this he became an author, though his poverty prevented his publishing his works.

He tried many plans with copper plates and compositions as substitutes for letter press, in order to be his own printer. He found, in the course of his experiments, that a composition of soap, wax, and lampblack, formed a good material for writing on plates; that when dry it became firm and solid, and that it resisted the action of aquafortis.— Wanting facility in writing backwards on the plates, he polished some pieces of Kelheim stone, as cheap materials on which he could practice. One day, being desired by his mother to take an account of some linen about to be sent to be washed, and having no paper at hand, he wrote the account on a polished stone, with his composition ink, intending to copy it at his leisure. When he was about to efface the writing, it occurred to him that by eating away the stone with acid, he could obtain impressions; having done this to the depth of an hundredth part of an inch, he charged the lines with ink, and found he could take successive impressions. This new mode of printing, instantly struck him as being very important, and he persevered through all difficulties in applying his discovery to practical purposes. In the course of a multitude of experiments, he found that it was not necessary to have the letters raised above the surface of the stone, but that the chemical principles by which grease and water were kept from uniting, were alone sufficient for his purpose. This point obtained, lithography may be said to have been fully discovered. All that was required was the improvement of the materials, and the mode of working with them, and the construction of a proper press for taking impressions. The perseverance with which he followed up his experiments in order to overcome the difficulties which successively arose in his progress was very remarkable, and the more so, considering the want of method in his proceedings. Often did he waste days and months in surmounting a difficulty which a little knowledge, or apparently a very little reasoning, would have enabled him to conquer immediately. Invention and application, however, are two different matters; the simplest things have sometimes been the most difficult to discover; it took the world nearly six thousand years to find out the use of moveable metallic printing types. Senefelder's first essay to print for publication, was some pieces of music, in 1796. Afterwards he attempted drawings and writings. The difficulty he experienced in writing backwards, led him to the process of transfer; and the use of dry soap, which he found to leave permanent traces that would give impressions, naturally led him to the mode of chalk drawings. Having made considerable progress in his invention, Senefelder, in 1799, obtained a patent privilege for Bavaria, when he made known his process. He afterwards entered into a partnership with M. André of Offenbach, who proposed to establish presses and take out patents in Vienna, Paris, and London. For this purpose, Senefelder went to London with the brother of André, and introduced his invention under the name of Polyantography. Several of the principal English artists made trials of it; but unfortunately, the difference between the materials of Germany and those of England, used for the purposes of drawing and printing and the art of printing from stones being imperfectly understood, caused constant failures and they successively abandoned its practice. In August, 1800, Senefelder, who had dissolved his connection with André, went to Vienna, where, after much difficulty, he obtained a patent, and extensive preparations were made for applying his process to printing cottons; but bad management and some unfortunate circumstances prevented his success, and he returned to Munich in 1806, leaving the establishment in other hands. In October 1809, he was appointed Inspector of the Royal lithographic establishment at Munich, and after that time till his death in 1834, he devoted himself to experiments, to instructing numerous pupils, and to writing a history of his invention. In 1819, he published his Elements of Lithography in German. In 1826, he invented a new process for taking impressions on colored sheets, so as to imitate oil painting, which art he called Mosaic Painting. Notwithstanding the difficulties he had to encounter, not the least of which were the opposition, and libels on his invention by persons who supposed their interests would be affected by his success, he completely triumphed, and lived to see his art brought to great perfection, and to be regarded as one of the most useful inventions of modern times, from its facility, cheapness, and general application. See Lithography, page xvii. of this work.

SENEX, JOHN CHRISTIAN, an English engraver, who flourished about 1720. and was employed by the booksellers. He engraved the plates for the London almanacs, from 1717 to 1727.

SENNAMAR, an eminent Arabian architect, mentioned by Milizia, who flourished in the fifth century. His chief works were two wonderful palaces called Sedir and Khaovarnack, concerning which many fabulous stories have been handed down in the Arabian chronicles.

SEPP, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a Dutch naturalist and painter, born at Amsterdam in 1739, and died there in 1811. He painted insects, in water colors, with the greatest accuracy. He published some works on Entomology, in which he was assisted by his son. The principal is "The History of the Insects of Holland," published in five vols. quarto, illustrated with upwards of two hundred and fifty finely colored plates.

SEPPEZZINO, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Genoa in 1530, and died there in 1579. He studied successively under Luca Cambiasi, and Gio. Battista Castelli. None of his works are specified, but he is said to have painted history with reputation.

SEPTIMUS, HERCULES. See SETTI.

SEPULVEDA, MATEO NUNEZ, a Spanish painter, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. In 1640, Philip IV. appointed him painter and gilder of the Royal Navy of Spain, "in consideration of his talents as an artist," says Bermudez, "and for his contribution of 500 ducats towards the expenses of the war in which his majesty was engaged." His patent, among other privileges, gave him the sole right of painting all the banners and standards required in the navy.

SEQUEIRA, DOMINGOS ANTONIO DE, a Portuguese painter, born at Lisbon, according to Count Racinski. about 1760, but Nagler says in 1768. After studying in his native city, he was taken under the protection of the Marquis Marialva, who sent him to Rome to complete his artistic education, where he became the disciple of Antonio Cavallucci. After a residence of several years in Italy, he returned to Lisbon, where he executed several works for the churches and public edifices, and was considerably employed by the nobility. Most of his works are of a sacred character; but he painted some pieces from profane history, and others relating to the family of his patron Marialva. In 1823, he went to Paris to exhibit his picture of the Last Moments of the Poet Camoens, which elicited the applause of Gerard, Vernet, and other French artists. He afterwards went to Rome, where he is said to have continued to paint with all the vigor of his youth. He had a great facility of design, and his drawings in crayons and India ink were much sought after by amateurs. He is said to have succeeded better in oil when he painted figures of a small, rather than those of a full size. It is impossible to form any correct opinion of his style or merits from the accounts given.

SEQUENOT, L., a French engraver, who flourished about 1671. He engraved some frontispieces and other book plates, indifferently executed.

SERAFIN, PEDRO, called El Griego, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Barcelona, and in conjunction with one Pedro Pablo, painted the doors of the organ of the cathedral at Tarragona, for which they received three hundred pounds, Catalonian money. On the inside of the doors they painted the Nativity and the Resurrection; on the outside, the Annunciation, and on one side of the organ, the figures of Faith, Hope, and Charity, and on the other, Sts. Thecla and Catherine. Nothing more is recorded of them.

SERAFINI, SERAFINO DE', an old painter of Modena, by whom there is a picture in the cathedral of that city, representing the Coronation of the Virgin, painted in the style of Giotto, inscribed Serafinus de Serafinis Pinxit 1385, die Jovis 23 Martii.

SERANO, or rather CERANO, IL. See GIO. BATTISTA CRESPI.

SERENARI, ABATE GASPERO, a Sicilian painter, born at Palermo, where he flourished about the middle of the 18th century. He went young to Rome, and studied with the Cav. Sebastiano Conca. Lanzi says he was considered a young man of talents at Rome, and after he left Conca, he painted some frescos in the church of S. Teresa, in competition with the Abate Peroni of Parma. On his return to Palermo, he became a celebrated master; and besides many oil paintings, he executed some vast frescos for the churches, particularly the cupola of the monastery of La Carità. He also instructed several pupils.

SERGELL, JOHANN TOBIAS, an eminent Swedish sculptor, was born at Stockholm in 1740. He was the son of an embroiderer and manufacturer of gold lace. Apprenticed to a stone mason while quite young, he wrought as such in the palace at Stockholm, and attracted the notice of the sculptor Larchevêque, who received him into his studio. He soon manifested unquestionable talents, and after assisting his instructor in modelling the two statues of Gustavus Vasa and Gustavus Adolphus, he obtained a traveling pension in 1767, and visited Rome for improvement. He spent about twelve years in the metropolis of art, and produced many admirable works. After this he visited Paris, and was admitted to the Royal Academy upon presenting the statue of a wounded Greek soldier, termed "Othryades," of half life size, subsequently placed in the Luxembourg. From Paris he proceeded to London, but was directly afterwards summoned to Stockholm by Gustavus III., who appointed him court sculptor. In 1784, he accompanied that monarch on a visit to Rome, and was frequently consulted in reference to the purchase of a number of antiques for the Royal Museum at Stockholm. The talents of Sergell were very highly esteemed, and he received the most flattering offers from Catherine II. of Russia, but being indifferent to riches, and ardently attached to his sovereign and his native land, he declined her invitations. His works are distinguished for energy and vigor, with elegance and grace of design, and perfect freedom from the mannerism and disgusting affectation which distinguish the works of his immediate predecessors and contemporaries. His busts and portrait medallions are highly esteemed for their faithful likenesses and artistic excellence. Among his principal statues are the group of Cupid and Venus; Diomed carrying off the Palladium; Othryades; a Faun; Gustavus III.; Oxenstierna dictating to the Historical Muse the deeds of Gustavus Adolphus; and Mars and Venus. Most of these are in the Royal Museum. One of his finest productions, a composition in alto-relievo for the Adolph-Fredrick church at Stockholm, has never been executed in marble.

The untimely end of his friend and patron, Gustavus Adolphus, affected Sergell with so deep a melancholy, that for a long time he was unable to practice his profession. At length, a few years before his death, he nearly regained his wonted mental composure, but so late in life as to render it impossible to retrieve the time that had been lost to the art. He died at Stockholm in 1814, aged 74. Byström, an eminent Swedish sculptor of the present day, was a pupil of Sergell.

SERI, ROBERT DE. See SEIS.

SERICCUS, PHILIP, a Flemish engraver, according to Huber, who was a cotemporary and disciple of Cornelius Cort, and resided at Rome, about 1568, in which year he engraved in a formal style a set of twenty-eight half-length portraits of the Popes, from the year 204 to 1568. This artist is differently denominated Sericeus, Sericus, Syticus, Sytius, Soius, and Soye; various plates marked with these signatures, are evidently by one hand. Other marks have also been attributed to him, as the letters P. S. interlaced, and P. S. in a circle, with the dates 1535, and 1538; but they appear quite doubtful, and the Biographie Universelle places his birth in the latter year. The following are among his principal prints:

The Angel appearing to Joseph in his Dream; C. Cort, inv. Ph. Soye, fec. St. Francis receiving the Stigmata; F. Zuccaro, pinx. Soye, fec. The Virgin with the infant Christ sleeping; after M. Angelo Buonarrotti. Philippus Sericcus. 1566. The Crucifixion; do. Adam and Eve in Paradise; after P. del Vago, P. Sericus fecit. Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after Giulio Clovio. Phil. de Soye, f. Adoration of the Shepherds; after F. Zuccaro. Ph. Sericus fecit. The Angel appearing to Joseph; do. A Pietà; after Michael Angelo. St. Jerome in a Landscape; after H. Muziano.

SERIN, N., a Dutch historical painter, who flourished at Ghent in the last half of the 17th century. He studied with Erasmus Quellinus, and executed several works for the churches at Ghent. There is also a fine picture attributed to him in the church of S. Martin at Tournay, representing that saint dividing his cloak with a Beggar. Balkema has confounded this artist with his son John S., who he says was a pupil of Quellinus, and he attributes to him all the works executed by his father, which is evidently an error, as John was born in 1678, the year in which Quellinus died.

SERIN, JOHN, was the son of the preceding, born in 1678, and doubtless was instructed by his father. He is said to have excelled in portraits, and in 1748, at the age of seventy, he painted the portrait of Marquis de Fenelon, ambassador at the Hague, and that of the Marchioness. He is also said to have painted several works for the churches, but he is so generally confounded with his father, that it is impossible to distinguish with certainty, their respective performances.

SCRIVANO, PIRRO LUIGI, was a knight of Malta, mentioned by Milizia, who gained considerable distinction by his works in civil and military architecture. His principal work in the latter branch, was the new castle of Aquila, in the Neapolitan state, which he executed at the commission of Charles V., in 1534.

SERLIO, SEBASTIANO, an Italian architect, chiefly celebrated for his writings on the art, was born at Bologna in 1475. According to Vasari, he was a disciple of Baldassare Peruzzi. The study of Vitruvius inspired him with an eager desire to obtain more knowledge of ancient edifices, and he accordingly proceeded to the Venetian states, where he employed himself in examining and measuring the amphitheatre and bridges at Verona. He subsequently erected a theatre at Vicenza, and designed the church of S. Francesco della Vigna at Venice. During his residence in the latter city, he formed the acquaintance of Sanmicheli, Sansovino, and other architects of note, and was also favored with the notice of the Doge Andrea Grilli. Had Serlio remained at Venice, he would undoubtedly have gained plentiful encouragement. He passed over to Pola, and examined its architectural remains. On returning, he studied the antiquities of Ancona, Spoleto, and Rome. While in the latter city, he composed his work entitled "Regole Generali di Architettura di Sebastiano Serlio, sopra le cinque maniere de gli edifici, cioe Toscano, Dorico, Ionico, Corinthio, e Composito, con gli Esempi dell' Antichita che per la maggior parte concordano con la dottrina di Vitruvio." This work evinces great learning and research, and has generally been regarded of great authority. Milizia says "he was devoted to Vitruvius, and showed himself equally well acquainted with theory and practice." Serlio sent a copy of his book to Francis I. of France, who acknowledged the compliment by a present of three hundred gold crowns, and invited the author to visit Paris. He accordingly went thither in 1541 with his family, and was appointed architect at Fontainebleau. He was also commissioned to undertake the court of the Louvre, but generously declined in favor of Lescot, whose design he recommended as superior to his own. At the death of his patron, and the commencement of the civil war, Serlio retired to Lyons, and remained there for some time, in straitened circumstances; but he afterwards returned to Fontainebleau, where he died in 1552.

SERMEI, CAV. CESARE, a painter born at Orvieto in 1516. It is not known under whom he studied, but, according to Orlandi, he married and settled at Assisi. He executed many excellent works both in oil and fresco, for the churches and public edifices at Assisi and Perugia, and at Spello. Lanzi says "he painted in fresco, if not in a grand style, still, with a felicity of design, with spirited and graceful attitudes, and a vigorous pencil. He wrought with great facility, and his oil paintings possess great merit. At Spello I saw a picture by him of the Beatified Andrea Caccioli, and it seemed to me that few other painters of the Roman school had at that time equalled him. His heirs at Assisi possess some pictures by him of the fairs, processions, and ceremonies which occur in that city on the occasion of the Perdoni, and the numbers, variety, and grace, of the small figures, the architecture and the humor displayed, are very captivating." He died at Assisi in 1600, aged 84.

SERMOLEI, or SERMELEI, IL. See BATTISTA FRANCO.

SERMONETA, DA. See SICOLANTE.

SERODINE, GIOVANNI, a painter born at Ascona in Lombardy. According to Baglioni, he was a pupil of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, whose style he followed with considerable success; he enumerates many of his works, executed chiefly for individuals. Lanzi says his pictures are more remarkable for their facility of execution, than their excellence, and that he died young in the pontificate of Urban VIII.

SERRA, CRISTOFORO, a painter born at Cesena, who, according to Malvasia, was a pupil of Guercino, whose style he adopted, and executed some excellent works for the churches in his native city, but wrought mostly for individuals. Lanzi also commends him, and says he was an imitator of Guercino. He was living in 1678.

SERRA, MIGUEL: in French, Michel Serre. This painter was born at Catalonia, in Spain, about 1653. At the age of eight years he left his home, on account of ill treatment, and went to Marseilles. Destitute of resources, he applied to an obscure painter of that city, who relieved his wants, and gave him instructions in the art. Two years after, the precocious young artist started for Rome, and remained in that city several years, studying the works of the best masters. At the age of seventeen, he returned to Marseilles, and soon after painted his picture of the Martyrdom of St. Peter, which gained him great reputation. Commissions flowed upon him in abundance, and he painted many pictures for the churches and private collections. Serra's works are distinguished for great fertility of invention, spirited execution, and such astonishing facility of operation, that he is reported to have painted an altar-piece entire, in a few hours! As might be expected, his works show many marks of neglect. He sent a picture to Paris, which gained him admission to the Academy, and the appointment of painter to the King. In 1721, during the plague at Marseilles, he nobly devoted the whole of a large fortune to relieving the sick; and after the plague ceased, he resumed his pencil, adopting for subjects the mournful scenes he had recently witnessed. His easel pictures are very numerous in private collections; among his other works were several in the Carmelites at Aix, the convent of St. Claire, and the church of the Magdalen at Marseilles. Serra died in 1728.

SERRES, DOMINIC, a marine painter born at Auch, in Gascony. He went to England about 1765, where he acquired considerable reputation for his marines and landscapes. When the Royal Academy was founded in 1768, he was chosen one of the first 40 members, and some years afterwards was appointed marine painter to the King. In 1792 he was appointed Librarian to the Royal Academy. One of his best works is a representation of Lord Howe's victory over the combined fleets of France and Spain, off Gibraltar, in 1782. He was a large contributor to the annual exhibitions of the Royal Academy, and during the first ten years he exhibited about 40 pictures, all of them representations of English naval engagements. Many of his works were engraved by Canot, Mason, Fittler, Vivares, and others, and were very popular in their day. He was compared to Vernet, but Stanley says that his pictures as works of art, possess very little value, but are still looked at with respect for the gallant deeds they commemorate. He died in 1793.

SERVANDONI, CAVALIERE GIOVANNI GIROLAMO, an eminent scene painter and architect, was born at Florence in 1695. He studied painting in the school of Gio. Paolo Pannini, where he became expert in landscape and architectural scenery, and painted a number of pictures in the style of his instructor, which are preserved in various collections. He afterwards acquired a knowledge of architecture under De Rossi. After painting a number of admirable scenes at Lisbon, for which he was honored with the order di Cristo, he visited Paris in 1724, and was extensively employed. He greatly improved the former mode of scene painting, and also produced an entirely new system of it, aiding and heightening the effect by machinery and every possible artifice. His scene exhibitions were received by the public with the greatest enthusiasm, and they were highly praised by men of genius and taste, well capable of appreciating the artist's poetical invention and profound classical study. Even in the most magnificent architectural fancies, Servandoni, unlike many others, never outraged probability by exhibiting mere gorgeous chimeras. Among his most celebrated scenes were the representation of the fable of Pandora (at the Tuileries in 1738), and the Descent of Æneas into the Infernal Regions. His talents were greatly in request at all public festivities, especially those held at Stuttgart, and the festivals held at Paris, in 1739, in honor of the marriage of Philip V. of Spain with the princess Elizabeth. There are a number of paintings by him, representing architecture, ruins, &c., preserved in French and English collections, among which is a picture of ancient ruins in the Louvre, painted in the style of Gio. Paolo Pannini. As an architect, Servandoni was also distinguished, and his fame would have been much greater than it now is, had he been allowed to realize various magnificent projects, such as an extensive amphitheatre, of which the arcades and galleries alone were to contain 25,000 persons. His most important work is the façade of S. Sulpice, commenced about 1732, and greatly superior to the taste of the times. Unlike the frittered and unmeaning decorations of that age, the façade of S. Sulpice is distinguished for a considerable degree of simplicity and harmony. The arrangement of the loggia formed by the Doric order below, where the columns are coupled one behind the other, has a good effect, but the second order appears more solid and heavier, in consequence of the intercolumniations being filled in with arcades and piers. Among his other works, praised by Milizia, are the gate of the Maison de l'Enfant Jesu; the magnificent staircase of the Hotel du Cardinal Auvergne; the round isolated chapel of M. de Live; and the Rotunda, in the form of an ancient temple, with twelve Corinthian columns, for the Mareschal de Richelieu. He made a number of designs for important edifices at Brussels; also several for the court of Portugal; and some in England, for the Prince of Wales, the father of George III. Servandoni died at Paris in 1766.

SERVI, CONSTANTINO DE', an Italian painter, gem-engraver, architect, and engineer, was born at Florence in 1554. According to the supposition of Baldinucci, he studied under Santo di Titi; and Lanzi says he excelled especially in portraits. He visited nearly every European court, and practiced the art with plentiful encouragement. In his earlier productions, he followed the style of Titi, but upon seeing the works of Pourbus, during his sojourn in Germany, he adopted the style of that master. At the request of the Prince of Wales, he visited England, and was appointed to superintend the erection of a number of bridges and machines, with a salary of 800 crowns. In 1609 he was invited by the Grand Sophy of Persia to visit that country, and he remained there about a year; but it is not known on what he was employed. On returning to Florence, he was appointed, according to Milizia, superintendent of all the commercial companies, the works at the chapel of St. Lorenzo, and the Florentine gallery, and also of the great mosaic manufactory, established by the Grand Duke Francesco I. Lanzi says he contributed to the improvement of this curious art. At the invitation of the States General, Servi visited Holland, and was commissioned to erect a palace at the Hague for Prince Maurice of Nassau, who favored him with many marks of esteem. This versatile artist finally returned to Tuscany, and was appointed by the Grand Duke to the vicarship of Lusignano. He died in 1622.

SERWOUTER, PETER VAN, a Flemish engraver, who flourished at Antwerp, according to the dates on his prints, from 1608 to 1628. There are also a number of prints attributed to him by several writers, marked with a monogram, composed of a P. and an S., with a W., as above, which, from its being similar to the mark used by a supposed artist, called Perjecouter, Persecouter, or Persecuteur, has led to his being confounded with that artist, who, from the dates on his prints, flourished seventy or eighty years before the time of Serwouter. The prints marked with the above monogram, among which are a set of twelve Huntings after Vinckenbooms, were evidently executed by a Dutch or Flemish engraver. Nagler gives a list of Serwouter's prints, most of which are marked with his name in full, and only one with a monogram composed of his initials, P. V. S. He does not mention the P. S. monogram, nor the W., as being marks found on any of his prints. He is also called Serwouter, Servatius, and Raeven, from the same confusion of marks. The prints in question are of little consequence.

SESSONE, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Naples in the latter part of the 18th century. He engraved part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples.

SESTO, CESARE DA, called also CESARE MILANESE. There is a singular paucity of information respecting this eminent artist. He is generally regarded as the most distinguished disciple of Leonardo da Vinci. The time of his birth and death are not exactly known; some say that he was born at Milan about 1480, and died in 1524. Others that he flourished about 1500, and Zani, that he operated in 1524. It is known that he went to Rome, where he improved himself by the study of the antique, and an intimacy with Raffaele, and that he was there employed by the Pope and some of the principal nobility. The following admirable account from Lanzi, embraces all that is known of him or his works. In his account of Vinci and his followers he says: "One who approached nearest to Vinci's style at a certain period, was Cesare da Sesto; though not recorded by Vasari or Lomazzo in the list of his disciples, still, he is admitted by more modern writers. In the Ambrosian collection at Milan, is the head of an old man, so extremely clear and studied, in the Vinci manner, by this artist, as to surprise the beholder. In some of his other works, he followed Raffaello, whom he knew in Rome; and it is reported that this prince of painters, one day said to him, 'It seems to me strange, that being bound in such strict ties of friendship as we two are, we do not in the least respect each other with our pencils,' as if they had been rivals on a sort of equality. He was intimate too, with Baldassare Peruzzi, and was employed with him in the Castle of Ostia. In this work, which was one of the earliest efforts of Peruzzi, Vasari seems inclined to yield the palm of excellence to da Sesto. He was esteemed Vinci's best pupil; and he is more than once held up by Lomazzo as a model in design, in attitude, and more particularly in the art of using his lights. He cites an Herodias by him, of which I have seen a copy in the possession of the Consiglier Pagave, in which the countenance bore an extreme resemblance to the Fornarina of Raffaello. The original, formerly in the gallery of the Archiepiscopal palace, was in the first occupation of the French adjudged to Madame la Pagerie, wife of the then General Bonaparte, and passed into France. The Cav. D. Girolamo Melzi, has likewise one of his Holy Families, in the manner of Raffaello, which he obtained a few years since for the enormous sum of 600 sequins, as well as that celebrated altar-piece painted for the church of S. Rocco. It is divided into compartments; in the middle of it is seen the titular saint, and the Holy Virgin with the Infant, imitated from a figure by Raffaello, which is at Foligno; he likewise borrowed the figures of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, seated on a cloud, from the Dispute of the Sacraments. These decorate the upper part of the picture, the lower being occupied by two half naked figures of Sts. Cristoforo and Sebastiano, both appropriately executed, and the latter exhibiting a new and beautiful foreshortening. They are on a larger scale than the figures of Poussin, and with such a resemblance to those of Correggio, that in the opinion of the Abbe Bianconi, they might easily have been attributed to that master, were it not for the superscription of the artist, such is the softness, union, and brightness of the flesh, such their beauty of coloring, and the harmony pervading the whole painting. It used to be closed with two doors, on which, with a certain correspondence of subjects, were painted the two princes of the Apostles, with St. Martin and St. George on horseback; all of which display the same maxims, though not the same diligence in the art. Hence we may infer that this artist did not, like Vinci, aspire at producing master-pieces as an invariable rule, but was content, like Luini, with occasional efforts of the kind. I ought not to separate the name of this noble figurist from that of Bernazzano, the landscape painter, as they were united no less in interest than in friendship. It is uncertain whether he was instructed by Vinci; he doubtless availed himself of his models, and in painting rural landscapes, fruit, flowers, and birds, he succeeded so admirably as to produce the same wonderful effects as are told of Zeuxis and Apelles in Greece. This indeed Italian artists have frequently renewed, though with a less degree of applause. Having represented a strawberry bed in a courtyard, the pea-fowls were so deceived by the resemblance, that they pecked at the wall till the painting was destroyed. He painted the landscape part of a picture of the Baptism of Christ, and on the ground he drew some birds in the act of feeding. On its being placed in the open air, the birds were seen to fly towards the picture, as if to join their companions. This beautiful painting is still one of the chief ornaments in the gallery of the distinguished family of the Trotti at Milan. As Bernazzano had the sense to perceive his own deficiency in figures, he cultivated an intimacy with Cesare, who added to his landscapes fables and histories, sometimes with a degree of license that is reprobated by Lomazzo. These paintings are held in the highest esteem, where the figure-painter made a point of displaying his powers."

At the church of Saronò, situated between Pavia and Milan, are to be seen the figures of four saints, painted in fresco, on four narrow pilasters; the two equestrian saints on the doors of the altar-piece above mentioned, are saints Sebastian and Rocco, to whom especial invocations are made against the plague. They are signed Cesare Magnus f., 1533. These pieces are generally assigned to Cesare da Sesto, and many infer from the inscription, that he belonged to the family of the Magni, but this is doubted by others, as his works do not sustain his high reputation, though excellent in their way. Lanzi finds much conformity of ideas in the frescos and the altar-pieces, which, together with other probable circumstances, induces him to believe Cesare da Sesto and Cesare Magni, to be the same artist.

SESTRI, ANTONIO DA. See TRAVI.

SETLEZKY, BALTHAZAR SIGISMUND, a German engraver of Polish origin, born at Augsburg in 1695, and died there in 1770. He engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects, after Watteau, J. M. Roos, H. Roos, and others, executed in a stiff and formal style.

SETTI, ERCOLE, an Italian painter and engraver, of whom there are notices from about 1560 to 1593. Lanzi says that he was an excellent engraver, and a painter of considerable merit. "There are a few of his altar-pieces at Modena, and I have seen some little pieces painted for the galleries, dignified, rather than beautiful, in point of design. He is cautious and studied in the naked parts, nearly equal to the style of the Florentines, spirited in his attitudes, and strong in his coloring. We find his name subscribed Ercole de' Setti, and also in Latin, Hercules Septimus." He is said to have etched several historical subjects, and some architectural ornaments, which he usually marked with the initials H. S. and the date.

SETTIGNANO, DESIRO DE, an Italian sculptor, born at Florence in 1457. His instructor is not mentioned, but after acquiring a knowledge of the art, he gained great improvement by studying the works of Donatello. The figure of an infant, in relief, executed by him for the chapel of S. Sacramento, in the church of S. Lorenzo, gained him great reputation, and he was commissioned to execute a number of works, among which was the statue of the Beatified Villana, surrounded with graceful figures of angels, in the church of S. Maria Novella at Florence. His works are distinguished for graceful simplicity, animated expression, and beautiful finishing. Among his other productions, are the mausoleum of Carlo Marsupini d'Arezzo, in the church of S. Croce; the Arms of Florence, sculptured on the façade of the Palazzo Gianfigliuzzi; and the bust of Marcotta Strozzi. During the short career of Settignano, he continued to make good progress, and would probably have attained great eminence, had he not died at the age of twenty-eight, in 1485.

SEUPEL, J. A., a German engraver, born at Strasburg in 1660, and died there in 1714. He engraved a number of portraits, some of them from his own designs from life, executed with the graver in a neat but formal style. He is said also to have engraved seven plates with the burin, so as to produce an effect similar to mezzotint.

SEUTER. See SAITER.

SEVE, GILBERT DE, a French painter, born at Moulins in 1615, and died at Paris in 1698. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted history, allegory, and portraits, with considerable ability. There are several of his works in the galleries at Versailles and Fontainebleau. Some of his portraits of distinguished personages were engraved by Edelinck, van Schuppen, Masson, and other eminent engravers.

SEVE, PIERRE DE, was the brother of the preceding, born at Moulins in 1623, and died at Paris in 1695. He was instructed in the art by Gilbert, and painted similar subjects. Edelinck engraved a Holy Family by him, and other subjects were engraved by Simmoneau, Landry, Gantrel and Dolival.

SEVERUS. See CELER.

SEVILLA, ROMERO Y ESCALANTE, JUAN DE, a distinguished Spanish painter, was born at Seville, according to the Biographie Universelle, in 1627. He acquired the elements of design from Andres Alonso Arguello of Granada, and subsequently entered the school of Pedro de Moya. Through the excellent advice and instruction of the latter, Sevilla acquired a taste for the works of Vandyck, and gained great improvement by studying them, as well as by copying the drawings of Rubens. He received numerous commissions for the churches and private collections, and executed many admired works, distinguished for lively and rapid conception, coloring in the style of Rubens, free and vigorous penciling, and great facility of execution. Among his principal productions was a large picture of the Last Supper, in the refectory of the Jesuits, several others in the Carmelite and Augustine churches, and the convent of St. Geronimo at Granada. Notwithstanding the excellent system of coloring adopted by Sevilla from the Flemish school, he instructed no pupils. He died at Granada in 1695.

SEVIN, PIERRE, a French painter and engraver, who flourished at Lyons about 1689. Little is known of him. Some of his works were engraved by Cossin, Gantrel, and le Moine; the last engraved his portrait of Madame la Valliere, which shows that he was an artist of some distinction. He also engraved some plates from his own designs for the booksellers.

SEYDELMANN, JACOB CRESCENTIUS, a German artist, celebrated throughout Europe for his admirable drawings in Sepia (India ink, from sepia, the cuttle-fish), was born at Dresden in 1750. After studying with Bernardo Bellotti and Casanova in his native city, he went under the patronage of the Elector to Rome, where he formed a friendship with Antonio Raffaele Mengs, who directed his attention to the most renowned works of ancient and modern masters, which he copied in sepia in a style entirely his own, possessing so much novelty and beauty of execution that they readily sold at high prices. Many were purchased by English visitors, and some by Baron von Riesch, and other noblemen of his country. He also drew the portraits of several persons of distinction in the same manner. On his return to his native country he was received with distinction, and appointed Professor of Drawing in the Academy of Dresden. The Academy at Berlin sent him a diploma, and he was elected a member of several foreign academies. In 1788, he commenced copying the principal pictures in the Dresden Gallery for the Duke of Gotha, among which were the celebrated Notte, by Correggio, and the Madonna di San Sisto by Raffaele; also the Venus by Titian, for the Winkler Cabinet. Soon afterwards, he again went to Rome, where he copied some of the works of the great masters, particularly of Raffaele, of the same size as the originals. From Rome he proceeded to Naples for the same purpose. In 1792, he returned to Dresden, and was employed by the Countess Radezivil to copy some of the finest pictures in the Dresden Gallery to embellish the chapel of her country seat. In 1794 he made a third trip to Rome, and executed two large drawings after Raffaele. After an absence of eight months he returned to superintend the continuation of the work called the Dresden Gallery, for which he made many of the drawings for the engravers. In 1804 he went to Rome for the fourth time, to execute a commission for Count Marcolini. On his return, he was commissioned by the Emperor Alexander to make copies of the Notte and St. George of Correggio, the Madonna di San Sisto by Raffaele, and several others, of the same size as the originals, for which he was munificently rewarded. For the copy after Raffaele he received 1000 ducats. He was afterwards invited to St. Petersburg to retouch the pictures which had received some injury in their transit; at the same time he received a commission from the Emperor to make two other drawings after the Magdalene of Correggio and the Venus of Titian, in the Dresden Gallery. Besides the copies enumerated after the great Italian masters, he made many others after the Dutch and Flemish masters, particularly after Chevalier Vander Werf, in which he imitated the polished manner of that painter to perfection. His high reputation continued till his death in 1829. There is an etching by him of a Figure bathing in a Cavern, after J. F. Bloemen. E. G. Krüger engraved an allegorical piece representing the Genius of Truth, and twelve plates of antique heads, after his designs; also several of his portraits were engraved by other artists.

SEYDELMANN, APOLLONIA, of the family of de Forgue, was the wife of the preceding, born at Venice in 1767. She was instructed by her husband, and not only assisted him in his works, but acquired distinction for her own copies in sepia after the most distinguished Italian masters. She also excelled in miniature painting. In 1789 she accompanied her husband to Italy, and assisted him in forwarding his larger pieces—a practice which she continued with so much ability that no difference is discernible. She made an admirable copy of Raffaele's Fornarina, in the Borghese palace at Rome, executed entirely by herself in 1823, and many smaller pieces, which she marked with her name. She was elected a member of the Academy at Dresden.

SEYMOUR, JAMES, an English painter of animals, born at London in 1702, and died in 1752. He excelled in painting horses, in which he was thought superior to Wootton.

SEYNES, ALPHONSE DE, a French architect and designer, who flourished at Nismes during the present century. He was chiefly distinguished for his researches among the antiquities of that city, and published a work relating to them, entitled Monuments Romains de Nimes, dessinés d'après nature et lithographies, Paris, 1818. De Seynes died at Nismes in 1844.

SEZENIUS, VALENTINE, a German engraver, who flourished about 1620. He engraved some plates of ornaments and grotesque subjects, which he usually marked with his initials V. S., and the date.

SQUAZZELLA, LO, ANDREA, a native of Città di Castello, who flourished about 1550. He studied with Andrea del Sarto, in company with a painter named Nannoccio, whose manner they followed. Vasari makes honorable mention of them, and says they went to France, where they resided a long time. Lanzi attributes to them some of the fine copies of the works of del Sarto, which often pass for originals at Florence. After mentioning the names of Domenico Puligo, Domenico Conti, Jacopo di Sandro, and Squazzella, as followers of del Sarto, he says, "the fine copies that so often pass for originals by Andrea del Sarto in Florence and other places, are chiefly the work of the above-named artists; it does not seem hardly credible that Andrea copied so closely his own inventions, and reduced them from the great to smaller dimensions. I have seen one of his Holy Families, in which St. Elizabeth appears, in ten or twelve collections, and in other pictures in private houses. I found the St. Lorenzo surrounded by other Saints, at the Pitti palace, in the Albani Gallery; the Visitation, in the Giustiniani palace; the Birth of our Lady in the convent of the Servi, in the possession of Sig. Pirri at Rome. All these are beautiful pictures, painted on small panels, all of the old school, and all believed to be the work of Andrea. It seems not improbable that the best of these were painted in his own studio, and retouched by him, a practice adopted by Titian, and even by Raffaele."

SHARP, WILLIAM, one of the most celebrated English line engravers, was born at London in 1749. His father was a gun-maker, and apprenticed him to a bright engraver (ornamental plate engraver), named Barak Longmate, who was also skilled in heraldry. His first essays, when an apprentice, were the embellishment of pewter pots; his flatterers qualify this assertion by substituting silver tankards, but Sharp always insisted on the veracity of this humble employment. After the expiration of the term of his apprenticeship, he commenced business for himself as a writing engraver, but he soon aspired to higher things. One of his first attempts in a superior branch of the art, was to make a drawing of the old lion Hector, who had been an inmate of the tower of London for thirty years, which he engraved on a small quarto plate, and exposed the prints in his shop-window for sale. He studied with great assiduity, and made such rapid progress that he was employed to engrave several plates from Stothard's designs for the "Novelist's Magazine," published by Harrison, a work on which Heath, Collyer, Angus, and other eminent artists were employed. By this means, his merits as an engraver were widely diffused; he soon distinguished himself among his cotemporaries, and was employed on works of art of the highest order, in the execution of which he proved himself a worthy successor of Woollett. As proofs of his extraordinary abilities, it is only necessary to adduce his prints of the Doctors of the Church, after Guido, in which he blended all the freedom of Giacomo Frey with the careful practice of Raphael Morghen; the Portrait of John Hunter, after Reynolds, in which is shown his just discrimination and skill in the quality and texture of the draperies and objects; and Lear in the Storm, after West, which last is considered his master-piece, and has been held up as a model for line engravers; proof impressions of this plate have been sold for fifteen and twenty guineas each. His style is always masterly, not servilely borrowed from any of his predecessors or cotemporaries, but formed by a judicious selection of the merits of all who excelled, improved by an attentive study of nature. He gave to his plates all the expression, fire, and energy of his originals. The half-tints and shadows of his best works are peculiarly rich, and his lines combine with the utmost freedom, a regularity and accuracy seldom attained. He was particularly distinguished for his power of imitating the various textures of the draperies. He conferred great honor on the fine arts in his country, yet he was not admitted a member of the Royal Academy. He was proposed by Sir Joshua Reynolds as an Associate, but it is related that he rejected the offer with disdain, warmly espousing the cause of those distinguished engravers of his country who considered themselves and their art slighted in not being allowed to become Royal Academicians; yet the Imperial Academy of Vienna, and the Royal Academy of Munich, deemed him worthy of being ranked among their honorary members, and he was elected by both. There are many amusing anecdotes told of this artist. Being suspected of revolutionary principles, he was examined before the privy council. At one of these meetings, being annoyed by questions which he considered irrelevant, he deliberately pulled out of his pocket a prospectus for publishing the portrait of Kosciusko, after West, which he was engraving, and with great gravity handed it to Pitt and Dundas, requesting them to have the goodness to put their names to it as subscribers, and then to give it to the other members of the council to add theirs. The singularity of the proposal, under the circumstances, set them all to laughing, and relieved him from an unpleasant, and at that time dangerous, predicament. With all his genius, Sharp had an erratic mind. He was a firm believer in the reveries of Emanuel Swedenborg, the divine mission of the madman Richard Brothers, and the immaculate conception of Johanna Southcote. Sharp engraved the portrait of Brothers, and Smith, in his life of Nollekens, relates a ludicrous mistake which occurred in the inscription. Sharp had written below, as now appears on the prints, "Fully believing this to be the man appointed by God, I engrave his likeness. W. Sharp." The writing engraver, Smith says, put the comma after the word "appointed," and omitted it in the subsequent part of the sentence. The mistake was not discovered till several impressions had been taken, when it was rectified; but the unrectified impressions are in the greatest request. There is a complete collection of the prints of this eminent engraver, in every state of progress, in the British Museum. He died at Chiswick in 1824, and was buried in the same churchyard as Hogarth and De Louthembourg. The following is a list of his principal plates:

The Doctors of the Church; after Guido. Ecce Homo; do. Portrait of John Hunter, two plates, one large and one small; after Sir Joshua Reynolds. The Holy Family, two plates, one large and one small; do. The Witch of Endor; after B. West. Alfred dividing his Loaf with a Beggar; do. Lear in the Storm; do. The Children in the Wood; after Benwell. St. Cecilia; after Domenichino. The Siege of, and Sortie from, Gibraltar; after Trumbull. Some plates in Cook's Voyages; after Webber. Portrait of Thomas Paine; after Romney. The Portrait of Mr. Boulton. Sir Frances Burdett; after Northcote. Sir William Curtis; after Lawrence. Charles I., three faces; after Vandyck. The Earl of Arran; do. Boadicea haranguing the Britons; after Stothard. The three Marys and dead Christ; after Ann. Caracci, from the picture at Castle Howard, but left unfinished.

SHAW, JAMES, an English painter, born at Wolverhampton. He went to London, and studied with Edward Penny. He painted portraits with considerable reputation till his death, in 1784. There was another artist of this name, who exhibited at the Royal Academy at its first establishment, as a painter of horses. He died in 1772.

SHAW, JOSHUA, an English landscape painter of little note, born at Bellingborough in Lincolnshire, in 1776. He was a self-taught artist, and went to London for improvement, but not meeting with any encouragement, he painted for the dealers, and is said to have copied for them some pictures by Berghem, Both, and Cuyp. He afterwards emigrated to America.

SHEE, SIR MARTIN ARCHER, an eminent English portrait painter, born at Dublin in 1770. He was placed early in life in the Academy of West, in that city, where he soon distinguished himself. He drew several chief medals for drawings of the figure, landscapes, and flowers; and was honored by the Dublin Society with a silver palette. At the early age of sixteen, he lost his father, and being obliged to provide for his own support, he established himself as a portrait painter at Dublin, where he gained reputation and encouragement. Two years after, he removed to London, where he made the acquaintance of Reynolds and Burke, and was admitted as a student of the Royal Academy. In 1798, he was elected an associate, and in 1800 an academician. He soon attained high distinction, and gained great encouragement. In 1830, at the death of Lawrence, he was elected president of the Royal Academy, on which occasion he received the customary honor of knighthood. Devoting his energies from the first to the practice of portrait painting, under the auspices of Reynolds, he never, during the long period of his career, deviated from the path which he had marked out; hence he acquired a position beyond any of his cotemporaries, except Lawrence; nor was he far behind his predecessor in the presidential chair in attracting the nobility and other distinguished characters to his studio, the ladies only excepted, for whom Lawrence's graceful pencil possessed a charm with which no other painter could vie with the least chance of success. A list of the great names who sat to Sir Martin would fill several columns of this work. He never attempted any works of an ideal or fanciful nature, unless a few portraits of celebrated actors and actresses, in their favorite characters, may come under this denomination. His first picture was exhibited in 1789; his last in 1845; and for half a century, he enjoyed a large share of public patronage. He died in 1850.

SHEPHERD, ROBERT, an English engraver, who flourished about 1660. He engraved some portraits, and copied on a smaller scale the Battles of Alexander by Gerard Audran, after le Brun. His prints are indifferently executed.

SHERLOCK, an English engraver of little note, who flourished about 1760. He engraved some portraits and landscapes.

SHENTON, HENRY CHAWNER, an English sculptor, born in 1825. He early manifested an inclination for art, and was placed under the tuition of Mr. Behnes, with whom he made rapid progress. In 1843, at the age of eighteen, he was admitted as a student of the Royal Academy; and he exhibited in the same year a group of "Christ and Mary"; and the next year, in Westminster Hall, a group entitled the Burial of the Princes in the Tower of London, which possesses considerable merit. In 1845 he exhibited two works, "Archbishop Cranmer," and "The Penitent." He afterwards commenced a fine group of the Crucifixion, but its completion was interrupted by the death of the artist, in 1846.

SHERWIN, JOHN KEYES, an eminent English engraver, born in Essex or Sussex, where his father carried on the business of a cutter of wood pins or bolts, for shipping, which business young Sherwin followed till he was about seventeen years of age, when by accident variously stated, he showed a talent for drawing that excited interest in his favor, and he was sent to London to study with Bartolozzi. Under this eminent master he made rapid progress in drawing and engraving, and in 1772 gained the gold medal at the Royal Academy, for a drawing of Coriolanus taking leave of his family. From that time to 1780, he exhibited at the annual exhibitions of the same institution a number of chalk drawings, some of them copies, others originals, which attracted considerable attention, particularly one called the "Joys of Life," executed in red and black chalk, with a mixture of color, in the manner of Bartolozzi.— This composition consisted of a beautiful female, and a figure of Bacchus surrounded by Cupids strewing flowers. In his larger works, his style of engraving has a greater resemblance to that of Woollett, than of Bartolozzi. One of his best works, and supposed to be his last, was a print from his own design, called the Finding of Moses, in which he introduced the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire as the Daughter of Pharaoh, and several ladies of rank as her attendants. Stanley says this print would have made his fortune had he been prudent, but unfortunately he contracted bad habits, plunged himself into debt, and in order to escape the importunities of his creditors and arrest, he was obliged to secrete himself, and finally died in a small ale-house, called "The Hog in the Pound," in 1790. The following is a list of his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

William Pitt, Earl of Chatham. George Nugent Grenville Temple, Marquis of Buckingham; after Gainsborough. Dr. Louth, Bishop of London; after Pine. Captain James Cook; after Dance. Sir Joshua Reynolds; after a picture by himself. William Woollett, Engraver to the King. Mrs. Siddons, in the character of the Grecian Daughter.

VARIOUS SUBJECTS.

The Holy Family; after N. Poussin. Christ bearing his Cross; after the picture in the chapel of the Magdalene College, Oxford. Christ appearing to Magdalene; at All Souls' College, Oxford. The Holy Family; after N. Beretoni. The Fortune Teller; after Reynolds. The Death of Lord Robert Manners; after Stothard.

SHERWIN, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished from about 1669 to 1711. It is not known by whom he was instructed. He is said to have been a royal engraver by patent, the only English artist known to have received that honor, a distinction to which his merits did not entitle him. He engraved some portraits in a stiff, formal style; also some frontispieces and other book plates, among which are most of the plates for a work entitled God's Revenge against Murder, published in 1669. He also scraped a few mezzotintos. The following are his best prints:

Charles I. on horseback, with a view of Richmond. Oliver Cromwell. Charles II.; three plates, one a whole length; prefixed to Ashmole's Order of the Garter. Catherine, his Queen. Christopher, Duke of Albemarle. William III. when Prince of Orange. Henry, Duke of Norfolk. George I. when Elector of Hanover. Richard At-kyns, Typograph. Reg.; scarce. Slingsby Bethell, Sheriff of London; scarce. Henry Scudder, B. D. Presbyt. William Ramesay, M. D. William Bridge, A. M. Presbyt. William Sermon, M. D.; inscribed, W. Sherwin, ad vivum, del. et sculp. 1671. John Gadbury, Astrologer. Judge Powell. 1711.

SHIPLEY, WILLIAM, an English artist, born at London in 1714. He was a drawing master, and kept a school for teaching drawing many years in London. He chiefly deserves notice for his public spirit. He was the founder of the "Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce," an institution that has proved highly beneficial to his country. In 1758, he received a gold medal as a token of acknowledgment for his exertions. He afterwards settled at Maidstone, where he died in 1804, at the great age of ninety. He was a brother of Dr. Jonathan Shipley, bishop of St. Asaph.

SIBELIUS, G., a Dutch engraver, who went to London about 1775, where he was chiefly employed by Sir Joseph Banks in engraving plates for his great botanical work. He also executed a few portraits.

SIBMACHER, JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg from about 1596 to 1611. He engraved, among other plates, a part of the antique statues for Boissard's collection. They are executed in an indifferent style.

SICHEM, CHRISTOPHER and CHARLES VAN, two Dutch engravers, who flourished at Amsterdam in the first part of the 17th century. They engraved both on wood and copper, and, though their works are exceedingly numerous, there is such a perfect chaos of confusion among writers that it is impossible to distinguish their respective works. According to Baron Heineken, there were three Sichems, Christopher, Cornelius, and Charles. To Cornelius, he attributes about six hundred prints from the Old and New Testaments, marked with a monogram of C. V. S. and K. V. S., though he admits that it is impossible to separate the prints of Cornelius and Charles, from the similarity of monograms and style; but other writers suppose there were only two, Christopher and Charles. The prints in question are usually marked with one of the preceding monograms, composed of the initials C. V. S. and K. V. S., sometimes with ichem below, which has led several writers to confuse the Sichems with a supposed engraver of the name of Vichem; the V. in the monogram being the largest, they have erroneously concluded that it was the principal letter. The truth doubtless is, that there were but two Sichems, Christopher and Charles, as there are some prints signed C., Ch., or Christ. van Sichem, and none with the name of Corn. or Cornelius; K., also, is frequently used by the Dutch writers for Karolus or Karl, but never for Christopher or Cornelius; and doubtless those prints marked with the monogram composed of C. V. S. were executed by Christopher, and those with K. V. S. by Karl or Charles. According to Malpe, Christopher was born about 1580, and his prints are dated from 1601 to 1637, and there are prints marked K. V. S. from about 1600 to 1629. Many of them are from their own designs, and the others after various masters. Their wooden cuts are the best, and are executed with great vigor and spirit.

SICIANTE, GIROLAMO, a painter born at Sermoneta in 1504; hence he is generally called Girolamo da Sermoneta, though sometimes Girolamo Siciolante da or di Sermoneta, and Girolamo di Sermoneta. He was one of the ablest disciples of Pierino del Vaga, whom he assisted in his works at the Castle of St. Angelo. As there is some discrepancy as to his style and merits, we prefer to give Lanzi's account. After stating that he was a pupil of del Vaga, whom he assisted in his works, and that he was one of the successors of Raffaello employed to complete the works in the Sala Regia, he says, "Girolamo Siciolante da Sermoneta, who adopted Raffaello's style, may be enumerated among the scholars of that great man, from his felicitous imitation of their common master. In the Sala Regia, in the Vatican, he painted Pepin, King of France, bestowing Ravenna on the church, after having made Astolfo, King of the Lombards, his prisoner. But he approaches Raffaello in some of his oil paintings, as in the Martyrdom of St. Lucia, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore; in the Transfiguration in the Ara Coeli, and in the Nativity in the church della Pace, which last he repeated in the most graceful style in the church of Osimo. His master-piece is at Ancona, on the great altar in the church of S. Bartolomeo, a vast composition, original and rich in invention, and commensurate with the grandeur of the subject, and the multitude of saints introduced into it. The throne of the Virgin is seen above, amidst a brilliant choir of angels, and on either side, a virgin saint in the attitude of adoration. To this height, there is a beautiful ascent on each side; and the picture is thus divided into a higher and a lower part; in the latter of which is the titular saint, a half naked figure vigorously colored, together with Saint Paul and two other saints; the whole designed and executed in a truly Raffaellesque style. This altar-piece possesses so much harmony, and such a force of color, that it is esteemed by some, the best picture in the city. If anything is wanting in it, it is perhaps a more correct observance of the perspective." Siciolante also excelled in portraits. His easel pictures painted for the private collections are extremely rare. There is much discrepancy as to the time of his death, but the best authorities place it in or about 1580. Baglioni says that he died in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., who ascended the papal chair in 1572, and it is stated by every author, that he was employed by that pontiff. Lanzi says he was living in 1572, as appears from an inscription on a monument he erected to his son. It is therefore evident that those who place his death in 1550, are greatly in error. It seems probable also that there is an error as to the time of his birth, as it is agreed that he was a pupil of Vaga, who was born in 1500, only four years previously.

SIEGEN, LIEUT.-COLONEL VON, was born in Holland, of a noble family, according to Laborde in 1609. He went to Germany in 1620, where he received his education. He returned to Holland in 1626, and remained there till 1637, when he entered the service of the Landgrave of Hesse and attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. His name was Louis von Siegen, or de Siegen, and it is now generally admitted that he was the inventor of the art of engraving in mezzotinto. It was for a long time attributed to Prince Rupert, till the Baron Heineken proved that he learned the art of Siegen, while in the service of the Landgrave of Hesse, which he afterwards introduced into England. Siegen produced his first print, a bust portrait of Amelia Elizabeth, Landgrave of Hesse, in 1643. Many interesting particulars of this amateur artist may be found in Laborde's "L'Histoire de la gravure en manière noire." He gives a descriptive account of seven prints by him, as follows: 1. Bust portrait of Amelia Elizabeth; 2. Eleonora Gonzago, wife of the Emperor Ferdinand III., called by others the Queen of Bohemia; 3. Portrait of the Prince of Orange, after Honthorst; 4. Portrait of the Princess of Orange, do; 5. The Emperor Ferdinand III. in an oval; 6. St. Bruno, a full length figure kneeling; 7. The Holy Family, after Ann. Caracci. They are marked L. à S., or L. à Siegen inv. et fec. Laborde, in his account of John George Seiller, who flourished about 1600, says he engraved in mezzotinto, and commends several of his prints; if this is true, Siegen's claim to the invention falls to the ground, as well as that of Prince Rupert. There is a fine collection of the works of Siegen, Prince Rupert, and other early engravers in mezzotinto, in the British Museum. Siegen died in the service of the Duke of Wolfenbuttel, about 1680. See Rupert and Seiller.

SIENA, AGNOLO, or ANGELO and AGOSTINO DA. See ANGELO.

SIENA, ANSANO, or SANO, DA, a painter of Siena, of whom there are notices from 1422 to 1462. According to Della Valle, when Pope Pius II. erected the cathedral in Pienza (the new name of his native place, Corsignano), in 1462, he invited the best artists of Siena there to decorate it, among whom were Ansano and his son Matteo. Lanzi says their style was laborious and minute, the universal character of that age.

SIENA, BALDASSARE DA. See PERUZZI.

SIENA, DUCCIO DA, called also DUCCIO, or GUIDUCCIO DI BONINSEGNA, or BUONINSEGNA. See DUCCIO.

SIENA, FRANCESCO, called by Vasari FRANCESCO SIENESE, a painter of Siena, who flourished about 1530. He studied under Baldassare Peruzzi, and is commended by Vasari for his frescos in the grotesque style of Peruzzi, most of which have perished, though there are some grotesque subjects in Siena attributed to him.

SIENA, BERNA, or BERNARDO DA, an old Italian painter, who flourished at Siena about 1370. According to Vasari, "he was the first who painted animals correctly;" and he also attained uncommon excellence in the human figure, particularly in expression. Lanzi mentions a fresco painting by him, in the parish church at Arezzo, as deserving more praise for the execution of the extremities, in which he surpassed his contemporaries, than for the drapery or coloring. He attained such reputation that he was invited to Florence, and commissioned to execute several paintings in the chapel of S. Niccolo, in the church of S. Spirito, which was afterwards destroyed by fire. The Canons of Siena possessed a collection of small pictures by this artist, which were better colored than his frescos. He also painted at Venice and Cortona, and finally died at San Gimignano, in 1380, after making considerable progress in a copious work, illustrative of sacred subjects, still remaining in the parish church. It was continued by his scholar Giovanni d'Asciano, with a superior coloring, but less pure design.

SIENA, FRANCESCO ANTONIO DA, a painter who flourished at Siena in the first part of the 17th century. Little is known of him except by a picture of the Last Supper in the convent of the Angioli, near Assisi, inscribed Franciscus Antonius Senensis, 1614. Lanzi says the style resembles that of Baroccio enough to lead him to suspect that he was a pupil of Vanni or Salimbeni. The picture is well colored, with a fine and appropriate expression in the different countenances.

SIENA, FRANCESCO DI GIORGIO DA, a painter of Siena, who flourished in the first half of the 16th century. According to Della Valle, he was one of the ablest scholars of Baldassare Peruzzi, whose style he followed. He painted grotesque subjects, in which, like his instructor, he introduced every species of ideas, as edifices, trees, fruit, flowers, vases, candelabra, lamps, armour, thunderbolts, satyrs, masks, animals, and monsters, in which he bridled his exuberant fancy with judgment. Lanzi says that, though he did not equal Peruzzi, he acquired great reputation in this style of painting. He was also a skillful architect.

SIENA, GIORGIO DA, a painter of Siena, who flourished about 1550; probably somewhat earlier. He studied under Domenico Beccafumi. Lanzi says he imitated Giovanni da Udine, both in his own country and at Rome. He was doubtless the father of the preceding artist.

SIENA, GIOVANNI, or GIANELLA DA, a painter and architect of Siena, probably a brother of Giorgio, with whom he studied under Beccafumi, according to Della Valle. Little is known of him. Lanzi says he turned his attention from painting to architecture. He flourished about the middle of the 16th century.

SIENA, GIOVANNI, DI PAOLO, a painter employed among others by Pope Pius II. to embellish the cathedral of Pienza, where he showed himself deserving a good reputation among the artists of his time. His notices range from 1422 to 1462. About four years after his performances in the cathedral of Pienza, he painted a Descent from the Cross, in the Osservanza at Siena, commended by Lanzi for its excellence in the naked figure, surpassing the productions of most artists of the time.

SIENA, GUIDO GUIDONE, an old Sieneſe painter, whom the writers of Siena and the learned and celebrated Cav. Marini of Florence claim to have made great improvements in painting, over the raw and feeble manner of the Greeks, before the time of Cimabue and Giotto. Lanzi says, "Guido left the art not very far behind (Cimabue and Giotto) in his picture of the Virgin, now hung up in the Malevolti chapel, in the church of S. Domenico. On it is inscribed the name and the date:

Me Guidode Senis diebus depinxit amenis.
Quem Christus lenis nullis velit agere poenis.
An. 1221.

And this example (of name and date) was often followed by the masters of the Sienese school, to the great benefit of the history of painting. The countenance of the Virgin is lovely, and participates not in the stern aspect that is characteristic of the Greeks. We may also discover some trace of a new style of drapery. The Madonnas of Cimabue which are at Florence, the one in the church of the Trinity, and the other in S. Maria Novella, are not however inferior. In them we may discover the improvement of the art (over the Greeks)—a more vivid coloring, flesh tints more true, a more natural attitude of the head of the Infant, while the accompaniments of the throne and of the Glory of Angels proclaim a superior style." Lanzi then goes on to confute Marini, by showing that while Guido only painted single figures, only one specimen of which is known, the paintings of Cimabue are numerous and full of subject.

SIENA, MARCO DA. See PINO.

SIENA, MATTEO DI GIOVANNI DA, an eminent Sienese painter, of whom there are notices, according to Della Valle, from 1462 to 1491. Lanzi says he far surpassed all his predecessors (of the Sienese school) in the extent of his genius. "This is the Matteo designated by some the Masaccio of this school, although there is a great distance between him and the Florentine Masaccio. The new style of Matteo begins to be recognized in one of his two pictures in the Cathedral. He afterwards improved in his works in S. Domenico, in Madonna della Neve, and in some other churches at Siena. It was he who excited the Neapolitan school to attempt a less antiquated style. Having learned the art of oil painting, he imparted softness to his figures; and from his intimacy with Francesco di Giorgio, a celebrated architect (also a sculptor and painter; see Giorgio), he imbibed a good taste in buildings, and diversified them very ingeniously with alto and basso-relievos. He foreshortened level objects well, and he cast his draperies with more nature and less frippery than was common in that age; if he imparted little beauty to the features, he attained variety of expression, and was attentive in marking the muscles and veins in his figures. He did not always aim at novelty and display; on the contrary, after painting the Murder of the Innocents, his best composition, which is engraved in the third volume of the Lettere Sanesi, he often repeated it at Siena and at Naples, but always with variations and improvements. His most studied picture on this subject is that at the Servi in Siena, painted in 1491, which must have been near the close of his life. He was accustomed to introduce some episode, unconnected with the principal story, in small figures, a style in which he excelled. The noble house of the Sozzini, and other families of Siena, possess several of his small pictures. As an artist, he is inferior to Bellini, to Francia, or Vannucci, but he surpasses many others."

SIENA, MATTEO DA, called by the Sienese writers MATTEINO, to distinguish him from the preceding, was born at Siena in 1533, and died at Rome in 1588. He painted landscapes and perspective in fresco, and was much employed in conjunction with other artists in decorating the public and private edifices. He went to Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., where he was employed to paint many landscapes in the Vatican, in which the figures were inserted by other artists. In conjunction with Niccolo Circignani, called Pomerancio, he painted a series of thirty-two pictures of the History of the Martyrs, at S. Stefano Rotondo, which have been engraved by Cavalieri. (See Gio. Battista Cavalleriis). It is said that he painted at the Casino at Siena about 1551, and in the Palazzo Lucarini with Rustichino. Many of his works still exist. Lanzi says they are beautiful, though executed in the old, dry style.

SIENA, MAESTRO MINO DA, called MINUCCIO, to distinguish him from Fra Mino da Turruta. There is a picture in the Council Room of the public palace, or City Hall, at Siena, painted in 1289, which Lanzi attributes to him. Lanzi, after showing that he was a different artist from Fra Mino, says of the picture above referred to, "He there represented the Virgin and Child surrounded by angels, and under a canopy supported by apostles and the patron saint of the city. The size of the figures, the invention, and the distribution of the work, are surprising for that age; of the other qualities one cannot speak with certainty, as it was repaired in 1321 by Simone da Siena." There are other works attributed to him of an earlier date.

SIENA, MICHAEL ANGELO DA. See ANSELMI.

SIENA, SEGNA, BONINSEGNA, or BUONINSEGNA, an old Sienese painter, of whom there are notices in 1305, according to Lanzi. There is no authentic work by him remaining at Siena, though he was eminent in his time. He was the instructor of Duccio di Buoninsegna, who painted as early as 1282, and died about 1340. See Duccio.

SIENA, UGOLINO DA, an old painter of Siena, who died old in 1339. Vasari insinuates that he was a disciple of Cimabue, and says, "he painted pictures and chapels all over Italy." Baldinucci engrafts him on his tree as a pupil of that master; others assert that he was a pupil of Guido da Siena. Lanzi is of a contrary opinion, as he adhered too closely to the style of the Greeks. There were several other old artists called da Siena, of little note, the accounts of whom are very contradictory. Some of them were pupils of those already noticed, and flourished from about 1350 to 1400.

SIENA, SIMONE DA. See SIMONE MEMMI.

SIERRA, FRANCISCO PEREZ, a painter born at Naples in 1627. His father was a Spanish officer, who, following the career of arms in the kingdom of Naples, married the daughter of the Governor of Calabria, for which reason, and that Francisco passed most of his life in Spain, he is ranked among the Spanish painters. Having a taste for painting, his father permitted him to study with Aniello Falcone; at the same time he received the appointment of page to Don Diego de la Torre, Secretary to the Council of Santa Clara, which was a great hindrance to his progress in art, as he could only devote to painting such time as he could snatch from his duties. He afterwards accompanied his patron to Madrid, where he entered the school of Juan de Toledo, a painter of battles, and by great assiduity became such a proficient as to attract the notice of Francisco Rizi and Juan Carreno, who obtained employment for him in the house of the Marquis de Heliche. His patron, la Torre, employed him to copy several pictures by Spagnoletto, which he had brought with him from Naples; also to paint a series of pictures of saints to decorate a chapel in the church of the Angels, which he had founded at Madrid. He also painted for the same church a picture in honor of Santa Rosa of Lima. He painted landscapes, battles, and pictures of Saints. Later in life he received the appointment of General Manager of the Prisons of Spain, when he abandoned painting as a profession, though he painted flower-pieces for amusement, some of which found their way into the palace of the Buon Retiro, and the houses of the nobility. He died at Madrid in 1709.

SIGALON, XAVIER, a reputable French historical painter, born in 1790, at Uzés, in the old province of Languedoc. After acquiring the elements of the art at Nismes, he executed several pictures for the church of Aigues Mortes, and then visited Paris, to enter the school of Guerin. In 1822 he exhibited at the Louvre his admired picture of the Courtesan, which was purchased by the government for the Gallery at the Luxembourg. Sigalon resided about twenty years at Paris, and painted many meritorious productions; but not being properly encouraged, he retired to Nismes, and commenced painting portraits, and teaching design. At the request of M. Thiers, however, the Minister of the Interior, he visited Rome, and commenced copying the Last Judgment by Michael Angelo. In 1837, at the completion of the work, it was placed in the old church of the Augustines at Paris, now the Hall of the School of Fine Arts. Sigalon gained considerable reputation by this work, and was commissioned to copy the Prophets of Michael Angelo in the Sistine chapel; but, soon after his return to Rome, he was attacked by the cholera, and died on the 10th of August, 1837. Besides his works already mentioned, he executed a picture entitled La Locuste, now in the Museum at Nismes; and the Vision of St. Jerome, in the Luxembourg.

SIGHIZZI, ANDREA, a Bolognese fresco painter of some eminence, who, according to Malvasia, was living in 1678. He was employed by Agostino Mitelli to insert the figures in some of his perspective pieces. He was also employed at Turin, Mantua, and Parma, where he was appointed court painter, with a salary. Nothing more is recorded of him.

SIGISMONDI, PIETRO, a painter born at Lucca, commended by the Cav. Titi as a scholar or imitator of Pietro da Cortona. He commends the great altar-piece by him in the church of S. Niccolò in Arcione, at Rome.

SIGNORELLI, LUCA, an eminent painter, born at Cortona in 1439, and died in 1521, according to the best authorities, though there is a slight discrepancy; Vasari says he was born about 1440, and died in 1521; Lanzi, the same; Zani, that he was living in 1525. He studied under Pietro della Francesca, and was one of the ablest artists of his time. He contributed much to the advancement of the art, as his works served as types to some of the illustrious painters, his cotemporaries or immediate followers. Lanzi says that he was the first of the Tuscan artists who designed the human figure with a true knowledge of anatomy. His greatest work is his celebrated fresco in the chapel of the Virgin in the Cathedral of Orvieto, representing the final Dissolution and Judgment of the World—an immense composition, exhibiting a surprising variety and originality of ideas, and designed in a bold and daring style, in which he evinces a profound knowledge of anatomy and of foreshortening. This performance, though not entirely divested of the dry, stiff manner that preceded him, was greatly admired by Michael Angelo, and Lanzi says that great artist did not disdain to imitate his naked figures, in his Last Judgment in the Sistine chapel. In this work, too, Signorelli introduced the portraits of many of his friends and benefactors. In the greater part of his works he is not so remarkable for beauty of form or harmony of coloring, as for fertility of invention and correctness of design, though Lanzi cites an exception to this in his picture of the Communion of the Apostles, in the church of the Jesuits at Cortona, in which there is beauty and grace, and harmony of tints approaching to modern excellence. He wrought equally well both in oil and fresco, and painted many works for the churches of his native place, Urbino, Volterra, Florence, and other cities. He was invited to Rome, to assist in decorating the Sistine chapel, where he painted the Journey of Moses with Zippora, and the Promulgation of the Old Law—paintings full of incident, and greatly superior in composition to the confused style of his age. Vasari and Taja have assigned him the first place in the great assemblage of artists employed at Rome before the time of Buonarrotti and Raffaello, and Lanzi says he seems to him to have at least equalled the best of them, and to have improved his usual style. Zani quotes two of his inscriptions, Lucas Aegidii Signorelli Cortonensis, 1502, and Lucas Coritius. There is considerable discrepancy as to his real merits, but whoever will refer to the print of the Last Supper, after him, in the Etruria Pittrice, and those of the Descent from the Cross, and a part of the Last Judgment in Rosini's Storia della Pittura (plates 65 and 82), will perceive an original mode of composition and design, and an energy of expression unknown before his time.

SIGNORELLI, FRANCESCO, a painter of Lucca, of whom there are notices from 1520 to about 1560, was the nephew of the preceding. He is commended by Bottari as an able artist, and Lanzi says that, "though unnoticed by Vasari, he shows himself a painter worthy of praise, by a circular picture of the patron saints of the city, which was executed for the Council hall in 1520, after which period he exercised his art at least forty years."

SIGNORINI, GUIDO, a Bolognese painter who, according to Orlandi, was the cousin and scholar of Guido Reni, and inherited his effects. Little is known of him. He died about 1650.

SIGNORINI, GUIDO, another Bolognese painter, mentioned by Crespi as a scholar and imitator of Carlo Cignani. He chiefly painted for individuals. Lanzi says he must not be confounded with another Guido Signorini, heir to Guido Reni.

SIGRILLI, B., an Italian engraver who flourished about 1760. He engraved a part of the plates for the collection of prints after the paintings in the Gallery of the Marchese Gerini.

SILANION, a distinguished Greek sculptor, who probably flourished about B. C. 346, in the time of Alexander and Lysippus. He executed a statue of the sculptor Apollodorus, holding a hammer in his hand, and about to strike an object before him; Pliny says it expressed the passion with such truth, that it seemed to personate Anger itself. It appears that Silanion was an adept in representing vivid passions. Cicero mentions his statue of Sappho, in the Prytaneum at Syracuse, as highly finished, delicate, and beautiful, and deemed worthy of Verres' rapacity. He executed a bronze bust of Plato, of which that in the Florentine Gallery is probably a copy. Among his other works were the statues of Corinna, Theseus, and Achilles; also a bronze statue of Alexander the Great, said to have been ordered by a Persian satrap named Mithridates, and consecrated by him to the Muses, in the shade of Academus.

SILO, ADAM, a Dutch painter, designer, engraver, and ship-builder, born at Amsterdam in 1670. He was probably the man who instructed Peter the Great in ship-building; at all events, it is said that the Czar sent to him five young Russians to learn the art of naval architecture, for whose instruction he paid him one hundred ducats each. He painted several marine pieces for the Czar, in which the drawing of the vessels was correct, but the sky and water not in accordance with nature; probably these were designs for ships. He also painted a Storm at Sea, for the Dutch admiral Grave, which is said to have been a learned composition, and gained him great reputation. There are nine etchings by him, of fishing boats and other vessels, signed A. Silo, inv. et fecit. He is said to have died in 1760, aged 90.

SILOE, DIEGO, a distinguished Spanish architect, a native of Toledo, who flourished in the latter part of the 15th century. According to Milizia, he studied under Alonso Cobarrubias, and assisted that master in restoring good taste in architecture. He erected the Royal Hospital at Granada, and several other edifices, among which are the Cathedral, adorned with Corinthian columns and a magnificent cupola; also the great chapel of S. Geronimo, with the royal monastery, founded in 1496, and considered one of the finest in Spain. It is decorated with a Corinthian order, and the cloister is graceful and well arranged. This edifice was purchased of Charles V. by the Duchess of Terra Nuovas, Donna Maria Maurique, wife of the famous Gonsalvo de Cordova, otherwise known as "the Great Captain."

SILVANI, GHERARDO, an eminent Florentine architect, born in 1579. His instructor is not mentioned, but he gained great distinction in his native city, and was highly esteemed by the Grand Duke Ferdinand; he wrought with indefatigable industry, and, according to Milizia, with unquestionable ability. In Via San Gallo, he erected a noble palace for Signor Castelli, now belonging to the Marucelli family, and one of the most beautiful edifices in Tuscany. In Via Guelfonda, he built the magnificent Riccardi palace, a truly royal residence. Silvani also made a noble design for enlarging the Palazzo Pitti, with a large square in front; but, on account of the intrigues of his rivals, it was never executed. The Grand Duke commissioned him to strengthen the Cathedral, for the façade of which he made a design of two orders, which was preferred to those of Buontalenti and other eminent architects, although the edifice still remains without a façade. During a long life of ninety-six years, Silvani erected a large number of edifices besides those already mentioned, among which were the Albizzi palace at Florence; the church of the Compagnia delle Stimate; the Capponi palace; the Salviati palace at Pinti; the Bardi palace at Verbellezza; the Sapienza palace at Pistoja, &c. He died in 1675. His son, Pier Francesco S., studied the art under his father, and was much employed in the Cathedral at Florence; he also erected a number of edifices, among which the church of the Padri dell' Oratorio is deemed by Milizia as deserving much commendation.

SILVESTRE, ISRAEL, an eminent French designer and engraver, born at Nancy in Lorraine, in 1621; died at Paris in 1691. He visited Paris, and studied under his uncle Israel Henriet. He engraved a great variety of landscapes and views, after his own designs, in a neat, tasteful manner, with charming effect, founded on the styles of Callot and Della Bella. His plates are decorated with small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with uncommon spirit; his style appears to have been followed by Sebastian le Clerc. The excellence of his performances gained him the patronage of Louis XIV., and he was employed to engrave views of the royal palaces, the public festivals, and the cities conquered by the king; was appointed drawing master to the Dauphin, with a pension, and apartments in the Louvre, and elected a member of the Royal Academy. Silvestre visited Italy twice, and made many designs there, which he afterwards engraved. His plates number about one thousand, among which are a collection entitled Paysages Diverses, containing seventy-four views of palaces, churches, gardens, fountains, &c., in Italy and France; Vues diverses de Rome et d'Italie, containing one hundred and five views of Italian scenery; and the following:

A set of twenty-one Views of Italy and France, representing edifices, ruins, and landscapes, with inscriptions in French. A set of thirteen Views in Rome and the environs; inscribed Faites par Israel Silvestre, et mises en lumiere par Israel Henriet. Twelve Views of gardens and fountains; entitled Alcune vedute de Giardini e Fontane di Roma e di Tivoli, &c., with descriptions in Italian. Four Views in the Kingdom of Naples, in the form of friezes. A set of six Views of Sea-ports in the Kingdom of Naples; circular. Twenty-four circular plates of Views of Italian and other Sea-ports; with descriptions in French. Twelve of the most remarkable Views in Paris and the environs, some of which are engraved by la Bella. A View of Paris from the Bridge of the Tuilleries. A large View of Rome; four sheets. Two Views of Campo Vaccino, and the Coliseum at Rome; the latter is scarce. The grand Carousal, or Royal Entertainment at Paris in 1662; in one hundred and eight prints. F. Chaveau engraved some of these plates. The Pleasures of the Enchanted Island; nine plates, with a vignette. A great variety of other Views and Landscapes.

SILVESTRE, LOUIS, a distinguished French painter, was a son of the preceding. There are great discrepancies in the accounts of the sons of Israel Silvestre. Bryan says that Louis was his eldest son, born at Paris about 1651; Zani says he was his third son, born in 1675; others place his birth in 1644. After acquiring the elements of design from his father, he studied painting under le Brun and Bon Boullongne, and subsequently visited Italy for improvement. On returning to Paris, he was chosen a member, and afterwards a professor of the Royal Academy. After gaining considerable reputation by various works in portrait and landscape, for the refectory of S. Martin des Champs, the churches of S. Roch and Notre Dame, &c., he was invited to the court of Dresden by Augustus III., king of Poland and elector of Saxony, who honored him with letters of nobility, and made him principal painter to the court. Appointed director of the Dresden Academy, he remained twenty-four years in that city, and then returned to Paris, where Louis XV. assigned him apartments in the Louvre, with a pension of 1000 crowns. Silvestre died in 1760; though some place his death in 1728.

SILVESTRE, ALEXANDRE. This engraver was born at Paris, according to Nagler, in 1650. Zani says he was the eldest, and Bryan the younger son of Israel Silvestre. Among other plates, he etched several from the designs of his brother, Louis S., which possess considerable merit, though greatly inferior to the productions of his father.

SILVESTRE, NICOLAS CHARLES, grandson of Israel S., was born at Paris, according to Basan, in 1700. He obtained sufficient distinction to be appointed drawing master to the king and royal family of France; and engraved, among other plates, a hunting-piece, after Audray; and Ubaldo and the Danish knight searching for Rinaldo in the Palace of Armida, after Lemoine. He died in 1767.

SILVESTRE, SUSANNA. This lady was the daughter of Israel S., and became the wife of Lemoine the painter. She engraved a number of plates, among which are several copies of other plates of heads and portraits, after Vandyck. One of them is signed Susanna Silvestre Lemoine, sculp.

SILVESTRO, an old Florentine painter, and a monk of Camaldoli, who died about 1350. According to Vasari, he was a pupil of Taddeo Gaddi. He was one of the miniaturists. He devoted his time mostly to ornamenting missals, which Lanzi says still exist, and are among the best that Italy possesses.

SILVIO, GIOVANNI, a Venetian painter, who flourished in the first part of the 16th century. Lanzi conjectures from his style that he was a pupil of Titian. He says, "Gio. Silvio, a Venetian, though omitted in the history of his native place, still vindicates his title to notice by numerous works dispersed throughout the state of Treviso; there is a very elegant altar-piece by him in the collegiate church of Piovi di Sacco, a municipality of the Padovano, executed in 1532. It represents St. Martin in his episcopal chair, between the two Apostles Peter and Paul; three angels form the accessories, two in the act of raising his pastoral staff, and the third playing upon a harp, at the foot of the throne, extremely graceful, like the rest, the whole displaying a design of taste and nature, such as are found in Titian."

SILVIUS, or SYLVIUS, ANTHONY, a real or supposed designer and wood engraver, who, according to Papillon, flourished at Antwerp from about 1553 to 1580. He was much employed by Christopher Plantin, an eminent printer and bookseller of that city, to execute cuts to illustrate his publications; also by other publishers. The prints are marked with the above monogram. Nagler says that the prints in question were executed by an unknown artist, and that Papillon mistook for the engraver the name of Antoniano Silvio, professor of Belles Lettres at Rome, afterwards a Cardinal himself, who dedicated an edition of Faerno's Fables to Cardinal Borromeo, published at Antwerp in 1567, illustrated with cuts marked with a monogram composed of an A. and an S.

SILVIUS, or SYLVIUS, BALTHASAR, an engraver who flourished about 1555. He engraved some plates from his own designs and others after Francis Floris, Karel van Mander, Jerome Bosch, and others. They are coarsely executed with the graver, and are marked with his initials, B. S.

SIMMONS, or SIMMONDS, JOHN, an English painter, born at Nailsea, in Somersetshire, about 1715. He served his apprenticeship to a house and ship painter at Bristol. He afterwards devoted his attention mostly to portraiture, and acquired considerable reputation at Bristol. His portrait of Ferguson the astronomer, and several others, have been engraved. He was one of the earliest exhibitors at the Royal Academy, and in the catalogue his name is sometimes printed Simmonds of Bristol. There is an altar-piece of the Annunciation by him, in All-saints church, Bristol, and another of the Resurrection, in St. John's church, Devizes. He died at Bristol in 1780.

SIMON, JEAN, a French engraver, born in Normandy about 1675. He learned the art of line engraving in his own country, and afterwards went to London, where he engraved several portraits of distinguished personages, in line. The success of John Smith in mezzotinto, then coming into vogue, induced him to adopt that method of engraving. The following are his principal prints:

Queen Elizabeth; after Hilliard. Charles I.; after Vandyck. William III.; after Kneller. Mary, his consort; after vander Vaart. Queen Anne; after Kneller. George, Prince of Denmark. George I.; after Kneller. SIMON, PIERRE, a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1680. He is supposed to have studied under Robert Nanteuil, whose style he adopted. His works, though inferior to those of Nanteuil, possess considerable merit. Among other prints, are the following by him:

SIMON, JOHN PETER, an eminent English designer and engraver, born at London in 1750. It is not mentioned under whom he studied, but he acquired a high reputation for his engraving in the chalk and dotted manner, after the eminent English painters of his time. He engraved the following from the Shakspeare Gallery, which are among his best works. He died in 1810.

SIMON, THOMAS, an eminent English engraver of medals and seals, who lived in the time of Charles I., Cromwell's protectorate, and Charles II., by all whom he was employed. He was also employed for some time in the service of Christina, Queen of Sweden. His great Seal of the Commonwealth is mentioned as an exquisite specimen of the art. He died soon after the Revolution. He had a brother named Abraham Simon, who was a medalist, and assisted him in his works. Abraham was also a celebrated modeler in wax.

SIMONE, MAESTRO, an old Italian painter, of the time of Giotto, about whose history there is much discrepancy. He is variously called Maestro Simone, Simone da Bologna, and Simone da Crocifissi, and is said by some to have been a disciple of Filippo Tesauro; by others of Giotto. Lanzi, after stating that Giotto was invited to Naples in 1325 by Robert, King of Naples, to decorate the church of S. Chiara, with subjects from the New Testament, and the mysteries of the Apocalypse, says, "Giotto selected for his assistant in these labors, a Maestro Simone, who, in consequence of his enjoying the esteem of that master, acquired a great name at Naples. Some consider him a native of Cremona, others a Neapolitan, which seems nearer the truth. His style partakes both of Tesauro and Giotto, whence some consider him a disciple of the first, others of the second master; and he may probably have received instructions from both. However that may be, on the departure of Giotto, he was employed on many works which King Robert and the Queen Sancia were prosecuting in various churches, particularly in S. Lorenzo. He there painted that monarch in the act of being crowned by Bishop Lodovico, his brother, to whom, upon his death and subsequent canonization, a chapel was dedicated in the episcopal church; Simone was commissioned to decorate it, but death prevented his accomplishing it." Dominici extols a picture by him of a Deposition from the Cross, painted for the great altar of the Incoronata, and thinks it will bear comparison with the works of Giotto. In other respects he confesses that his conception and invention were not equally good, the airs of his heads less graceful, and less suavity in the tone of his coloring.

SIMONE, FRANCESCO DI, was the son and scholar of the preceding, of whom there are notices from 1340, to 1360. He executed some works in the church of S. Chiara, all of which have been effaced, together with those of Giotto, except a Madonna, in chiaro-scuro, which is highly extolled by Dominici.

SIMONELLI, GIUSEPPE, a Neapolitan painter, born about 1649, and died in 1713. According to Dominici, he was originally a servant of Luca Giordano, but showing a talent for painting, his master instructed him in the art. He became an accurate copyist of his works, and an excellent imitator of his coloring. When he attempted original works, he was generally deficient in design, though the author above cited highly extols his picture of S. Niccolo di Tolentino, "which approaches the best and most correct manner of Giordano both in design and handling."

SIMONET, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1742, and died there in 1810. It is not mentioned with whom he studied, but he engraved a considerable number of plates after the works of Greuze, Moreau, Baudoin, Aubry, and other artists of his country. His plates are executed in a neat and pleasing style.

SIMONETTI, DOMENICO, a painter of the Roman school, born at Ancona, where he flourished in the latter part of the 18th century. Lanzi says he was a reputable artist, and executed many works for the churches of his native city, and particularly distinguished himself in the church of the Suffragio. He decorated the gallery of the Marchesi Trionfi, and was much employed by individuals. He is also called Magatta, for what reason is not stated, for his real name was Simonetti.

SIMONI. See SIMONINI.

SIMONINI, FRANCESCO, an eminent battle painter, born at Parma in 1689. According to Lanzi and others, he studied with Ilario Spolverini, and painted battles, skirmishes of cavalry, attacks of banditti, &c., in the style of his master. His pictures are designed and executed with great fire and spirit. He chiefly resided at Venice, where he painted in the Sala Capello, a series of battles and warlike achievements, which are highly commended and greatly admired. There are many of his works in the collections at Venice, which Lanzi says abound with figures, and are ornamented with fine architecture. There are also some of his works at Rovigo. Orlandi says he studied with Francesco Monti, called delle Battaglie, and was educated at Florence, upon the model of Borgognone. Lanzi says he was living in 1753; others that he died at Venice about 1760. His name is sometimes written Simoni.

SIMONNEAU, CHARLES, an eminent French engraver, born at Orleans in 1639; died at Paris in 1728. He learned design from Noel Coypel; and studied engraving under Guillaume Chateau. His first plates were executed entirely with the graver, in a style resembling that of Poilly; but he afterwards introduced the point, particularly in the demi-tints and distances, reserving the burin for the more prominent and vigorous parts. Chosen a member of the Royal Academy, he presented, as the reception-piece, the portrait of Jules Hardouin Mansard; and was afterwards appointed engraver to the King, with a pension. He engraved numerous historical subjects, portraits, and vignettes, in a neat, agreeable, and spirited style. Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

Henrietta Maria, consort of Charles I. Charlotte Elizabeth, Duchess Dowager of Orleans; after Rigaud. Francis de Brienne, Bishop of Constance; after Dumée. Julius Hardouin Mansard, Architect to the King; after de Troy. George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

The Journey of Mary of Medicis to Pont-de-Cé; after Rubens; for the Luxembourg Gallery. The Conquest of Franche-Comté; after le Brun. This is esteemed his best print.

SIMONNEAU, Louis, a distinguished French engraver, the younger brother of the preceding, was born at Orleans, according to Zani, in 1660, and died in 1727. His style seems to have been formed in imitation of the Audrans. He nearly attained the excellence of his brother; his drawing is correct, particularly in the extremities, and by combining the point with the graver, he gave a pleasing variety to his plates. He was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. The following are among his principal plates:

PORTRAITS.

Giacinto Serroni, Archbishop of Albi. Anthony Arnauld, famous Theologian; after Ph de Champagne. Anthony le Maitre, Advocate in Parliament; do. Martin de Charmois, Counsellor of State; after Seb. Bourdon.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Crucifixion; do. The Assumption of the Virgin; after the ceiling by le Brun in the chapel of St. Sulpice. Four plates of the Four Times of the Day; do. The Four Seasons, in four plates; do. The ceiling of the Pavilion of Aurora, in the garden de Seeaux; in four plates; do.

SIMONNEAU, PHILIPPE, was the son of Charles S. He studied design and engraving under his father, and executed several plates, but subsequently relinquished the art, either from the lack of application or ability. Three prints of moderate merit are mentioned by him, which are:

Two friezes, on one sheet, representing the Rape of the Sabines, and the Peace between the Romans and the Sabines; after the pictures by Giulio Romano in the Orleans collection. The three Goddesses preparing for the Judgment of Paris; after the picture by Pierino del Vaga in the same collection. Venus and Adonis; after Albano.

SIMPSON, WILLIAM, an indifferent English engraver, who flourished about 1635. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and among other things, engraved the plates for Quarles' Emblems.

SIMPSON, JOSEPH, THE ELDER, an English engraver of little note, who flourished, according to Lord Orford, about 1710. His chief employment was to engrave coats of arms and other embellishments.

SIMPSON, JOSEPH, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding. He died young in 1736. He engraved a plate of a Holy Family, with St. John, St. Sebastian, and several angels, after Filippo Lauri, dated 1728.

SIMSON, WILLIAM, a Scotch painter, born at Dundee in 1800; studied in the Academy at Edinburgh. About 1829, he commenced painting portraits, and was so successful that in three or four years he was enabled to visit Italy. On his return in 1838, he exhibited in the Royal Academy at London, "A Camaldolese monk showing the Relics of his convent," which was engraved by the Art Union; also "Cimabue and Giotto," which was purchased by Sir Robert Peel for one hundred and fifty guineas. From this time till 1844, he exhibited a number of works, of which his "Columbus asking charity for himself and Child" is esteemed the best. Few of the rest possess merit. Had he devoted himself to portrait painting, he would have attained considerable eminence. This artist died in 1847.

SINGHER, JOHN, a painter born at Hesse Cassel about 1510. He settled at Antwerp, where he painted landscapes with figures, in a free, bold style, with considerable reputation. He was elected a member of the Academy there in 1543. He was much employed in making designs for the manufacture of tapestry. He died in 1558.

SINGLETON, HENRY, an English designer and painter, born at London in 1766. He first studied with his uncle, a miniature painter. He afterwards became a student of the Royal Academy, and gained the gold medal in 1788, for the best historical painting; the subject was taken from Dryden's Ode on Alexander's Feast. Among his most esteemed works are Christ entering Jerusalem; Christ healing the Blind; Coriolanus and his Mother; and Hannibal swearing eternal enmity to the Romans; all which were engraved in mezzotinto. His paintings of the Storming of Seringapatam, the Death of Tippoo Saib, and the Surrender of Tippoo's sons as hostages, were engraved by Schiavonetti and Cardon, and were very popular. He painted many poetical and fancy subjects, and made many designs to embellish the various publications of the day. His conceptions are common-place, his style mannered, and his execution exceedingly rapid. "Propose a subject to Singleton," said West, "and it will be on canvass in five or six hours." Stanley says there is an extensive series of small paintings by him of scenes from Shakspeare's Plays, which, if they were engraved, would enhance his reputation. He died in 1839.

SINJEUR, GOVERT, a Dutch painter who resided at Rotterdam, and is said to have been a successful imitator of the style of Philip Wouwerman. No particulars are recorded of him.

SINTZENICIL, HEINRICH, an eminent German engraver, born at Manheim in 1752. After learning the elements of the art in his native city, he was sent to England at the expense of the Elector, to complete his studies under Bartolozzi, with whom he continued four years. On his return to his native city, he was appointed engraver to the court, and executed many works in the chalk and dotted manner, and in mezzotinto. Among these are the portraits of several noble and distinguished personages of his country; also subjects after Frà Bartolomeo, A. Caracci, P. Veronese, Domenichino, Carlo Dolce, Solimena, Rubens, le Brun, and other eminent painters of later times. He acquired a high reputation, and was elected a member of the academies of Munich and Berlin. Nagler gives a descriptive catalogue of fifty-four of his principal works. He died at Munich in 1812.

SIRANI, GIOVANNI ANDREA, a painter born at Bologna in 1610. According to Crespi, Oretti, and others, he was one of the favorite disciples of Guido Reni, and one of the most successful emulators of his style. Lanzi says, "another good copyist and master of Guido's style appeared in Gio. Andrea Sirani. On his master's death, he completed the great picture of St. Bruno, left unfinished at the Certosini, with several others throughout the city in the same state. Whether owing to Guido's retouches, or his want of freedom, Sirani's earliest works bear much resemblance to that master's second manner, more particularly in his Crucifixion, in the church of S. Marino, which seems like a repetition of Guido's St. Lorenzo in S. Lucina, or that in the Modenese Gallery. In process of time, Sirani is supposed to have aimed at the stronger style of Guido in his early career; he conducted in such a taste his pictures of the Supper of the Pharisee, at the Certosa; the Nuptials of the Virgin, in S. Giorgio at Bologna; and the Twelve Crucifixions, in the Cathedral of Piacenza, an extremely beautiful picture, ascribed by some to Elizabeth Sirani, his daughter and pupil." Lanzi means that Sirani, in these last works, followed the style of Guido founded on that of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio. (See Guido.) At Rome is a very beautiful picture of the Last Supper by him, alone sufficient to establish his reputation as a great master. He usually painted in a large size, and in a grand style, like his master. There are a number of spirited etchings marked G. A. S. and I. A. S., heretofore attributed to him, but Bartsch considers only two genuine—Apollo and Marsyas, signed Sirani fecit, and the Death of Lucretia. He died in 1670.

SIRANI, ELIZABETTA. This extraordinary lady was the daughter of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1638. She was instructed in the art by her father, and showed such talent, and made such rapid progress, that she was accounted a prodigy at fifteen years of age. She attached herself to an imitation of the best style of Guido, which unites great relief with the most captivating amenity. It is almost incredible that in a short life of not more than twenty-six or twenty-seven years, she could have executed the long list of works enumerated by Malvasia, copied from a register kept by herself, amounting to upwards of one hundred and fifty pictures and portraits; and our astonishment is increased when we are told that many of them are pictures and altar-pieces of large size, and finished with a care that excludes all appearance of negligence or haste. Her first public work appears to have been painted in 1655, when she was seventeen years of age. Her compositions are elegant and tasteful, her design correct and firm, and there is a freshness and suavity in her coloring, especially in her demi-tints, that strongly resembles the best works of Guido. The airs of her heads are noble, beautiful, and graceful. She was particularly successful in the expressive character which she gave to her Madonnas and Magdalens, which were her favorite subjects. Her penciling was more delicate, but less free and spirited than that of her father. Her most admired works in the churches at Bologna, are the Baptism of Christ at the Certosa; St. Antonio of Padua kneeling before the infant Christ, in S. Leonardo; the Virgin with St. Anne, contemplating the infant Christ sleeping, in S. Maria di Galiera. Lanzi says that in her smaller works, painted by commissions, she still improved herself, as may be seen by the numerous pictures of Madonnas, Magdalens, Saints, and the infant Christ, found in the Zampieri, Zambecari, and Caprara palaces at Bologna, and in the Corsini and Bolognetti collections at Rome. She also painted some small histories on copper, exquisitely finished and extremely valuable, which are to be found in the palaces at Bologna and Rome. She received many commissions from several of the sovereigns and most distinguished personages of Europe. Lanzi mentions an exquisite specimen of her art which he saw, in the possession of Counsellor Pagave at Milan—a portrait of herself, in the act of being crowned by a cherub. She died by poison, August 29th, 1665, administered by one of her own maids, instigated, as is supposed, by some jealous young artist. Her melancholy death was bewailed with demonstrations of public sorrow. Her remains were interred in the same vault in the church of S. Domenico where reposed the ashes of Guido. She executed some spirited etchings, mostly from her own designs, which she usually signed with her name, but sometimes marked with her initials, E. S. F. Bartsch describes only ten prints by her; some are signed and others are not, but none have E. S. F. Some of them are dated as early as 1655, when she was only seventeen years of age. Lanzi says she instructed, besides her two sisters, many other ladies, the most talented of whom were Veronica Franchi, Vincenzia Fabri, Lucrezia Scarfaglia, and Ginevra Cantofoli.

SIRANI, ANNA and BARBARA, were the younger sisters of the preceding. They were doubtless instructed both by their father and sister, though Crespi and Lanzi say they were instructed in the art by Elizabeth, whose fame was so great, according to Lanzi, that "she is nearly the sole individual of the family whose name occurs in collections out of Bologna"; by which he doubtless means that the works of her father and her sister are generally attributed to her. This would account for the extraordinary number of works attributed to her throughout Italy, but more especially at Bologna, Rome, and Milan. Lanzi says they imitated the style of Elizabeth, and that there are some pictures by Barbara in the churches and collections of Bologna.

SIRCEUS, PHILIP, an artist mentioned by Florent le Comte and others, as the engraver of some prints after Michael Angelo. He is the same as Sericcus or Soye, which see.

SIRIES, VIOLANTE BEATRICE. This ingenious lady was born at Florence in 1710. She was first instructed in crayon painting and in water-colors by the celebrated paintress Giovanna Fratellini. At the age of sixteen, she accompanied her father to Paris, who was an eminent goldsmith, and had been invited to that court and appointed goldsmith to the King. In that city she learned from a Flemish artist, the practice of oil painting, in which she made rapid progress, and during her residence of five years there, she painted the portraits of several persons of rank. These performances were so much admired, that flattering offers were made to induce her to remain at Paris, under the royal patronage. She, however, preferred to return with her father, who was recalled by the Grand Duke to Florence, where she acquired a high reputation, and was much patronized by the court and the nobility. Though she chiefly confined herself to portraits, she occasionally painted history, and fruit and flower-pieces. Her works are correctly designed, her pencil light, delicate, and free, her carnations warm and life-like, her draperies well chosen, varied, and remarkable for noble simplicity, her perspective excellent, and she enriched her pictures with magnificent architecture. One of her most capital performances is a picture of the Imperial family, consisting of fourteen portraits. The Grand Duke ordered her portrait to be placed in the Florentine Gallery, among those of illustrious artists, on which occasion she took the opportunity of introducing the likeness of her father into the picture, a proof of her filial piety and distinguished merit. Most of her works are in oil. She died in 1770.

SIRLET, FLAVIUS, an eminent gem engraver, who died at Rome in 1737. Some of his works are accounted little inferior to the finest specimens of antiquity. One of his best performances is the famous group of Laocoon and his children, cut upon an amethyst.

SISTO, F. See RISTORO.

SIXDENIERS, M., a distinguished French line engraver, born at Paris in 1795; died in 1846. He studied under Villerey, and soon acquired distinction. In 1816 he gained the second prize for line engraving; in 1824, a gold medal at the Salon. Besides many line engravings, he also executed, in concert with Maile and Reynolds, many of the best mezzotints of the time. He was much patronized, and gained great reputation. Among his line engravings the following are most worthy of note:

Honors rendered to Raffaele after his death; after Bergeret. 1822. Properzia di Rossi; after Ducis. 1824. Vignettes for various works; 1827. Endymion; after Girodet. Sleep; after Mlle. Pagés. The Bath, and the Surprise; after Rioult. 1831. Pacha de Janina, Don Juan, the Visit, the Invasion. 1833. Edward in Scotland; after Delaroche. Combat de Navarino; after Langlois. 1834. The Departure, and the Return; after Mlle. Pagés. Young Girls and Faune; after Rioult. Group of Louis XVI.; after Bosio. 1835. Charles I. and his Children; after Colin. 1836. The Broken Contract; after Destouches. 1837. Portrait of Arago. 1839. The Rural Virtuoso; after Boutelwerk. Boatmen attacked by Bears; after Biard. 1840. Charlotte Corday; after Scheffer. Hospitality; after Latit. Mlle. Rachael; after Charpentier. 1841. Napoleon and the King of Rome; after Steuben. 1842. Funeral of Gen. Marceau; after Bouchot. 1843. Arab in Prayer, and Posting in the Desert; after Horace Vernet. 1844. Head of Christ; after Colin. 1845. The Village Bride; after Greuze. Portrait of Brother Philip; after H. Vernet. 1846.

SKELTON, WILLIAM, an English engraver, born at London in 1763. He studied with James Basire, and afterwards with William Sharp. He acquired considerable reputation as a line engraver, and was much employed by Boydell, Macklin, and others. He executed several plates for the Dilettanti Society, and some of his best engravings are from the antiques published in their valuable works. Towards the close of his professional labors, he engraved and published his series of Royal Portraits, embracing every member of the Royal family, from the time of George III. to the accession of Queen Victoria. He was a most worthy and exemplary man, and by his professional skill and industry, acquired a moderate independence, which he expended in deeds of charity. For nearly sixty years he was a guardian of the Asylum of Female Orphans, and such was his devotion to the interests of the institution, that he was called the father of that noble charity. He died in 1848, in the 86th year of his age.

SKILLMAN, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who flourished about 1655. Among other plates, he engraved the façade of Albemarle House, and a view of the Banqueting House.

SKIPPE, JOHN, a modern English artist, of whose history, singularly enough, little is known. There are about thirty wooden cuts by him, printed in chiaro-scuro, with three and four blocks, after Raffaele, Correggio, Parmiggiano, Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, Pierino del Vaga, Salvator Rosa, Andrea del Sarto, Baccio Bandinelli, and Rubens. His prints are dated from about 1771 to 1809. Jackson, in his "Treatise on Wood Engraving," says, "from the year 1754, the date of John Baptist Jackson's tract 'On the Invention of Engraving and Printing in Chiaro-Scuro,' to 1819, when the first part of Mr. Savage's Hints on Decorative Printing, was published, the only chiaro-scuro wood engravings which appear to have been published in England, were executed by an amateur of the name of John Skippe."

SLABBAERT, or SLABBARD, KARL, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known, except by a few pictures which are elaborately finished and well colored, though labored and incorrectly drawn. He painted interiors and familiar subjects. With respect to the time of his birth and death, the Dutch writers are silent. Zani mentions him or another artist of the same name, as a designer and engraver who operated in 1645.

SLATER, T., an obscure English engraver, who flourished about 1630. He engraved some portraits for the booksellers.

SLINGELANDT, PETER VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1640. He studied under Gerard Douw, whose manner he imitated, and in the opinion of some judges, he surpassed that master in the delicate and labored polish which he gave to his pictures, though they are deficient in the characteristic expression, the magical effects of the chiaro-scuro, and the correctness of design, which distinguish the works of Douw. His chief merits seem to consist in Dutch patience and perseverance. Houbraken relates that he was occupied three years without intermission in painting a small picture of the portraits of the Meerman family; that he was employed a month in finishing the lace of a ruff; and that when he painted a dog, cat, or mouse, which he was fond of introducing into his pictures, he was not satisfied till he had represented each particular hair. Yet his stiff and tasteless compositions were much sought after, still command high prices, and are only to be found in the collections of the great. One of his works, now in the Louvre, was bought of a brewer for £480, and has been valued at 20,000*l.* Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné, vol. I. and Supplement, gives a descriptive account of 70 pictures by him. There are several of his works in the Royal galleries and the collections of the nobility in England. He died in 1691.

SLODTZ, SEBASTIAN. This sculptor was born at Antwerp in 1655, and gained considerable distinction among the artists employed in embellishing the palace of Louis XIV. His productions are more distinguished for beauty of execution, than for elevation of design. Among the principal are the statue of St. Ambrose, and the group of St. Louis sending missionaries to the Indies, at the Invalides; and a marble statue of Hannibal measuring with a bushel the rings of the Roman knights slain in the battle of Cannæ. Slodtz died at Paris in 1726.

SLODTZ. There were several sons of the preceding artist, who gained in France considerable distinction in sculpture. Sebastian Slodtz, the eldest, practiced the art with success, in concert with his younger brother Paul Ambrose, who was born in 1702, and died in 1758. Among the works executed by them were, the grand altar of the church of St. Bartholomew; the altar of the chapel of the Virgin, in S. Sulpice; also several decorations for the fêtes celebrated at Versailles in 1751, on occasion of the birth of the Duke de Bourgogne. Paul Ambrose was appointed professor of sculpture in the Academy, and designer to the King's Cabinet. His abilities, however, were surpassed by his younger brother RENÉ MICHEL, generally known among his cotemporaries as Michael Angelo Slodtz. He was born at Paris in 1705; at the age of twenty-one he gained a prize from the Academy of Sculpture, and visited Rome with the royal pension. He remained seventeen years in that city, and was commissioned to execute a statue of St. Bruno, for St. Peter's; the tomb of the Marchese Capponi, in S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini; and the mausoleum in the cathedral of Vienna in Dauphiny, in honor of M. de Montmorin, archbishop of that city. In 1747, Slodtz returned to Paris, where he soon gained reputation, and was commissioned to execute a number of works. Many of his productions evince the decadence of the arts under Louis XV., particularly his monument to Languet in S. Sulpice, which, though possessing little true merit, gained for Slodtz so great reputation, that King Frederic II. of Prussia commissioned him to execute two statues, and invited him to his court. In 1755, he received a pension from the King of France, and in 1758 succeeded his brother Paul Ambrose as designer to the King's Cabinet. He died in 1764.

SLUYS, JACOB VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1660. He first studied with Ary de Voys, and afterwards with Peter van Slingelandt, whose polished style he imitated, though with less laborious finishing. He copied the works of Slingelandt, and painted conversations, domestic subjects, and modish assemblies, composed and treated in an agreeable style, though his drawing is incorrect. His works are principally confined to Leyden, where he constantly resided and died in 1736.

SLUYTER, P., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1700. He was principally employed in engraving frontispieces and other book plates, for the publications of Peter vander Aa.

SMEATON, JOHN, an eminent English architect and engineer, born at Anstrophe, in Yorkshire, in 1724. His father, who was an attorney, gave him a classical education, intending him for his own profession, but young Smeaton having a passion for mechanics, he placed him with a mathematical instrument maker to learn that business. He afterwards studied architecture and engineering, acquired distinction, and was much employed by government in executing some difficult works, one of the most important of which was to rebuild the Eddystone light-house. He erected this famous edifice in a novel, and so substantial a manner, that it may justly be pronounced a work unparalleled in its kind; it has withstood the contest of the elements, contrary to predictions, ever since, and bids fair to continue a monument to his genius for ages to come. He published a curious account of this structure and its history in one vol. folio. In 1753, he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1759 he obtained its gold medal for his valuable paper on "The Natural powers of Wind and Water, to turn Mills and other Machines, depending on a Circular Motion." He constructed the improvements in Ramsgate harbor, of which he published an account. He died in 1792.

SMEES, JOHN, a Dutch landscape painter and engraver, of whom little is known. He died about 1729. There are some spirited etchings by him, of landscapes, with figures and animals, enriched with edifices and ruins, in the manner of John Both. Bartsch describes five, signed J. Smees, in. et fecit.

SMIBERT. See SMYBERT.

SMILIS, the earliest sculptor of Egina, of whom we have any account. His works are distinguished for a gravity and severe grandeur, which marked the school of Egina. Pliny mentions a statue of Juno by him, considered the most ancient of that goddess.

SMIRKE, ROBERT, an eminent English historical painter, born at Wigton in 1752. It is not mentioned under whom he first studied, but it is said that he first painted coats of arms on coach panels. In 1771, at the age of 19, he became a student at the Royal Academy, but he did not exhibit there till many years after, in 1786, as he was extremely diffident, and a severe critic on his own performances. His merits however, were soon acknowledged, and he was elected a member of that institution in 1792. His favorite subjects are from Scripture, English history and poets, Don Quixote, and the Arabian Nights. He was employed by Alderman Boydell to paint several pictures for the Shakspeare Gallery, of life size, which he treated in an admirable and very humorous manner. He was more successful in his cabinet pictures, which are numerous, than in those of a large size. His works are correctly designed, his figures arranged with judgment and skill, and he gave to his countenances an admirable and appropriate expression. He particularly excelled in the representation of comic subjects, in which he displayed a rich humor in his characters that never degenerates into buf-foony ; he is always the gentleman when representing the ridiculous, the affected, or the grotesque. He makes the observer to think and smile, but never to laugh outright. It is said that he was in the habit of sketching every marked face he met with, which he transferred to his portfolio ; thus he had an ample collection of real heads, from which he could select one appropriate to every character ; hence the striking originality in all his works, in which the figures appear to be real portraits, though sometimes a little caricatured to fit the dramatis persona. His coloring is pleasing, and his chiaro-scuro excellent. He made many designs for the various publications of the day, which abound with humor, pathos, and sentiment. Many of his works were engraved by eminent artists, and were very popular, not only in England, but on the Continent. He continued to practice his art till advanced in life. It is said that his last works were the designs for the admirable bas-reliefs which embellish the front of the Oxford and Cambridge Club House, in Pall-Mall, erected by Sir Robert Smirke, jr., the eminent architect. Though he was not fully appreciated till late in life, his works greatly increased in value, and are now held in high estimation. He died in 1845.

SMIT, ANDREW, a Dutch marine painter, who flourished about 1650. There is a capital picture by him in the Berlin Gallery, resembling the manner of Backhuysen. It represents an approaching Storm ; the sea is rising with a heavy swell, and several vessels are seen making preparations to encounter the tempest. Stanley says there are some of his works in England, but they are attributed to other artists.

SMIT, ARNOLD, a Dutch painter, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He painted landscapes and marines ; the latter resemble the darkest manner of Backhuysen. There are pictures signed A. Smit, And. Smit, and Arn. Smit, and from the similarity of style, subjects, and the time they flourished, it may reasonably be conjectured that Andrew and Arnold are one and the same artist, especially as there are no authentic particulars recorded of either.

SMITH, ANKER, an excellent English line engraver, was born in London in 1759. After receiving a good education, he was articled to an attorney. As he was an excellent penman, and had a taste for the fine arts, he amused his leisure hours in copying line engravings with his pen, which he did with such accuracy that on some of them being shown to James Heath, he mistook them for prints. This induced his friends to place him with an engraver named Taylor, who instructed him in the mechanical part of the art, and his natural talent soon enabled him to surpass his instructor. He afterwards became an assistant to Heath, in whose name he is said to have executed several works, among which the Apotheosis of Handel is named. Bell was then engaged in publishing an edition of the British Poets, and he employed Smith to engrave the illustrative plates ; other publishers also employed him, and his name soon became familiar to the public. His plates are much esteemed for correctness of drawing and beauty of execution.

He executed many plates to embellish the various publications of the day, among which may be mentioned Smirke's Edition of Don Quixote, Wood's small edition of Shakspeare's Plays, Coombe's Ancient Marbles and Terracottas in the British Museum, &c. He was also much employed by Boydell ; he engraved several of the plates for the smaller edition of the Shakspeare Gallery. His print of the Death of Wat Tyler, after Northcote, obtained for him the honor of being elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He engraved several fine plates after Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, and the Caracci. He died in 1819.

SMITH, BENJAMIN, an eminent English engraver in the chalk manner, born in London about 1750. He studied with Bartolozzi, whose style he followed. He engraved a considerable number of plates, chiefly after the eminent English painters of the day ; most of them are of large size, beautifully executed, with the character and expression of his originals carefully preserved. He was employed by Boydell to engrave several of the plates for the Shakspeare Gallery, which are elaborately executed, and rank among his best works. He died in 1810. The following are among his principal works :

Christ healing the Sick ; after B. West. St. Peter's first Sermon ; do. An Allegory of Providence ; after J. F. Rigaud. An Allegory of Innocence ; do. Sigismunda ; after Hogarth. Bacchus ; after Sir J. Reynolds. Shakspeare nursed by Tragedy and Comedy, and the infant Shakspeare attended by Nature and the Passions ; after Romney. An equestrian Portrait of George III. ; after Beechey. The Portrait of Napoleon ; after Appiani. William Hogarth and his Dog ; after Hogarth. The Marquis Cornwallis ; after Copley. The Annual Ceremony of administering the Oath of Allegiance to the Lord Mayor elect, &c. Scene from Richard II. ; after Matthew Brown.

SMITH, CHARLES JOHN, an English engraver, born at Chelsea in 1803. He was the son of an eminent surgeon, who placed him with Charles Pye to learn engraving. He became a skillful artist, and was much employed in engraving plates for the various expensive publications of the day, among which are Stothard's Sepulchral Effigies, Cartwright's Rape of Bramber, Murray's Illustrations of Johnson, Dibdin's English Tour, and other similar works, some of them for private circulation only. In 1828, he engraved and directed the publication of a volume in imperial quarto, comprising a series of fac simile autographs of royal, noble, and distinguished personages, from the reign of Richard II. to that of Charles II., to which biographical notices were furnished by John Gough Nichols, F. S. A. At the time of his death, he was engaged on the work entitled "Historical and Literary Curiosities," of which six numbers were published ; the remaining two to complete the work were left unfinished. He was a member of the Society of Antiquaries. He died in 1839.

SMITH, FRANCIS, an English landscape painter of little note, whose name occurs as an exhibitor at the Royal Academy, in the catalogues of that institution, from about 1770 to 1779, when he is supposed to have died.

SMITH, GABRIEL, an English engraver, born in 1724, and died in 1783. After learning the rudiments of the art, he went to Paris, where he acquired the method of engraving in imitation of chalk drawings. On his return to London, he practiced this method with considerable success. He was much employed by Boydell, for whom he executed his principal works.

SMITH, JACOB, an obscure English engraver, who flourished about 1730, and executed a few portraits, among which are those of Sir Isaac Newton and Sir Hans Sloane, on one plate. The engraving is executed in a singular manner, with one spiral line, begun in the centre, and continued to the border of the plate.

SMITH, JOHN, an eminent English mezzotinto engraver, who died about 1720. Little is known of him except by his works. He is said to have first studied painting under an obscure artist, named Tillot or Tillet. As soon as he became his own master, he learned the art of engraving in mezzotinto of Isaac Becket and J. vander Vaart. He surpassed every engraver in his line who had preceded him, and was employed by Sir Godfrey Kneller to engrave many of his portraits. His works are very numerous; Nagler gives a catalogue of five hundred prints by him. The following are his most esteemed works:

SMITH, NATHANIEL, an English sculptor, the friend and companion of Nollekens, flourished in the latter half of the last century. He entered the studio of Roubilliac in 1755, and in 1759 and 1760 gained several prizes from the Society of Arts. He afterwards wrought in the studio of Nollekens, and subsequently established himself as a printseller in St. Martin's Lane.

SMITH, JOHN THOMAS. This distinguished English artist, and writer on art, was the son of the preceding, born in 1766. The friendship existing between his father and Joseph Nollekens, occasioned young Smith to be frequently noticed by that sculptor, and at the age of thirteen he entered his studio. After remaining there three years, he entered the Royal Academy, and distinguished himself by several drawings in imitation of Ostade and Rembrandt. He afterwards studied engraving under Sherwin; and at the termination of his engagement with that artist, he was for several years employed as a drawing master. In 1791 he commenced his first work, the "Antiquities of London and its Environs," ninety-six plates, accompanied with brief descriptions. His next work relating to art was the "Antiquities of Westminster," representing the old Palace, St. Stephen's chapel, &c., containing engravings of two hundred and forty-six topographical objects, of which, at the time of its publication in 1807, only one hundred and twenty-four were remaining. This work also contains colored engravings of several curious old paintings discovered in 1800, on the wainscoting of the House of Commons, and soon after destroyed by the workmen in enlarging the building, but not before they had been copied by the prompt and energetic Smith. In 1809, he published a second volume of sixty-two additional plates. In 1815 he completed the publication of the "Ancient Topography of London," which is considered his best work, containing thirty-two plates, very boldly etched, in a style somewhat resembling that of Piranesi. In 1816, Smith received his appointment of Keeper of Prints in the British Museum, and discharged the duties of his office in an exemplary manner. His last literary production was "Nollekens and his Times," which appeared in 1828, and soon ran through three editions. The author was an executor of Nollekens, and was disappointed at not being a legatee; he therefore wrote under the influence of excited feelings, and appears to have made a discreditable use of the privileges of intimacy he so many years enjoyed in the home and studio of his old instructor. Although containing many details that should never have been made public, and characterized by a degree of high coloring that greatly impairs its credibility, it contains many curious anecdotes of artists and distinguished personages, with whom Smith had been more or less intimately connected in the course of his long and rather eventful life. He left in manuscript the materials for a history of his own life and times, which has never been published. He died in 1833. There is a portrait of Smith by Skelton, engraved after a drawing by Jackson.

SMITH, SAMUEL, a very talented landscape engraver, little known in the annals of art, as he wrought principally for other artists. The date of his birth or death is unknown; and nothing of his history has been ascertained, except that he never married. He executed the landscape in Sharpe's Holy Family, after Reynolds, and several engravings after Louthembourg. Among his other works is a beautiful plate of Wilson's Niobe, in the National Gallery, of which the figures were inserted by Sharpe.

SMITH, THOMAS, an eminent English landscape painter, who resided chiefly at Derby, and was usually styled Smith of Derby, to distinguish him from the Smiths of Chichester. He is said to have reached a distinguished rank in his profession, without any other instructor than nature and his own genius, and to have been the first English artist who explored and depicted the charming scenery of the country. He painted almost all the picturesque views of the Peak of Derbyshire; forty of these were engraved by Vivares, and published collectively by Boydell, in 1760; others were engraved by Mason and Elliot. He also painted sporting pieces. He died at the Hot-Wells, Bristol, in 1769.

SMITH, JOHN RAPHAEL. This eminent artist was the son of the preceding, born about 1750. He was instructed by his father in painting, but he afterwards adopted engraving, in which he distinguished himself, particularly in mezzotinto. He executed about one hundred and fifty plates from his own designs, and after other masters. His portraits are the best, and are much admired. He also practiced drawing in crayons. He died in 1812. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS AFTER SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS.

The Duke of Devonshire. William Markham, Archbishop of York. Richard Robinson, Archbishop of Armagh. Joseph Dean Bourke, Archbishop of Tuam. Lady Beaumont. Lady Caroline Montague, daughter of the Duke of Buccleugh. Mrs. Montague. The Marchioness of Thomond, when Miss Palmer. Lady Gertrude Fitzpatrick, daughter of the Earl of Ossory. Lady Catherine Pelham Clinton. Master Crewe, as Henry VIII. Master Herbert as young Bacchus. Lieut. Colonel Tarleton. Mrs. Musters. Lieut. General Sir William Boothby. PORTRAITS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Hyde Parker, Vice-Admiral of the Blue; after Northcote. Miss Coghlan; after Gainsborough. Mrs. Siddons as the Grecian Daughter; after Lawrence. Edward Wortley Montagu, in an Oriental dress; after Peters.

SMITH, WILLIAM, GEORGE, and JOHN, three English painters, born at Chichester, where they resided, and hence called the Smiths of Chichester. William was born in 1707; George, in 1714; and John in 1717. William and John died in 1764, and George in 1766. It is not known that they had the advantage of any instructor in art, but they established a kind of domestic academy, and, by a diligent study of nature, acquired a high reputation in the age in which they lived. William devoted his attention chiefly to portraits, though he occasionally painted landscapes, flowers, and fruit. George excelled in landscape painting, and reached an eminent rank in that department; John also painted landscapes with nearly equal success. Their fame was widely spread by the admirable engravings by Woollett, Elliot, Peake, and others. John and George etched and finished with the graver fifty-three prints of landscapes painted by themselves, and of subjects from Rembrandt. There is also a collection of "Select Views in England and Wales," after their designs, by Vivares, and others.

SMITHSON, JOHN, an English architect, who died in 1648. Little is known of him. He was early taken into the service of the Earl of Newcastle. He built part of Welbeck in 1604, the riding house there in 1623, and the stables in 1625. He made great additions to Bolsover Castle for William Cavendish, Earl and afterwards

Duke of Newcastle, who, it is said, sent him to Italy to collect designs. He left a great many drawings and designs, some of which were purchased by Lord Byron from his descendant who lived at Bolsover.

SMITS, LUDOLF, or LUDEWYK, called HART-CAMP, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1635, and died there in 1675. He acquired considerable reputation for his fruit and flower pieces, but his works, from his bad system of coloring, have mostly perished.

SMITS, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Breda about 1672, and died there in 1731. Little is known of him. There are a few of his pictures at Breda, which are said to evince considerable talent.

SMITZ, GASPAR, called by the English Magdalen Smith, a Dutch or Flemish painter, who went to London soon after the Restoration, where he acquired considerable reputation and employment. He painted several portraits in oil, and fruit and flower-pieces, which were admired. He also painted some beautiful pictures of Magdalens, and for these penitents his model was a beautiful English woman, whom he called his wife. He also taught drawing and painting. An Irish lady of rank, whom he had instructed, persuaded him to go to Dublin, where, at her recommendation, he found abundant employment at high prices. He received £40 for a picture of a single bunch of grapes. In his Magdalens, he always introduced a thistle in the foreground. Pilkington says that, though his reputation as an excellent painter was fully established, and he had as many commissions as he could possibly execute at high prices, yet his extravagance kept him always necessitous, and he died at Dublin in miserable circumstances in 1707. Graham, in his Lives of the Painters, says he died in 1689. He engraved a few plates in mezzotinto, from his own designs, among which are a Portrait, a Magdalen in a Grotto, and Hagar in the Wilderness.

SMYBERT, JOHN, a Scotch painter, born at Edinburgh about 1680. He served his apprenticeship to a common house painter; but aspiring to higher things, he went to London, where he studied diligently, and contrived to support himself by copying for the dealers, and ornamenting coaches. His enthusiasm carried him to Italy, where he spent three years in copying the works of Titian, Vandyck, and Rubens. He then returned to London, and commenced portrait painting. When his industry and ability had surmounted many difficulties, he was induced to engage in Bishop Berkeley's famous scheme of founding a universal college in Bermuda for the instruction of the heathen. He accompanied the Bishop to America; but the scheme failing, he settled in Boston about 1725, where he married, and continued to practise portrait painting till his death in 1751. There is a large picture by him of Bishop Berkeley's family at Yale College. Dunlap says he painted the portraits of the most eminent magistrates of New England and New York, who lived from 1725 to 1751. He is said to have lived on terms of friendship with Allan Ramsay, the author of the "Gentle Shepherd," with whom he corresponded after his settlement in America. His name is written Simbert, Smibert, and Smybert; the last was the way he wrote it.

SNAYERS, PETER, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1593. He studied under Henry van Balen, and distinguished himself by many excellent works in history and portraits, battles, huntings, and landscapes. His pictures are well designed, his composition ingenious, his pencil free and delicate, and his coloring rich and harmonious, approaching that of Rubens. He particularly excelled in battles and huntings, in which his figures and horses are designed and painted with great spirit and animation. He was much patronized by the Archduke Albert, who appointed him his principal painter, with a large pension, and for whom he executed many of his choicest works. The Archduke sent some of them to the King of Spain, and Snayers afterwards received many commissions from that court. His works are found in the choicest collections of the Netherlands, and some in those of foreign countries, where they are highly esteemed. There are some of his pictures in the churches and public edifices of Antwerp and Brussels. He was esteemed by Rubens, and Vandyck painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country. He died in 1670, though some say in 1662.

SNAYERS, HENRY. See SNYERS.

SNELLINCKS, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1544. It is not known under whom he studied. He painted history, but he chiefly excelled in depicting battles and skirmishes of cavalry, which are ranked among the ablest productions of his time. His compositions are judiciously grouped, his figures and horses correctly designed, his attitudes spirited and graceful, and his aerial perspective and chiaro-scuro excellent. His pictures are full of fire and energy, and produce a surprising effect; he expressed the hurry and confusion of an engagement with singular judgment and skill. He contrived to relieve and animate his figures in an artful manner, by contrasting them with the dark masses of clouds of smoke. According to van Mander, several princes and persons of the highest rank employed him incessantly; Vandyck esteemed him one of the ablest artists of the Low Countries, and painted his portrait, which was afterwards placed over his tomb in the church of St. James at Antwerp. He resided chiefly at Antwerp, and was appointed battle painter to the Archduke Albert and the Archduchess Isabella, governors of the Netherlands. He died in 1638, at the great age of ninety-four years. His name is variously written, Snellincks, Snellinks, Snellinck, and Snellinx. There is a single etching by this artist of his own portrait, after Vandyck.

SNYDERS, FRANCIS, a very eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1579. He studied under Henry van Balen, and confined himself for some time to painting subjects of fruit, flowers, and still life, in which he excelled, but his genius led him to paint animals and huntings, which he designed in a grand style, with surprising fire and spirit. It has been asserted by D'Argenville and others that he went to Italy, and improved himself by studying a long time with Benedetto Castiglione; a palpable error, for Snyder was an old man when that artist began to distinguish himself, who was born in 1616. It is very probable that he never left Flanders, and it is certain that he frequented the studio of Rubens, who was a great admirer of his talents, and often employed him to paint the animals, fruit, &c. in his pictures, though he himself represented those objects in so admirable a manner. The favorite subjects of Snyder were all kinds of animals, combats of wild beasts and subjects of the chase, which he represented with wonderful truth and spirit. His pictures are designed in a grand style, his composition is rich varied, and ingenious. He gave to every animal an expression adapted to its species and situation; nothing can be finer than his representations of the ferocious combats and attacks of wild beasts. His pencil is bold and free, peculiarly adapted to express the hairs, furs, and skins of the animals he introduced into his pictures; his coloring is clear, chaste, and vigorous; and his landscapes and accessories are designed and executed in fine taste. He also excelled in interiors of kitchens and larders, stored with all kinds of dead game, fish, fruit, vegetables, &c. When his designs required figures of a larger size than he was accustomed to paint, they were frequently inserted by Jordaens, and sometimes by Rubens, which gave an additional value to his works. He resided most of his life at Antwerp, and it is not known that he ever left that city, except for a short time, when he went to Brussels at the invitation of the Archduke Albert, who appointed him his principal painter, and for whom he executed some of his finest works. The Archduke sent some of these to Philip III. of Spain, who commissioned Snyder to paint several large pictures of subjects from the chase, and combats of wild beasts, which are now in the old palace Buon Retiro. Snyder acquired an immense reputation, and found abundant employment from princes and persons of the highest distinction; his works are now only to be found in public galleries and the choicest collections. Vandyck painted his portrait, which was in the Orleans collection. There is a set of sixteen spirited and masterly etchings of various animals, marked Liure d'Animaux Peint et Gravé par Senedre, which have heretofore been attributed to him, but Bartsch (Peintre Graveur, tom. iv.) has shown that they were executed by John Fyt. The first impressions from the plates are signed Johannes Fyt, pinxit et fecit, or Fyt, pinx. et fec. They were published by Fyt in 1642, dedicated to the Marquis de Solerio, and are extremely rare. The plates afterwards passed into the hands of some person who erased the name of Fyt, and substituted that of Snyder. There are also variations of these prints; particularly some in which the lettering is written backwards, and the prints reversed, attributed by some to imitators; but these are what the trade call transfers; they are produced by laying sheets of paper on the fresh impressions, and subjecting them to pressure, by which means the prints are duplicated, but the transfers are in reverse. The author has several transfers in his possession, after Rubens and other masters. Snyder died at Antwerp in 1657. His name is often erroneously written Sneyders.

SNYERS, or SNAYERS, HENRY, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1612. It is not known with whom he studied, but he imitated the manner of Scheltius Bolswert with considerable success, and probably was the pupil of that master. His drawing is pretty correct, and his prints exhibit much of the character of their originals. He engraved some portraits and other subjects, after Rubens, Vandyck, Jordaeus, Titian, and other masters. He is generally called Snayers, but he signed his prints, Heinrich or H. Snijers.

SOANE, SIR JOHN, a distinguished English architect, born at Reading in 1753. His family was of very obscure origin. At an early age, he was taken into the service of Dance, and afterwards studied under Holland. The first work which brought him into public notice was a design for a triumphal bridge, which drew the gold medal of the Royal Academy. At the recommendation of Sir W. Chambers, in 1777, Soane was sent to Italy, with a pension. An octavo volume of his architectural designs was published the year after his departure. During a three years' residence in Italy, he studied the remains of antiquity and the finest modern edifices with great assiduity, and made several original designs, among others, for a British Senate House and a Royal Palace. He also made the acquaintance of Mr. Thomas Pitt, afterwards Lord Camelford, who assisted him by his influence. On returning to England, he was commissioned to execute several country residences in Norfolk, Suffolk, and other counties, the plans and elevations of which he published in a folio volume in 1788. At the death of Sir Robert Taylor, in the same year, Soane was appointed to the lucrative office of architect of the Bank of England. Other advantageous appointments followed; that of Clerk of the Works of St. James' palace, 1791; Architect of the Woods and Forests, 1795; Professor of Architecture in the Royal Academy, in 1806; and Surveyor of Chelsea Hospital, 1807. In addition to his public employment, he received many commissions for private buildings, and was constantly occupied for many years. He was industrious and indefatigable in the practice of his profession. His works are eminently distinguished for convenient arrangement, and have many striking beauties, though frequently marred by defects. He had great ingenuity and a surprising faculty of contrivance, often producing many happy combinations, particularly in regard to sky-lights; and he is entitled to no small praise, if not for inventing a new order of architecture, yet for being the first to apply and naturalize in England the l'ivoli Corinthian. In the Bank, he used it with great success, and the northwest corner of that magnificent edifice surpasses all his other works. In 1828, Soane published his folio volume of "Public and Private Buildings," containing designs of many edifices erected by him in the preceding years. He made liberal donations to aid the progress of art, such as £1000 to the fund for building the Duke of York's monument, and similar sums to the Royal British Institution. He died at the age of 84, in 1837.

SOBLEO. See DESUBLEO.

SODERINI, MAURO, a painter born at Florence about 1690. He studied with Gio. Giuseppe dal Sole, and was one of his ablest pupils. He executed some works for the churches at Florence, but wrought mostly for individuals. Lanzi says he enjoyed the reputation of an able designer, and that he aimed at beauty and effect. There is a fine picture by him in the church of S. Stefano, representing St. Zanobi restoring a dead Child to life; and another of the Death of St. Joseph, in the Cathedral, attributed to him by some, but by others to his fellow-pupil, Gio. Domenico Ferretti. The time of his death is not known. He was living in 1730.

SODOMA, IL. See RAZZI.

SODOMA, GIOMO or GIROLAMO DEL', a Sieneſe painter, of whom little is known with certainty. According to Vasari, he studied with Gio. Antonio Razzi, called Il Sodoma. He is confounded by Orlandi and Bottari with Jacopo Pacchiarotti, the rival of Razzi, which has led to some discrepancy. Lanzi ſays he was without doubt a pupil of Razzi, and he ſuppoſes he died young.

SOENS, JOHN, a Dutch landscape painter, born at Bois-le-Duc in 1553. He firſt ſtudied with James Boon, and next with Giles Moestaert. He made great progreſs, and was conſidered one of the moſt promiſing young artiſts of his time. He went early to Rome, where he greatly improved himſelf, and his works were much admired. He was employed by the Pope and ſeveral of the nobility in embellishing their palaces. From Rome he went to Parma, where he was taken into the ſervice of the Duke, for whom he executed many works. His landſcapes are deſigned in a grand ſtyle, and his manner was prompt and full of vigor; he had an excellent knowledge of perſpective, and his diſtances recede with a pleaſing degradation; his figures are correctly drawn and touched with great ſpirit. He died at Parma in 1611. Zani ſays he was born in 1547.

SOEST, or ZOEST, GERARD, a German painter, born at Weſtphalia in 1637. He learned the art in his own country, and went to England about 1656, where he painted portraits with reputation, and found abundant employment. Pilkington ſays he was one of the rivals of Sir Peter Lely. His heads are animated and full of truth, his coloring warm, and he gave his figures great relief. At firſt he finiſhed his pictures very highly, and painted his draperies, particularly ſatins, in the manner of Terburg. He however enlarged his manner, by ſtudying the works of Vandyck, and painted with a bolder and freer pencil. He ſucceeded beſt in his male portraits; his manners are ſaid to have been too coarſe and ungraceful to recommend him to the ſofter ſex. He died at London in 1681.

SOEUR, HUBERT LE, a French ſculptor, according to Walpole, was probably born about 1580. He viſited Italy, and ſtudied under Giovanni da Bologna. Very little is known of the circumſtances of his life, except that he viſited England in the firſt part of the 17th century, and was employed in 1633 by the family of Howard Arundel, to execute the bronze equeſtrian ſtatue of Charles I. at Charing Croſs. At the commencement of the civil war it had not been erected, but was ſold to a brazier named John Rivet, with orders to break it in pieces. The latter buried it in the earth, and kept it concealed until the Reſtoration. About 1678 it was placed in its preſent ſituation. The figure of the horſe is heavy, and generally faulty in the model; but the ſtatue of the monarch is exceedingly dignified and expreſſive, and reflects great credit upon the artiſt. Soeur executed many other works in braſs and bronze in various places in England, moſt of which have been deſtroyed. Walpole mentions a bronze buſt at Stourhead, repreſenting Charles I., with a helmet and dragon.

SOGGI, NICCOLO, a painter born at Florence in 1474. He was a ſcholar of Pietro Perugino, whoſe manner he imitated, though his works are designed and executed in a more dry and labored style. He resided chiefly at Arezzo, where there are some of his pictures in the churches, and where he died in 1554.

SOGLIANI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, a painter born at Florence in 1481, and died in 1533. He studied with Lorenzo di Credi for several years; but he afterwards imitated the manner of Bartolomeo di S. Marco, called della Porta, though not very successfully. His genius was better adapted to the simple and agreeable style of his instructor, than to the grand manner of Porta. Lanzi says he lived with Credi for twenty-four years, in imitation of whom he was content to paint less than his cotemporaries, that he might do it better. "Few of his scholars can compare with him for the natural appearance he gave the naked, as well as the clothed figure, or for the conception, as Vasari terms it, of 'handsome, good-natured, sweet, and graceful features.' Like da Vinci, he possessed the rare talent of representing images of virtue by the faces of his saints, and of vice by those of his wicked characters. This is exemplified in his Cain and Abel, in the cathedral of Pisa, in which he introduced a landscape that would do credit to any painter. With equal felicity in the figures, and the back-ground, he painted the Crucifixion of St. Arcadius, in the church of S. Lorenzo at Florence. He entered into competition with Picrino del Vaga, Mecherino, and Andrea del Sarto at Pisa, where he was noted for his dilatoriness, but admired for that happy simplicity and elegance which he always preserved. Some have praised a few of his pictures, as inclining to the manner of Raffaello."

SOIARO, IL. See BERNARDO GATTI.

SOUTZ, G. C., a German engraver, who flourished at Vienna about 1530. He executed some plates for the booksellers.

SOIUS, PHILIP. See SERICCUS.

SOLARI, ANDREA, called also DEL GOBBO, and by Vasari, ANDREA MILANESE, a painter who flourished at Milan about 1530. Vasari, in his life of Correggio, commends him as a beautiful designer, and an excellent colorist; he mentions several of his works in private collections, and his Assumption of the Virgin in the church of the Carthusians at Pavia, where Torre says he wrought in conjunction with Salaino. Zani says he was born in 1458, and died in 1508, and thinks he is the same as Andrea Salai or Salaino, the scholar of Leonardo da Vinci, but he is evidently in error. Several writers have confounded the history of Solari with Salaino, who is also called Salai, and Solaino, from similarity of names. See Salaino.

SOLARIO, ANTONIO, called LO ZINGARO (the Gipsy), a painter born, according to Dominici, at Civita, in Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples, about 1382, and died about 1455. There is considerable discrepancy about this old painter. Lanzi says, "before Zingaro introduced a manner acquired in other schools, the art had made little progress in Naples and her territories. This is clearly proved by the works of Colantonio del Fiore (the scholar of Francesco di Simone), who lived till the year 1444." After giving the life of that painter and of Angiolo Franco, his scholar and an imitator of Giotto, he proceeds, "the art however, was more advanced by Antonio Solario originally a blacksmith, and commonly called Lo Zingaro. His history has something romantic in it, like that of Quintin Matsys, who, from his first profession, was called il Fabbro (the smith), and became a painter from his love to a young girl who promised to marry him when he had made himself a proficient in the art of painting. Solario, in the same manner, being enamored of the daughter of Colantonio del Fiore, and receiving from him a promise of her hand in ten years, if he became an eminent painter, forsook his furnace for the academy, and his file for the pencil. He went to Bologna, where he studied several years with Lippo Dalmasio, called Lippo delle Madonne, from his numerous and beautiful pictures of the Virgin. On leaving Bologna, he visited other parts of Italy to study the works of the best artists in the various schools, as Vivarini in Venice, Bicci in Florence, Pisanello and Gentile da Fabriano in Rome. It has been thought that he assisted the two last and Luca Giordano affirmed that among the pictures in the Lateran, he recognized some heads which were indisputably by Solario. He excelled in this particular, and excited the admiration of Marco da Siena himself, who declared that his countenances seemed alive. He became also a good perspective painter for those times, and respectable in historical compositions, which he enlivened with landscape in a better style than was practiced by other painters before him; he distinguished too, his figures by a drapery peculiar to the age in which he lived, and carefully drawn from nature. He was less happy in designing his hands and feet, often being heavy in his attitudes and crude in his coloring. On his return to Naples, he gave proofs of his skill, and is said to have married the daughter of Colantonio, and to have taught and painted there under the patronage of King Alfonso till about 1455, when he died." He painted numerous pictures, usually portraits of Madonnas, Magdalens, and Saints, for the churches of Naples, very beautiful in form and expression. His most celebrated work was the choir of S. Severino, painted in fresco, representing, in several compartments, the life of S. Benedetto, into which he introduced an incredible number and variety of figures and objects. In the church of S. Domenico Maggiore, he painted a Pietà, or Dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin, and in that of S. Pietro Martire, an altar-piece of St. Vincenzio with some subject from the life of that saint, in which he is said to have surpassed himself. Thus he commenced in Naples a new epoch, which the Cav. Massimo Stanzioni termed the school of Zingaro. There are several of his works in the Museo Borbonico. Some writers assert that Solario was a Venetian, and Rosini gives an outline, (plate 37) of a picture of the Virgin and Infant Christ, with St. John, inscribed Antonius da Solario Venetus, f. The composition has the truth and simplicity of Raffaello, and evidently belongs to a later age. Some writers have mixed up together the histories of Andrea Salaino, Andrea Solari, and Antonio Solario, but with regard to the last there can be no doubt as to his belonging to the Neapolitan school, the time he flourished, and the authenticity of his works.

SOLDANI, MASSIMILIANO, an Italian sculptor and medalist, was born at Florence in 1658. During his infancy, his parents removed to a country seat at Petriolo. As he grew up, he manifested great inclination for art, and was finally sent by an uncle to Florence, where a model in terra cotta, representing the Assumption of the Virgin, gained him the patronage of Baldassare Franceschini, who placed him under the instruction of Giuseppe Arrighi. After progressing rapidly for some time, he was sent by the Grand Duke Cosimo III., with a pension, to Rome, where he studied design under Ciro Ferri, and sculpture under Ercole Ferrata. Manifesting superior excellence in medal engraving, he was commissioned by Queen Christina of Sweden to execute one hundred medals, illustrating the events of her reign; but in consequence of his recall to Florence by the Grand Duke, he only completed five. Before his departure, however, he executed medals of the Cardinals Azzolino, Chigi, and Rospigliosi; also those of Ciro Ferri and Ercole Ferrata, his instructors. Innocent XI. was so greatly pleased with the beauty of these works, that he wished Soldani to engrave his head; but he was obliged to depart for Florence, being a pensioner of the Grand Duke. On arriving there, he received apartments in the buildings of the old mint, and proceeded to execute his magnificent bas-relief of the Decollation of St. John. He afterwards visited Paris, where he engraved a large medal of Louis XV., struck on occasion of the peace, representing on the reverse side, Hercules reposing after destroying the Hydra. In 1686, he returned to Florence, where he executed many medals, statues, and bas-reliefs, in silver and gold, with great delicacy and beauty. After the death of Cosmo III., Soldani found in his successor Ferdinand, the same favor. Among his principal works are, the magnificent bronze candelabras in gilded bronze, in the Nunziata, at Florence; the mausoleums of Marc' Antonio Zondadari, and Don Manuel de Villena, grand master of the Knights of Malta; also twelve busts, three bronze statues, and several bas-reliefs, executed by the commission of the Prince of Lechtenstein, for his rich Museum at Vienna. Soldani established a successful school, which produced a number of able artists, among whom was Gio. Battista Foggini. He died in 1740.

SOLDI, ANDREA, a painter born at Florence about 1702. He went to Aleppo, where he painted the portraits of some English merchants, at whose recommendation he went to London, about 1735. He met with considerable employment there in portraiture, became a member of the Chartered Society of Artists, and exhibited with them till about 1766, when he is supposed to have died.

SOLE. ANTONIO DAL, called IL MANCHINO, a painter born at Bologna in 1606. He studied with Francesco Albano, but afterwards devoted himself to landscapes, in which he became very eminent, and as he always wrought with his left hand, he was called Il Manchino da' Paesi (the left handed landscape painter.) His pictures represent the most charming scenery, and delightful situations, his perspective is admirable, and his distances recede with a pleasing degradation; his coloring is clear and lively, and his touch delicate and free. He decorated his landscapes with groups of graceful and beautiful figures, designed and composed in the style of Albano. He died in 1684. Crespi and others place his birth in 1597, and his death in 1677; but Zani and Lanzi say that he was born in 1606, and died in 1684. Oretti copied the same dates from the Register of la Maddalena.

SOLE, GIOVANNI GIUSEPPE DAL, was the son of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1654. He received his first instructions from his father, and next studied with Domenico Maria Canuti, whom he left to become the disciple of Lorenzo Pasinelli, by whose instruction and advice he gradually rose to great distinction. His life is full of instruction and encouragement to young artists. He did not early exhibit any extraordinary powers, and was diffident of his own performances. He labored incessantly to improve himself, and following the example of Pasinelli, he went to Venice to improve his coloring by studying the works of Paul Veronese. Even after he had executed several admirable works, and acquired distinction—when he was employed to paint the Martyrdom of St. Vittoria for the cathedral of Mirandola, in competition with his fellow pupil, Gio. Antonio Burrini, he was thrown into despair on beholding the picture of his rival so greatly superior to his own. Pasinelli, the common master, reassured him by predicting that he would become a better artist than Burrini, whose facility of genius would at length betray him into mannerism, which prediction was exactly fulfilled, for though he practiced with tolerable care for fifteen years, he at length formed his second style, that of a mere machinist. Lanzi, after giving the life of Burrini, and describing the means by which he lost his reputation, thus contrasts the picture of dal Sole with his. "Gio. Giuseppe dal Sole, on the contrary, burned each day to become more perfect, and gradually raised himself to one of the first posts among the artists of his age. He had constant commissions from noblemen, both native and foreign, and received invitations also from the courts of England and Poland. For some time he followed the style of Pasinelli, but in order to improve it from the same sources, he made frequent visits to Venice, though he never attained to that degree of beauty in his most elegant subjects that formed the boast of his master. In many particulars however, he displays exquisite grace, as in the hair and plumes of his angels, and especially in his accessories, such as veils, bracelets, crowns, and armor. He seems also to have been more inclined to treat powerful themes than Pasinelli; more observant of costume, more methodical in his composition, and more learned in point of architecture and landscape. In these, indeed, he is almost unique, and the most beautiful specimens are to be seen in the Casa Zappi in Imola, representing Evening, Night, and Morning, all very pleasingly distributed with sober tints, such as the subject required. His other works in most instances, exhibit the most lively play of vivid fluctuations of light, more especially in his holy pieces, and celestial visions, as we see in St. Peter of Alcantara, in S. Angiolo at Milan. Moreover he was more exact and polished than Pasinelli, not that he was by any means deficient in celerity in conducting his works, but esteemed it unworthy of an upright character, to bestow upon them less perfection than he was capable of doing. Being employed at Verona by the noble family of Giusti, where he left several mythological pieces and scripture histories, truly beautiful, he executed one of Bacchus and Ariadne, which artists pronounced excellent, in one week; yet he erased the whole and remodeled it according to his own taste, declaring that it was enough to have shown his rapidity of hand to satisfy others, but that it became his duty by additional accuracy to satisfy himself. Hence, his fresco in the church of S. Biagio at Bologna, cost him an infinite deal of labor in its execution; and in conducting his altar-pieces, which are few and valuable, as well as in his pictures for individuals, which are numerous, he called for high remuneration, persevering in his determination to paint only with care." Gio. Giuseppe dal Sole, like many artists, had two manners, the first founded on that of Pasinelli, and the other, which he practiced later in life, on that of Guido, and which procured for him the surname of the Modern Guido. Very many of the pictures which he executed for the collections were painted in this style. Lanzi says a large portion of his pictures nearly approach the taste of Guido. He instructed many pupils. He executed many spirited etchings from his own designs, and after Pasinelli. He died at Bologna in 1719.

SOLEMACKER, J. F., a painter of whom nothing is known except by his pictures. He is said to have flourished in the time of Wynants, Ruysdael, and Berghem. He imitated the manner of Berghem sufficiently to make his pictures pass for the works of that master with the unlearned in such matters. He imitated his grouping, forms, and cattle, in some instances, with considerable success, but his handling is less delicate and free, his coloring less transparent, his shadows are dark, and the general appearance of his pictures heavy. His pictures, though they cannot be compared with the admirable productions of Berghem, possess considerable merit. His greatest skill lay in painting cows, sheep, and goats. There is a piquancy in his manner, a pleasing rural choice in his subjects, and a freedom in the distribution of his objects, which would make his pictures valuable, were it not for their opacity of coloring. He is also said to have sometimes imitated Wouwerman, and occasionally to have imitated the animals and figures in the landscapes of Wynants. His pictures are generally of small size, and always painted on panel. His name is sometimes written Soomemaker, and Zoomemaker.

SOLERI, GIORGIO, a painter born at Alessandria, where he died in 1587. It is not known under whom he studied, but he married the daughter of Bernardino Lanini, for which reason some suppose he was his pupil, though he did not follow his style. He excelled in portraits, in which branch Malvasia ranks him equal to Bartolomeo Passerotti, Giuseppe Arcimboldi, and Gio. da Monte. Lanzi highly commends two of his historical works. One is an altar-piece in the church of the Conventuali at Alessandria, representing the Virgin, to whose protection Sts. Augustin and Francis are recommending the city; there is a fine landscape in the background in the style of Paul Bril. The other is in the church of the Dominicans at Casale, and represents St. Lorenzo kneeling before the Virgin with the holy Infant; near are three cherubs playing with a huge gridiron, the symbol of his martyrdom. Lanzi says in this picture we trace most distinctly a follower of Raf-fabelle in the chasteness of design, the beauty and force of the countenances, and the finished expression. He had a son named Raffaele Angiolo, but he did not rise above mediocrity.

SOLFAROLO, II., a German painter, who, according to Lanzi, flourished at Milan about the middle of the 17th century, where he acquired considerable reputation for his landscapes. His name was Gruenbrech, or Gruembroeck, and he was called Solfarolo for his night-scenes, fires, and conflagrations. He is not mentioned by the Dutch or German writers.

SOLIMENA, ANGELO, a Neapolitan painter, who flourished at Nocera de' Pagani, a place about eighteen miles from Naples, about the middle of the 17th century. He studied under the Cav. Massimo Stanzioni at Naples, and acquired some distinction in his time, but his fame was entirely eclipsed by his son Francesco.

SOLIMENA, CAV. FRANCESCO, called L'ABATE CICCIO. This eminent painter was the son of the preceding, and was born at Nocera de' Pagani, in 1657. His father being in easy circumstances, intended his son for the profession of law, and had him instructed in classical learning, in which he showed apt parts; he had a passion for poetry and design, and is said to have passed whole nights in the pursuit of his favorite studies. The Cardinal Orsini, afterwards Pope Benedict XIII., in passing through Nocera, honored Solimena with a visit, and expressed his approbation of the progress Francesco had made in his studies. Solimena complained of his son's unwise application of his time, which prevented him from making such progress as he might, and requested the Cardinal to remonstrate with the youth. The prelate desired to see the designs, and was so struck with the uncommon talent they evinced, that he advised the father not to thwart his son's inclination, but to allow him to follow a profession for which nature had evidently designed him. Angelo followed this advice, and began to instruct Francesco with great care, so that he was soon able to design from the naked figure. After studying two years with his father, he went to Naples in 1674, at the age of seventeen, and entered the school of Francesco di Maria, but soon left it, as he thought that master too exclusively devoted to design. He then entered the academy of Giacomo del Po, where he assiduously designed from the naked figure, and at the same time began to color. Thus, says Lanzi, he had the advantage of being the scholar of two of the best masters of the Neapolitan school, and he always studied and copied their works. He next proceeded to Rome, where the works of Pietro da Cortona were for some time the models of his imitation. Lanzi says, "at first he imitated Pietro da Cortona, but afterwards formed a manner of his own, still retaining that master as his model, and copying entire figures from him, which he adapted to his new style. This new and striking style of Solimena approaches nearer to that of Preti than any other. The design is not so correct, the coloring not so true, but the faces have more beauty; in these he sometimes imitated Guido, sometimes Maratti, and they are often selected from nature. Hence he is called by some il Calabrese ringentilito (ennobled). To the style of Preti he added that of Lanfranco, whom he named his master, and from whom he adopted that curving form of composition which, perhaps, he carried beyond propriety. From these two masters, he took his chiaro-scuro, which he painted strong in his middle age, but softened as he advanced in years, and then attached himself more to facility and elegance of style. He carefully designed every part of his picture, and corrected it from nature before he colored it; so that in preparing his works, he may be included among the most correct, at least in his better days, for he utterly declined into general facility and opened the way to mannerism. He possessed an elegant and fruitful talent of invention, for which he was celebrated by the poets of his day. He was also characterized by a sort of universality in every style he attempted, extending himself to every branch of the art; history, portrait, landscape, animals, fruit, architecture, utensils, &c.; and whatever he attempted, he seemed formed for that alone. He did everything so well. As he lived to the age of ninety, and was endowed with great celerity of pencil, his works, like those of Giordano, were spread over all Europe. Of that artist, he was at the same time the competitor and the friend, less powerful in genius, but more correct in principles. When Giordano died, Solimena became the first painter in Italy. Notwithstanding what his rivals said of his colors not being true to nature, he began to ask extraordinary prices for his pictures, and still abounded in commissions."

Solimena executed an incredible number of works, in oil and fresco, of large and small size, for the churches and public edifices of Naples, for the kings, princes, and nobility of Europe. The King of Naples held him in such esteem, that he not only commissioned him to paint several pictures, sat to him for his portrait, and conferred on him the honor of knighthood, but he desired him to paint a picture representing himself in familiar conversation with Solimena. He took delight in the instruction of youth, and had many scholars, whom he pointed out, in the most familiar manner, the principles and practice of the art, and the observations he had made; he took especial pains to make his disciples acquainted with the perfections of the most celebrated masters, inculcated the advantage of seeking out the most beautiful natures, forms, and proportions from nature, and uniting them with the correctness, elegance, and grace of the antique. Solimena, notwithstanding his great abilities and merits, is reckoned by Lanzi and other judicious critics, among those artists who used the declension, and accelerated the downfall of Italian art. Pietro da Cortona, Carlo Matti, Luca Giordano, Solimena, Sebastiano Conca, and Pompeo Battoni, regularly followed each other in depravity of style, and by the influence of their immense reputation, gradually reduced the art from the correctness, elegance, and dignity of Raffaele, to a species of mannerism. With Solimena, this was not intentional; as he advanced in years, his facility led him imperceptibly to become less studied and correct, and at length, the gradual failure of his sight increased the difficulty, so that his later performances are not to be compared with his earlier works. Such was his reputation in his time, that anything from his hand was adored and esteemed. The history of art hardly furnishes an example of rapid execution which did not eventually prove injurious to the reputation of the artist; hence great facility of hand is termed by the best critics dangerous. Michael Angelo and Raffaele, though they possessed the greatest facility of hand, never practiced it, but curbed it within proper bounds.

Among the most celebrated works of Solimena are the Sacristy of the PP. Teatini in S. Paolo Maggiore; the arches of the chapel in the church of the Holy Apostles, particularly commended; the chapel of S. Filippo in the church of the Oratorio, conducted with extreme care; the Sanfelice, so called from his noble scholar Ferdinand; the great altar in the church of the monks of S. Gaudioso; four immense pictures in the choir of the church of Monte Cassino, and many others in the churches at Naples, and various places in the kingdom. His private pictures are to be found in all the best collections of Naples. At Rome, the princes Albani and Colonna, have some large compositions by him, and the Bonaccorsi family, a great number in the gallery of Macerata. One of his best works is a picture of the Last Supper, in the Refectory of the Conventuali at Assisi. He died at Naples in 1747. His name is generally, but erroneously written Solimene. Dominici read it Solimena on his tomb.

SOLIS, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter who flourished at Madrid in the first part of the 17th century. He studied with Alonso Herrera of Segovia. Little is known of him, or his works. Bermudez says he did not practice much as a professor.

SOLIS, FRANCISCO DE, was the son of the preceding, born at Madrid in 1629. According to Bermudez, his father intended him for the church, but his passion for painting induced him to instruct him in the art. At the age of eighteen he painted a picture for the Capuchins of Villarubia de los Ojos, which being exhibited on a public solemnity at the convent de la Piedad at Madrid, attracted the notice of connoisseurs, and Philip IV. was so much pleased with the performance, that he directed the artist to sign it with his name and age. This incident brought him immediately into notice, and he soon gained abundant employment. When the Queen Louisa of Orleans, made her solemn entry into Madrid, he contributed to the splendor of the decorations by a series of paintings representing the labors of Hercules, from the designs of Claudio Coello; but the work which established his reputation was a picture representing the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin. Henceforward, says his biographer, his conceptions were all the vogue. He contributed much to the advancement of Painting in Spain. He opened an academy in his house, to which he admitted young artists, free of expense, to draw from the living model. He wrote an account of the Spanish painters, sculptors, and architects, and engraved several portraits for its embellishment, but he did not live to publish the work, and the manuscript was afterwards lost. He left books, prints, and drawings worth 6000 ducats. He died in 1684.

 SOLIS, VIRGIL, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1514, and was living in 1581. Little is known of him with any certainty, except by his prints, executed both on wood and copper, amounting to upwards of 800, which are usually marked with one of the above monograms. His prints are chiefly from his own designs, and of small size; hence he is classed with the little masters. His copper plates engraved in the early part of his life, resemble the works of Hans Sebald Beham, but when he afterwards engraved after the Italian masters, he adopted a style more open and spirited. His wooden cuts are similar to those of Jost Amman, both in respect to composition and execution. His works prove him to have possessed a fertile invention, and though the design is stiff and formal, some of them possess great merit. As with many of the old German artists, it is a disputed question, whether he engraved on wood himself at all, or employed others to execute the cuts from his designs. It is a profitless discussion, and adds or detracts little from the value of their productions. Doubtless Solis not only wrought himself, but employed others to assist him in the execution of his numerous works, as is done at the present day. There is a great difference in his prints, especially in his wooden cuts, and some of them bear the mark of the engraver or assistant, in addition to his own, which signifies that the print was designed and traced by himself, which made the work practically his own. The following are his principal prints:

A variety of small engravings on copper, representing hunting subjects; dated 1541. A set of Vases and Ornaments for goldsmiths; do. The Marriage of Cupid and Psyche, the Assembly of the Gods, Mount Parnassus, and several other subjects; after Raffaele. The Bath of the Anabaptists; copied from Aldegrever.

WOODEN CUTS.

Several sets of small historical subjects from the Bible. The Metamorphoses of Ovid, in one hundred and seventy cuts; published at Frankfort in 1563. A set of cuts for the Emblems of Nicholas Reuser. 1581. Another set of cuts for the Emblems of Andreas Alciatus. 1581.

SOLOMAYOR, LUIS DE. See SOTOMAYOR.

SOLON, an ancient engraver on gems, who flourished at Rome in the time of Augustus, and was a cotemporary of Dioscorides. His name is affixed to an ancient portrait, which for a long time was supposed to represent the Athenian Lawgiver, but has since been attributed to this artist, and probably represents Mæcenas, whom he often portrayed. Among his other productions were, a portrait of Diomed sitting; a head of Medusa; Cupid standing; and a head of Hercules.

SOLVYNS, FRANCIS BALTHASAR. This painter and engraver was born at Antwerp in 1760. After acquiring a knowledge of the art, he practiced marine painting for some time, and executed, among other works, a View from the port of Ostend, engraved on a large plate by Daudet, and now in the palace at Vienna. His taste for travel induced him to embark in the squadron of Sir Home Popham, for the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. He made many exact designs of the shores of the Red Sea; and on arriving at Calcutta, he commenced making designs to illustrate the manners and customs of the East Indians. A part of these he engraved and published at Calcutta in 1799, and, according to his own account, they were favorably received. Solvyns afterwards returned to Europe, and published at Paris his entire work in four folio volumes, in 1809, and the three succeeding years, containing 288 colored plates, engraved by himself, with descriptions in English and French. It bears the marks of great care and expense; but it met with little encouragement, and involved the author in pecuniary embarrassment. The subscription price was $500. Solvyns died at Antwerp in 1824.

SOLY, ARTHUR, an obscure English engraver, who flourished about 1683. He was employed by Robert White, and engraved a few portraits for the book publishers.

SOMER, or SOMEREN, MATTHIAS VAN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1660. He engraved some portraits, and a set of landscapes, marked with the initials, M. V. S.

 SOMER, JOHN VAN, a Dutch engraver, supposed to have been a relative of the preceding, who flourished about 1675. He engraved some portraits and other subjects, after the Dutch masters, indifferently executed. He usually marked his prints with one of the accompanying monograms.

SOMER, PAUL VAN, a Dutch engraver, probably of the same family with John van S. He went to Paris, where he resided some time. He finally settled in London, where he died in 1694. He executed quite a number of plates, from his own designs and after other masters, some of which are etched, and others engraved in line or mezzotinto.

SOMERS, or SOMEREN, BERNARD and PAUL, two Flemish painters, born at Antwerp—the first in 1579, and the last in 1581. Little is known of them. Bernard went to Italy, and on his return joined his brother at Antwerp, where it is said they painted history with reputation. Bernard died in 1632, and Paul in 1641.

SOMMERAU, LUDWIG, a German painter and engraver, born at Wolfenbüttel in 1750. He studied engraving under Christian de Mechel, at Basle. He went to Rome, where he engraved several portraits, and some pieces after Raffaele, Guido, Domenichino, and Guercino, the most important of which are twenty plates from the designs for tapestry in the Vatican, by Raffaele. These were published at Rome in 1780. The same, with six additional plates, were published in London in 1837, by Cattermole, with explanations.

SOMPEL, or SOMPELEN, PETER VAN, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp, about 1600.—He studied with Peter Soutman, whose style he followed with success. His plates are neatly executed with the graver, and produce a pleasing effect. His portraits are the best. Among others are the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Paracelsus, the famous Physician; after Soutman. Henry, Count of Nassau; do. Philip of Nassau, Prince of Orange; do. The Emperor Charles V.; after Rubens. Cardinal Ferdinand, brother to Philip IV.; Governor of the Netherlands; after Vanduyck. Isabella Clara Eugenia, Infanta of Spain; do. Gaston, Duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XII.; do. Margaret, his consort; do. Philip the Bold, Duke of Burgundy; after J. van Eyck. Frederick Henry of Nassau; after G. Honthorst.

SUBJECTS.

Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; after Rubens. The Crucifixion; do. Juno and Ixion; do.

SON, or ZOON, JORIS VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1622. It is not known under whom he studied, but he excelled in painting fruit and flower pieces. His pictures are well designed, his pencil light and flowing, and his coloring clear and natural. He died in 1676.

SON, or ZOON, JOHN VAN. was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp about 1650. He studied with his father, whom he greatly surpassed. He painted similar subjects, and designed everything from nature with a fidelity and precision that approaches to illusion. He went early in life to England, where he married the niece of Robert Streater, and succeeded to most of his business. He painted fruit, flowers, dead game, vases, curtains fringed with gold, Turkey carpets, and other objects of still life, which he composed in a picturesque manner, and executed with a free and spirited pencil. Lord Orford calls his name Francis van Son, but Descamps and others say his name was John. He died at London in 1700, though some say he was born in 1661, and died in 1723.

SON, NICOLAS DE, a French engraver of whom little is known, except by a few prints, in which he imitated Callot with considerable success, and doubtless he was a pupil of that master. He was a native of Rheims, and flourished about 1628. He is sometimes called Anthony, but he signed his prints N. de Son, fecit.

SONNIN, ERNEST GEORGE, a German architect, born at Perleberg in 1709. While acquiring a liberal education at Altona, he formed an intimate friendship with an artist named Moller, who instructed him in design, and received from him in return instruction in mathematics. Several years afterwards, he was induced by a wealthy citizen of Hamburg, named Rahusen, to study architecture; and he made such rapid progress that he was soon commissioned to erect an edifice at Altona. The Senate of Hamburg, probably at the instance of his patron, appointed him second architect of the church of St. Michael, erected in place of the one consumed by lightning in 1750. In this work, notwithstanding Prey had the ostensible direction, the talents of Sonnin controlled the operations. He was subsequently employed on various edifices, and sustained a deserved reputation until his death, in 1794.

SONS, GIOVANNI. See SOENS.

SOPHONISBA. See ANGOSCIOLA.

SOPRANI, RAFFAELLE, a painter born at Genoa in 1612. He studied successively under Giulio Benso and Sinibaldo Scorza, after which he applied himself to landscape under Godefrói Vals. He painted landscapes, perspectives, and architectural subjects with applause, though he was rather an amateur than a professor of the art. He wrote the Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects of Genoa, published at Genoa after his death, in 1674, 4to. He died in 1672.

SORDO, DI SESTRI, IL. See ANTONIO TRAVI.

SORDO D' URBINO, IL. See ANTONIO VIVIANI.

SORDO, GIOVANNI DEL, called also MONE DA PISA, a painter who flourished at Pisa about 1650. It is not known under whom he studied, but he is commended by Morrona for some works in the churches at Pisa, particularly in the Cathedral. Lanzi says that his coloring seems superior to his invention.

SORE, NICOLAS DE, an excellent French engraver, who flourished at Rheims in the first part of the 17th century. Among his principal plates were the façade of the church of S. Nicaise, and the grand entrance to the Cathedral at Rheims, which were greatly admired. De Sore died in the prime of life, about 1625.

SORELLO, MIGUEL, a Spanish engraver, born at Barcelona about 1700. He went to Rome, and studied with Giacomo (James) Frey. He executed a part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published in 1757 and 1761. He also engraved several plates after the Italian masters, the principal of which are a set of eight plates from the tapestry in the Vatican, designed by Raffaele, as follows:

The Nativity. The Purification of the Virgin. Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter. Christ descending into Hell. The Resurrection. Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus. Christ appearing to Magdalene. The Conversion of St. Paul.

SORGH, ZORG, or ZORGH. See ROKES.

SORIA, GIO. BATTISTA, an Italian architect, born at Rome in 1581. His instructor is not mentioned, but he obtained considerable employment through the patronage of Cardinal Scipione Borghese. Milizia gives him little credit for excellence. Among his principal works are the façade of the church della Vittoria; that of S. Carlo de' Catenari; the porticos and façade of S. Gregorio; and the church of S. Caterina da Siena, on the Monte Magnanapoli. Soria died in 1651.

SORIANI, CARLO, a painter who flourished at Pavia about the middle of the 17th century. Little is known of him. He is commended by Bartoli for several works he executed for the churches at Pavia, particularly for his picture of the Rosario, accompanied by fifteen Mysteries, in the Cathedral. Lanzi says he deserves to be better known.

SORIANI, NICCOLO, a painter who flourished at Cremona in the latter part of the 15th century. According to Baruffaldi, he was an artist of considerable note in his day at Cremona. He was the maternal uncle of Benvenuto Tisio, who, after having received his first instruction from Panetti at Ferrara, went to Cremona, and studied with Soriani till the death of the latter in 1499.

SORNIQUE, DOMINIQUE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1707. He studied with Charles Simonneau, whose style he followed with considerable success. He engraved a variety of vignettes and other book plates, in a neat, clear, and pleasing style; also some larger plates of portraits and other subjects, among which are Cardinal Richelieu, and John Louis, Duke of Epernon, after Nanteuil; Admiral Louis Bourbon, after Mignard; Marshal Saxe, after Rigaud; Diana and her Nymphs, after Correggio; the Rape of the Sabines, after Luca Giordano; and Peasants regaling, after Teniers. A list of his works may be found in Nagler's Lexicon. He died in 1756.

SORRI, PIETRO, a painter born at Siena in 1556. After receiving instruction from Arcangelo Salimbeni in his native city, he went to Florence, and became the disciple of the Cav. Passignano, whose system he adopted, which was characterized by a mixture of the Florentine and Venetian schools. He married the daughter of that master, and accompanied him to Venice, where he improved himself by studying the works of Paul Veronese, whose splendid and magnificent style is discernible in his best works. On his return to Florence, he received the highest marks of approbation and applause, for the elegance and taste of his composition and design, and the beauty and brilliancy of his coloring. Lanzi says, "he emulated the style of Passignano with such success that their works bear a perfect resemblance, and are held in equal estimation; though he wrought with less facility, his design was more graceful, and his coloring more durable." He executed many works for the churches of Florence, and all the cities of Tuscany, particularly at Pisa, where he painted for the Cathedral a vast picture on canvass, representing the ceremony of the consecration of that edifice, and another of Christ disputing with the Doctors—two of his best works, in which he imitated the grand style of Veronese, in his architecture and other accessories. He was employed in the convent of S. Sebastiano at Siena, in competition with the best Sieneese artists. He was also employed in the convent of the Carthusians at Pavia, and appointed preceptor in the Academy of Genoa. He died in 1622.

SOSTRATUS of Cnidus, the son of Dexiphanes, was a celebrated ancient architect, and flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He constructed in his own country the noted hanging gardens, concerning which there have been formed so many conjectures. His greatest work, however, according to Strabo, was the celebrated light-house on the Isle of Pharos, considered among the seven wonders of the world. It was 450 feet high, divided into several stories, each decreasing in size; the ground story was hexagonal, the sides alternately concave and convex, each an eighth of a mile in length; the second and third stories were of the same form; the fourth was a square, flanked by four round towers; the fifth was circular. The whole edifice was of wrought stone; a magnificent staircase led to the top, where fires were lighted every night, visible from the distance of a hundred miles, to guide the coasting vessels. Sostratus is said to have engraved an inscription on stone, and covered it over with a species of cement, upon which he sculptured the name of Ptolemy, calculating that the cement would decay, and bring to light his original inscription. Strabo says it read, Sostratus, the friend of kings, made me. Lucian reports differently, and more probably, thus, Sostratus of Cnidus, the son of Dexiphanes, to the Gods the Saviors, for the safety of Mariners. It is also said that Ptolemy left the inscription to the inclination of the architect; and that by the Gods the Saviors were meant the reigning king and queen, with their successors, who were ambitious of the title of Soter or Savior.

SOTO, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1592. He studied with Bartolomeo Carducci, whom he assisted in several of his works, and whose style he followed. He possessed great talents, and according to Bermudez, was "selected from among the great professors of his time to decorate in fresco the Queen's dressing room, in the palace of the Prado;" but this work was doubtless executed from the designs of Carducci, who was then in the service of the king. (See Carducci.) He painted several pictures in oil, which gained him great reputation, and he was rising rapidly in public estimation, as one of the most promising artists of his time, when he died in the flower of his life, in 1620.

SOTO, DON LORENZO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1634. He studied under Benito Manuel de Agüero, whose manner he followed. According to Palomino, he painted landscapes, decorated with figures of hermits and saints, with high reputation, till the government attempted to impose a tax on artists, when he abandoned painting, and retired to Yecla, in Murcia, where he obtained the post of collector of the royal rents. During this retirement, he made many sketches of the beautiful scenery of the country, and after an absence of about 50 years, he returned to Madrid and resumed his pencil, but his works were looked upon (as well they might be) with indifference, and the poor old man was under the necessity of selling them in the public places to gain a subsistence. He died in 1688, aged 54, so that the account is not only bombastic, but contradictory.

SOTOMAYOR, LUIS DE, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1635. He first studied with Estéban March in his native city, and afterwards went to Madrid, where he entered the school of Juan Carreno. On his return to Valencia, he acquired considerable reputation, and executed several works for the churches and convents in that city, which are highly commended by Bermudez. He died in 1673.

SOUBEYRAN, PETER, a Swiss painter and architect, was born at Geneva in 1708. He visited Paris quite young, and resided there about twenty years, during which time he engraved most of the plates for Mariette's Traité des pierres antiques gravées du Cabinet du Roi, after the designs of Bouchardon. Among his other plates were a variety of vignettes and other book ornaments, after Cochin and others; also the portrait of Peter the Great, after Caravac; the Arms of the city of Paris, supported by Genii, after Bouchardon; and the Fair Maid of the Village, after Boucher. On returning to Geneva, Soubeyran devoted himself to the study of architecture, and gained considerable distinction. He was employed for many years upon the most important edifices of Geneva; and he filled with distinction the office of director of the school of design, established in that city. He died in 1775.

SOUFFLOT, JACQUES GERMAIN, an eminent French architect, born at Irancy, near Auxerre, in 1713. After receiving a liberal education, he studied mathematics and drawing at Paris, and afterwards visited Rome for improvement. Through the influence of M. de St. Aignan, he was admitted as a pensionary in the French Academy, and soon attained distinction. Several new edifices having been projected in the city of Lyons, the commissioners requested the directors of the French Academy at Rome to send them an able architect, and they decided upon Soufflot. He erected several fine edifices in that city, among which are the Hotel Dieu, the Exchange (now the Protestant church), and the grand Hospital, an immense edifice, the façade being over 1000 feet in length. Having acquired considerable distinction by these works, Soufflot was invited to Paris, and was chosen a member of the Academy of Architecture. At the invitation of M. de Marigny (the brother of Madame de Pompadour) superintendent of the Crown Buildings, he visited Italy in 1750, and examined the Antiquities of Paestum. In 1754 he was again employed at Lyons to erect the Grand Theatre.

The ancient church of S. Genevieve having fallen into decay, it was determined that it should be rebuilt. Among a number of designs for the new edifice, that of Soufflot obtained the preference; and in 1757 the works were commenced, but they proceeded so slowly that the ceremony of laying the first stone by Louis XV. did not take place until 1764. This magnificent work is distinguished for good proportions, elegance and beauty of outline, simplicity, and grandeur. A single order, with Corinthian columns sixty feet high, forms a grand portico, crowned with a pediment filled with sculpture. The entablature is continued along the whole building, of which it constitutes almost the sole decoration, the interior being lighted by the dome, and several semi-circular windows above the internal colonnades, which are not visible externally. The lower part of the dome is encircled by a Corinthian peristyle of thirty-two columns, thirty-six feet high, on an unbroken podium or stylobate. The interior is in the form of a Greek cross, the breadth being uniform, 104 feet, the principal nave 295 feet, and the transept, 262 feet. Including the portico, the total length of the edifice is 352 feet. Instead of pier arches, the aisles are formed by insulated Corinthian columns, forty feet high, producing an air of great richness and lightness. Soufflot did not live to see his great work completed. It was afterwards generally known as the Pantheon. He was honored with the Order of St. Michael, and, according to Milizia, his labors have greatly aided the progress of the art in France. Besides the edifices already mentioned, Soufflot erected others, among which were the treasury and sacristy of Notre Dame; the Ecole de Droit, in the Place du Pantheon; the Orangery at the Chateau de Menars; and several private hotels. He died in 1780. In the next year, his friend M. Duminot, Professor of Architecture, published a number of his drawings, under the title of Elevations et coupes de quelques Edifices de France et d'Italie, dessinées par feu M. Soufflot, Architecte du Roi. et gravées par ses ordres.

SOURCHES. LOUIS FRANÇOIS DU BOUCHET, MARQUIS, grand marshal of France, was an amateur engraver, and is supposed to have learned the art of Stefano Della Bella, who resided at Paris from 1640 to about 1649. He copied some prints by that master, in which he imitated his style so successfully that proofs before the letter have sometimes been mistaken for the originals. In the print department of the Bibliothèque, at Paris, are nineteen pieces by him, all of them copied from Della Bella. They are entitled Diuerfes figures et Maneiges de Cheuaux Gravées par le Marquis de Sourches. His prints are very rare. Dumesnil also attributes to him twelve pieces from his own designs, as follows:

1. Le Berger. 2. L'Homme de Qualité. 3. La Dame de Qualité. 4. Le Duel. 5. Le Porte-drapeau. 6. La Marchande de vieux Habits. 7. Le Depart pour la Chasse. 8. Le Promeneur. 9. Le Pêcheur. 10. Le Puits. 11. Les Ramoneurs. 12. Le Batelier.

SOUTMAN, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Haerlem, according to Nagler, about 1580, and to others, 1590. He studied painting under Rubens, and painted history and portraits with considerable success, particularly at the courts of Berlin and Warsaw. He is, however, better known as an engraver. He executed a considerable number of prints from his own designs, and after Rubens and other masters, in which he aimed at producing a striking effect by keeping all the masses of light broad and clear; but by carrying this idea too far, some of his prints, though neatly executed, have a slight, unfinished appearance. He engraved several portraits of the Counts of Flanders, and other distinguished personages. A full list of his works may be found in Nagler's Lexicon. He operated as late as 1650. The following are his best prints:

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

The Fall of the Angels. The first impressions are before the address of the younger Bouttat. The Defeat of the Army of Sennacherib. Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter; from a design by Rubens, after Raffaele. The Last Supper; from a drawing by Rubens, after Leonardo da Vinci. The Miraculous Draught of Fishes. The dead Christ at the Tomb, with the Holy Women; the first impressions are before the shadows were strengthened by Witdoeck. The Crucifixion. The Consecration of a Bishop. The Rape of Proserpine. The Triumph of Venus. Silenus supported by a Satyr and a Negress. A Boar-hunt. 1642. The Hunting of the Lion and Lioness. Do. of the Wolf. Do. of the Crocodile and Hippopotamus.

SOZZI, OLIVIO, a Sicilian painter, and a native of Catania, who flourished in the 17th century. According to Hackert, he studied at Naples, and executed many excellent works for the churches at Palermo, particularly in S. Giacomo, where all the altars have pictures by him, besides three large ones in the tribune, of subjects from the infancy of Christ. There was another Sozzi, named Francesco, who is highly commended for his picture of Five Saints, bishops of Agrigentum, in the Cathedral of that city.

SPADA, LIONELLO, a painter born at Bologna in 1576. When a boy, he was employed in the school of the Caracci as a color-grinder. Possessing a lively imagination, it was not long before the display of genius by which he was surrounded inspired him with the ambition to become a painter. He accordingly occupied his leisure hours in imitating the objects before him, following the instructions given to the pupils, which, being observed by the Caracci, they commended him, and admitted him into the academy. His progress under their instruction was rapid, and he became one of the most eminent disciples of that distinguished school. Lanzi relates an interesting anecdote of his ready wit and quick parts. When Giovanni da Capugnano came from his native hills and settled at Bologna, misled by a pleasing self-delusion, and the flattery he had received, he imagined himself the greatest painter in the world. He requested the Caracci to send him a pupil from their school, that he might polish him in his studio. They accordingly sent Lionello Spada, an admirable wit, who went and copied some of his designs, affecting the utmost obsequiousness towards his new master. At length, thinking it time to put an end to the jest, he left behind him an exquisite picture of Lucretia, and over the door some fine satirical verses, in apparent praise, but real ridicule of Capugnano, who only accused Lionello of ingratitude for having acquired from him, in so short a time, such excellence in the art; but the Caracci at last acquainted him with the joke, which acted as a complete antidote to his folly. One of his first public works was a picture of Sts. Francesco and Domenico, kneeling before the Virgin, in the Chiesa de Poveri at Bologna, which excited general admiration. Malvasia relates that Guido, on seeing this performance, sarcastically observed that the powers of Lionello seemed to be confined to decoration, which so exasperated him that he determined to rival the graceful and delicate style of that master, by adopting a system more masculine and vigorous. Vindictively bent on this purpose, he had recourse to the novel and energetic style of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, which at that time was exceedingly popular. He accordingly went to Rome, and studied some time under that master. This emulation, though it fell short of its object, carried Spada further than he otherwise would have reached. In adopting the daring contrasts of light and shadow which distinguish the works of Caravaggio, he avoided his incorrectness, and introduced something of the dignity and elevation which characterize the school of the Carracci, though his forms are neither beautiful nor select. On his return to Bologna, he acquired great celebrity, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Bologna and Reggio, particularly in the latter city, where he resided a long time, and instructed many pupils. The latter part of his life was passed at Parma, in the service of the Duke Ranuccio, till the death of his patron, whom he did not long survive. Among his best works at Bologna are, the Miraculous Draught of Fishes, in the refectory of S. Procolo; and his celebrated altar-piece in the church of S. Domenico, representing that Saint burning heretical books, which last is considered his masterpiece. He sometimes marked his pictures with the letter L., crossed with a sword, which is the rebus of his name, Spada in Italian signifying sword. He died at Parma in 1622, in the prime of life.

SPADA, VERONICA, an Italian paintress, who excelled in painting fruit, flowers, and birds. She flourished at Bologna about the middle of the 17th century.

SPADARINO, GIO. ANTONIO, a painter born at Rome in 1600, and died in 1648. Little is known of him. Orlandi says he was of the family of the Galli, and that he painted in the church of S. Pietro in Valeria with a talent that entitles him to more consideration than he has received from biographers.

SPADARO, MICCO. See GARGIOLI.

SPAENDONCK, GERARD VAN, an eminent Dutch painter of fruit and flowers, was born at Tilburg in 1746. After studying under the elder Herreyns, a flower painter of Antwerp, he visited Paris at the age of twenty-four, and devoted himself to miniature painting. Through the kindness of Watelet he obtained, in 1774, the appointment of miniature painter to the king, and his excellence in flower-painting, which he constantly practiced, soon gained him great reputation. His exquisite productions were distinguished for tasteful arrangement, correct design, and coloring natural, light, transparent, harmonious, and delicate.—They were in great request, and were purchased for the choicest collections. In 1781, Spaendonck was chosen a member of the Academy of Painting; and during the civil commotions of France, he discharged the office of Professor of Iconography at the Jardin des Plantes. At the formation of the Institute, he was appointed Professor, and discharged his duties with highly commendable ability, assiduity, and kindness. He published a work entitled Fleurs dessinées d'après Nature. There are four of his pictures in the Louvre, which are greatly admired. Spaendonck died at Paris in 1822.

SPAGGIARI, GIOVANNI, a painter of Reggio, of whom little is known. According to Tiraboschi, he was a skillful painter of perspective and architecture, and was much employed in decorating theatres. He died in the service of the king of Poland, in 1730.

SPAGGIARI, PELLEGRINO, was the son of the preceding, born at Reggio. After receiving instruction from his father, he studied with Francesco Galli, called Bibiena, and became one of the most skillful of the decorative painters of Lombardy. He went to France, where he died in 1746.

SPAGNOLETTO. See RIBERA.

SPAGNUOLO, GIOVANNI, called Lo SPAGNO. This artist was a Spaniard. He studied with Pietro Perugino at Perugia, whose style he followed. In the opinion of Vasari, the coloring of Perugino survived in him more than in any of his fellow-scholars. He established himself at Spoleto, at which place and Assisi he left his best works. He excelled also in portraits. Lanzi says, "In a chapel of the Angioli below Assisi, there remains the picture described by Vasari, in which are the portraits of the brotherhood of St. Francis; and perhaps no other painter of this school painted portraits with more truth, if we except Raffaello himself, with whom no other painter is to be compared." He was living in 1524, and probably later. He is doubtless the same artist mentioned by Bermudez under the name of Juan de Espana, which see.

SPAGNUOLO, IL. See GIUSEPPE CRESPI.

SPALTHOF, N., a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem, in 1636. After studying in his own country, he went to Italy, where he resided several years. He excelled in painting Italian fairs, markets, carnivals, and merry-makings. His pictures are ingeniously composed in the Italian taste, correctly designed, and neatly and spiritedly touched. He copied everything after nature, and had an excellent knowledge of chiaro-scuro, which enabled him to give his figures and objects a fine relief. He died in 1691.

SPECCHI, ALESSANDRO, an Italian engraver, who flourished from about 1665 to 1706, and is supposed to have died in 1710. He engraved a large number of views of the palaces and public edifices in and about Rome, which are executed with the graver in a bold and spirited style. These were published at different periods, and a set was published by Dom. de Rossi, in 1699.

SPECKLIN, VITUS RODOLPHUS, a German engraver on wood, who flourished at Strasburg about 1540. He engraved a set of cuts for Fuchs's Herbal, published in that year, with a whole-length portrait of the author, the engraver's own portrait, and those of Henry Fullmaurer and Albert Maher, the artists who designed the prints. The cuts are executed in a neat and spirited style. His name is variously written Specklin, Speckle, and Speckle.

SPECKTER, ERWIN, an eminent German painter, was born at Hamburg in 1806. During the siege of that city, in the winter of 1813-14, his parents took refuge at Altona, in the house of the banker Dehn. A painter named Herterich was also residing in the house of Dehn, from whom the young Erwin acquired some ideas of art, and his taste was also developed by spending most of his time in contemplating a good collection of pictures in that city. In 1818, his father and Herterich established a lithographic press, and young Speckter made some attempts at designs and portraits. In 1822, Rumohr returned to Hamburg from his second visit to Italy, and was much surprised at the talents of Speckter, encouraged him to persevere, and gave him much valuable instruction. In 1825, he visited Munich, and entered the school of Cornelius, who greatly admired his talents, and commissioned him to decorate one of the vaults of the Pinacotheca, with subjects from the life of Fra Giovanni da Fiesole. Unfortunately, this building was not ready for the work until many years after. In 1827, Speckter returned to Hamburg, chiefly on account of his desire to be near Overbeck's celebrated picture of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem, in the Marian Kirche at Lubec, while painting his picture of Christ and the Samaritan Woman. The study of this work seems to have had a prejudicial effect, by inducing him to strive after abstract ideal representation. His inward dissatisfaction at his own attempts may be inferred from his immediate, though gradual, change of manner; for his next work, the Women at the Tomb, is in a more natural style, both in design and coloring. About this time, he also painted several beautiful miniatures of sacred subjects. In 1830, he appeared in an entirely new character, in his arabesque mythological representations of Syndicus Sieveking, near Hamburg. In the same year, he set out for Italy. His originally transcendental ideas of art had been gradually yielding to the dictates of experience, and the immortal productions of the Roman and Venetian schools finally drew him, by the essential attractions of art, from an abstract conventional system to the imitation of nature. At Rome he executed a number of studies, in the general spirit of Italian art; also two pictures of Albano Women, and a large painting of Samson and Delilah. After spending three years in Italy, he was commissioned to paint in fresco the villa of Dr. Abendroth, at Hamburg. Returning to his native country in the summer of 1834, he executed three of the principal cartoons, and commenced the frescos in the ensuing spring. The subjects were, Minerva receiving the winged Pegasus from the Muses, near the Hippocrene fountain; the Graces, in a grove of laurels, decorating the bow and quiver of Cupid, and offering him a cup of ambrosial drink; and the Fates reclining on cushions, lulled by the lyre of Cupid. The first of these admirable designs, distinguished for the exquisite beauty of its forms, was completed in fresco; the second was partially finished; the third was not commenced. Speckter had for some time been afflicted with the asthma, and his weak state finally obliged him to relinquish his operations, about the first of November, and he died on the 23d of that month, in 1835, deeply lamented by all the friends of art. The letters he wrote while in Italy, were published in two vols. 12mo., at Leipsic, in 1846, under the title of Briefe eines Deutschen Künstlers aus Italien, or Letters of a German Artist from Italy. They are accompanied with an account by his friend Rumohr, of the character of Speckter's genius, and are full of interesting information and reflections upon art.

SPEERS, M., a German painter and engraver, born at Regensburg (now Ratisbon), in 1700. Little is known of him with certainty. He is said to have visited Italy, and studied with Solimena; at all events he imitated the manner of that master in painting, and he engraved some of his allegories and martyrdoms. He painted several altar-pieces and historical pictures, and engraved several plates from his own designs, as well as other masters. His prints are marked M. Speers inv. et fecit. Hence, he is called Martin or Michael S. Some of his prints are dated 1742. The time of his death is not certainly known, though Zani says he died in 1762.

SPELT, ADRIAN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden or Gouda (for writers differ) in 1630. He studied with W. Crabeth, and excelled in painting flower-pieces. He went to Germany, where he resided a long time, and was much patronized by the Elector of Brandenburg. He afterwards returned to Leyden, where he died in 1674. His works were held in great estimation in his time.

SPENCER, JARVIS, an English miniature painter, who died in 1763. He was a self-made artist, originally the servant of a gentleman, through whose influence and his own talents and application, he acquired considerable reputation and practice.

SPERA, CLEMENTE, a painter who flourished at Milan in the first half of the 18th century. It is not known under whom he studied, but he excelled in painting landscapes, architectural ruins, and perspective views. These were sometimes decorated with figures by Alessandro Magnasco, which see.

SPERANZA, GIOVANNI, a painter of Vicenza, who flourished about 1500. He studied with Andrea Mantegna, and followed his style with success. Lanzi says there are a few of his pictures at Vicenza, which are highly esteemed, though not remarkable for strength of coloring.

SPERANZA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Rome in 1610. He studied under Francesco Albano, and afterwards greatly improved himself by studying the works of Raffaello, and other great masters. He excelled in fresco, and in that manner painted a series of pictures of the Life of the Virgin, in the church of S. Caterina at Siena; and the ceiling of the church of the Orfanelli, where he represented the Passion of our Savior, in five compartments. He was an artist of great talents, but died in 1640, in the flower of his life.

SPERLING, JEROME, a German engraver, born at Augsburg about 1693. He studied with John Justin Preisler, at Nuremberg. He engraved part of a set of plates of the churches of Vienna, published by J. A. Peffel in 1724; and part of the plates from the marble statues in the gallery of the king of Poland, published at Dresden in 1733. He also engraved some plates of portraits, chiefly after the German painters, and a set of thirteen allegorical subjects, representing the Twelve Months of the Year, with a frontispiece. He signed his plates H. (Hieronymus) Sperling. He died in 1777.

SPERLING, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a German painter, born at Halle in Saxony, in 1691. He was the son of John Henry Sperling, a painter of portraits and fancy subjects, who was born at Hamburg, but settled at Halle. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with Adrian vander Werf at Rotterdam, whose manner he adopted. He excelled in portraits, and painted the likenesses of many persons of rank and distinction. He also painted cabinet pictures of poetical and historical subjects, with considerable reputation. There are some of his pictures in the galleries at Dresden and Salzdahlum. His works are little known out of his own country. He died at Ansbach in 1746.

SPEY, MARTIN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, in 1777. He painted portraits, and excelled in painting fruit, flowers, dead game, and other objects of still life. He went to Paris in 1809, where he resided till 1815, and gained considerable reputation. On the entrance of the allied army, he disappeared, and has not been heard of since.

SPEZZINI, FRANCESCO, a painter who, according to Soprani, flourished at Genoa about 1578; others say that he died young, of the plague, in or about 1590. He first studied in his native city, under Luca Cambiasi, and next with Gio. Battista Castelli. He afterwards went to Rome, and improved himself by studying the works of Raffaele, Michael Angelo, and other great masters. On his return to Genoa, he executed several works for the churches and public edifices, which gained him considerable applause. His best work is an altarpiece in the church of S. Colombano.

SPICER, HENRY, an English painter, born about 1744. He painted portraits in miniature and enamel, and acquired considerable reputation and patronage. He died in 1804.

SPICER, an English mezzotint engraver, who flourished at London about 1760. He engraved some portraits after Reynolds and other English painters.

SPIEGL, JOSEPH, a German engraver, born at Vienna in 1772. He studied in the academy in that city, and executed a few plates in mezzotinto, among which are a Female bathing, after Rubens; a Holy Family, after Sassoferrato; the Mater Dolorosa, after Guido; Venus and Cupid, after N. Poussin; and Bacchus and Ariadne, after G. Hamilton.

SPIERRE, FRANÇOIS, an eminent French engraver, born at Nancy in 1643. He went to Paris, and studied with Francis de Poilly, whose style he at first followed with great success. He afterwards went to Italy, where he resided several years, and changed his style, adopting a novel method of handling the graver, which produced a pleasing effect, much admired. He did not long survive his return to Paris, where he died in 1681. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Pope Innocent XI.; engraved with single strokes, in the style of Mellan; Franciscus Spier, del. et sculp. The Grand Duke of Tuscany; dated 1659. Lorenzo, Count de Marsciano; after his own design.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Virgin suckling the infant Christ; after Correggio. This fine print is very scarce. The first impressions are before the drapery was inserted to cover the nudity of the child. St. Michael combating the Evil Spirit; after P.

da Cortona. The Conception of the Virgin; do. The Virgin and infant Jesus, with St. Catherine; do. The Circumcision; after Ciro Ferri. St. John preaching in the Wilderness; after Bernini. The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes; do. Christ on the Cross, suspended over a sea of blood, which flows from his wounds; do.; executed with single strokes. The first impressions are before the heads of the cherubs were added at the top.

SPIERINGS, N., a Dutch painter, born at Antwerp in 1633. It is not known under whom he studied; nor is his baptismal name known, though Balkema calls him Nicholas. He went young to Italy, where he painted landscapes so much in the style of Salvator Rosa, that his works have sometimes been mistaken for those of that master. His style is agreeable, though bold and eccentric; his scenery is well chosen; the forms of his rocks and trees grand and picturesque; his coloring good, and his touch firm and spirited. He was not so successful in designing the figure, and his pictures are usually decorated with historical subjects by other artists. In returning to his own country, he passed through France, and resided some time at Paris, where his pictures were greatly admired, and he was employed by Louis XIV to execute several works to adorn the royal palaces. On his return to Antwerp, he found abundant employment, till his death in 1691. Houbraken calls his name Henry, but he signed his pictures N. Spierings.

SPIERS, ALBERT VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1666. He studied with William van Inghen, in his native city, and then went to Rome, where he resided some years, diligently studying the works of Raffaele, and other great masters. He next proceeded to Venice to improve his coloring by studying in the Venetian school. In 1697, after a residence of ten years in Italy, he returned to Amsterdam, where he acquired great distinction, and was regarded one of the ablest artists of his time. He painted both in oil and fresco, and was much employed in decorating the ceilings and mansions of the nobility and gentry with poetical and historical subjects, which were greatly admired. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, his design correct, and his coloring rich and harmonious; his design partakes more of the Roman, and his coloring of the Venetian, than of the Dutch school. He had acquired a brilliant reputation, when he fell a victim to an assiduous application to his profession, in 1718.

SPIILBERG, JOHN, a German painter, born at Dusseldorf in 1619. He was the son of a glass painter, who was employed in the service of the Duke of Wolfgang. He early showed great talents, and his father instructed him in the rudiments of the art, with the intention to send him to Antwerp to study in the school of Rubens, for which purpose the Duke furnished him with a letter, commending him to the particular care of that great master. As he was on the eve of his departure, news came of the death of the head of the Flemish school, and he was sent to Amsterdam to study with Govaert Flinck. He prosecuted his studies under that able master with untiring assiduity for seven years, and on leaving his school, he soon distinguished himself as a painter of history and portraits. After acquiring a high reputation at Amsterdam, he was invited to Dusseldorf by the Elector Palatine, who appointed him his court painter, with a liberal pension. He painted the portraits of the Elector and his family, and of the distinguished personages of the court, and the Elector presented him with a gold medal and chain in token of his approbation. He executed several altar-pieces and other works for the churches, and a series of twelve pictures representing the Labors of Hercules, for the Castle of Dusseldorf, in which he discovered great fertility and originality of invention, and a commanding facility of execution. In these works the figures were of life size. At the same place he painted an allegorical picture representing the Alliance of Music and Poetry, designed and executed with judgment and taste. He was commissioned by the Elector to paint a series of pictures from the Life of Christ, but he did not live to complete them. His pictures are correctly designed, his coloring is rich and harmonious, and he wrought with a bold and free pencil. He died in 1690.

SPILBERG, ADRIANA. This lady was the daughter of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1646. She was instructed by her father, and excelled in painting portraits in crayons, though she sometimes painted in oil. These works were much esteemed for the correctness of her likenesses, the neatness and delicacy of her handling, and her lively and natural tone of coloring. She was most patronized at the court of Dusseldorf, where she was respected and beloved. She married Eglon H. vander Neer, an eminent artist of Amsterdam, then in the employment of the Elector Palatine.

SPILIMBERGO, IRENE DI, a paintress of the Venetian school, born at Spilimbergo. She flourished, according to Ridolfi, about 1550; Vasari says she died a short time before 1576. She was of a noble house, and is believed to have received instruction from Titian, who painted her portrait, and was familiar with her family. She practiced only for amusement, yet she is said to have applied herself to study with the enthusiasm of a professor. Her works are very rare. Lanzi mentions three pictures of sacred subjects by her, preserved by the noble family of Maniago, and a Bacchanal, at Monte Albodo, in the possession of the Claudi family; he says, "they display but little skill in design, though they are colored with a degree of masterly power not unworthy of the first artists of that happy period."

SPILMAN, HENRY, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam, according to Nagler, in 1721, and to others, at the Hague, about 1738. Some of his prints, however, were published in 1745, and one after van Goyen, is said to be dated 1732. He painted portraits and landscapes with some reputation. He also engraved a few portraits and landscapes from his own designs and after other masters. Huber says he engraved three landscapes in the style of drawings in bistre, after Everdingen, van Borsum, and Berghem.

SPILSBURY, INIGO, an English designer and engraver, born about 1730. After acquiring a knowledge of the art, he established himself as a print-seller at London, and drew successively the first prize from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., in the years 1761 and 1762. He engraved several plates in mezzotinto, and in the dotted style; particularly a collection of gems in the latter manner. His plates are very numerous; among them are the following:

PORTRAITS AND HEADS.

A set of fourteen Heads and Busts; in the manner of Rembrandt. 1767 and 1768. George III. when Prince of Wales. 1759. Queen Charlotte. 1764. Christian VII. King of Denmark; after Fesché. 1769. Inigo Jones; after Vandyck. Lady Mary Leslie decorating a Lamb with Flowers; after Reynolds. A young Lady holding a Bouquet of Flowers; do. Frederick Howard, Earl of Carlisle; do.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

A Boy eating Grapes; after Rubens. Two Monks reading; do. Abraham sending away Hagar; after Rembrandt. The Flight into Egypt; after Murillo. The Crucifixion; do.

SPINEDA, ASCANIO, a painter born, according to Federici, at Trevigi, in 1588. He was of a noble family, and is included among the disciples of Jacopo Palma, called Il Giovine, whose style he followed so closely, that Lanzi says it is sometimes difficult to distinguish their respective performances. "His works abound at Trevigi; no artist of his district surpassed him in the number of his pieces in public, if we except indeed Bartolomeo Orioli. He was one of the most exact (of the artists of Trevigi), in point of design; he also colored with much sweetness and grace of tints." He is little known out of his own city, though Lanzi says his works are found in many churches at Trevigi and its vicinity, which display talents that entitle him to more consideration. He was living, according to Ridolfi, in 1648.

SPINELLO, ARETINO, an old painter, born at Arezzo in 1308. He studied under Jacopo del Casentino, a disciple of Taddeo Gaddi. He was one of the most distinguished fresco painters of his time, and his fame spread throughout Italy. He excelled in portraits, and had the honor of painting those of Popes Innocent IV., and Gregory IX. In the Sacristy of S. Miniato at Florence, are still remaining several pictures by him of the life of S. Benedetto, which are among his best preserved works. He was employed in conjunction with the first artists of his time, in decorating the Campo Santo at Pisa, with historical paintings, and his pictures there, of the Martyrdom of St. Petito and St. Epiro, are ranked by Vasari as his best performances. Lanzi says he was inferior there to his competitors, both in design and coloring, and that his green and dark tints are too predominant. Others however, say that he was equal to Giotto in design, and surpassed him in the force and beauty of his coloring. Though his design was stiff and formal, as was usual at the time, he gave great force and expression to his figures. His picture of the Fall of the Rebel Angels still remains at Arezzo, in which he represented Lucifer so terrible, that it afterwards haunted him in his dreams, deranging both his body and mind, and hastening his death, which happened, according to Bottari, Lanzi, and others, in 1400, at the age of 92. As if this story were not improbable enough, some say that he executed this painting in conjunction with his son Parri in 1407, and that he represented the devil so hideous, that his satanic majesty appeared to him, and fiercely demanded satisfaction for the foul injustice done him, frightening the terror-struck artist into convulsions, of which he died!

SPINELLO, or SPINELLI, PARRI (for GASPARRI), was the son of the preceding, born at Arezzo in 1356. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with Lorenzo Ghiberti. Lanzi says he excelled in the art of coloring, but he was barbarous in the drawing of his figures, which he made extravagantly long and bending, in order, as used to say, to give them greater spirit. There are some of his works still preserved in the church of S. Domenico at Florence. Lanzi says he was the first to introduce the art of painting on glass for the windows of churches at Arezzo. There are notices of him as late as 1425.

SPINELLO, FORZORE, another son of Aretino S., was a very eminent worker in niello, a species of engraved work on silver, filled up with a compound of silver and lead, called by the ancients nigellum, contracted by the Italians into niello. This substance being incorporated with the silver, and the whole being polished, produced the effect of shadow, which, contrasted with the clearness of the silver, gave the entire work the appearance of a chiaro-scuro in silver. Various things were ornamented in this way, as caskets, sword and dagger hilts, images, and particularly paxes, or images of Christ on the cross, which the people used to kiss after service, called the kiss of peace. Some of these works were executed with wonderful neatness and precision, representing flowers, portraits, and even historical subjects, and gained for the artist, called Niellatore, a high reputation. The art is very ancient, and was much practiced by the old Italian goldsmiths. See Matteo Dei and Maso Finiguerra.

SPINTHARUS, an eminent ancient architect of Corinth, who flourished about B. C. 550. The only work by his hand, was the temple of Apollo at Delphi. This magnificent edifice, originally erected by Trophonius and Agamedes, was destroyed by fire, and afterwards rebuilt by Spintarus.

SPIRINX, L., a Dutch engraver of little note, probably a relative of the preceding, who executed in an indifferent style, some frontispieces, portraits, and other book plates, which bear date from about 1641 to 1674.

SPIRITO, MONSIEUR, a French painter, briefly mentioned by Lanzi, as a portrait painter, who was employed by the court at Turin in the latter part of the 17th century. He is also commended for the excellence of his portraits in the Pittura d'Italia.

SPISANO, VINCENZO, called also PISANELLI and Lo SPISANELLI, a painter born at Orta, in the Milanese territory, in 1595. According to Malvasia, he was brought up in the school of Denis Calvart, whose style he adopted, and followed without variations. Lanzi says, "he laid down for himself the maxim, never to alter with any other styles, that of Calvart. He however is inferior to that master in solidity and truth of design, and displays quite as much caprice and mannerism as any of the practitioners of his time; nor does he always preserve the colors of his school, but deadens them with a leaden hue, which is still not unpleasing. His altar-pieces executed for the churches at Bologna and in the neighboring cities, are less celebrated than his small pictures for private ornament, which abound at Bologna, and which he enlivened with very attractive landscapes." His best works at Bologna are the Death of St. Joseph in S. Maria Maggiore; the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth, in S. Giacomo Maggiore; the Baptism of Christ in S. Francesco; and the Conversion of St. Paul in S. Domenico. He died in 1662.

SPOFFORTH, ROBERT, an English engraver and printseller, who flourished about 1707. He engraved a few portraits, among which are those of Queen Anne and George I.

SPOLETTI, PIETRO LORENZO, a painter born, according to the Cav. Ratti, at Finale, in the Genoese territory, in 1680. He was a scholar of the Cav. Claudio Beaumont, whose style he followed with considerable success. He died in 1726.

SPOLVERINI, ILARIO, a painter born at Parma in 1657. Orlandi says that he was a scholar of Francesco Monti, and educated at Florence upon the model of Borgognone. He painted history, but chiefly acquired his reputation from his battle-pieces, in which Lanzi says he was not less eminent than Monti. He delighted in depicting battles, skirmishes of cavalry, attacks of bandits and assassins, which he designed with spirit and touched with a vehemence of pencil well adapted to the subjects. It is said that while the soldiers of Monti threatened, those of Spolverini seemed to kill. He was much employed by the Duke Francesco, for whom he executed many works, though he painted some large pictures both in oil and fresco for the cathedral, the Certosa, and other churches in Parma, and throughout the state. He died in 1734.

SPOOR, W. J. L., a painter born at Budel, in North Brabant. He studied under Henry Antonissen at Antwerp, whose style he followed for some time. He afterwards chiefly employed himself in copying and imitating the works of Paul Potter and other great landscape and animal painters of the Dutch school, which he did with considerable success. He also painted some original subjects in which he faithfully represented nature. There were some of his pictures, both copies and originals, in the collection of Prince William at the Hague. He flourished in the latter part of the last, and first part of the present century.

SPRANGHIER, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1546. He was the son of Joachim Sprangher, an eminent merchant of that city, who intended to bring him up to commercial pursuits, but finding in Bartholomew a decided inclination for painting, he placed him under the instruction of John Madyn at Haerlem, with whom he continued about eighteen months, till the death of that master, when he became the pupil of Francis Mostaert. He is also said to have received instructions from van Dalen and other masters of his country. He afterwards went to Paris, and next to Parma, where he studied three years with Bernardino Gatti, called Il Sojaro, who had been a disciple of Correggio. From Parma he went to Rome, where he was favored with the patronage of the Cardinal Farnese, who employed him in decorating his villa of Caprarola, with several landscapes painted in fresco. The Cardinal also recommended him to Pius V., who appointed him his painter, and accommodated him with apartments in the Palazzo Belvidere—a high compliment. His first work for the Pope was a picture of the Last Judgment, executed on a copper plate six feet high, and containing above five hundred figures, which occupied him three years, and was so highly esteemed, that after the death of that pontiff, it was placed over his tomb. He was commissioned by the Pope to paint twelve pictures of the passion of Christ, which he did not accomplish before the death of his holiness. In 1575 he was invited to the court of Vienna by the Emperor Maximilian II., who appointed him his principal painter. That monarch dying the following year, he was continued in his office by his successor, Rodolphus II., who employed him to paint several considerable works, both at Vienna and Prague. Sprangher was greatly respected by the Emperor Rodolphus, not only for his abilities as a painter, but for his extensive literary acquirements, and great conversational powers. In 1588, that monarch ennobled him and his descendants, and honored him by placing round his neck with his own hands, a gold medal and chain.

With all his talents and advantages, Sprangher did not arrive at any great excellence in art, because he pursued a false system. His great success was owing more to several lucky circumstances, and his own pleasing address, than to his merits as a painter. He totally neglected the study of nature, and does not seem to have profited much by a residence of several years in Italy; it is very doubtful whether he ever made a single design from the antique or the great Italian masters, but contented himself with a superficial observance of those great models, and depended upon his memory for a retention of their beauties. His design has little of the dignity and elegance of the Roman school, his contours are constrained and unnatural, his outline hard, stiff, and ungraceful, his attitudes are affected, the extremities of his figures contorted, and his general style mannered. He had however, a lively and inventive imagination, and an alluring facility of execution, an extraordinary lightness of hand, and great sweetness of pencil, which always procured him many admirers. His later productions have fewer extravagances, and a more natural tone of color. Nagler attributes six etchings to him, from his own designs. They are executed in a slight, but agreeable style. He died at Prague in 1623.

SPRIETT, JOHN VANDER, a Dutch mezzotinto engraver of little note. He studied under Verkolie at Amsterdam, and executed a few indifferent portraits. He went to London, where he died about 1700.

SR SPRINGINKLEE, HANS. The only information respecting this artist, is derived from Doppelmayr, who states that he lived in the house of Albert Durer, from whom he learned the art of design and engraving, and that he died about 1540. He was formerly ranked among the wood engravers, and certain cuts marked with the above monogram, were attributed to him. Bartsch describes sixty-one of these cuts, to be found in a work entitled "Hortulus animæ cum horis beatæ Virginis," &c., published at Nuremberg in 1518, and afterwards in 1519 and 1520. Bartsch, Zani, and others, are of opinion that he only made the designs, and that the cuts were executed by another hand, as they are too indifferently executed for a pupil of Albert Durer. It has been conjectured that he was a painter, but no pictures by him are known, and all that can be affirmed is, that he was a cotemporary with Durer, and disgraced the subjects which bear his monogram.

SPRONG, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem, according to Balkema, in 1600, and died there in 1651; though others say he was living in 1661. He excelled in portraits; there is a half-length portrait of a lady by him in the gallery of the Louvre.

SPRUYT, PETER, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp about 1740, and died, according to Nagler, about 1790. There is a singular paucity of information respecting him, for he must have been an artist of some distinction, as he was director of the Academy at Ghent, where he appears to have settled. Nagler describes thirteen etchings by him, after Rubens, Teniers, and van Goyen. Several of these are signed E. P. Spruyt, so that even his christian name is not certainly known.

SQUARCIONE, FRANCESCO, an eminent painter, born at Padua in 1394. He was more celebrated as the founder of the most distinguished academy of his time, and for his excellent system of instruction, than for his works as a painter. After acquiring a high reputation and abundant employment at Florence and other cities, his desire to cultivate the art of painting in the most effectual manner, induced him to forego these advantages, and travel throughout Italy and Greece to design the most interesting vestiges of antiquity. On returning to his native place, he began to form a Museum, which proved the richest of any known at that period, not merely in designs, but in statues, torsos, bassi-relievi, and funeral urns. Here he opened a school which at one time was frequented by upwards of one hundred and thirty students from all parts of Italy, and such was his success in communicating instruction, and the paternal regard he had for his pupils, that he acquired the venerable name of the Father of the young painters. Thus devoting himself to the instruction of students, he continued to live in comparative affluence, and divided many of the commissions he received among his different pupils. Such was the respect entertained for him, that he was frequently visited by popes, sovereigns, princes, and cardinals. Of his productions as a painter, little remains. Lanzi notices a picture by him, formerly in the church of the Carmelites at Padua, afterwards in the possession of the Conte Cav. de' Lazara. It is executed in different compartments, the chief place being occupied by the figure of St. Girolamo, surrounded by several other saints. The work has been retouched in parts, yet sufficient of the original remains to establish the character of the painter. "Rich in coloring, in expression, and, above all, in perspective, it may be pronounced one of the best specimens of the art produced in those parts." This picture was executed for the noble family of the Lazara, of which the original contract is still preserved, dated 1449. It is signed Francesco Squarcione, 1452, thus correcting Vasari, who called his name Jacopo, an error repeated by many writers. Lanzi says, "in the church of the Misericordia at Padua, is preserved a book of anthems, illustrated with very beautiful miniatures, commonly ascribed to Andrea Mantegna, the ornament of the Lombard school; but so great is the variety of the different styles, that the most competent judges conclude it to be one of the works committed to Squarcione, and by him distributed among his disciples. Of these we are not yet prepared to treat, but the chief part of them are known to have flourished subsequent to the introduction of oil painting. Though little can be said of the productions of Squarcione as a painter, great respect is due to his labors as a master. Indeed he may be considered the tree, as it were, whose branches we trace through Andrea Mantegna in the great school of Lombardy; through Marco Zoppo in the Bolognese; while it extended some degree of influence over that of Venice itself, for Jacopo Bellini, having come to exercise his talents in Padua, it appears that he took Squarcione for his model." Rosini has given an outline of the above named picture of St. Girolamo, and another of a Madonna and Infant, in the same collection, in his "Storia della Pittura Italiana," which gives a good idea of his excellence in design. Zani strongly inclines to the belief that he also engraved. He died in 1474. See Andrea Mantegna.

STABEN, HENRY, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1578. After learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went quite young to Italy, and entered the school of Tintoretto at Venice. He had not, however, the advantage of the instruction of that able master for any length of time, as he died before Staben was seventeen years old, nor is it known that he studied with any other painter. It is supposed also that he did not remain long in Italy, as he early established himself at Paris, where he acquired considerable reputation for his small pictures of interiors, decorated with figures, executed with great neatness and precision. His pictures are well composed, correctly designed, agreeably colored, and highly finished, more in the style of the Flemish, than the Italian school. One of his best performances was a picture representing the interior of the gallery of a Virtuoso, decorated with pictures and statues, in which he displayed an intelligent acquaintance with perspective. Above are several pictures of different subjects, arranged in regular order, every object being exquisitely finished, and placed in such exact perspective, that they produce a very agreeable deception. This work was formerly in the collection of Count de Morny, but is now in England. Stanley says it is a picture that would be an ornament to the richest collection of the Dutch and Flemish masters. He died in 1658.

STAEVAERTS, or STEVERS, ANTHONY PALAMEDES, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1604. He painted portraits; but was more frequently employed in painting conversation pieces, card and musical parties, &c. He executed many works, little distinguished for correctness of design, or judgment in composition. He died in 1680.

STAEVAERTS, or STEVERS, PALAMEDES, a painter of the Dutch school, the younger brother of the preceding, and the son of a Dutch engraver on precious stones, who was employed by James I. at London, where Palamedes was born, in 1607. He was taken to Delft while very young. After acquiring a knowledge of the elements of art, he gained considerable improvement by studying the works of Esaias Vandervelde, adopting his clear and transparent coloring, and excelled in painting similar subjects, representing battles and skirmishes, attacks of robbers, the plundering of villages, &c. His works are distinguished for ingenious composition and remarkable transparency of coloring, the figures and horses are spiritedly designed, and touched with a free and firm pencil. Staevaerts rose to a distinguished rank among the artists of his native country, and his works were highly esteemed; but he died in the prime of life, in 1638.

STAINES, ROBERT, an English engraver, born at London in 1805. He studied under J. C. Edwards, and also with the Messrs. Finden. He wrought chiefly for the booksellers, and executed a number of good plates for the Annuals of the day, after Richter, Westall, etc. Two of his best plates, however, are "Sancho and the Duchess," and "Malvolio," which he executed in 1849 for the London Art Journal, from pictures in the Vernon Gallery. He died in 1849.

STALBENT, ADRIAN VAN, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Antwerp in 1580. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted landscapes decorated with small figures, in which he imitated Velvet Breughel. His scenes are well chosen, frequently solemn, his figures are well designed and touched with a free, delicate, and spirited pencil, his trees are well formed, and his coloring clear and natural, though his verdure is sometimes a little too green. According to Lord Orford, who calls his name Stalband, this artist visited England in the reign of Charles I., for whom he painted several pictures, among which was a View of Greenwich, and returned to Antwerp liberally rewarded. He also painted interiors, decorated with historical subjects in small. Some of his earlier performances resemble the manner of old Franck, for which reason some suppose that he was a pupil of that master. Vandyck painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country, of which there is an engraving by Pontius. He also etched a few subjects. He signed his pictures A. V. STALBENT, in Roman capitals, the letters A and V being joined together, and he signed his etchings Adrianus van Stalbant. Most writers call him Stalbert. He died at Antwerp in 1660.

STALBENT, JOHN. This artist was a cotemporary, and perhaps a relative of the preceding. He is said to have painted landscapes in the manner of Peter Breughel the elder, which has caused some confusion in the accounts of both. Little is known of him or his works.

STAMPART, FRANCIS, a Flemish portrait painter, born at Antwerp in 1675. He studied under the younger Tyssens, whose style he followed, though he improved by studying from nature and the works of Vandyck. He had acquired considerable reputation as a portrait painter in his native city, when he was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Leopold, who appointed him his principal painter, which office he held under his successor Charles VI. He there found abundant employment. As he was much employed in painting persons of distinction, who had neither the leisure nor patience, to undergo the tedium of the usual process of sitting, he was accustomed to sketch the features with white, black, and red crayons, which was soon executed, and then he worked on the portrait with color at his leisure, and finished it at a single sitting. Another custom of his was to lay upon the canvass patches of flesh color, in proper places, which contributed to lessen his labor, and to assist him in getting the right tints. If we can form any correct opinion of his merits from this singular method of operating, we may safely conclude that his works have little of that air of life and nature which distinguish the portraits of his instructor. He died at Vienna in 1750.

STANZIONI, CAV. MASSIMO, an eminent painter, born at Naples in 1585. He first studied with Gio. Battista Caraccioli, a follower of Ann. Caracci, whose style is discernible in all his works; but he derived his best instruction in fresco painting from Belisario Corenzio, one of the ablest fresco painters of his time. When Lanfranco visited Naples, he profited by his instruction, and in one of his MS., he calls him his master. He also took lessons of Fabrizio Santafede in portrait painting, whose principles he adopted in that branch, and attained, says Lanzi, "an excellent Titianesque style." He next went to Rome, where he applied himself particularly to the study of the works of Annibale Caracci, and having formed an intimacy with Guido Reni, he became ambitious of imitating the design of the first, with the coloring of the second, in which he was so successful, according to Galanti, that he attained the appellation of Guido Reni di Napoli. On his return to Naples his talents enabled him to compete with the ablest of his cotemporaries, and to excite their jealousy. He painted in the Certosa a Dead Christ surrounded by the Marys, in competition with Giuseppe Ribera, which excited the envy and animosity of the latter to such an extent that, having persuaded the monks to allow him to clean it, as the picture had become somewhat obscure, he purposely applied a corrosive liquid which destroyed the beauty of the work. The Fathers applied to Stanzioni to restore it, which he positively refused to do, declaring that such an act of perfidy and malice ought to be perpetuated to public indignation. In the same edifice, which is a Museum of Art, in which the most distinguished masters successively vied to surpass each other, Massimo left several admirable works, particularly a stupendous altar-piece, representing St. Bruno presenting to his brethren the rules of his Order. He executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Naples, both in oil and fresco. The vaults of the Gesu Nuovo, and of S. Paolo, entitle him to a place among the most distinguished fresco painters. He painted many easel pictures for the collections, which are highly esteemed. The school of Massimo produced many celebrated scholars, his method and high reputation confirming the ancient proverb, primus discendi ardor nobilitas est magistri (the example of the master is the greatest incentive to improvement.)—Stanzioni was highly respected by the King, who, among other marks of his favor, conferred upon him the honor of knighthood. Lanzi says "he studied perfection during his celibacy, and finished his paintings very highly, but afterwards, marrying a woman of rank, in order to maintain her in an expensive style of living, he painted many hasty and inferior pictures; therefore it was not without reason that Cocchi took occasion to warn all artists against the perils of the wedded state." He died in 1656.

STARREN, or STERN, DIRK or THEODORE VAN, a Dutch engraver, about whom there is much discrepancy. Like many of the old engravers, little is known of him except by his works. His prints are said to be numerous, and dated from about 1520 to 1550. But Bartsch has described only nineteen; a few others are mentioned by other writers, though doubtless some of them are the same as those given by Bartsch, under another name. Most of them are copper plates of small size, hence he is classed with the little masters. Only one wood cut, mentioned by Ottley, is known by him. Some of these are marked simply with his initials, and others with the same with a star between them, and the date sometimes on a tablet. There are other similar prints, bearing similar marks, except that a bird or starling is substituted for the star, which are generally attributed to him, but some give them to Dirk Verster, an artist unknown in the history of art. The following are the titles and dates given by Bartsch, P. G. tom. viii.:

1. Eve and the little Cain, 1522, A. G. (Augusti) 19.
2. The Deluge (L. 14 p. 61.; H. 10 p. 5 l.) 1544.

STARNINA, GHERARDO, an old painter born at Florence in 1354. He was a disciple of Antonio Veneziano, and painted history in the dry, stiff style, which prevailed at that early period, though he improved over the immediate followers of Giotto. Vasari says that he was invited to the court of Spain, where he executed several grand pictures for the King, who liberally rewarded him, and loaded him with presents. Few of his works have escaped the ravages of time. There is a picture by him in the church of S. Croce at Florence, representing the dying St. Jerome exhorting his disciples, some of whom are listening to his discourse, others writing down his precepts. Another picture by him is a Descent from the Cross, of which Rosini has given an etching by Gatti, which proves him to have been an able designer. Lanzi says he painted in a gay style, and that his works are among the last efforts of the school of Giotto, which succeeding artists abandoned to adopt a better manner. The time of his death is not exactly known; it is generally placed in 1403, but it is certain that he was living in 1406, and Zani says he died in 1415.

STARRENBERG, JOHN, a Dutch painter, who was born, according to Descamps, at Groningen, where he flourished from about 1650 to 1670. He painted in fresco, and executed some considerable historical works, chiefly on ceilings, which were well composed, and executed with facility.

STAVEREN, JOHN ADRIAN VAN, a Dutch painter who flourished from about 1660 to 1680. He was a close imitator of Gerard Douw, and is supposed to have been his pupil. He chiefly excelled in painting subjects representing a saint or hermit contemplating a skull, reading a book, or at his devotions. The scene is generally a grotto, in a wild locality, and he usually introduced the trunk of an old tree, covered with ivy or moss. His execution is as elaborate as that of Douw, but his pencilling is not so soft and clear. There is one of his pictures in the Louvre, representing a Geographer in his Study. He is also said to have painted familiar scenes, conversations, and groups of family portraits; many such are attributed to him, but it is very doubtful whether they were executed by the painter of hermits, or another van Staveren, as none of the van Staverens appear to have signed their works with their christian names.

The Dutch writers mention three other van Staverens, Paul, Jacob, and E.; all of whom flourished about the same time with the preceding. Paul and E. are said to have studied with Douw, whose manner they followed. Jacob was a painter of fruit and flowers. Laborde mentions a mezzotinto print of a man counting money, a half-length, signed P. Straverenus, and asks Que signifie ce nom?

STEEN, JAN, (JAMES, not JOHN, as frequently written), an eminent Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1636. When we consider the great number and excellence of this master's works, which betray no want of diligence and care, it is impossible to credit the accounts given of his debauched and dissipated course of life. He was the son of a wealthy brewer at Leyden, who, perceiving his passion for painting, first placed him with Nicholas Knufer at Utrecht. Descamps, probably from similarity of subjects and character, asserts that he afterwards studied with Adrian Brower, and his account has been followed by Pilkington and others; but Brower died in 1640, when Jan Steen was only four years old. It seems very probable that he received instruction from John van Goyen, whose daughter he married, and who died in 1656, when Jan Steen was twenty years old. The rest of his life, if we are to believe his biographers, is soon told. His father, apprehending that he could not procure a comfortable subsistence by the exercise of his pencil, established him in his own business at Delft, where, instead of attending to his affairs, he gave himself up to dissipation, and soon squandered his means and ruined his establishment; his indulgent parent, after repeated attempts to reclaim him, was compelled to abandon him to his fate. He opened a tavern, which proved more calamitous than the former undertaking. He gave himself up entirely to reveling and intoxication, wrought only when his necessities compelled him, sold his pictures to satisfy his immediate wants, and often for the most paltry prices to escape arrest.

The pictures of Jan Steen usually represent merry-makings, and the frolics and festivities of the ale-house, which he treated with a characteristic expression of humorous drollery, that com-pensates for the vulgarity of his subjects. He sometimes painted interiors, domestic assemblies, conversations, mountebanks, &c., which he generally accompanied with some facetious trait of wit or humour, admirably rendered. Some of his works of this description are little inferior to the charming productions of Gabriel Metz. His compositions are ingenious and interesting, his design is correct and spirited, his coloring chaste and clear, and his pencil free and decided. He also had a good knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, which enabled him to give his figures a fine relief. His works are invariably finished with care and diligence, and do not betray any haste or infirmity of hand or head. It is evident that, from some untoward circumstance, his works were not appreciated in his day, but after his death, they rose amazingly in value, and have continued to increase ever since,—a true test of a master's merit—till now they are scarcely to be found except in royal and noble collections and the public galleries of Europe. His pictures were, for a long time, scarcely known out of Holland, but now they are deservedly placed in the choicest collections. His works are very numerous, sufficient to have continually occupied the life time of not only a sober and industrious artist, but one possessing great facility of hand. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné, vol. iv. and Supplement, gives a descriptive account of upwards of 300 genuine pictures by Steen, many of them compositions of numerous figures, and almost all of them executed with the greatest care. It cannot be believed that a man living in a state of continued dissipation and inebriety, could find time to produce so many admirable works, displaying, as they do, a deep study of human nature, and a great discrimination of character; or that the hand of an habitual drunkard could operate with such beauty and precision. Nor is it probable that a mind besotted by drink, and debased by low intercourse, could moralize so admirably as he has done on the evil consequences of intemperance and the indulgence of evil passions. Dr. Kügler, a judicious critic, thus sums up his character as an artist: "The works of Jan Steen imply a free and cheerful view of common life, and he treats it with a careless humour, such as seems to deal with all its daily occurrences, high and low, as a laughable masquerade and a mere scene of perverse absurdity. His treatment of the subjects differed essentially from that adopted by other artists. Frequently, indeed, they are the same jolly drinking parties, or the meetings of boors; but in other masters, the object is, for the most part, to depict a certain situation, either quiet or animated, whilst in Jan Steen is generally to be found action more or less developed, together with all the reciprocal relations and interests between the characters which spring from it. This is accompanied by great variety and force of individual expression, such as evinces the sharpest observation. He is almost the only artist in the Netherlands who has thus, with true genius, brought into full play all these elements of comedy. His technical execution suits his design; it is carefully finished, and notwithstanding the closest attention to minute details, it is as firm and correct as it is light and free." There is a single etching attributed to him, representing a woman seated, apparently in a drunken sleep, holding a small glass in her left hand, and a bottle in her right, with other figures in a chamber. It is signed Pinxit J. Steen, the J and S interlaced on the left, and on the right H. Steen. It is a poor affair, and is regarded spurious by the best judges. Jan Steen died in 1689.

STEEN, FRANCIS VANDER, a Flemish painter and engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1604. Little is known of his works as a painter, but he distinguished himself by the plates he executed for the collection of prints known as the Teniers' Gallery. He was much employed by the Archduke Leopold, who assigned him a pension. He engraved quite a number of plates, besides those he executed for the Teniers' Gallery, among which are the following. A complete list of his works may be found in Nagler's Lexicon.

1573 STEENWYCK, HENRY, THE ELDER, a Flemish painter, born at Steenwyck in 1550. He studied under John de Vries, an artist who excelled in perspective and architecture. Steenwyck painted similar subjects, but he far surpassed his instructor, and in neatness and accuracy, he has hardly been surpassed by succeeding artists. He settled at Antwerp, where he met with good encouragement. His pictures usually represent interiors of churches, and Gothic edifices, designed with surprising accuracy and precision. He frequently represented those superb edifices by torch-light, and by his perfect knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, he was enabled to produce a mysterious grandeur of effect, extremely picturesque. He did not succeed so well in his figures, and frequently employed other artists to insert them. His pictures are frequently decorated with figures by Franck. The time of his death is not exactly known; some say he died in 1603, and others that he was living in 1604. His name is also variously written Steenwyck, Stenwyck, and Steinwyck.

STEENWYCK, HENRY, THE YOUNGER, the son of the preceding, was born at Antwerp in 1589. He was instructed by his father, and painted similar subjects, though he usually designed them on a larger scale. He acquired a high reputation, and lived in habits of intimacy with Vanduyck, who painted his portrait among the distinguished artists of his country, which was engraved by Pontius. At the recommendation of Vanduyck, Charles I. invited him to England, for whom he executed some of his choicest works, ten of which are described in the Catalogue of King James. He sometimes painted the backgrounds of Vanduyck's pictures with ornamental architecture. He is said to have died in London, at what time is not known. There is a picture by him in the Museum at Berlin, dated 1642.

STEENWYCK, or STEINWYCK, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born at Breda, according to Descamps, in 1640. He excelled in painting vases, musical instruments, books, and other objects of still life, which he composed in a pleasing manner, and represented with great truth and precision. He also painted fish, dead game, &c., in an admirable style. He wrought with a bold, free pencil, yet his pictures are well finished.

STEFANESCHI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Ronta, in the Florentine state, in 1582. He was a monk, and is generally called l'Eremita di Monte Senario. Having a taste for painting, he studied with Andrea Comodi, and afterwards with Pietro da Cortona; he became an excellent miniature painter, and was very conspicuous among the portrait painters and copyists of his time. He was much employed by the Grand Duke Ferdinand II. in copying in small, some of the works of the great Italian masters, as Raffaele, Correggio, Titian, and Andrea del Sarto. His coloring was lovely, his touch delicate, and his chiaro-scuro excellent. He died in 1651.

STEFANI, TOMMASO DE, an old painter, born at Naples about 1230. Dominici, in his Lives of the Neapolitan Painters, attempts to show that the art was practiced at Naples long before the time of Cimabue, even in the Dark Ages, and that this artist was equal, if not superior to Cimabue; but he signally fails to prove it, and his works will not bear him out in his assertions. Marco da Siena, who is the father of the history of painting in Naples, declares that, in respect to grandeur of composition, Cimabue was entitled to the preference. He however acquired great distinction in his time, and enjoyed the favor of King Charles of Anjou, and of Charles II., who employed him at Naples, as did also the principal personages of the city. He formed his style by studying the remains of Grecian art which had been preserved in the churches and public edifices. He had painted several pictures for the churches of S. Francesco and S. Maria della Grazie previous to 1260, at which time he was employed by the Archbishop of Naples to decorate the chapel of his palace with several pictures of the Passion of our Saviour. Several of his works still remain, which are particularly described by Dominici. He died in 1310.

STEFANI, PIETRO DE', the oldest sculptor of the Neapolitan school, and brother of the preceding, was born at Naples about 1228. He was frequently employed by Charles of Anjou and his son Charles II. He acquired some reputation as a painter, but was more celebrated as a sculptor. Among his principal works, are still preserved in the archiepiscopal palace, the tombs of Pope Innocent IV., and the Archbishop Filippo Minutolo. Stefani died about 1310.

STEFANI, BENEDETTO, an Italian engraver and printseller, who flourished at Verona about 1575. Little is known of him or his works. There is a print by him representing the battle of the Lapi-thæ, copied from Marc' Antonio. The style of engraving resembles that of Æneas Vico.

STEFANINI, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver and perhaps painter, who flourished at Florence about 1760. There is an etching by him, representing the Purification of the Virgin, after Bartholomew Spranger.

STEFANO, called IL FIORENTINO, an old Florentine painter, born in 1301. He was the grandson and disciple of Giotto, whom, according to Vasari, he greatly excelled in every department of art. He was the first artist who attempted to show the naked under his draperies, which were loose, easy, and delicate. He established the rules of perspective, little known at that early period, on more regular principles. He was the first to attempt the difficult task of foreshortening. He also succeeded better than any of his cotemporaries in giving expression to his heads, and a less Gothic turn to the attitudes of his figures. He acquired a high reputation, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Florence, Rome, and other places, all of which have perished, according to Lanzi, except a picture of the Virgin and Infant in the Campo Santo at Pisa. He died in 1350.

STEFANO, TOMMASO, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Florence in 1324. According to Vasari, he adhered so closely to the style of Giotto, that his fellow citizens called him Il Giotlino, and used to say that the soul of Giotto had transmigrated and animated him. There are some frescos by him still remaining at Assisi, and a picture of the dead Christ with the Virgin and St. John, in the church of S. Remigio at Florence. He died at Florence in the flower of his life, in 1356.

STEFANO, NICCOLO DI, a painter born at Belluno, who flourished about 1530. He was an imitator, and perhaps a disciple of Titian. Lanzi says, "Niccolo di Stefano, a cotemporary with the Vecelli (the family of Titian), was a painter deserving commendation, no less for his having competed with the family of Titian, than for the reputation he acquired by such competition. His rivals among the Vecelli, were Francesco, the brother, and Orazio, the son of Titian, who approached him pretty nearly in point of style."

STEFANO, DA VERONA, OR DA ZEVIO, an old painter, who flourished at Verona about the commencement of the 15th century. There is a good deal of uncertainty and contradiction about him, though he was an eminent artist in his time. He studied with Angiolo Gaddi at Florence. Lanzi says that Vasari sometimes calls him Stefano da Verona, and at others, Stefano da Zevio, a territory adjacent to the former; he is also of opinion that the artist mentioned by Vasari under the name of Sebeto, must be the same as Stefano da Verona. He says, "Vasari makes honorable mention of him in several places, exalting him above the best disciples of Angiolo Gaddi, to whose style (judging from what I have myself observed of his works at San Fermo and elsewhere), he added a certain dignity and beauty of form, while such was his excellence in fresco, that Donatello extols him beyond any of the artists who were then known in those parts for similar compositions. Del Pozzo brings his labors down as late as 1463; an incredible assertion, as applied to a scholar of Gaddi (who was born in 1324, and died in 1387, though to this period might perhaps be referred Vincenzio di Stefano, apparently one of his sons, of whom nothing survives but his name, and the tradition of his having conferred the first lessons of the art upon Liberale da Verona."

STEFANONE, MAESTRO, a Neapolitan painter, who was born, according to Dominici, at Naples about 1325, and studied with Gennaro di Cola, in conjunction with whom he painted some grand frescos for the church of S. Restituta. He also says he painted in oil, and cites a beautiful picture still preserved in the church of S. Maria della Pietà, representing the Virgin Mary and Mary Magdalen weeping over the dead Christ. From this, and similar statements, authors have attempted to prove that oil painting was practiced in Italy before the time of the van Eycks. Lanzi, however, throwing aside all national pride, cites abundance of evidence to prove that all claims set up by the Italians to the invention of painting pictures in oil, are unfounded. Lanzi says also that Stefanone studied under Maestro Simone, and that Cola was his fellow pupil, which is the more probable, as they were nearly of the same age, and wrought much together. On the death of Simone, they executed in conjunction, several large pictures in fresco, from the life of S. Lodovico, in the church of S. Giovanni da Carbonara, which had only been commenced by Simone when he died. They also painted in the same edifice some histories of the Virgin, which were preserved for a long time. The styles of Cola and Stefanone were very similar, and Lanzi says, "notwithstanding the similarity of their styles, we may perceive a difference in the genius of these two artists; Cola was more studied and correct, anxious to overcome all difficulties, and to elevate the art, on which account he appears occasionally somewhat mannered. Stefanone discovers more genius, more confidence, and a greater freedom of pencil, and he gave a spirit to his figures that might have assured him a distinguished place, if he had been born at a more advanced period of art." Stefanone died about 1390. See Gennaro di Cola and John van Eyck.

STEFANONI, GIACOMO ANTONIO, a painter and engraver, who flourished at Bologna about 1630. Little is known of him as a painter, but he executed quite a number of spirited etchings, among which are the following:

The Virgin, with the Infant Christ, St. John, and two Angels; after Lod. Caracci. The Holy Family, with St. John; after An. Caracci. 1632. Another Holy Family, with St. John presenting Cherries; do. The Virgin and infant Christ, with St. John; after Agos. Caracci. The Murder of the Innocents; after Guido. The Martyrdom of St. Ursula; after L. Passinelli.

STEFANONI, PIETRO, an Italian engraver and printseller, who flourished about 1620. There is a set of forty etchings by him, after the designs of the Caracci, intended as a drawing-book. He usually marked his plates P. S. F.

STEIDNER, D., a German engraver of little note, who died at Augsburg in 1760. He engraved some plates of devotional subjects.

STELLA, FERMO, a painter of the Milanese school and a native of Caravaggio. He studied under Gaudenzio Ferrari, whose style he followed with considerable success. Lanzi says there are some of his works in the chapels at Varallo. He flourished in the first part of the 16th century.

STELLA, FRANCIS. This painter was born at Mechlin, in Flanders, in 1563. After acquiring a knowledge of the art in his own country, he visited Rome for improvement, and afterwards settled in France, in the city of Lyons. He executed a considerable number of works for the churches and private collections, among which are his frescos of the Virgin, St. Sebastian, St. Roch, and St. Anthony, in the church des Minimes; the Entombment, in the church of St. John; the grand altar-piece at the Celestines, representing a Descent from the Cross; and the Seven Sacraments at the Cordeliers, considered his master-piece. Stella died in 1605.

STELLA, JACQUES, an eminent French painter, was the son of the preceding, born at Lyons in 1596. His father taught him the rudiments of design, and though he died when Jacques was only nine years old, he had made such proficiency that he was enabled to complete his education without the assistance of any other master. At the age of twenty he went to Italy, and first stopped at Florence, where he was employed by the Grand Duke to assist in the decorations for the solemnization of the marriage of his son Ferdinand II. The Grand Duke was so much pleased with his abilities that he took him into his service, assigned him apartments in his palace, and gave him a pension equal to that of Callot, who was at that time in his service. After a residence of seven years at Florence, he proceeded to Rome in 1623, where he formed an intimacy with Niccolò Poussin, by whose direction and advice, he particularly devoted his attention to a diligent study of the antique and the works of Raffaëlle, by which means he acquired that remarkable correctness of design which distinguishes his subsequent works. He executed several works at Rome, which gained him so much reputation that he was invited to the court of Madrid. Having determined to accept this invitation, he resolved to first visit his native country, and after a residence of eleven years at Rome, he proceeded in 1634 to Paris, whither his reputation had preceded him. His talents recommended him to the patronage of Cardinal Richelieu, at whose solicitation he was induced to abandon his intended visit to Spain and settle at Paris, where, through the influence of the Cardinal, he was appointed painter to the King, with apartments in the Louvre and a pension of one thousand livres. The King also honored him by conferring upon him the Order of St. Michael. Stella executed many works for churches and public edifices, but succeeded best in easel pictures, particularly those of pastoral subjects, though he showed great skill in painting cherubs and boys, or dancing cupids. He had an extensive genius, which enabled him to paint all kinds of subjects with equal ease. His invention is noble; his design rigidly correct, and his attitudes natural; but his works appear cold and inanimate, and we look in vain for that sentiment and expression which characterize the admirable productions of his friend Poussin. He was however a perfect master of perspective, and often enriched his pictures with noble architecture. His principal works in the churches at Paris are the Baptism of Christ in St. Germain le Vieux; the Annunciation, in the chapel of the Nuns of the Assumption; and Christ with the Woman of Samaria at the Carmelites. He executed some spirited etchings, marked with a star, the rebus of his name, among which are the Descent from the Cross; the Ceremony of doing Homage to the Grand Duke of Tuscany on St. John's Day, dated 1621; a Madonna, a St. George, and some dancing children. There are also some wood cuts after his designs, marked with a star, but they were executed by Paul Mauvain. He died at Paris in 1657, aged 61, according to Bardon; and not in 1647, as generally stated.

STELLA, FRANÇOIS, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Lyons in 1601. He was instructed by Jacques, accompanied him in his travels, and settled with him at Paris. He painted history, but never acquired any great distinction. He painted some works for the churches at Paris, among which is an altar-piece at the Augustines, representing the Dead Christ with the Virgin and St. John. It is generally stated that he died at Paris in 1661, though Felibien says on the 26th of July, 1647, in his forty-fourth year, which changes the time of his birth.

STELLA, ANTOINE BOUSONNET, was the nephew of Jacques Stella, and born at Lyons in 1630. He was instructed by his uncle, and acquired sufficient reputation as an historical painter to procure his election as a member of the Royal Academy at Paris, where he died in 1682. He also etched some plates, among which is one of Moses defending the Daughters of Jethro, after Poussin.

STELLA, CLAUDINE BOUSONNET, was the sister of the preceding, born at Lyons in 1636. She studied design under her uncle Jacques S., and afterwards applied herself to engraving, in which she became greatly distinguished. Her plates are chiefly after the works of Jacques Stella and Niccolò Poussin. Her prints after the latter have hardly been surpassed by other artists, and she greatly excelled Jean Pesne. Her drawing is very correct, and the character of the heads is admirably expressed. She died at Paris in 1697. The following are her best prints:

A set of seventeen plates of pastoral subjects, including the title; after James Stella. Fifty plates of the Sports of Children, and rural subjects; do. The Marriage of St. Catherine; do. Moses found in the Bulrushes, in two plates; after N. Poussin. Moses striking the Rock; do.; very fine. St. Peter and St. John curing the Lame Man; do. The Crucifixion, called the Great Calvary; do; very fine. The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth and St. John; do. Another Holy Family, with children bringing flowers; do.

STELLA, ANTOINETTE BOUSONNET, was the sister of Claudine, born at Lyons about 1637. She was also instructed by her uncle, and though she did not equal her sister, she handled the graver with judgment and taste, her drawing is correct, and her prints possess considerable merit. She executed some plates after Jacques Stella, Giulio Romano, and other masters. She died at Paris in 1676.

STELLA, FRANÇOISE BOUSONNET, another sister of Claudine. She engraved a set of sixty-six plates of antique ornaments, and a set of fifty-six vases, after her uncle Jacques Stella. Finding she could not equal the reputation of her sister Claudine, she afterwards assisted that distinguished lady in many of her productions.

STELZER, JOHN JACOB, a German engraver, who flourished about 1730. He engraved a part of the plates for the collection of prints after the antique marbles in the Dresden Gallery, published in 1733. He also executed some other plates after various masters. Nagler says he operated as late as 1780.

STEMPSIUS. See SEMPELIUS.

STENDARDO, or STANDARD. See PETER VAN BLOEMEN.

STENREE, or STEENREE, G., was a nephew of Cornelius Poelemburg, with whom he studied, and whose style he followed. His name is called George by some, and William by others. His birth is placed at Utrecht in 1600, and his death in 1648.

STENT, PETER, an English engraver and print-seller of little note, who flourished at London from 1640 to 1663. Only one print, a portrait of Andrew Willet, marked P. S., is certainly the work of his hand; other prints bearing his name, with exc., only indicate him as the publisher.

STERN, DIETRICH VAN. See STAREN.

STERN, IGNAZIO, a painter born in Bavaria about 1698. Probably he learned the rudiments of design in his own country, but he went young to Bologna, where he entered the school of the Cav. Carlo Cignani. While in Lombardy, he painted some pictures for the churches, possessing great merit; particularly an Annunciation in the Nunziata at Piacenza, which Lanzi describes as a graceful and elegant composition, executed in a style peculiar to himself. He afterwards went to Rome, where he acquired a high reputation, and executed several works, both in oil and fresco, for the churches and public edifices, the most considerable of which are some frescos in the Sacristy of S. Paolino, and some oil paintings in S. Elisabetta. He however, excelled more in painting easel pictures from profane history, conversations, musical parties, and what the Italians call Bambocciate, as fairs, rural festivals, markets, masquerades, &c., which were greatly admired, and Lanzi says they are to be found even in royal collections. He died in 1746.

STETTLER, WILLIAM, a Swiss painter, born at Berne, according to Füessli. He studied with Felix Meyer at Zurich, and afterwards went to Paris, where he learned miniature painting of Joseph Werner. He settled in that city, and was much employed in designing historical and other subjects for the publishers. He accompanied Charles Patin as draughtsman, in his travels through Holland and Italy, and made the greater part of the designs for the plates in his publications on medals and antiquities. He died in 1708.

STEUDTNER, MARK CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, born at Augsburg in 1698, according to Nagler; though this is doubtless an error, as there is a print bearing his signature, representing St. Catherine carried to Heaven by Angels, dated 1696. He engraved both on copper and wood, and scraped in mezzotinto. His works embrace a variety of subjects, the chief of which are a set of etchings, representing the Loves of the Gods, and other mythological subjects, from his own designs, which evince considerable talent. He died in 1736. He is sometimes called Stuedener, but he signed his prints M. C. Steudtner.

STEVENS, ALEXANDER, an able English architect and engineer, was born in the early part of the eighteenth century. He distinguished himself by a great number of excellent works, among which are Carlisle Bridge, over the Liffey, in Dublin; the locks and docks on the Grand Canal in Ireland; and the aqueduct over the Lune, at Lancaster. He died at an advanced age, in 1796.

STEVENS, or STEPHANUS, JOHN, a German engraver, and probably painter, who flourished at Strasburg about 1585. He engraved a variety of plates from his own designs, which prove him to have possessed considerable genius. His prints are chiefly slight etchings, executed almost entirely with dots, and are frequently little more than outlines. He sometimes marked his prints with his name, but generally with his initials, J. and S., with the date.

STEVENS, JOHN, an English landscape painter, supposed by Lord Orford to have been a scholar of Vandiest, whose style he imitated. He was principally employed in painting pieces for chimney ornaments. He died in 1722.

STEVENS, STEEVENS, or STEPHANS, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin about 1540. Little is known of him. He painted both history and landscape, and was employed by the Emperor Rodolphus II. at Prague, where he died, at what time is not known. Several of his pictures, chiefly landscapes, were engraved by the Sadeliers and H. Hondius.

STEVENS, or STEEVENS, PETER, another artist born at Mechlin, who flourished about 1650. He was a painter and engraver, but devoted himself chiefly to the latter art. He engraved several portraits, among which are John III., King of Poland; Lodovic, Marquis of Brandenburg; the King of Prussia; Philip, Duke of Orleans; Count Emeric Tekely, and other distinguished personages.

STEVERS. See STAEVARTS.

STIEGLITZ, CHRISTIAN LUDWIG, a distinguished German writer on architecture, was born at Leipsic in 1756. After receiving a liberal education, he studied the legal profession, but devoted his leisure hours to the study of architecture. In 1792, he published his "History of the Architecture of the Ancients," and in 1798, completed his "Encyclopedia of Civil Architecture." In 1804 he began to publish, under the title of Zeichnungen aus der schonen Baukunst, a series of engravings of select specimens of modern architecture, which was exceedingly well received. After producing two or three treatises on ancient coins and medals, he published, in 1820, his excellent work on "Ancient German Architecture," entitled All Deutsche Baukunst, which has had considerable influence towards inspiring and directing the present German taste for the monuments of mediæval art. His next work was his Geschichte der Baukunst, a valuable compendium of the history of architecture from the earliest periods, among all nations, published in 1827. Stieglitz died in 1836. His works evince profound research, and an intimate acquaintance with his subject.

STIGLMAYER, JOHANN BAPTIST, an eminent German sculptor, and the distinguished director of the Royal Brass Foundry at Munich, was the son of a blacksmith, born in 1791, at Furstenfeldbruck, a small town near Munich. Manifesting a strong inclination for art, he was apprenticed to a goldsmith at Munich, named Streissel; and he also attended the holiday school, where by his industry and good conduct he gained the first prize of 100 florins. This success attracted the notice of M. Leprieur, Director of the Bavarian Mint, who encouraged the young artist, and in 1810 procured him admission as a student at the Academy. From this time, Stiglmayer pursued the regular course of study in sculpture, and also practiced seal and medal engraving. In 1814, he executed an admirable medal, representing, on the obverse, von Langer, a Director of the Academy, and on the reverse, Moses striking the Rock, which gained him the appointment of engraver to the Mint. In 1819 he was sent to Italy at the king's expense, to complete his studies. At Rome, Ludwig, then crown prince and subsequently king of Bavaria, became cognizant of Stiglmayer's great abilities; and he seems to have first directed the sculptor's attention to those great undertakings which he had already projected. Accordingly, Stiglmayer visited Naples, to witness the operation of casting the colossal equestrian statue in bronze of Charles III., by Francesco Righetti and his son Luigi, from the model by Canova; but some petty jealousy prevented him from accomplishing his purpose. Undismayed by difficulties, after considerable trouble he obtained permission to erect a smelting oven in his own cellar; and, having procured the assistance of Beccari, an experienced founder, he undertook the casting of several works. The first wholly failed; but the second, a cast from Thorwaldsen's bust of Prince Ludwig of Bavaria, was so completely successful that the journeyman Pasquali, in his ecstasy kissed the lips of the bust before they were cool, and seriously burnt his own! After casting a few other works, and perfecting his acquaintance with the practical department of the art, he returned to Germany in 1822. During the succeeding two years, he was chiefly employed as engraver to the Mint, and in the execution of several works in sculpture, for the Glyptothek or Sculpture Gallery at Munich. Among his busts of this period, are those of Maximilian I., Queen Theresa, Count Dorring, and Bishop Streber. In 1824, he commenced making preparations for his great series of metal castings; and from this time he was exclusively employed in founding the numerous monumental works erected by the king of Bavaria, some of which are after his own models, and others after those of Schwanthaler, Thorwaldsen, and other eminent sculptors of the present century. Impelled by great energy and caution—qualities rarely united—he visited Berlin in 1824, to witness the casting of Rauch's statue of Blucher by Reisinger, who, influenced by liberal and generous sentiments, allowed him everything in his power.

Stiglmayer's great activity commenced in 1826, at the accession of his patron, Ludwig I. His works are too numerous to admit the insertion of a complete list. Among the principal are, the monument of Maximilian I., in Bad Kreuth; and the Parting of Otto, king of Greece, from his mother Theresa, queen of Bavaria, at Aibling—both after his own designs; the twelve colossal fireilded statues of the ancestors of the king of Bavaria, in the palace at Munich; the colossal statues of Jean Paul in Bayreuth, Mozart in Salzburg, the Margrave Frederick of Brandenburg in Erlangen, and the Grand Duke Ludwig of Darmstadt—all after Schwanthaler; the statue of Schiller at Stuttgart; and the colossal statue of Maximilian I. of Bavaria at Munich—both after Thorwaldsen; the obelisk, 100 Bavarian feet high, in commemoration of the 30,000 Bavarians who fell in the allied war; the bronze gates of the Glyptothek and the Wallalla; and the grand constitutional column at Raibach. Stiglmayer was honored, in 1830, with the knighthood of the Bavarian order of St. Michael. He died in 1844, leaving a number of important works in progress, which have since been completed. Among them are the colossal statue of Goethe, for Frankfort, cast on the day of Stiglmayer's death; the enormous colossal impersonification of Bavaria, nearly sixty feet high, placed before the Bavarian Ruhmeshalle, or Temple of Fame, and the largest statue in the world, measuring with its pedestal about eighty feet; the monument of the Grand Duke of Baden—all after the designs of Schwanthaler.

STIMMER, TOBIAS, a Swiss painter and designer, born at Schaffhausen in 1534, according to Bartsch and Nagler, and not in 1544, as stated by others. It is not known under whom he studied, but he had acquired considerable celebrity by decorating the principal mansions of his native city, Strasburg, and Frankfort, with historical subjects painted in fresco, when he was invited to the court of the Marquis of Baden, to paint a series of portraits of the ancestors of that prince, which, according to Huber, he executed in a grand style. All his frescos, however, have perished; but he designed a set of small wooden cuts for a Bible, published at Basle in 1586, entitled Novæ Tobiae Stimmeri sacrorum Bibliorum figuræ versibus Latinis et Germanicis expositæ, and another set of cuts for the New Testament, printed at Strasburg in 1588. These cuts are numerous, and prove him to have possessed a ready and fertile invention. It is no mean proof of his ability that they were commended by Rubens, who declared that he had studied them with attention, and derived much instruction from them. The cuts in the Bible before mentioned, marked with the above monogram of his initials, have heretofore been attributed to him; yet Bartsch says that he made the designs, but never engraved on wood. This, however, rests upon conjecture, and as John C. Stimmer certainly executed a part of these cuts, and doubtless learned the art of his brother, it seems more than probable that Tobias engraved those bearing his monogram; otherwise, why should not his mark be found on all the prints, if it only indicates him as the designer? The title page clearly shows that he designed them all. The time of his death is not known, but he is supposed to have lived to an advanced age.

STIMMER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Schaffhausen, in 1552. He is supposed to have been instructed by Tobias. He is said to have distinguished himself as an engraver on wood, and to have executed many cuts in a clear, neat style, from his own designs, and after those of his brother, which he marked with a monogram composed of the initials C. S. T. M., as above. The accounts of him, however, are involved in much intricacy, confusion, and uncertainty. Those fond of vainly attempting to unravel such perplexities, are referred to Nagler's Lexicon, and Bartsch's P. G., tom. ix. Besides some of the cuts in the Bible mentioned in the preceding article, the following are attributed to him: A set of cuts for the New Testament, printed at Strasburg in 1588. A set of prints of learned persons and theologians of Germany, published by Bernard Jobio, at Strasburg, in 1587. A set of Emblems, entitled Icones Affabræ, published by B. Jobio, at Strasburg, in 1591.

STOCCADE, NICHOLAS DE HELT, a Dutch painter, born at Nimeguen in 1614. He studied at Antwerp under Martin Ryckaert, whose daughter he married. He first practiced landscape painting in the style of his instructor, but his genius leading him to historical painting, he applied with great assiduity to that branch, and had acquired considerable reputation, when he went to Italy for improvement. He passed eight years at Rome, with unremitting application, where his talents soon recommended him to public attention, and he was employed to paint several pictures for the palaces and private collections, particularly for Christina, Queen of Sweden. From Rome he went to Venice, to improve his coloring by studying the works of the great Venetian masters. After a residence of several years at Venice, he set out for his own country; but visiting Paris on his way, he met with such distinguished encouragement that he was induced to establish himself for many years in that city, where he was appointed one of the painters to the king. It is said that he did not long survive his return to the Netherlands, where he died, according to Immerzeel, in 1669.

The historical pictures of Stoccade are generally of large dimensions, and his design bears the character of the Roman school. His compositions evince a ready and fertile invention, his figures are correctly designed, his manner of penciling broad and free, his coloring sweet and harmonious, and he sometimes showed a singularity of manner in expressing the actions and passions of his characters, different from other painters. Thus in the story of Andromeda, while many painters have represented her almost dying with fearful apprehension of her danger, Stoccade, on the contrary, depicted her in modest confusion, rather blushing from the consciousness of being exposed naked, than terrified at the horrors with which she was threatened. This picture, and those of Clelia passing the Tiber, and Joseph distributing Corn to his Brethren, were celebrated by the poets of his country. His principal works are at Rome, Venice, and Paris. He executed a few etchings, among which are Cephalus and Aurora, and Susanna and the Elders, from his own designs; and a portrait of A. van Opstat. after Vandyck.

STOCK, IGNATIUS VANDER, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished from about 1620 to 1660. Little is known of him as a painter, though he is said to have painted landscapes with ability. There are some spirited etchings by him, from his own designs, and after other masters, which evince considerable talent.

STOCK, ANDREW, a Dutch engraver, born at the Hague, in 1590. He went to Antwerp, where he seems to have chiefly resided. He is supposed to have studied under James de Gheyn the Elder, whose style he imitated. He engraved several plates for the Academie de L'Espée, published at Antwerp by Thibeaup, in 1625; he inscribed them Andreas Stokius Hagæ Comitibus, sculp. Among others, are the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Albert Durer, Effigies Alberti Dureri. And. Stock. sc. 1629. Hans Holbein; Effigies Holbeini, Pictoris celeberrimi, se ipse pinx. And. Stock. fecit. Lucas of Leyden; from a picture by himself. Peter Sneyers, Painter; after A. Vandyck.

SUBJECTS.

The Sacrifice of Abraham; after Rubens. Twelve plates of the Months in the Year; after Wildens. A set of eight Landscapes; after Paul Brill.

STOCK, H., an English engraver, who flourished about 1635. Only one print is mentioned by him—a portrait of Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.

§ STOER, LAWRENCE, a German artist, who flourished at Augsburg, about 1567. According to Prof. Christ, he was a painter, and an engraver on wood. He executed several cuts, which are marked with the above monogram.

STOFFE, J. V. D., a Dutch painter of battle-pieces and skirmishes of cavalry, of whom nothing is known except by his pictures, signed with his name. They are of small size, painted on panel, and rarely exceed thirty-six inches by about twenty-four. His pictures are well designed, spirited in action, strongly colored, and highly finished.—They bear some resemblance to those of Stoop, or Esaias Vandervelde, to whom they are sometimes attributed. He flourished about 1650.

STOLKER, JOHN, a Dutch painter, and an engraver in aquafortis and mezzotinto, born at Amsterdam in 1724. He studied painting under J. M. Quinkhard, with whom he remained till he was twenty-three years of age. He then went to the Hague, where he resided nine years, painting portraits and family groups. He next removed to Rotterdam, where he settled permanently, and acquired considerable reputation. He also painted cabinet pictures of familiar subjects, one of which, called Rhynlande, is highly commended for its admirable design, composition, expression, chiaro-scuro, and elaborate finishing. He also engraved quite a number of prints after Rembrandt, Adrian van Ostade, Jan Steen, Frank Hals, Terburg, Schalken, and other masters. He died in 1786.

STOM, or STOOM, MATTHEW, a painter, supposed to have been of Flemish origin, who died at Verona in 1702. He painted landscapes and battle-pieces with considerable reputation. There was another artist of this name who flourished about 1650. He painted sacred subjects, and there is an altar-piece by him in the church of St. Cecilia at Messina.

STOMME, a Dutch painter of still-life, supposed to have been a scholar of John David de Heem, whose style he imitated. There is a fine picture by him in the Museum at Brussels, representing a table covered, on which are a pitcher, a plate of broiled fish, and other objects. Nothing more is known of him.

STONE, NICHOLAS, an English sculptor and architect, born in 1586. He served his time with Isaac Jones, for whom he worked a considerable time. He afterwards went to Holland, where he was employed by one Peter de Heyser, whose daughter he married. On his return to England, he was much employed in executing monuments for persons of distinction. In 1616, he was employed at Edinburgh, in the King's chapel. In 1619, he was engaged in the Banqueting House at Whitehall, and in the beginning of the reign of Charles I. he received his patent as master mason. The following are a few of his principal works, given by Vertue: A tomb, for the Earl of Ormond, set up at Kilkenny, Ireland; a superb tomb for Lord Northampton, in Dover Castle; another for the Earl of Bedford, for which the artist received £1020; a monument to Spenser, the poet, in Westminster Abbey; four statues for the old Royal Exchange, London, of Edward IV., Richard III., Henry VII., and Queen Elizabeth, which were afterwards removed to Guildhall Gate. He executed many works at Windsor for Charles I., and built the front of St. Mary's church at Oxford. According to Stone's private memoranda, he received about £11,000 for his monuments. He died in 1647.

STONE, HENRY, was the son of the preceding, and usually called Old Stone, to distinguish him from his brother John. The time of his birth is not known. He probably studied with Michael Cross, an excellent copyist of the works of various masters, employed by Charles I. He made many excellent copies from the portraits of Vandyck, and many portraits now to be found in various collections, attributed to Vandyck, are supposed to have been painted by him. He also copied the Italian masters with great success. Stanley says that the picture of the Cornaro family, said to be by Titian, formerly at Northumberland House, and now at Hampton Court, is a copy by Stone. He died at London in 1653.

STONE, JOHN, was the brother of Henry. He chiefly followed the profession of his father as a statuary. He also copied some of the most esteemed works of the old masters with considerable success. He is said to have studied with Thomas Cross, an engraver; but it was more probably Michael Cross, mentioned in the foregoing article. He is said to have designed and engraved some plates, but only one is known. He died in 1653.

STONE, NICHOLAS, an English statuary, was the third son of Nicholas S. After receiving some instruction from his father, he visited Italy to complete his education, and modelled many excellent copies of celebrated foreign works, among which, according to Walpole, were the Laocoön, and Bernini's Apollo and Daphne, in terra-cotta, afterwards in the possession of the sculptor Bird.— He returned to England in 1642, and died in the same year as his father, in 1647.

STOOP, DIRK or THEODORE, and PETER. There is a great deal of contradiction and confusion among writers, especially the English, with regard to the Stoops. According to Bartsch and the best authorities, Theodore, Thierry, Dierick, Dirk, and Roderigo are one and the same artist. Roderigo in Portuguese is the same as Theodorus in Latin, from which the other names are derived, Dirk being the diminutive, or rather a corruption, of Theodore, used by the Dutch. Dirk Stoop was a designer and engraver, and probably a painter, born in Holland about 1610. There is a set of twelve plates of Horses, and a set of twelve masterly etchings of figures and animals, signed D. Stoop, which he engraved before he left Holland. He went to Lisbon, where he resided some time, and was patronized by Catherine of Braganza, whom he accompanied to England. While in Lisbon, he engraved a set of eight views in that city, from his own designs, which he dedicated to his patroness. They are signed Ro. Stoop. f., and are dated 1661 and 1662. It is supposed by some that these were from pictures painted by himself, though this rests entirely on conjecture. On his arrival in London, he engraved and published a set of seven prints, representing the Queen's Journey from Lisbon to London. These are marked Ro. Stoop. f. Some time afterwards he engraved, conjointly with Hollar, the plates for the first part of Ogilby's translation of Æsop's Fables, after designs by Barlow, though several of those by Stoop are from his own designs. He engraved several other plates while in England, some of which he signed Ro., and others T. Stoop. It is therefore evident that these prints are all by the same artist, and that he varied his signature according to the custom of the country in which he happened to be located when he published them. There are several other prints by him; and others are attributed to him, but they are of very doubtful authenticity. Some of his prints are extremely rare. Lord Orford, Pilkington, and Bryan, who call him Peter and Roderigo, say he died at London in or about 1685; others, that he returned to his own country about 1678.

STOOP, PETER, is supposed to have been the brother of Dirk, and born about 1612. He was a cotemporary of Peter de Laer, whose style and subjects he imitated with great success, and his best works are said to be little inferior to the productions of that admirable master. Bryan says, in his life of Dirk S., that "his pictures represent hunters and sportsmen on horseback, the halts of travelers, farriers' shops, &c., which are composed and designed with a spirit and taste which has scarcely been surpassed by Philip Wouwerman, for whose works the pictures of Stoop are not unfrequently taken." He then goes on to describe Peter S. as an engraver, and says that he painted battles, huntings, and sea-ports with considerable success. Pilkington gives nearly the same account. It is evident, however, that the imitator of Bamboccio was Peter, for such pictures are frequently met with, signed P. Stoop. The Dutch writers describe Jan Pieter Stoop, as a painter of similar subjects as those attributed by the English to Dirk Stoop. It seems very probable, too, that Dirk was also a painter as well as an engraver, and that he painted the battles, huntings, and halts of travelers. The Dutch writers also mention a J. Stoop, who they say imitated van Bloemen and Michael Carré, and he is commended for his good coloring, spirited penciling, and excellent chiaro-scuro. The reader who wishes to pursue this subject further, must be referred to Bartsch's Peintre Graveur, tom. iv., Weigel's Supplement to Bartsch, Nagler's Lexicon, and Robert Dumesnil Le Peintre Graveur Français, tom. v.

STOOPENDAAL, or STOOPENDAEL, B., a Dutch engraver, who flourished from about 1700 to 1720. He imitated the style of Cornelius Visseher, and copied some of his prints. He generally signed his plates B. Stoopendael, fec., but sometimes with the contraction, B. Stoop., which has caused some confusion. There was another engraver who flourished about the same time, named D. Stoopendael, probably his brother. The following are by him:

Sixty Views in Holland, entitled Les Delices du Diemer Meer; engraved from his own designs. A set of twenty-four Views near the Hague. Four plates, representing the Departure of King William from Holland for England, his Arrival, his meeting the Parliament, and his Coronation; inscribed B. Stoopendaal, fec. The Robbers; after Bamboccio; B. Stoopendaal, sc. The Attack of a Military Convoy; do.; do. A Lime-kiln; do. The last three plates are very finely copied from the prints by Visseher.

STORALI, GIOVANNI, a Bolognese painter, who flourished about 1600. He studied with Cesare Baglioni, whose style he followed with considerable reputation. He painted landscape, fruit, flowers, and still-life.

STORCK, or STORK, ABRAHAM, an eminent Dutch marine painter, born at Amsterdam in 1650. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he studied nature with great assiduity, and carefully sketched every scene, vessel, and object which he intended to introduce into a picture; hence his works have a strong character of truth. His pictures usually represent views on the Y, or the Amstel, near Amsterdam, with a variety of shipping and boats, decorated with small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with great neatness and spirit. He also painted sea-ports, calms at sea with fishing smacks, and sometimes storms at sea, which he represented with great truth and fidelity. His pictures are ingeniously composed, his vessels and rigging are drawn with precision and accuracy, his coloring is clear and transparent, his skies light and floating, and his chiaro-scuro excellent. One of his most celebrated pictures was a representation of the reception of the Duke of Marlborough in the river Amstel, with a procession of vessels, yachts, and barges, superbly decorated, and crowded with figures in a variety of habits, adapted to their different dignities, ranks, and conditions, yet so ingeniously disposed and arranged that there is no appearance of confusion or want of room. His pictures are little inferior to those of Backhuysen and Vandervelde, and are now held in high estimation. Bartsch describes six etchings, which he attributes to him, signed A. Storck. His name is often written Stork, but he signed his pictures A. Storck. He died at Amsterdam in 1708.

STORCK, JAN, or JACOB, is supposed to have been the elder brother of the preceding. He painted similar subjects, but his works are far inferior to the admirable productions of Abraham Storck. His pictures are numerous, usually of small dimensions, and are signed J. Storck, or simply Storck. Jan or Jacob is merely conjectural.

STORER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a Swiss painter, born at Constance in 1611. He went to Milan, and studied in the school of Ercole Procaccini. Lanzi says that he produced some works of a solid taste, but subsequently he fell into mannerism, and not unfrequently adopted gross and common ideas. In other points he displayed much spirit, and was a good colorist. He was one of the artists employed on the decorations at Milan, on the occasion of the Entry of Philip IV. and Maria of Austria. There are many of his pictures in the churches and collections of Germany. Several of his pictures have been engraved by Bonacina, dal Sole, M. Küsel, B. Kilian, and Ph. Kilian. He also etched several plates of subjects from sacred and profane history, from his own designs, some of which are signed Joan. Christ. Storer, and others Giov. Christ. Storer. His name is sometimes erroneously written Stoer and Stora. He died at Constance in 1671, though Lanzi and others say at Milan.

 STOSS, FRANCIS, an old German engraver, who is supposed to have flourished as early as 1460, and to have practiced engraving before the time of Martin Schoen and Israel von Mecheln.

He is said to have engraved a set of small plates, representing the Life and Passion of Christ, which were copied by Schoen, who is believed to have been his pupil, as he imitated his style. He marked his plates with the initials F. and S., in old German characters, with a kind of cross between them, as above. Much of this, however, is merely conjectural. Bartsch (P. G., tom. vi.) describes only three prints bearing this mark, viz., the Resurrection of Lazarus, the Dead Christ, and the Holy Virgin. He says "the engraver who used this mark is very ancient, and absolutely unknown; for as to the names of Francis Stoss, Stoltzhirs, and Stolzius, which different writers have given him, they have as little foundation as the opinion that he was the master of Martin Schongauer." Nagler, however, is of a different opinion, and regards this artist of so much importance that he devotes eight closely printed pages concerning him and his supposed works, which, though interesting to the connoisseur, elicits nothing beyond conjecture.

STOTHARD, THOMAS, an eminent English painter of historical, poetical, and fancy subjects, was born at London in 1755. His father was a coachmaker, and as Thomas was an only and a sickly child, he sent him to Acomb, a small village near York, when he was five years old, and placed him with an old Scotch lady, whose motherly care, with the healthy locality, soon restored him to strength. It was here that his natural genius for painting exhibited itself at a very tender age, and the artist used to relate, in his old age, an incident that induced him to adopt a profession which had afforded him pleasure full seventy years. "My Scotch friend had two sons in the Temple, London, who had sent her some of Houbraken's heads, with an engraving of Blind Belisarius and other prints from the graver of Strange; as they were framed, she had them hung up in a sort of drawing room, and rarely allowed any one to look at her treasures, as she called them. One day I ventured to follow her into her sanctuary. She was pleased with the earnestness with which I viewed the heads and groups, patted me on the head, and said I should see them often, since I seemed to like them so much. I became almost a daily visitor to her room, and I began to wonder how such things were done. I was told they were made with pencils. Though the old lady told me this, she little expected the result. In short, she missed me one day, and found me standing on a chair, trying to imitate with a pencil one of the heads before me. She smiled, patted me on the head, and bade me go on, adding, 'Thomas, ye are really a queer boy.' I did little else now but draw, and I soon began to make tolerable copies.

"I lived at Acomb till I was eight years old, when I left my old Scottish dame with tears in my eyes, and went to school at Stretton, the birth-place of my father. I continued drawing, and even attempted to make sketches from life. Some one told me that engravings were made from paintings in oil colors. I longed to see a painting, and shall never forget the delight with which for the first time I looked upon one. I resolved to paint in colors, and wrote to my father to send me some materials; I was, however, too impatient to wait their coming; but going to a cart and plow wright, I begged black, red, and white oil colors from him, and commenced to make a picture. I painted a man in black paint, and then tried with red and white to work it into the hues of life. It was a sad daub; but I still persevered, and soon learned to handle my brush with more skill, and to lay on my colors with better taste." Such are the simple and instructive circumstances which often lead men of genius to excellence and renown. His father dying about this time, his relatives apprenticed him to a weaver of brocades, but at his master's death, which happened when he was about seventeen years of age, he devoted his whole time to his favorite art, which he had never neglected. To improve himself, he became a student of the Royal Academy. He had already, by the force of his own genius and application, made great progress in art. He had, too, adopted the right path to excellence, which he ever pursued—a diligent study of nature. He delighted to roam over the fields, and sketch on the spot, in water colors, every curious and beautiful object that met his view, whether tree, plant, flower, or insect. In town, too, he was not less diligent in drawing every beautiful and pleasing form. Cunningham says, "His first recorded work is a Holy Family, painted in small, like almost all his pictures; it was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1778; he was then twenty-three years old, and though an early beginner, his modesty equalled his talents, and he did not hurry, as many do, his first crude gropings after beauty before the public. In the following year, he exhibited a little picture of Banditti, and afterwards the retreat of the Greeks with the body of Patroclus; the Death of Sir Philip Sidney; King Richard returning from Palestine; King Richard's treatment of Isaac, King of Cyprus; and Britomart, from Spenser. The last of these intimates the commencement of that series of works, from our poetic and prose literature, which extend to several thousands, and exhibit the heroism, the pathos, the humor, and the spirit of the island genius, in a manner as easy, as graceful, and as brightly, as it shines in the purest prose, or the most vivid verse. In 1792, he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and two years afterwards he was admitted into the ranks as a Royal Academician. He moved at the same time from 39 East street to 28 Newman street—a neighborhood much frequented by brethren of the art.

"Of all our poets, Spenser was his favorite, and from his pages, and those of Chaucer and Shakspeare, he has embodied scenes and groups sufficient for his fame. To ensure the presence of nature in his compositions, it was his custom to walk frequently in the streets, and observe the men and women, girls and boys, the rich and the poor, the high and the humble, as they hurried or loitered along. He used to say that he transcribed their looks or their air from his memory into his studies, and that he never met with two faces or two forms exactly alike. He loved to extend his walks to the Tower, and often further, to study the heads of foreign mariners, who crowd the Thames from every point of the compass: and of these he loved the seamen from the Mediterranean most, for their ancient Grecian cast of countenance; and the Chinese and low Irish least, from their coarse looks and unpoetic airs. In all his pictures there is a natural action and a classic grace—the fruit of these studies, and his fine poetic talents. This is visible in his numerous scenes from the Grecian and Italian poets, over which the air of antique beauty is warmly, sometimes too glowingly, breathed; these consist chiefly of nymphs wandering in shady forests, reposing by falling streams, singing to the lute by silent fountains, walking with their favorite knights, or bathing singly or in clusters in lonely streams, with nothing save a song-bird or a wild fawn to see them.

"The Pilgrim's Progress and Robinson Crusoe were the sources from which he frequently drew his inspiration; Christiana and her Children was in the exhibition of 1797; Christian, the Pilgrim, followed, and both were admired for their simplicity and beauty; while Robinson Crusoe on his lonely isle, scared by the print of a man's foot in the sand, can never pass away from the memory. The illustrations of these romantic compositions tell the story of themselves; in a small compass, and at a glance of the eye, we find the bloom and essence of the great originals. There is scarcely an author of any mark whose pages he has left unembellished; nor is there a poet whose peculiar excellence he can be accused of not perceiving and feeling. In his scene from the Canterbury Pilgrimage, where he musters at sun-rise his motley yet select devotees, and directs their march to the shrine of Thomas à Becket, at Canterbury, we read in their looks the various characters described by Chaucer; and no man who has seen that fine picture, glowing with truth and life, can say he is unacquainted with the poet, though he only knows him by name. The same may be said of those fine pictures which he has hung, like summer garlands, on the Muse of Rogers; and of his illustrations to the Tales of Boccaccio; in both of which he has shown a fancy teeming with images of innocence and loveliness. The sun never shone on more pure and lovely creatures; yet now and then, here and there, he has exhibited a touch of what the Puritans call the old Adam, and has just intimated, in some of his Nymphs, that they feel their steps unsteady, and the grass under their feet a little slippery.

"The chief excellence of Stothard lies in expressing virgin innocence and matronly grace—in depicting images of female loveliness, and rural or chivalrous life. He has humor of a quiet kind, and deep sensibility; he is without labored shapes or constrained postures; all, with him, is easy, graceful, and unaffected. He is the painter of thought, rather than form; and yet, where are fairer forms to be found than in his clusters of nymphs and beves of ladies? His coloring is often bright and clear. He is very unequal, and what is called mannered; his smaller pictures are his best, and luckily they are very numerous."

Stothard's chief fame rests upon his almost innumerable designs and water-colored drawings, which he executed to embellish almost all the beautiful publications of his day. It is said that he made upwards of five thousand, more than three thousand of which were engraved by Charles Heath, and many other eminent engravers, by which means his fame was spread all over the world, even in his life-time. Among his larger works may be enumerated the pictures he painted for the Shakspeare Gallery, the Canterbury Pilgrims, the Flicht of Bacon, and the Wellington Shield. He also painted in fresco the staircase at Burleigh House, the seat of the Marquis of Exeter, the figures of which are seven feet high, and occupied him near four years; and he executed the designs for the ceiling of the Advocates' Library, at Edinburgh. He made many excellent designs for workers in gold, silver, and other metals, to ornament rich services of plate, urns, vessels, &c., and drew the outlines of many celebrated works by the English sculptors, for the engravers. His designs are now highly esteemed, and eagerly sought after by collectors; and though they are so numerous, they are constantly rising in value—a sure proof of their merit. Some of his aquarel drawings are almost as valuable as his oil paintings. Of his numerous oil paintings, his cabinet pictures are the best, and less mannered than his larger productions. It is admitted that he succeeded better in illustrating domestic scenes and the poets of his own country, than the heroic subjects of antiquity; for he was a close observer of men and manners. In representing the sports, humors, and innocence of children, he is without a rival among modern artists. It is said that he gave the preference, before all his other works, to fifteen small pictures which he painted to illustrate the Pilgrim's Progress. He was very simple and unassuming in his deportment, and an unfortunate deafness prevented him from associating with his brother artists and men of genius as much as he otherwise would have done. He was a self-made man, and by the force of his genius, and untiring perseverance and industry, raised himself to a distinguished position, at a period when so many English artists flourished as to cause it to be designated "the golden era of English art." The history of such a man is full of instruction and encouragement to young artists. He died in 1834, aged 79 years.

STOTHARD, CHARLES ALFRED, was the son of the preceding, born in London in 1787. His father gave him a liberal education, and instructed him in art; he afterwards studied in the Royal Academy, where he soon attracted attention for his chaste drawings, and the accuracy with which he drew from the ancient sculptures. In 1802, he accompanied his father to Burleigh, the seat of the Marquis of Exeter, and during the four years he was occupied there, young Stothard employed much of his time in making drawings from the monuments and antiquities in the various churches of that region. This awakened in him a predilection for a pursuit in which he distinguished himself. In 1811 he exhibited at the Royal Academy a spirited picture, representing the Murder of Richard II. at Pomfret Castle, in which the costume of the time was strictly observed, and the portrait of the monarch taken from his effigy in Westminster Abbey. In the same year he commenced and finished the first number of his great work, "The Monumental Effigies of Great Britain," under the auspices of the Society of Antiquaries, of which he became a member. This work required immense labor and research, as it was intended to bring together and preserve correct representations of the best historical illustrations extant, from the Norman Conquest to the time of Henry VIII., to be found in the cathedrals and churches. He therefore devoted his whole time to its prosecution, with great assiduity. He executed the designs with the utmost accuracy and precision, the heraldic emblazonry is of the highest order for correctness and beauty, and he etched all the plates himself, with a delicacy and fidelity before unknown in English art. The work is now considered indispensable to antiquaries, artists, and to every person who is desirous of being acquainted with the costumed history of those times, and the heraldic bearings of all those illustrious persons whose names are recorded for valorous achievements, or other deeds beneficial to their country. In 1816, he was sent by the Society to Bayeux, to make drawings from the famous tapestries preserved in that city. While thus engaged, he visited the Abbey of Fontevraud, where he discovered the effigies of the Plantagenets, the existence of which, after the revolutionary tempest, was considered doubtful. These were added to the work, and in the edition published by Bohn, are superbly illuminated in imitation of the originals. In 1818, he married Miss Kempe, a very ingenious lady, who accompanied him in his second visit to France, and wrote an interesting account of their tour through Normandy and Brittany, which was subsequently published, illustrated with twenty-one engravings from designs by her husband. In 1819, he made drawings for the Society, from the pictures discovered on the walls of the Painted Chamber. In prosecuting this work, he recovered the long lost art of embossing gold on the surface of the material, as practiced by the old Italian and German illuminators, and which contributes so much to the splendor of ancient missals and other manuscripts. His last undertaking, which cost him his life, was for illustrating Lysons' account of Devonshire in the Magna Britannia. He left London in May 1821, and after traversing some portion of that interesting county, came to Bere Ferrers on the 27th of the month. The next day he ascended a ladder, and began to make tracings of the stained glass window in the church, when his feet slipping, he fell, and his head striking against a monument in the chancel, he was instantly killed, aged 34 years.

STRAATEN, JOHN JOSEPH IGNATIUS VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1766. He studied under C. van Geelen, and painted fruit, flowers, dead game, and other objects of still life, in a style somewhat resembling that of J. Weenix. His pictures are well composed and highly finished; they are sometimes enriched with landscape backgrounds by his countryman Swagers. He died in 1808.

STRADA, or STRADANUS, JOHN, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Bruges in 1536. He was first instructed in art by his father, an artist of little celebrity, and next studied under Peter Aertsen. He afterwards went to Rome, where he diligently studied the antique, and the works of the great Italian masters. He there became acquainted with Francesco Rossi, called Il Salviati, whose style he in some measure adopted. In conjunction with that master and Daniello da Volterra, he was employed in decorating the pontifical palace of Belvidere, where he acquired considerable reputation. From Rome he proceeded to Naples, at the invitation of Don John of Austria, to represent his military achievements, in which he gave entire satisfaction to the monarch, and proved himself one of the ablest artists of his time. Vasari next engaged him to assist him at Florence, and in conjunction with that artist, he executed several considerable works for the Ducal palace, and the churches and public edifices. In that city are still to be seen some noble performances of Strada. In the Nunziata is a grand picture by him, representing Christ on the Cross with the Virgin Mary, Mary Magdalen and St. John, with a number of other figures larger than life. Lanzi says this is considered his most capital performance. In S. Croce, is a fine picture of the Ascension, and in S. Maria Nuova, the Baptism of Christ. In the chapel of the Palazzo Pitti, are two small altar-pieces of the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, which are much admired. He did not confine himself to sacred history, but painted battles, huntings, and processions, with great ability; and these are his most numerous works, executed in a noble and spirited style, with a ready hand and a free, firm pencil. He also made many designs for tapestry. He was an indefatigable artist, and his constant practice gave him an uncommon facility of hand, both in oil and fresco. He had a fertile invention, and his design was generally correct, though occasionally heavy and somewhat mannered, for notwithstanding his long residence in Italy, he could never entirely divest himself of his Flemish manner. His coloring was vigorous and effective, and sometimes very brilliant, especially in his cabinet pictures. His works are very numerous, and there are upwards of 400 engravings after pictures by him, many of them by Sadeler, Goltzius, Collaert, Wierix, Galle, and C. de Passe. In 1578, a work was published at Antwerp, entitled, Stradani Venationes Ferarum, Avium, Piscium, &c., illustrated with 94 plates of all kinds of huntings and fights of animals, engraved by several of the above named artists. Lanzi says that he imitated the design of Salviati, and the coloring of Vasari, in whose employment he remained two years at Florence. He died in that city, according to Baldinucci, in 1605. He is called by the Italians Giovanni Stradano.

STRADA, VESPASIANO, a painter who was born at Rome, according to Baglioni, of Spanish parents. It is not known whether he had any other instructor than his father, who was an artist of little note. He wrought chiefly in fresco, and had decorated several of the churches at Rome with his works, when his promising career was cut short by death in the prime of his life. His principal works are a series of pictures in the monastery of S. Onofrio, representing the history of that saint; the Visitation of the Virgin, and the Adoration of the Shepherds in S. Maria Maddalena al Corso. Bartsch describes twenty-one etchings by him, which he believes to be a complete list. Fifteen of these have his name in full, and one only is marked V. S. I. F. Others say that he usually marked his prints V. S. F., or V. S. I. F., and sometimes, VES. ST. I. FE., or VESP. STRA. I. F. There is great discrepancy as to the time of his birth and death. Baglioni and Lanzi say that he died in the pontificate of Paul V., aged 36; Malpe that he was born in 1591, and died in 1624; others that he died about 1615 and 1620. One of his prints is dated 1595; on which Bartsch remarks (P. G. tom. xvii), that supposing this print, which exhibits his greatest power, was done by him at the age of twenty, he must have been born about 1575.

STRAETEN, HENRY VANDER, a Dutch painter, born about 1665. It is not known under whom he studied. Bryan says that, by an attentive study of nature, without the help of a master, he reached an eminent rank as a landscape painter. He went to England about 1690, where he painted landscapes in a style resembling those of Ruysdael and Hobbema, and might have found abundant and profitable employment had it not been for his dissipated habits. He is probably the same artist mentioned by Balkema, under the name of Nicholas vander Straeten, who, he says, was born at Utrecht in 1680, and went to London, where he died in 1722. The accounts of him are contradictory and exaggerated, and it is doubtful if there are any authentic pictures by him. Houbraken says he painted ten landscapes in a day, "each of them full of pleasing variety, with views of mountains, forests, water-falls, and other pleasing incidents"!

STRANGE, SIR ROBERT, an eminent Scotch engraver, born at Pomona, in the Orkneys, in 1721. He was a descendant of the family of the Stranges of Balcasky, in the county of Fife, who had settled in the Orkneys at the time of the Reformation. He was educated for the law, but having a passion for drawing, in which he evinced uncommon talents, his friends were induced to place him under the instruction of Mr. R. Cooper at Edinburgh. His progress to fame, was, however, arrested for a time by the rebellion, for he joined the Pretender, Charles James Edward Stuart, and after the ruin of his affairs, he wandered for some time a fugitive in the Highlands, and had a narrow escape with his life, the incidents attending which, are in the highest degree romantic. After the battle of Culloden, being pursued by a party of the King's troops, he fled into a cottage, where, observing a young lady dressed in the full costume of the period, he besought her protection. As the soldiers were close at his heels, no time was to be lost, she raised her hoop and directed him to seek shelter under the ample folds of her petticoat, and there, "patulae sub tegumine recubans," he remained undiscovered, though the soldiers ransacked the house. After their departure, she concealed him till the troublous times were past. Filled with gratitude and admiration at her conduct, the youth begged her to wait for him till he should prove himself worthy of her hand. As soon as his fortunes were sufficiently prosperous, he married his protectress, and never was there a more devoted husband, or a more affectionate wife. When tranquillity was restored, he returned to Edinburgh, and thence proceeded to London. Shortly afterwards he set out for Italy, but stopping at Rouen, he entered the academy there and drew the first prize for a design, though his competitors were numerous. He next went to Paris, where he became the pupil of le Bas, from whom he learned the use of what is called the dry point, which he afterwards improved, and used with such distinguished success. He now abandoned for the present, his projected visit to Rome, and returned to London, where he soon distinguished himself as an historical engraver. In 1761, he gratified the wish he had long entertained of visiting Italy for the purpose of making designs, and engraving some of the most celebrated pictures of the great Italian masters of the different schools. He was every where received with marked attention and respect, and elected a member of the academies of Rouen, Florence, Bologna, Parma, and Paris; he was also appointed Professor in the academy at Parma. The Royal Academy of London did not show him any favor, though it could not have added to his honor; yet the King thought him worthy of knighthood for the honor he had conferred upon the arts of his country, and accordingly knighted him in 1787. The works of Sir Robert Strange consist of about one hundred plates, more than one-half of which are after the most eminent Italian painters. They are distinguished by a bold and intelligent execution, exhibiting an admirable union of the point and the graver, producing a vigorous and harmonious effect. It is said that he retouched Dorigny's plates of the Transfiguration, and the cartoons of Raffaele, in Hampton court; also that about 1790, he had 80 copies of selected proofs of his own works, bound, to which he prefixed a dedication to the King, and an introduction on the progress of the art of engraving, with remarks on the pictures he had engraved. There are three states of almost all the prints by Strange; 1st. the pure aquafortis, or single etching; 2d. the proof before the letter, or the plate finished with the graver; 3d. do. with the letter. The first are extremely rare, as they were only trial proofs; the second also are rare, as he never struck more proofs than were subscribed for. As an author, he published "An Inquiry into the Rise and Establishment of the Royal Academy of Arts," to which is prefixed a letter to the Earl of Bute, and "A descriptive Catalogue of a Collection of Pictures, and of thirty-two Drawings collected by him in Italy." He died at London in 1792. The following is a complete list of his works, except a few of his earlier productions:

STRASTER, FRAY GERONIMO, a Franciscan monk, who lived in the convent of his order at Valladolid, where he practiced engraving. He engraved the plates for a work entitled "Historia del Monte Celia de nuestra Señora de la Salceda," written by D. Fr. Pedro Gonzalez de Mendoza, archbishop of Granada, published in 1613. The plates are executed with considerable ability.

STRATEN, GEORGE VANDER, a Flemish painter, of whom little is known. He went to Lisbon, where he flourished in 1556, and painted the portraits of some of the princes and principal nobility of Portugal. It is probable, from some documents, that he was painter to the court.

STRAUCH, LORENZ, a painter born at Nuremberg in 1554. He was a skillful portrait and architectural painter, and also painted on glass. Bartsch describes only one etching by him, dated 1599, but Nagler gives a list of twenty-two; some of which are signed with his name in full, and others marked with the above monogram, dated as late as 1614. There is some question whether the prints bearing this mark are really by him; some writers interpret it Lorenz Schnitzner, and Lorenz Stoer, but the first is a supposed name, and the second used a mark composed of the same initials, but of a different form. The question can only be settled by a critical examination and comparison. Bartsch and Zani place his death in 1630, and Nagler in 1636.

STREATER, ROBERT, an English painter, born at London in 1624. He studied with a French painter, named du Moulin. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, and still-life, with such reputation, that at the Restoration, Charles II. appointed him his serjeant painter. The King had a high respect for him, and when he was afflicted with the stone to such a degree as to render an operation necessary, the Monarch procured a surgeon from France to perform it, but it proved fatal, in 1680. His principal works were the theatre at Oxford; some ceilings at Whitehall, which were destroyed by fire; the Battle of the Giants at the Palace of Sir Robert Clayton; and two altar-pieces of Moses and Aaron in the church of St. Michael, Cornhill. Some of his finest pieces are still preserved, and possess great merit. There are a few etchings by him, indifferently executed.

STREEK, JURIAN VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1632. He painted portraits with reputation, but chiefly excelled in objects of still-life. He painted dead game, musical instruments, books, vases, and other objects, correctly designed after nature, agreeably composed, finely colored, and finished with uncommon neatness. He had a good knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, and the effect of light and shadow in his works is very picturesque, giving his objects great force, relief, and truth. He frequently introduced a skull and sepulchral lamp into his compositions. He sometimes signed his pictures with his name, and at others with the above monogram. He died in 1678.

STREEK, HENRY VAN, was the son of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1659. He first studied with his father, and afterwards with Emanuel de Wit, whose manner he followed. His pictures generally represent the interiors of magnificent buildings, churches, temples, and palaces. He had perfect knowledge of the principles of perspective, which enabled him to design his works with great accuracy and precision. He did not succeed so well in figures, and frequently employed other able artists to insert them in his pictures. He died in 1713.

STRESI, PIETRO MARTIRE, a Milanese painter, who died in 1620. He studied under Gio. Paolo Lomazzo, and acquired some reputation as an historical painter, but chiefly excelled, according to Lanzi, in copying the works of Raffaele.

STRINGA, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Modena in 1635, according to Tiraboschi, and to Oretti, in 1638. According to most writers, he studied with Lodovico Lana, an imitator of Guercino, but Lanzi says it is a question whether he was not rather a pupil of Guercino himself. "All that is certainly known is, that he formed himself upon this model (Guercino and Lana), and that of other excellent masters, whose works, during his direction of the great Este Gallery, he might consult at his pleasure. Endowed with a rich imagination, spirited and rapid in his execution, he produced many works in the cathedral and other churches, which were greatly commended. His distinguishing character is the depth of his shades, the somewhat disproportioned length of his figures, and an inclination to the capricious in his composition, and in his actions. When he was advanced in years, he began to deteriorate in style, a case common to most artists." He painted history, landscape, and architecture, and engraved in aquafortis. He executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, which he signed F. Stringa, In. F. He died in 1709.

STRINGA, FERDINANDO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Naples about the middle of the 18th century. He engraved a part of the plates for the Antiquities of Herculaneum, published at Naples in 1750.

STROIFI, DON ERMANN, a painter born at Padua in 1616. Lanzi says he studied with Il Prete Genovese, and afterwards with Titian, whose style he imitated with great success, although, owing to an excessive attention to chiaro-scuro, he deviated too much from the right path. According to Boschini, he traveled for the purpose of improving himself by observing the practice of other schools, and on his return to Venice, he still continued to rise in the estimation of the Venetians. He executed several works for the churches and convents at Venice, and at Padua. He was a monk, and the founder of the order of S. Filippo Neri at Venice. He died in 1693.

STROZZI, ZANOBI, a Florentine painter of a noble family, born in 1412. He studied under F. Giovanni da Fiesole, whose style he followed; his frescos have all perished, and Lanzi says he does not know that any of his works exist in the public collections. He was living in 1466.

STROZZI, or STROZZA. BERNARDO, called IL CAPPUCINO, and sometimes IL PRETE GENOVESE, from his monastic and ecclesiastical character, was born at Genoa in 1581. He studied under Pietro Sorri, and at an early period of his life became a monk of the order of St. Francis. Lanzi gives the following admirable account of him. "The other great colorist of this school, and the scholar of Sorri, was Bernardo Strozzi, better known under the name of Il Cappuccino, or the Capuchin of Genoa, from his preferring that order. He is also called Il Prete Genovese, because he left the cloister when a priest to support an aged mother and a sister; but the one dying, and the other marrying, he refused to return to his order; and when forcibly recalled, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment, he contrived to effect his escape, and fled to Venice, where he passed the rest of his days as a secular priest. His larger compositions are only to be found at Genoa, in the houses of the nobility, and in S. Domenico, where he executed the great picture of Paradise, one of his best works. There are too at Novi, and at Voltri, several altar pieces by him; and above all, an admirable picture of the Madonna in the Palazzo Reale, at Genoa. There are also some of his works in the churches at Venice, where he was preferred to every other artist to replace a Tondo (an oval), executed in the best age of Venetian art, in the Library of S. Marco, and he there painted a figure of Sculpture. He however left few public works. Whoever wishes to see admirable productions, must observe his pictures in eminent collections, as the Incredulity of St. Thomas in the Palazzo Brignole. When placed in a room of excellent colorists he eclipses them all by the majesty, copiousness, vigor, nature, and harmony of his style. His design is not very correct, nor sufficiently select; in these respects we see a naturalist who follows neither Sorri nor any other master, but one who, after the example of that ancient master (Apelles), derives instruction from the multitude. There is a deep expression of force and energy in his heads of men, and of piety in those of his saints; but in the countenances of his women and his youths, he has less merit; and I have seen some of his Madonnas and angels vulgar and often repeated. He was accustomed to paint portraits, and in his compositions, derived all his knowledge from the study of nature, hence there is a want of ideality, and often a meanness in his heads. He often painted half-length figures in the style of Caravaggio. In the Royal Gallery at Florence, is a picture of Christ by him, called della Moneta; the figures are half size, and exhibit great vivacity. He is esteemed the most spirited artist of the Genoese school; and in strong impasto, in richness and vigor of coloring, he has few rivals in any other; or rather, in this style of coloring, he is original and without an example." There are two admirable works by him in the Louvre, St. Anthony of Padua caressing the infant Jesus, and the Virgin and Infant in the clouds, surrounded with a choir of angels. Strozzi also excelled in portraits. He died at Venice in 1644, and his remains were deposited in the church of S. Fosca, with this inscription, "Bernardus Strozzius, Pictorum splendor, Liguriæ decus;" a high eulogium in the seat, and near the ashes, of the greatest colorists of the Venetian school.

STRUDEL, PETER VON, an eminent Tyrolese painter, the time of whose nativity is variously placed in 1648, 1660, and 1680, which last date is evidently erroneous. The best authorities place it in 1660. He went to Venice, and studied with the Cav. Carlo Loti. On leaving the school of that master, he distinguished himself so much as an historical painter, that he was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Leopold, who appointed him his principal painter, and employed him to execute several grand compositions, which gave the monarch so much satisfaction, that he conferred upon him the title of a baron. The accounts of him are singularly brief. He is said to have executed many works for the churches, convents, and public edifices of Vienna, and other cities of Germany, which are correctly designed, warmly and vigorously colored, and evince great originality of taste and conception. He particularly excelled in the graceful airs he gave to his women and children. There are several of his works in the churches of St. Lawrence, and the Augustines at Vienna; and an altar-piece in the cloister Neuburg. There were also three pictures by him in the Dusseldorf gallery—an Ecce Homo, St. John and a Holy Family. He died at Vienna in 1717.

STRUTT, JOSEPH, an English engraver and a writer on art, was born at Springfield, in Essex, in 1749; died in 1802. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to Ryland the engraver, and afterwards studied design and painting in the Royal Academy. He engraved a variety of plates in the crayon and dotted manner, in a very neat and delicate style. In 1785 and 1786, he published his "Biographical Dictionary, containing an Account of all the Engravers from the earliest period to the present time, illustrated by engravings," 2 vols. quarto; a work very creditable to his industry and judgment. Strutt also published several works relating to the ancient and modern customs of England. Among other plates, he engraved twelve illustrations for the Pilgrim's Progress, after T. Stothard; the Birth of Venus, 1779; Pandora presenting the fatal Box to Epimetheus, 1779; Candaules presenting his Queen to his favorite Gyges, after le Sueur; and an allegorical picture of America, after R. E. Pine.

STRY, ABRAHAM VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1753. His father was an ornamental painter, and brought his son up to his own business, but when he attained his majority, he aspired to a higher branch, in which he attained considerable reputation. He painted interiors, with representations of various occupations of the middle class, particularly of shopkeepers and other dealers. He treated these subjects with much ability. He is also said to have painted landscapes with figures and cattle, in the manner of Albert Cuyp, but probably he is confounded in this respect with Jacob van Stry. His pictures are well designed, and though his coloring is rather gay, his chiaro-scuro is excellent. There are two of his works in the Museum at Amsterdam, and others are to be found in the best collections of the Netherlands. He was also a good portrait painter. Balkema places his death in 1824, and Nagler in 1830; but Immerzeel says he died March 7th, 1826.

STRY, JACOB VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1756. He was doubtless the brother of the preceding. After receiving instructions from his father, he went to Antwerp, and studied with Andrew Lens, and afterwards in the Academy in that city. He also diligently studied nature, made rapid progress, and was considered one of the most promising landscape painters of his time. He made the works of Albert Cuyp and Hobbema, particularly of the former, his model. Unfortunately for his reputation, instead of striking out into an original style, he imitated them so closely, that his name has been erased from many of his best works by unprincipled dealers, who have passed them upon the unlearned, for originals by those masters. The Dutch writers boast that his pictures have brought from four to seven hundred florins in Holland, and Stanley says they have been sold in England for as many pounds sterling. He was an artist of great ability, highly eulogized by several cotemporary writers, and was appointed corresponding member of the Royal Institute of the Netherlands. There are three capital landscapes with figures and cattle by him in the museum at Amsterdam. He died in 1815.

STUART, GILBERT CHARLES. This preëminent portrait painter was born at Narraganset, Rhode Island, in 1756. He received his first instruction from a Scotch painter at Newport, named Alexander, who was so much pleased with his talents and lively disposition, that he took him with him on his return to Scotland. His friend dying soon after, the youth found himself penniless in a strange country, but undismayed, he resolved to return home, and found himself obliged to work his passage before the mast. He had already made considerable progress in art, and on his return commenced portrait painting, although without meeting with much encouragement. He was in Boston at the time of the battle of Lexington, but immediately left that city and went to New York, where he painted the portrait of his grand-mother from memory, though she had been dead about ten years, which is said to have been a capital likeness, and gained him some business. About this time he painted his own portrait, the only one he ever took of himself, to the excellence of which, his friend Dr. Waterhouse, bears ample testimony. He says, "it was painted in the freest manner, and with a Rubens' hat," and in another place, that "Stuart, in his best days, said he need not be ashamed of it." Not meeting with any adequate encouragement, and the country being in a deplorable state, in the midst of the Revolution, he set sail for London in 1778, at the age of twenty-two, to try his fortunes in that city. Stuart was a wayward and eccentric genius, proud as Lucifer withal; and on his arrival in that metropolis, he found himself full of poverty, enthusiasm and hope,— often a painter's only capital. He expected to have found Waterhouse, who would have helped him with his advice, and purse if necessary, but he had gone to Edinburg. Instead of going directly to West, as he should have done, he wandered about the "dreary solitude" of London, as Johnson used to characterize the busy hum of that crowded city to the poverty-stricken sons of genius, till he had expended his last dollar. He had cultivated a taste for music, and was an accomplished musician. One day as he was passing a church in Foster-Lane, hearing the sound of an organ, he stepped in, and ascertaining that the vestry were testing the candidates for the post of organist, he asked if he might try. Being told he could, he did so, and succeeded in getting the place, with a salary of thirty guineas a-year! Dr. Waterhouse at length returned to London, and procured for him better lodgings, and "managed to keep him even with his landlord and washerwoman, which was better than he had done." All this time, for some unknown reason, he never once sought the acquaintance of West, but the moment that excellent man heard of the young painter and his circumstances, he immediately sent a messenger to him with money to relieve his necessities, and invited him to call at his studio. "Such was Stuart's first introduction," says Dunlap, "to the man from whose instruction he derived the most important advantages from that time forward; whose character he always justly appreciated, but whose example he could not, or would not follow." Stuart himself says, "On application to West to receive me as a pupil, I was welcomed with true benevolence, encouraged and taken into the family, and nothing could exceed the attentions of the great artist to me,—they were paternal." He was twenty-four years old when he entered the studio of West. Before he left the roof of his benefactor and teacher, he painted a full-length portrait of him, which elicited general admiration. It was exhibited at the Royal Academy, and the young painter paid frequent visits to the exhibition rooms. It happened that one day as he stood near the picture, surrounded by artists and students (for he had fine wit, and was an inimitable story-teller), West came in and joined the group. He praised the picture, and addressing himself to his pupil, said, "you have done well, Stuart, very well; now all you have to do is to go home and do better." Stuart always expressed the obligations he was under to that distinguished artist. When West saw that he was fitted for the field, prepared for and capable of contending with the best portrait painters, he advised him to commence his professional career, and pointed out to him the way to fame and fortune. But Stuart did not follow this wise counsel, preferring to indulge his own wayward fancy. He had a noble, generous, and disinterested heart, but he was eccentric, improvident, and extravagant, and consequently he was always necessitous. There are many amusing anecdotes told of him, some of which do not redound to his credit. He himself explains how he came to adopt a custom, which, where it can be adopted, commends itself to others. "Lord St. Vincent, the Duke of Northumberland, and Colonel Barre, came unexpectedly into my room one morning, shortly after my setting up an independent easel, and explained the object of their visit. They understood that I was under pecuniary embarrassment, and offered me assistance, which I declined. They then said they would sit for their portraits,—of course I was ready to serve them. They then advised that I should make it a rule that half-price must be paid at the first sitting. They insisted on setting the example, and I followed the practice ever after this delicate mode of their showing their friendship."

Stuart married the daughter of Dr. Coates in 1786. Soon afterwards, he was invited to Dublin by the Duke of Rutland, who promised him his patronage and influence, but he died while the artist was on his way. Miss Stuart, his daughter, says, "he arrived in Dublin in 1788, and notwithstanding the death of his friendly inviter, he met with great success, painted most of the nobility, and lived in a good deal of splendor. The love of his own country, his admiration of General Washington, and the very great desire he had to paint his portrait, was his only inducement to turn his back upon his good fortune in Europe." Accordingly, in 1793, he embarked for New York, where he took up his abode for some months, and painted the portraits of Sir John Temple, John Jay, Gen. Clarkson, John R. Murray, Colonel Giles, and other persons of distinction. In 1794, he proceeded to Philadelphia, for the purpose of painting the portrait of Washington, who received him courteously. Stuart used to say that when he entered the room where Washington was, he felt embarrassed, and that it was the first time in his life he had ever felt awe in the presence of a fellow-man. Washington was then standing on the highest eminence of earthly glory, and the gaze of the world was steadily fixed upon the man whom Botta terms "the Father of Freedom." To leave to posterity a faithful portrait of the Father of his country, had become the most earnest wish of Stuart's life. This he accomplished, but not the first time; he was not satisfied with the expression, and destroyed the picture. The President sat again, and he produced that head which embodies not only the features but the soul of Washington, and from which he painted all his other portraits of that great man. This picture is now in the Boston Athenæum.

After the removal of Congress to Washington, Stuart followed and resided there till 1806, when he went to Boston, and passed there the rest of his days. He painted a great many portraits, which are scattered all over the country. The last work he ever painted was the head of the elder John Quincy Adams. He began it a full-length; but he was an old man, and only lived to complete the head, which is considered one of his best likenesses, and shows that the powers of his mind and the magic of his pencil continued brilliant to the last. The picture was finished by that eminent and highly gifted artist, Thomas Sully, who would not touch the head, as he said "he would have thought it little less than sacrilege." He died in 1828, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

As a painter of heads, Stuart stands almost unrivalled in any age or country; beyond this he made no pretensions, and indeed bestowed very little care or labor. He used to express his contempt for fine finishing of the extremities, or rich and elegant accessories, which he used to say was "work for girls." Whether these were his real sentiments, or affectation, it is difficult to determine. He was, however, totally deficient in that academic education which is necessary to success in the highest branch of the art—historical painting. He had genius enough to have distinguished himself in any branch, but he could not, or would not, brook the necessary toil. All who have written about Stuart speak of his wonderful conversational powers. He read men's characters at a glance, and always engaged his sitters on some interesting topic, and while their features were thus lit up, he transferred them to the canvass. Hence his portraits are full of animation, truth and nature. This trait is well illustrated by the following anecdote. While he was in England, Lord Mulgrave employed him to paint his brother, General Phipps, who was going out to India. When the portrait was finished, and the General had sailed, the Earl called for the picture, and on examining it he seemed disturbed, and said, "This picture looks strange, sir; how is it? I think I see insanity in that face." "It may be so," replied Stuart, "but I painted your brother as I saw him." The first account Lord Mulgrave had of his brother, was that insanity, unknown and unapprehended by any of his friends, had driven him to commit suicide. Washington Allston, in his eulogium of Stuart, says, "The narratives and anecdotes with which his knowledge of men and the world had stored his memory, and which he often gave with great beauty and dramatic effect, were not unfrequently employed by Mr. Stuart in a way, and with an address peculiar to himself. From this store it was his custom to draw largely, while occupied with his sitters, apparently for their amusement; but his object was rather, by thus banishing all restraint, to call forth, if possible, some involuntary traits of natural character. But these glances of character, mixed as they are in all men with so much that belongs to their age and associates, would have been of little use to an ordinary observer; for the faculty of distinguishing between the accidental and the permanent, in other words between the conventional expression which belongs to manners and that more subtle indication of the individual mind, is indeed no common one; and by few, if indeed by any, has this faculty been possessed in so remarkable a degree. It was this which enabled him to animate his canvass, not with the appearance of mere general life, but with that peculiar, distinctive life which separates the humblest individual from his kind. He seemed to dive into the thoughts of man—for they were made to rise and speak on the surface. Were other evidences wanting, this talent alone were sufficient to establish his claims as a man of genius; since it is the privilege of genius alone to measure at once the highest and the lowest. In his happier efforts, no one ever surpassed him in embodying, if we may so speak, these transient apparitions of the soul. Of this, not the least admirable instance is his portrait of President Adams, whose bodily tenement at the time seemed rather to present the image of a dilapidated castle, than the habitation of the unbroken mind; but not such is the picture—called forth from its crumbling recess, the living tenant is there, still ennobling the ruin, and upholding it, as it were, by the strength of his inner life. In this venerable ruin, will the unbending patriot and the gifted artist speak of the first glorious century of the republic. In a word, Gilbert Stuart was, in its widest sense, a philosopher in his art; he thoroughly understood its principles, as his works bear witness—whether as to harmony of colors, or of lines, or of light and shadow—showing that exquisite sense of a whole which only a man of genius can embody. Jealousy was unknown to him, but where praise was due he gave it freely, and gave it with a grace too which showed that, loving excellence for its own sake, he had a pleasure in praising it. To young artists he was uniformly kind and indulgent, and most liberal of his advice, which no one ever properly asked but he received, and in a manner no less courteous than impressive."

STUART, JAMES, called The Athenian, was an English architect, born at London in 1713. His father, a Scottish mariner, died while James was very young, and the latter materially assisted his mother in the support of her family, by the profits of his ingenuity in designing and painting fans for an engraver named Goupy. By great application, he acquired a knowledge of anatomy and geometry, and also of the Greek and Latin languages. In 1742 he set out for Italy, by the way of Holland and France, defraying his expenses by exercising his talents on the route. At Rome, he formed an intimate acquaintance with Nicholas Revett, a painter and architect; and, after several years' study, they formed a plan for visiting Athens, and published proposals, soliciting assistance to carry it into execution. Having received from England the necessary aid, they quitted Rome in March 1750, proceeded to Venice, and thence to Pola in Istria, to examine the interesting remains of antiquity at that place. Returning to Venice, they sailed to Zante in the beginning of 1751, and thence to Corinth. In the month of March they reached Athens, and remained there about two years and a half, making drawings and exact measurements of the architectural remains. Stuart there became acquainted with Sir Jacob Bouverie, and Mr. Dawkins, the latter of whom proved a most liberal patron. From Athens, they visited Salonica, and several islands of the Ægean Sea, returning to England in the beginning of 1755. The result of their labors appeared in 1762, when the first volume was published of their work in folio, entitled, "The Antiquities of Athens, measured and delineated, by James Stuart, F. R. S., and S. A., and Nicholas Revett, Painters and Architects." In the drawings and measurements of this work, their labors were doubtless united; but the letter-press appears to have been Stuart's. It was received with great applause by the lovers of art and antiquity; and although anticipated by Leroy's Ruines, which surpassed it in picturesque beauty, yet its superior truth and depth of research gave it a more solid and permanent value. Stuart, on his return to England, was patronised by several persons of rank and influence, in the practical department of his profession. Lord Anson procured for him the appointment of surveyor to Greenwich Hospital. Among his principal works were, the seat of Lord Eardley, near Erith, Kent; Mrs. Montague's House, Portman Square; the chapel and infirmary at Greenwich Hospital; and the seat of Lord Anson, in Staffordshire. Stuart died in 1788. The second volume of the Athenian Antiquities was published by Mr. Newton, in 1790; the third by Mr. Revely, in 1794.

STUBBS, GEORGE, an eminent English painter of animals, was born at Liverpool in 1724. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went to Rome at the age of thirty for improvement, and on his return settled in London, where he soon distinguished himself as a painter of animals, particularly the horse, which he designed with the greatest anatomical accuracy, to ensure which he practiced dissection. In 1766, he published "The Anatomy of the Horse," all the plates of which he etched himself, from his own designs. Though he chiefly devoted his attention to this branch of the art, he was capable of higher exertions, as is proved by his picture of Phaëton with the Horses of the Sun. His pictures of the Lion and the Horse, the Lion and the Stag, &c., were highly applauded. He was the inventor of a method of painting large landscapes in a kind of enamel, on plates of iron, of little value. He etched and engraved in mezzotinto some fine plates of animals, from his own designs. Other pictures by him were engraved by Woollett, Earlom, Green, Hodges, and other eminent engravers. At the time of his death, he was employed upon a work entitled "A Comparative Anatomical Exposition of the Structure of the Human Body, with that of the Tiger and the Common Fowl." He was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and died in 1806.

STUBBS, GEORGE TOWNLEY, was the son of the preceding, born in 1756, and died in 1815. He engraved some plates of animals, after his father's works, and other subjects after other English painters.

STUERBOUT. See DIRCK VAN HAERLEM.

STURMIO, HERNANDO, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville, according to Bernudez, about the middle of the 16th century. He painted the altar-piece of the Four Evangelists, for the chapel of the Evangelists, and another grand picture in the Cathedral, in several compartments, representing the Resurrection, St. Gregory saying mass, the patron saints of Seville, and other subjects. These works are well designed and colored.

STURMIUS, LEONARD CHRISTOPHER, an eminent German writer upon architecture, was born at Altorf in 1669. After receiving a liberal education, he studied divinity, but soon quitted it for the mathematics. In 1714 he published "Prodromus Architecturæ Goldmannianæ," and afterwards, in separate treatises, a new edition of Goldmann; the whole forming a "Complete Course of Civil Architecture," printed at Augsburg, in 16 vols. fol. His next work was "Sciagraphia Templi Hierosolymitani," in folio. In 1697, he started on a tour through France and the Netherlands, and published, in 1719, the result of his observations in a work in folio, illustrated with numerous plates from his own designs. At Mecklenburgh he erected the palace of Neustadt, on the Elde. He also made an unsuccessful attempt to form a sixth order of architecture. Sturmius was successively honored with the appointments of Professor of Mathematics at Wolfenbittel, and in the University of Frankfort on the Oder; also of Counsellor of the Chamber of Finances, and Director of Buildings at the court of Frederick William, Duke of Mecklenburgh. He died in 1719.

STURT, JOHN, an English engraver, born at London in 1658, and died there in 1730. He was a pupil of Robert White, and his chief excellence consisted in engraving ornamental letters. His principal work is a Book of Common Prayer, published in 1717. The top of every page is ornamented with a small scriptural vignette, neatly executed.

STUVEN, ERNEST, a German painter, born at Hamburg in 1657. He learned the rudiments of art in his native city, of an obscure painter named Hins, and at the age of eighteen went to Amsterdam, and studied with John Voorhout, a reputable painter of history. The fruit and flower pieces of Abraham Mignon were then held in the highest estimation, and Stuvén having a taste for that branch of the art, he became the pupil of that master, and imitated his manner with considerable success. Though his works are not so exquisitely finished and delicately colored as those of Mignon, they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1712.

SUARDI, BARTOLOMEO. See BRAMANTINO.

SUÁREZ, or JUÁREZ, LORENZO, a Spanish painter who was born at Murcia, and flourished there about 1600. In conjunction with Cristobal Acebedo, he executed several works for the convent of the Shod Carmelites in his native city, which are said to display considerable ability.

SUAVIUS. See SUTERMAN.

SUBLEYRAS, PIERRE, an eminent French painter, born at Usès in Languedoc, in 1699. After acquiring the elements of design from his father, Matthieu S., an artist of little note, he entered the school of Antoine Rivalz, at Toulouse, at the age of fifteen. In 1724, he went to Paris, and frequented the Royal Academy, where he obtained, two years after, the grand prize in painting, for his fine picture of the Brazen Serpent. He visited Rome for improvement, with the royal pension. According to Lanzi, when Subleyras entered the French Academy at Rome, it was distinguished for a certain mannerism, designated spiritoso by Mengs, which had brought it into disrepute, consisting in transgressing the limits of propriety and beauty, overcharging both the one and the other, and aiming at fascinating the eye rather than satisfying the judgment. Subleyras, though instructed in this false taste, had sufficient discrimination to reject it entirely; he reformed the prevailing manner, retaining the good, avoiding the feeble part, and added from his own genius what was lacking to make a truly original style. His pictures are distinguished for admirable fidelity of representation, an engaging variety in the airs of the heads and the attitudes of the figures, and great skill in the distribution of the chiaro-seuro, which gives them a fine general effect. His figures and drapery have a certain fullness and grandeur, which in him appears easy, because natural; but it was never emulated by his scholars. Upon leaving the Academy, he was already an accomplished artist; and he was commissioned, in preference to Masucci, to paint the portrait of Benedict XIV., which, according to Lanzi, established his reputation as the first painter at Rome. He was soon afterwards chosen to paint the History of St. Basil, for the purpose of being copied in mosaic, for the church of the Vatican. The original is at the Carthusians, and is a most admirable production, remarkable for the august representation of the Sacrifice solemnly celebrated by that Saint, in the presence of the Emperor Valens, who is offering bread at the altar. Lanzi says, "the countenances are very animated; there is great truth in the drapery and accompaniments; and the silks, in their light and lucid folds, appear absolutely real." Subleyras settled permanently at Rome, and executed many altar-pieces for the churches in that city, and other places in Italy, among which his St. Benedict resuscitating an Infant, in the Olivetani at Perugia, is accounted his masterpiece. He also painted many portraits and easel pictures, which are highly prized, even in the choicest collections. He was chosen a member of the Academy of St. Luke about 1740. and presented a sketch of his picture of Mary Magdalene washing the feet of Christ; it was afterwards executed in oil for a monastery at Turin, and is now in the Louvre, with two other of his productions. Subleyras was subsequently received into the Academy of the Arcadi, with his wife (formerly Maria Felice Tibaldi, a paintress in miniature), under the names of Protogenes and Asteria. He died at Rome in 1749. There are two of his works in the Academy of the Brera at Milan; and one representing the Fall of Simon Magus, in England, at Alton Tower, the seat of the Earl of Shrewsbury. There are a few spirited and tasteful etchings by Subleyras, among which are the following, from his own designs: The Brazen Serpent. The Martyrdom of St. Peter. Mary Magdalene washing the Feet of Christ. A set of four plates from La Fontaine's Fables. The Holy Family, in an oval. St. Bruno restoring a Child to life. Martyrdom of St. Peter.

SUBTERMANS. See SUSTERMANS.

SUEUR, EUSTACHE LE, an eminent French painter, born at Paris in 1617. He was the son of an obscure sculptor, who, discovering in him a talent for painting, placed him under the tuition of Simon Vouet. He was, however, more indebted to a diligent study of the antique marbles, and the fine pictures of the Roman school which Francis I. had caused to be brought into France, and to which he had free access, than to the precepts of his instructor. Though he never visited Italy, and had not the advantage of studying the works of Raffaello at Rome, he was an enthusiastic admirer of that great master, and in his laudable ambition of emulating him, he threw aside the frippery and affected style then prevalent in his country. The simplicity and grandeur of his compositions, and the purity of his design procured for him, among his countrymen, the honorable appellation of the French Raffaello. The French biographers do not hesitate to compare his talents with those of Raffaello, and M. Watelet, one of the least prejudiced of the French critics, elevates his talents to nearly a level with those of the illustrious head of the Roman school. Making every allowance for national partiality, it must be allowed that no painter of his country, N. Poussin only excepted (who ought to be regarded as a Roman rather than a Parisian), approached so nearly to the dignity and grandeur of the Roman school; yet there can be no justice nor advantage in comparing him to Raffaello. He had an easy and fertile invention, his compositions are noble and elevated, his draperies are simple and grand, and in the manner of his folds he observed the order of the antique. Yet his close attention to his models, without a sufficient study of nature, contributed to give a hardness and dryness to his works. He never divested himself entirely of the manner of coloring which he had acquired under Vouet, and he knew but little either of chiaro-scuro, or of local colors. Though he had extraordinary merit, it was blended with great imperfections, so that in some parts of all his pictures he was unequal to himself. His taste of design and the airs of his heads are justly to be admired, but his nude figures are faulty in their disposition, as well as in the action of the muscles. His coloring is tender and delicate, yet it wants vigor and force, and the distribution of his lights and shadows is far from judicious. His attitudes, however, are noble, simple, and natural, his expression great, and well adapted to his subject, and he was ingenious in the choice of his objects. Upon the whole, he may be said to have had an uncommon mixture of the perfections and imperfections of the art; he excelled in the superior and most difficult parts, and erred in those which are least important, yet necessary to form a perfect whole.

Le Sueur never received that patronage and consideration to which his talents and great merits eminently entitled him. His dignified and unpretending style was less captivating than the gaudy and fantastic productions of some of his cotemporaries. In 1640 he was received into the Academy, and painted, for his reception piece, St. Paul casting out a Demon. He was soon afterwards engaged in his celebrated series of twenty-two pictures, representing the Life of St. Bruno, for the monastery of the Carthusians at Paris. These pictures were afterwards purchased by the king, and arranged in one of the apartments of the Luxembourg; they are now in the Louvre, with twenty other works by him of different subjects, among which are the famous pictures of St. Paul preaching at Ephesus, painted for the church of Notre Dame, and the Descent from the Cross, formerly in the church of S. Gervais. There is a single etching by le Sueur, representing the Holy Family, half-length figures, from his own design. He died in 1655.

SUEUR, PIERRE LE, called the Elder, a French engraver on wood, born at Rouen in 1636, and died there in 1716. According to Papillon, he studied with an artist named du Bellay, whom he greatly surpassed. He generally marked his prints with a monogram composed of his initials, P. L. S., as above.

SUEUR, PIERRE LE, called the Younger, was the son of the preceding, born at Rouen in 1663. He was instructed by his father, whom he surpassed. His drawing is tolerably correct, and his cuts are executed with great neatness and delicacy. He went to Paris, where he settled, and engraved some devout subjects, biblical prints, and other subjects, which he usually marked with his initials, P. L. S.

SUEUR, VINCENT LE, was a younger brother of the preceding, born at Rouen in 1668. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Paris, and studied with Jean Papillon. He distinguished himself as an engraver on wood, and executed a variety of cuts, from his own designs and after other masters, some of which are printed in chiaro-scuro. He marked his prints V. L. S.

SUEUR, NICHOLAS LE, was the son of Pierre le S. the Younger, born at Paris in 1690. He studied with his father, excelled as an engraver on wood, and was the most eminent of the family.

He executed some beautiful cuts, mostly in chiaro-scuro, for the Crozat collection, which gained him great reputation. He also engraved in a very tasteful manner, the embellishments for an edition of La Fontaine's Fables, from the designs of Bachelier. The following are among his best prints, executed for the Crozat collection. He died at Paris in 1764.

Fishermen drawing their Nets; after Giulio Romano. The Mass; after Pelidoro da Caravaggio. The Egyptians overwhelmed in the Red Sea; after Gio. Fran. Penni, called Il Fattore. Christ with the Apostles; after Raffaele del Colle. The Man and the Lion; after Bal. Peruzzi. The Death of St. Francis Xavier; after Lod. Gimignani. The Descent of the Holy Ghost; after G. B. Lenardi. The Annunciation; after G. M. Morandi. The Virgin appearing to St. Philip Neri; after L. Garzi. The Virgin on a Throne, surrounded by Saints; after P. Pietri.

SUGGER. This architect was an abbot of St. Denis, and flourished about the middle of the 12th century. In 1140, he rebuilt the church of St. Denis, near Paris, with magnificent additions. Its length is 335 feet, and its width from the middle nave 39 feet. The vault is of an equal elevation in every part, and supported by slender columns; the entire edifice is lighted by three orders of windows.

SUISSE, LE, an engraver on wood mentioned by Papillon, who executed several cuts, particularly a large one representing a Turkish army arrayed in order of battle. He is probably the same as Christopher Stimmer, which see.

SUIZER, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1650, and executed some book plates. He is doubtless the same as John Schweizer, which see.

SULIVAN, LUKE, an Irish miniature painter and engraver, of little note. He went to London, where he learned engraving of Thomas Major. As an engraver, he was principally employed by Hogarth, to engrave from his pictures, and he sometimes worked conjointly with that artist.

SUNMAN, or SOUMANS, WILLIAM, a Dutch portrait painter, who went to London in the reign of Charles II., where, after the death of Lely, he acquired considerable practice. He was employed to paint several large pictures of the founders of the University of Oxford, which are preserved there in the picture gallery. He died about 1707.

SUPPA, ANDREA, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina, according to Hackert, in 1628. He studied with Bartolomeo Tricomi, whom he excelled, particularly in portraits, which he executed with great truthfulness. Lanzi says "he studied landscape and architecture under Abraham Casembrodt; but he formed himself principally upon the antique, and by constantly studying Raffaele and the Caracci, and other select masters, he acquired a most enchanting style of countenances, and indeed of every part of his composition. His works are as fine as miniature, and are perhaps too highly finished. His subjects, in unison with his genius, are of a pensive and melancholy cast, and are always treated in a pathetic manner. He excelled in frescos, and painted the vaults in the Duomo in S. Paolo; he excelled equally in oils, as may be seen from the picture of S. Scolastica, here also. He died in 1671.

SURCHI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, called DIE-

LAI, a painter born at Ferrara. He was a disciple of the Dossi, whom he assisted in some of the principal works in the palaces Belriguardo, Belvidere, Giovecca, and Cepario. Lanzi says, "Thus instructed by both brothers, he became, perhaps, the most eminent figurist among his fellow-pupils, and beyond question, the best ornamental painter. He left many specimens in the first branch, but few in the second. In rapidity, vivacity, and grace in his figures, he approaches Dosso Dossi; also in his easy and natural mode of draping. In the warmth of his coloring, and in his strong lights, he even aimed at surpassing him; but, like most young artists who carry to excess the maxims of their schools, he became somewhat crude and inharmonious, at least in some of his works. Two of his Nativities at Ferrara are highly extolled, one at the Benedettini and the other at S. Giovannino, to which he added the portrait of Ippolito Riminaldi, a distinguished civilian of his age; both possess great merit." Barotti notices several other works by him in the churches at Ferrara, particularly the Marriage of St. Catherine in S. Anna, and the Adoration of the Shepherds in S. Giovannino. He died in 1590.

SURRUGUE, LOUIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1695. He was instructed in design and engraving by Bernard Picart, whose style he followed with success, and, like his instructor, united the point and the graver in a very agreeable manner. Though his drawing is not very correct, he acquired distinction, and was elected a member of the Academy of Paris. His prints are very numerous, and are after some of the greatest masters of the Italian, French, and Flemish schools. The following are among his best prints; for a full list the reader is referred to Nagler's Lexicon. He died in 1769.

PORTRAITS.

Louis de Boullongne, Painter to the King; after Matthieu. Joseph Christopher Veirier, Sculptor.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

St. Margaret; after Raffaele; for the Crozat collection. St. Jerome in the Desert; after Bal. da Siena; engraved by N. Chateau, and finished by L. Surrugue; do. Christ curing the ten Leprous Men; after Girol. Genga; do. Abraham sacrificing Isaac; after A. del Sarto. The Birth of the Virgin; after P. da Cortona. Abraham sending away Hagar; after le Sueur. Venus nursing Love; after Rubens. A Flemish Merry-making and the Fortune-Teller; two plates; after Teniers.

SURRUGUE, PIERRE LOUIS, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1717. He was instructed by his father, whose style he followed, though he was inferior to him. He executed quite a number of plates after Correggio, Guido, Coypel, Latour, Teniers, Pater, Chardin, and other masters. He died in 1771.

SUSTERMANS, or SUBTERMANS, JUSTUS, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1597. He first studied under William de Vos, and afterwards with Francis Pourbus. He next travelled through Germany to Italy, in search of improvement, and after stopping some time at Venice, he proceeded to Florence, where his talents recommended him to the patronage of the Grand Duke Cosmo II., who appointed him his painter. He continued in the service of that prince till his death, and was continued in his office by his successor, Cosmo III., to the end of his reign. Sustermans painted history and portraits, and in the latter branch he was considered little inferior to Vandyck. When that distinguished painter visited Florence, he expressed his admiration of the works of Sustermans, and painted his portrait, of which we have an etching by Vandyck himself. Rubens also esteemed him, and presented him with one of his own historical works, regarding him as an honor to his country. Lanzi says, "Sustermans painted all the living members of the Medicen family in a variety of attitudes; and when Ferdinand II. ascended the throne, he executed a stupendous picture, wholly composed of portraits. He represented in it the ceremony of swearing allegiance to the new sovereign; and portrayed with him his mother and grandmother, and the senators and nobility who were present. This picture is very large, has been engraved, and still remains in the Gallery. The artist had a neatness and elegance of pencil, extraordinary even in the school to which he belonged; and he possessed a peculiar talent of ennobling every countenance, without injuring the likeness. It was his custom to study the peculiar and characteristic air of the person, and to impart it to his work, so that when he would sometimes conceal the face of a portrait, by the bystanders it could certainly be told whom it represented, from the figure, and the disposition of the hands."

Sustermans was also employed by several other princes of Italy and Germany, as well as the nobility, who were ambitious of having their portraits painted by an artist scarcely less famous, or inferior to Vandyck. His historical works are composed in a grand style, and his design, refined by his studies in Italy, is elegant and correct. His coloring possesses all the clearness, brilliancy, and strength of his country, and he had an excellent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, which enabled him to give his figures, and every object, a surprising relief. His name is called by the Italians Subtermans; and he is sometimes confounded with Suterman, an entirely different artist, from similarity of names. His real name was Sustermans. He died in 1681.

SUSTRIS, or SUSTER, Lanzi says, is the surname of Federigo di Lamberto, called also F. del Padovano, a Fleming who flourished in 1568, at Florence, of which place he had become a citizen. Vasari also commends him, and says he was an ornament to the Academy there. This artist cannot be the same as Lambert Lombard, as some have supposed, from similarity of names, for that artist had returned many years before to Liege, where he is supposed to have died about 1565. See Lambert Lombard and Suterman.

SUTERMAN, LAMBERT, called also SUAVIUS, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Liege, where he flourished about the middle of the 16th century. He was a disciple of Lambert Lombard. Nothing is known of him with certainty as a painter, but there are quite a number of prints by him, after the works of his instructor, and from his own designs. He generally marked his plates with his initials, L. S., and the date.

The history of three Flemish artists, viz., Lambert Lombard, Lambert Suterman, and Justus Sustermans, has been mixed up, by some careless writers, in the most admirable confusion, under the names of Lambert Suterman, or Sutermans, or Sustermans, Suavius, Suster, or Sustris.—

There is a picture in the Louvre attributed to Lambert Suster, who it is said was a pupil of Christopher Schwartz, and afterwards of Titian, and died at Munich in 1600. (See Lambert Lombard, Sustermans, and Sustris.) Among others are the following prints by Suterman:

SUBJECTS AFTER LAMBERT LOMBARD.

The Resurrection of Lazarus; Lambert Lombard, inv. L. S. 1544. Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus. The Entombing of Christ. St. Peter and St. John healing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple. The taking down from the Cross.

SUBJECTS FROM HIS OWN DESIGNS.

The Twelve Apostles; dated 1545, 1547, and 1548. The Head of Christ; circular. 1559. The Head of the Virgin; do. Some portraits, among which is that of M. Angelo Buonarrotti.

SUVÉE, JOSEPH BENOIT, a distinguished painter of the French school, was born at Bruges in 1743. After acquiring the elements of design under Matthew de Visch, he visited Paris, and entered the school of Bachelier, where he made such rapid progress that, at the age of twenty-three, he was appointed to superintend the free school of design in that city. In 1771 he gained the grand prize, and went to Rome with the royal pension, by the way of Bruges, where he was honored with a public banquet by the city magistrates. After studying for seven years the antique and the works of the great masters, he returned to Paris, and in 1780 was chosen a member of the Academy. He exhibited several pictures at the Louvre, which were much admired. His compositions are more distinguished for graceful expression and harmonious effect, than for vigorous coloring and spirited touch. Among the principal are the Descent from the Cross, and the Adoration of the Magi, in a church at Ypres; the Origin of Painting, in the Academy at Bruges, and the Resurrection, in the church of S. Donat. Most of his pictures are to be found in France. In 1792, Suvée was appointed Director of the French Academy at Rome, but was prevented by the civil commotions from entering upon the duties of his office until 1801, when he proceeded to Rome. Finding the institution almost entirely abandoned, he labored several years with great assiduity to restore its reputation and prosperity, and had finally succeeded in establishing it with comparative stability, in the Villa de' Medicis, when he died suddenly, in 1807.

SUYDERHOEF, JONAS, an eminent Dutch designer and engraver, born at Leyden, the times of whose birth and death are not exactly known; several writers variously place his birth about 1600 and 1613; Zani says he operated from 1631 to 1668. He studied with Peter Soutman, whose style he followed, but excelled him in the delicacy and harmony of his execution. Although his plates are finished with uncommon neatness, they produce a vigorous and harmonious effect, and exhibit great knowledge of the principles of chiaro-scuro. He advanced his plates with the point, and finished them with the graver, in a very picturesque and pleasing style. He executed a considerable number of plates of portraits and other subjects, after the Flemish masters, and some from his own designs, which are deservedly held in high estimation. The following are his best prints:

Henrietta Maria, his Queen; do. Francis de Moncade, Count d'Ossonne; do. John the Bold, Duke of Burgundy; after P. Soutman. SWAGERS, FRANCIS, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1756. It is not known under whom he studied, but after acquiring considerable reputation in his native city as a painter of landscapes and marines, he went to Paris, where he resided till his death. His works are numerous, and consist mostly of views in Holland, in the vicinity of Utrecht, Haerlem, Rotterdam, and Dort, and mariners off the coast, with fishing smacks, &c. From his long residence in Paris, he imbibed much of the French taste, and his pictures executed there exhibit a mixture of the Dutch and French schools. They are, however, pleasing compositions, and are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1836.

SWAINE, FRANCIS, an English marine painter, who lived in London from about 1770 to 1780. He painted small sea-pieces in the style of the elder Vandervelde, for the dealers. Stanley says, "he earned his bread, but got no reputation, though a clever painter. His very name is held in abhorrence when pronounced before one of his own pictures, as it deprives old Vandervelde of the honor, and endangers the dealer's profits. Many English Vanderveldes are certainly by Swaine." Stanley ought to have known, as he was one of the craft.

SWANENBURG, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Leyden about 1581. Little is known of him except by his works. Huber says he was a disciple of John Saenredam, but his style has a greater resemblance to that of Henry Goltzius. He had a great command of the graver, and his plates are executed in a bold, free style, but his drawing is not very correct. The following are his most esteemed prints:

PORTRAITS.

Maurice, Prince of Orange Nassau. Ernest Casimir, Count of Nassau. John William, Duke of Cleves. Daniel Heinsius, Historian. 1603. Abraham Bloemaert, Painter.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

Esau selling his Birth-right to Jacob; after P. Morelson. The Resurrection; do. The Adoration of the Shepherds; after Ab. Bloemaert. The six Penitents; do. St. Jerome in the Desert; do. St. Peter penitent; do. St. Peter and his Daughters; after Rubens. Christ with the disciples at Emmaus; do. The Judgment of Paris; after T. Mireveldt. Perseus and Andromeda; after J. Saenredam. A Village Festival; after D. Vinckenbooms.

A set of fourteen Plates, entitled The Throne of Justice; after Joachim Uytendael. 1605, 1606.

SWANEVELT, HERMANN, a very eminent Dutch painter, born at Woerden in Holland, in 1620. He is said to have first studied with Gerard Douw, but this is very doubtful. He went young to Italy, where he passed the rest of his life, and from his studious and retired life was called the Hermit of Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he was indefatigable in the pursuit of his studies; he was seen to frequent the most sequestered places, and he designed the most interesting views and the most remarkable vestiges of antiquity in the vicinity of that metropolis. In 1640, he is said to have become the pupil of Claude Lorraine, whose productions he had contemplated with wonder and delight; this however, though highly probable, seems to rest merely on conjecture and assertion. At all events, he made the works of that great painter his model, and followed his precepts. He became one of the most celebrated landscape painters of his time, and his works were held in such estimation that he could scarcely supply the demand for them. Though the scenery of Swanevelt is less extensive and select, and his coloring less warm and glowing than that of his inimitable model, yet he nearly equalled him in the suavity and tenderness of his tints, in aerial perspective, in the delicate degradation of his distances; and he excelled him in his figures and animals. His pictures are usually enriched with the choicest relics of antiquity, as edifices, ruins, and monuments, and he decorated them with groups of figures and cattle, tastefully composed, and designed with elegance and correctness. Swanevelt approached Claude nearer than any other master; hence his pictures are held in the highest estimation, and are only to be found in the choicest collections, and mostly in Italy.

Hermann Swanevelt produced a large number of etchings from his own designs, executed in a free, spirited, and masterly style. Bartsch describes 116 (P. G., tom. ii.). He handled the point with uncommon neatness and dexterity, and his prints are held in the highest estimation. The following are the principal:

A set of eighteen small oval plates, representing Views in Italy, and rural subjects; entitled Varia campestri fantasie a Hermanno Swanerelt, inrent. et in lucem editae. A set of thirteen Italian Landscapes, including the title; dedicated to Gideon Tallement. A set of twelve Views in and near Rome; entitled Direrses Vues dedans et dehors de Rome, &c. 1653. A set of seven Plates of Animals, with landscape back-grounds and figures. A set of four Arcadian Landscapes, with Nymphs and Satyrs. A set of four Landscapes, with Biblical subjects. A set of four Mountainous Landscapes, with different representations of the Flight into Egypt. A set of four Views of the Appennines, with pastoral subjects. A set of six grand Landscapes, with the history of Venus and Adonis. A set of four Landscapes, with different Saints and Mary Magdalene.

SWEBACH, JAMES, called also FONTAINES, a Belgian painter, whose life has not yet been written. He flourished from about 1800 to 1824, and resided chiefly at Paris. He painted battles, marches, encampments, landscapes, and huntings, with ability. All his compositions of military subjects and huntings are remarkably spirited, and prove that he was well acquainted with the manoeuvres of the field, either as a soldier or a sportsman. His pictures are numerous, and held in considerable estimation. Some of his works were engraved by Conché, Beauvinet, and Bertaux; and since his death many have been executed in mezzotinto, aquatinto, and lithography. Swebach etched a great number of his own compositions, which were published collectively at Paris, in five vols. quarto, under the title, "Encyclopedic Pittoresque; ou, Suite de compositions, caprices, et etudes utiles aux Artistes." He died at Paris about 1824. He left a talented son, Edward Swebach, whom he instructed in the art, and who painted and designed similar subjects.

SWEERTS, or SWERTS, MICHAEL, a Dutch painter and engraver, who flourished about 1655. Little is known of his history. He is said to have been a good portrait painter, but he is only known by his prints, of portraits and other subjects, chiefly from his own designs. Bartsch describes sixteen prints by him, some of which are signed Michael Sweerts Eques pin. et fecit.

SWELINCK, JOHN, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam from about 1620 to 1635. Among other plates, he engraved a set of emblematical subjects, after A. vander Venne; some subjects of the Life of the Virgin, the Resuscitation of Lazarus, and St. John the Evangelist. His plates are executed with the graver, in a style resembling that of the Wierixes, and he marked them with his initials, J. S.

SWIDDE, WILLIAM, a Dutch engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. Little is known of him, except by his works. There are some large marines by him, dated about 1680; also a set of six landscapes, with figures and cattle, after Dirk Dalens. He went to Stockholm, where he resided about 1690. He engraved several plates for a work entitled Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna, containing views of the principal buildings in Sweden, and the plates for Puffendorf's Life of Charles Gustavus.

SWITZER, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver on wood, who resided in England about 1614. He was employed by Speed to cut the coins and seals for his History of Great Britain, from the originals in the Cottonian collection. Speed calls him the most exquisite and curious hand of that age. He had a son, also named Christopher, who assisted him, and whose works are confounded with those of his father. Stanley says he is the same as Christopher Stimmer—a very doubtful assertion.

SWITZER, JOSEPH, a Swiss painter, born at Berne in 1570. He went to Rome, where he is said to have studied with John van Achen, whose style he followed with considerable success. He died at Rome in 1629.

SYBRECHT, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1625. He was the son of an obscure painter, who instructed him in the art. He afterwards improved himself by studying nature, and the works of Berghem and Karel du Jardin, both which painters he is said to have imitated with great success. He painted both in oil and water-colors, and the latter are the most numerous. He painted landscapes with figures and cattle, and views on the Rhine. He went to England at the invitation of the Duke of Buckingham, who employed him at Cliefden. He died at London in 1703. His name is variously written, Sybrecht, Sybrechts, Sibrecht, and Sibrechts.

SYDER, DANIEL, called by the Italians, IL

CAVALIERE DANIELLO, a German painter, born at Vienna in 1647. After receiving instruction in his native city, he went to Venice, and studied under Carlo Loti, whose style he emulated with so much success, that some of the works which he executed for the churches and private collections in that city have been mistaken for those of his instructor. He next proceeded to Rome, to improve himself by a study of the antique and the works of the great masters. Carlo Maratti was then at the height of his reputation, and Syder entered his school, where he distinguished himself so much that Maratti procured him the commission to paint two pictures—the Children of Israel gathering Manna, for the Chiesa Nuova, and the Last Supper, for the church of S. Filippo Neri. These works established his reputation, and his instructor recommended him to the patronage of the Duke of Savoy, who invited him to his court, appointed him his painter, conferred on him the honor of knighthood, and presented him with his own walking stick, richly set with diamonds. Syder also excelled in portraits. He died at Rome in 1721. The Italians apply the history of this painter to an artist variously called Saiter, Seiter, Sauter, Seutter, and Schuter. The accounts nearly agree, and they are doubtless one and the same painter. Zani, differing from others, says he was born at Vienna in 1642, and died in 1705. See Seiter.

SYLVESTRE. See SILVESTRE

SYMMACHUS, a learned Roman, who flourished in the early part of the 6th century, under the reign of Theodoric, the Ostrogoth. He was employed by that monarch, according to Cassiodorus, in superintending the erection and restoration of various edifices in Rome, which had been rapidly going into decay during the foreign and civil wars, particularly the famous Theatre of Pompey.

SYMPSON. See SIMPSON.

SYSANG, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a Danish engraver, who flourished about 1746. He engraved several plates of portraits, in a neat, clear style, for a work entitled, "Portraits Historiques des Hommes Illustres de Danemark," published in that year.

SYTICUS. See SERICCUS.

T.

TACCA, PIETRO GIACOMO, a sculptor of Carrara, who flourished in the first half of the 17th century. He studied under Giovanni da Bologna, and subsequently traveled into Spain and France, where he acquired great celebrity. He executed, among other works, a statue of Henry IV. at Paris, one of Jane of Austria, and a statue of Ferdinand III. of Tuscany, with four slaves chained at his feet, at Leghorn; his master-piece is said to be an equestrian statue of Philip IV. at Madrid. Tacca afterwards returned to Florence, and died there in 1640. His son Ferdinand, was esteemed an able sculptor.

TACCONI, INNOCENZIO, a Bolognese painter who, according to Baglioni, was a relative and disciple of Annibale Caracci, whom he accompanied to Rome, and assisted in many of his works. Lanzi says, "whether he was really the kinsman of Annibale or no, he certainly enjoyed his confidence, and he received from him designs and re-touchings, tending to make him appear a greater artist than he really was. To judge from some of his histories of St. Andrew, painted for S. Maria del Popolo and S. Angiolo, he may be said to have rivalled the best of his fellow pupils. But abusing his master's goodness, and alienating himself from Agostino, from Albano and from Guido, by misrepresentations, he received the usual recompense of slanderers. Annibale withdrew from him his support, deprived of which, he became gradually more and more insignificant." His principal works are the histories of St. Andrew, above mentioned, and three large frescos, representing the Coronation of the Virgin, Christ appearing to St. Peter, and the Vision of St. Paul in the third Heaven, in the vault of the church of S. Maria del Popolo. He died at Rome in the prime of life, in the pontificate of Urban VIII.

TAFFI, or TAFI, ANDREA, an old Florentine painter, born in 1213, who was the first to introduce mosaic painting into his native city. According to Vasari, he went to Venice, where he learned the art of one Apollonius, a Greek, whom he induced to accompany him to Florence, where they executed in concert some scripture histories in mosaic, in the church of S. Giovanni, which the author above cited says "are without invention and without design." Lanzi says "he improved as he progressed, so that his last works were not so despicable as at the beginning." His most famous work was a Dead Christ, executed entirely by his own hand. He died in 1294.

TAGLIASACCHI, GIO. BATTISTA, a painter born at Borgo S. Donnino, near Piacenza. He studied with Giuseppe dal Sole. Lanzi says "he displayed a fine genius for elegant subjects, which induced him, after he left the school of dal Sole, to study the works of Correggio, Parmiggiano, and Guido. He was particularly ambitious of adding Raffaello to the list, but his parents would not permit him to visit Rome. He resided and chiefly employed himself at Piacenza, where there is a much admired Holy Family by him in the cathedral, which in its ideal cast of features, partakes of the Roman style, and is not inferior to the Lombards in point of coloring. He was an artist of far greater merit than fortune." He painted easel pictures for the collections, and excelled in portraits. He died, according to the Guida di Piacenza, in 1737.

TAILLASSON, JEAN JOSEPH, a French painter, was born at Blaye, near Bordeaux, in 1746. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and though opposed by his parents, he finally obtained their consent to his entering the school of Vien at Paris, where he arrived in 1764, at the age of eighteen. After studying with assiduity for several years, he visited Italy about 1773. He returned to Paris four years afterwards, and gained considerable reputation for his picture of the Birth of Louis XIII. The works of Taillasson are distinguished for sensibility and expression, and possess considerable merit; but they often exhibit a labored appearance, which impairs their vigor. He was chosen a member of the Royal Academy, for his picture of Ulysses bearing to Philoctetes the arrows of Hercules. Among his other principal works were, Virgil reading the Æneid to Augustus; Timoleon visited at Syracuse by strangers; the Death of Seneca; and Hero and Leander.

Taillasson wrote a work of considerable merit, entitled Observations sur quelques grands peintres, 1807, 8vo. He died in 1809.

TALAMI, ORAZIO, a painter born at Reggio, according to Tiraboschi, in 1625, and died in 1705. He first studied with Pietro Desani, in his native city, and afterwards traversed Italy for improvement. Lanzi says "he studied the models of the Caracci with unwearied care, and succeeded so well, that he might be mistaken for one of their scholars. While at Rome, which he visited twice, he devoted himself particularly to the study of perspective, and very scrupulously observed its rules in the noble and extensive edifices and ruins, with which he enriched his compositions. On his return to his native city, he executed many works for the churches and public edifices, as well as for individuals, which prove him an able artist. His works are more distinguished for solidity and correctness of design, than for amenity."

TALPINO, IL. See SALMEGGIA.

TALMAN, WILLIAM, a distinguished English architect of the 17th century, was a native of West Lavington, in Wiltshire. Although he was Comptroller of the Works during the reign of William III, little is known of him, except by a few private edifices, erected for the nobility, among which are Dynham House, in the county of Gloucester, commended for its elegant taste; Thoresby House, for the Duke of Kingston, in the county of Nottingham, erected in 1671, which has a basement of rusticated stone work, and a tetrastyle portico of the same material, in the Ionic order. In 1681, according to Walpole, Talman designed Chatsworth House, in the county of Derby, for the Duke of Devonshire. On the ground plan are the offices, a large hall, and a chapel, with a spacious court and two noble porticos in the centre; a magnificent staircase leads to the first range of state apartments, in which is a superb gallery, and a library; over these is a suite still more noble. The western façade is in the richest and best style of architecture, a rustic basement surmounted by an order of Ionic pilasters, with a tetrastyle portico in the centre, over which is a rich pediment. The whole edifice is crowned with balustrades, on the solid divisions of which are vases, producing a better effect than statues. There are a few of Talman's drawings in the library of the Antiquarian Society. His son, John Talman, was esteemed a good artist.

TAMBURINI, GIO. MARIA, a Bolognese painter who flourished about 1640. He first studied with Pietro Faccini, and afterwards entered the school of Guido, whose manner he adopted. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed several works for the churches of Bologna, the most esteemed of which are the pictures representing the history of St. Anthony of Padua in the church of La Morte, and the Annunciation in S. Maria della Vita. He also etched some plates from his own designs, and after other masters. Lanzi says he died old, at what time is not known.

TANCREDI, FILIPPO, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina, according to Hackert in 1655, and died at Palermo in 1725; but Zani says in 1722. He first studied at Naples, and afterwards proceeded to Rome, where he entered the school of Carlo Maratti. On leaving this master, he returned to Sicily, where he acquired a great reputation, and executed many works for the churches at Messina and Palermo, particularly in the latter city, where he settled. Hackert says he possessed a ready and fertile invention, a tolerably correct design, and a very sweet and agreeable style of coloring. He painted both in oil and fresco, and his best works are the ceilings of the churches of the Teatini, and of Il Gesù Nuovo at Palermo.

TANDINO, a painter of whom little is known, born at Bevagna, a place near Assisi. In the church of S. Giacomo at Spello, there is an altarpiece by him, representing that saint and St. Catherine before the Madonna, which is inscribed Tandini Mecanatis, 1580. This work is highly commended by Orsini, and Lanzi says, "it is a picture not to be passed over."

TANJÉ, PETER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1700. It is not known under whom he studied, but he was a very industrious artist, and engraved a great number of plates of portraits and other subjects, as well as many vignettes and other book plates. His most considerable works are five large plates from the famous paintings on the windows of the church of St. John of Gouda, and several plates for the Dresden gallery. Zani says he was born in 1706, and died in 1760.

TANTERI, VALERIO, a Florentine painter, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. He studied with Cristofano Allori, and was an excellent copyist of his works. Lanzi says, "To Valerio Tanteri, F. Bruno Certosino, and Lorenzo Cerrini, we owe numerous duplicates of Allori's most celebrated pictures, scattered through Florence, and over all Italy; more especially of that Judith, so beautifully and magnificently attired, a portrait of his mistress, while that of her mother appears as Abra, and the head of Holofernes is that of the painter himself, who permitted his beard to grow for the purpose." There is a Visitation of the Virgin by Tanteri, inscribed with his name, with the date 1606, in the church of S. Antonio of Pisa, executed in a weak style. He was also a good portrait painter.

TANZI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Alagna, near Novara, in 1574. It is not known with whom he studied, but Lanzi says he was an able and skillful designer, and distinguished himself by several public works at Milan, painted in competition with Carloni; and others for the churches at Varallo and Novara. He particularly commends his Battle of Sennacherib in the church of S. Gaudenzio, in the latter city, a work full of spirit and intelligence. He also painted much for the collections, and there are several of his histories and perspectives in the galleries at Naples, Venice, and Vienna. He died in 1644. He had a brother, named Giovanni Melchior, who practiced the art, but there is nothing remaining by him worthy of notice.

TAPIA, DON ISIDORO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1720, and a scholar of Evaristo Munoz. In 1743 he went to Madrid, where he improved himself by studying the works of the best masters in that capital. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed several works for the churches and convents in his native city, which, according to Bermudez, are well designed and colored. The principal are a grand altarpiece in the church of San Bartolome, and the Oratory of the convent of the Carmelites, where he represented St. Teresa and the Four Doctors of the church. He died young at Madrid in 1755.

TARABOTI, CATERINA, a Venetian paintress, who studied, according to Lanzi, with Chiara Varatori, and painted history and portraits with considerable reputation. She was living in 1660. Others say that she was a native of Vicenza, and was instructed by Alessandro Varatori, the brother of Chiara. Pilkington says she was born at Venice in 1582, and died there in 1631; Zani, that she operated in 1659. She is also called Tarabotti, and Tarabotta. She was doubtless a pupil of Chiara V., who is highly extolled by Ridolfi, for the beauty of her portraits, and who is known to have instructed several Venetian ladies in the art.

TARASCHI, GIULIO, a painter of Modena, who, according to Tiraboschi, was a pupil of Pellegrino da Modena, whose style he followed with considerable success. Lanzi says he executed many works for the churches at Modena, entirely in the Roman taste, particularly some sacred subjects in S. Pietro. He had two younger brothers, whom he instructed in the art. He was living in 1546.

TARAVAL, THOMAS RAPHAEL, a Swedish painter, who resided at Paris some time; and on his return to Stockholm, he painted portraits with reputation. He died there in 1750. He had two sons, the first, John Hughes T., was born at Paris in 1728. He painted portraits and familiar subjects. He was also a designer, employed in the Gobelin manufactory, and died about 1785. Louis Gustavus T., was born at Stockholm in 1737. His father sent him to Paris, where he learned the art of engraving. Among other things, he engraved some architectural subjects from the designs of Dumont. He was living in 1790.

TARDIEU, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, an eminent geographical engraver, born at Paris in 1757, and died there in 1822. His principal works are:

Les Cartes marine de l'Atlas de Commeree. Les Plans des Capitales de l'Europe. Cartes in the Atlas de Mentelle. Several plans in "le Voyage pittoresque en Grèce," by Choiseul Gouffier. Les Palatinats de Cracovie, Plack, Lublin, et Sandomir. The folio Atlas for the quarto edition of the "Voyage du jeune Anacharsis." Atlas du Voyage aux Terres Australes. Atlas for l'Histoire des Guerres des Français en Italie; after Lapie. A grand map of Russia in Europe, in six sheets.

TARDIEU, JEAN BAPTISTE PIERRE, probably a brother of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1746, and died in 1816. He executed many valuable geographical works, the principal of which are the following:

Cartes des Pays Bas, 53 plates, engraved for the Empress Maria Teresa. Cartes de Chasses du Roi, by direction of Louis XVI. Cartes du Voyage de Sonini en Grèce et en Turquie. Cartes de l'edition de Volney. Cartes Topographiques de la Saxe-Gotha, 25 plates.

TARDIEU, PIERRE, was the son of Antoine François, born at Paris in 1784, and died in 1837. He engraved several maps and plans after Humbolt, de Buch and Brousted; the Atlas for "l'Histoire Ancienne," of M. Segur; "La Carte des Routes de Poste de l'Empire," in 1811, by order of the Emperor Napoleon, and many other important works.

TARDIEU, NICHOLAS HENRI, an eminent French engraver, born at Paris in 1674. He first studied with P. le Pautre, and afterwards with Jean Audran. He acquired distinction, and was elected a member of the Academy at Paris in 1720. He was engaged on some of the most important publications of his time, and engraved some of the plates for the Crozat Collection, the Gallery of Versailles, and other works. He is ranked among the most eminent engravers of his country. His design is correct, and by a judicious union of the point and the graver, he finished his plates in a very tasteful and effective style. He died at Paris in 1749. The following are among his most esteemed prints :

PORTRAITS.

Louis Anthony, Duke d'Antin; after Rigaud; engraved for his reception plate at the Academy, in 1720. John Sannon, Bishop of Senez; Nic. Tardieu ad vivum fecit. 1716.

F. de Troy*; the Mustard Merchant, after Charles Hutin; two plates of the charitable Lady and the Catechist, after P. Dumessnil; the Old Coquet, do.; the Repose, after Jeaurat.

TARDIEU, JACQUES NICOLAS, was the son of Nicolas Henry T., born at Paris in 1718. He was instructed by his father, but in his mode of operating, he used the point less, and the graver more, than that master; hence his prints have a neater appearance, but they are much inferior in spirit and picturesque effect. His prints however, possess considerable merit. He was admitted into the Academy. He engraved a part of the plates for the Gallery of Versailles, after the works of le Brun, and a considerable number of portraits and other subjects, among which are the following :

PORTRAITS.

Louis XIV.; after Vanloo. His Queen; after Nattier. Maria Henrietta of France; do. The Archbishop of Bordeaux; after Restout. Robert Lorraine, Sculptor to the King; his reception plate at the Academy. 1749. Bon Boullongne, Painter to the King; the companion.

TARDIEU, LOUISA, was the wife of the preceding. She was the daughter of the celebrated medalist du Vivier. She executed several plates of portraits and other subjects, in a neat style.

TARDIEU, JEAN CHARLES, an eminent French historical painter, was the son of Jacques Nicolas T., born at Paris in 1765. He painted a great many pictures by order of the government, for the galleries of the Luxembourg, Versailles, St. Cloud, and Fontainebleau, and seems to have been fully employed during the reigns of Napoleon, Louis XVIII., and Charles X. There are several of his works in the Museum and the cathedral at Rouen. He also painted many poetical and classical subjects for individuals. He was living in 1831, and continued still to exercise his pencil.

TARDIEU, PIERRE FRANÇOIS, was the nephew of Nicolas Henry T., by whom he was instructed in engraving. He was born at Paris in 1720, and died in 1772. He engraved quite a number of plates, which, though inferior to those of his relative, possess considerable merit. He engraved a set of architectural Views after Pannini; a set of plates for La Fontaine's Fables, after the designs of Oudry, and some plates for Buffon's Natural History; also some large plates after various masters, among which are the Judgment of Paris, and Perseus and Andromeda, after Rubens. His wife, Marie Anne Tardieu, whose maiden name was Roussellet, was also an engraver, and executed some plates.

TARDIEU, PIERRE ALEXANDRE, an eminent French engraver, was a nephew of Jacques Nicolas T., born at Paris in 1756. He studied with J. G. Wille, whose style he followed. He executed some historical subjects, and a great many portraits of eminent persons. He was the successor of Bervic in the Institute of France, and was made Chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1825. He instructed several pupils, among whom were Desnoyers, Bertonnier, and Aubert. Among his principal plates are the following :

TARICCO, SEBASTIANO, a painter born at Cherasco, in the Piedmontese, in 1645. The Padre Della Valle commits an extraordinary error with regard to this painter, into which others have fallen. After mentioning the time and place of his nativity, he says, "it clearly appears from his works that he studied with Guido and Domenichino in the great school of the Caracci," whereas not only the Caracci, but both Guido and Domenichino were dead before he was born. The probability is that he studied at Bologna, where he made the works of the Caracci his models. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed some works both in oil and fresco for the churches and palaces of Turin, Cherasco, and other places in the vicinity. Some say that he imitated Guido and Domenichino in his design and coloring. Lanzi, though he admits he has not seen his best productions, says that, judging from his works which he saw at Turin, he was rather a follower of Guido; "he is select in the heads and sufficiently pleasing in general, but of too great facility, and without that refinement which distinguishes the classic painters; others of his works in his native city and elsewhere, are said to inspire a higher opinion of his talents." His name is sometimes erroneously spelled Tar-rico. He died in 1710.

TARILLIO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Milanese painter, who, according to Lanzi, was an artist of great merit, as is evinced by his altar-piece painted for the church of S. Martino, dated 1575.

TARUFFI, EMILIO, a painter born at Bologna, according to Crespi, in 1633, and assassinated in 1696; others place his birth in 1632, and his death in 1694. He was a fellow student with Carlo Cignani, under Francesco Albano. He assisted Cignani in decorating the Palazzo Pubblico at Bologna, and next at Rome, in his frescos in the church of S. Andrea della Valle, and others for private houses. After a residence of three years at Rome he returned to Bologna, where he was employed to execute several works for the churches, the most esteemed of which is the Virgin presenting the Rosary to St. Domenico, in S. Maria Nuova, and the Virgin with a glory of angels appearing to St. Celestino, in the church of that saint. Lanzi says, "no artist there better conformed to Cignani's style, than Taruffi, and he could at least second him in painting histories. But his genius lay more in minor compositions for the collections. He was an excellent copyist of any ancient master; a portrait painter of great spirit; and in landscape, one of the best pupils formed by Albano. In these three branches, he obtained his usual commissions, which he ever discharged with credit. He also conducted some altar-pieces, and that of S. Pier Celestino, yields to few of that period."

TASCA, CRISTOFORO, a painter born at Bergamo in 1667. After studying in his native city, he went to Venice, where he settled, and adopted the manner of Carlo Loti. He found considerable employment in painting for the churches and public edifices. His works most deserving of notice are the Birth of the Virgin in dell' Assunzione; the Death of St. Joseph, in SS. Filippo e Giacomo; the Nativity and the Baptism of Christ in S. Marta. He also painted much for the collections. He died in 1737.

TASNIERE, G., an engraver who, according to Basan, flourished at Turin about 1670. He engraved a part of a set of plates of huntings and portraits of the nobility, after the works of John Miel, in the palace of the Duke of Savoy, published at Turin in 1674, under the title of La Venaria reale Palazzo di piacere, &c. He also engraved some plates after other masters, some of which are signed G. Tasniere Bourgundus scu. Mediolano, or G. Tasniere sculps. Taurini, and dated as late as 1703. His plates are executed with the graver in a coarse, heavy style.

TASSART, PETER JOSEPH, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Brussels in 1736. He is little known as a painter, though he painted some portraits. He etched some plates from his own designs, and after other masters, among which are the following, after Rubens; Jonas thrown into the Sea; the Parting of Venus and Adonis; the Woman taken in Adultery; the Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; and the Virgin and Child, with St. Elizabeth and St. John.

TASSI, AGOSTINO, a painter born at Perugia, according to Lanzi and the best authorities, in 1566, and died at Rome in 1642; some place his birth in 1565, and his death in 1644. His real name was Buonamici. There is considerable contradiction as to his history, but none as to his works. He studied with Paul Brill at Rome, though Lanzi says he was ambitious of being thought a pupil of the Caracci. He however founded his style on that of Brill, and had already acquired a high reputation for the beauty of his landscapes,—which are elegantly designed, enriched with noble architecture, and exquisite figures, touched with a free and spirited pencil,—when he was condemned to the galleys at Leghorn for some unknown cause, though Passeri intimates that it was assassination. Lanzi says he was a man of infamous character, but the incidents recorded of him in the lives of his pupils, particularly that of Claude Lorraine, (whom he took into his house, when he was in poverty and obscurity, instructed him and treated him as his son,) show that he possessed a kind and generous heart. It seems more than probable that the crime which stigmatized his character, was a fatal duel, or the slaying of an antagonist in the heat of passion. At all events, his reputation had gained him friends sufficiently powerful to procure the remission of the laborious part of his sentence, and ultimately, his pardon. Lanzi says, "in this situation, he prosecuted his art with such ardor that he soon obtained the first rank as a painter of sea views, representing ships, storms, fishing parties, and the dresses of mariners of various countries with great spirit and propriety. He excelled in perspective, and in the papal palace of the Quirinal, and in the palace de' Lancellotti, he displayed an admirable style of decoration, which his followers very much over charged. He painted many pictures at Genoa in conjunction with Salimbeni and Gentileschi." Tassi, after his liberation, confined himself mostly to marine subjects and sea-ports, which last he enriched with noble edifices and abundance of shipping, and figures decked in the costume of all nations. He did not succeed so well in storms, as in scenes of tranquillity and repose. He painted both in oil and fresco equally well, and his works adorn the choicest collections of Italy. There are some spirited etchings by this artist from his own designs, of marines, storms and shipwrecks.

TASSINARI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Pavia, whom Orlandi supposes to have studied with Il Rosso of Pavia. He executed some works for the churches of that city, two of which are dated 1610, and 1613. He was a reputable artist.

TASSONE, CARLO, a painter of Cremona, born about 1640. He studied under Carlo Natali, and became an eminent portrait painter. Lanzi says "he flourished about 1690, and was much employed at Turin and other courts, where his portraits were much admired." Zaist says he died aged 70, but he does not mention the time or place.

TASSONI, GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Rome, according to Dominici, in 1653. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he went to Naples, where he distinguished himself as a painter of animals. He died there in 1737.

TATTI, JACOPO, called SANSOVINO, an eminent

Italian sculptor and architect, was born at Florence in 1479. He was the son of Antonio Tatti, whose surname he exchanged for that by which he is more generally known, assumed out of compliment to his master, Andrea Contucci da Monte Sansovino. Contucci had just returned from Portugal, where he had acquired great reputation as a sculptor, when Jacopo, then twenty-one years of age, became his pupil, and afterwards greatly surpassed him; but his superior talents served only to increase his instructor's attachment. At this time Jacopo profited greatly by his intimacy with Andrea del Sarto; they almost pursued their studies in common, and both of them copied Michael Angelo's famous cartoon of Pisa. Becoming acquainted with Giuliano Sangallo, then architect to Julius II., he was taken by him to Rome, where his talents procured for him the notice of Bramante and other eminent artists, and also that of the Pope himself. He was probably indebted to Sangallo for instruction in architecture, which he did not commence practicing until some years afterwards. On returning to Florence, he produced his Bacchus, a master-piece of modern sculpture, which is now only known by copies and drawings, it having been destroyed by a fire that broke out in 1762, in the Florentine Gallery, where it had been placed. While residing at Florence at this time, Jacopo displayed his talents in designing several triumphal arches, and erecting a temporary façade to the church of S. Maria del Fiore, in honor of the entry of Pope Leo X., in 1515. On a very large base he arranged couplets of columns in the Corinthian order, between which were niches with figures representing the apostles; the columns supported a cornice and pediment with various projections. Del Sarto painted several historical subjects in chiaro-scuro, and Jacopo executed the statues and bas-reliefs; the whole work, according to Milizia, was extremely well conceived, and the Pope complimented him by saying that the design ought to be executed in marble.

On returning to Rome, besides executing a number of statues, he erected a loggia on the Via Flaminia without the Porta del Popolo, for Marco Coscia; the church of S. Marcello; and a beautiful and convenient palace near Banchi, for the Gaddi family, which afterwards passed into that of Niccolini. His greatest work in Rome was the design for the church of S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini, which he commenced erecting upon some ground near the Tiber. Not succeeding in laying firm foundations in the water, he transferred the works to Sangallo, who completed the foundations at immense expense, and erected the edifice after the original design. At the sacking of Rome in 1527, Sansovino quitted the city, and went to Venice; after which he visited France, whither he had been invited some years before by the King, but it does not appear that he executed any works in that country. Returning shortly after to Venice, he was appointed by the Doge, Andrea Gritti, to the post of principal architect to the Procurazie. One of his first works was the repairing of the cupolas of St. Mark's, which he performed with great credit, and afterwards erected many other public and private edifices, among which are the Scuola della Misericordia, consisting of two magnificent halls, one above the other; the Palazzo Cornaro a S. Maurizio, one of his best works; the church of S. Giorgio de' Greci; the Loggia del Campanile; Palazzo Delfino; the Fabbriche Nuove, or New Buildings, in the quarter of the Rialto; the admired church of S. Francesco della Vigna; and the celebrated Zecca, or Mint, a magnificent work, built of Istrian stone, and one of his finest designs. The Library of St. Mark is perhaps the most highly esteemed of all his works; it has two orders, the first a highly ornamented Doric, the second an elegant Ionic with a grand frieze and noble partition. Over the cornice is a balustrade, with beautiful statues above, by the ablest scholars of the architect; on the ground floor is a portico, raised three steps from the level of the piazza: it has twenty-one arches, supported by pilasters, to which there are external columns, with other arches corresponding to the interior, sixteen of which, with their internal rooms, are used for shops. The centre arch conducts to the noble staircase, divided into two branches; at the top of this staircase is a hall, used as a museum for ancient statues; beyond this is the Library, occupying seven arches in length, by three in width. Scarcely was the vaulted ceiling of the Library completed, when it fell down; in consequence of which Sansovino was deprived of his office, imprisoned, and fined 1000 crowns; but through the active exertions of his friends Pietro Aretino, and Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador, combined with his former exalted reputation, he was restored to his office, and his fine was remitted. The edifice, when completed, was the most highly ornamented building, according to Palladio, in the world; to its exquisite style of architecture is added every variety of elegant columns, bas-reliefs, stuccoes, and statues.

There are some inconsistencies in the works of Sansovino, as in those of all the great architects. In the Loggia del Campanile, the sculptures on the exterior represent heathen deities, while the Virgin Mary occupies the niche within; and in a magnificent bronze door in the sacristy of St. Mark's, the two principal compartments represent the Savior's death and resurrection, while the smaller panels are decorated with the heads of the Evangelists, and those of Sansovino's friends, including Pietro Aretino. Notwithstanding these errors, he possessed a fertile invention, and his architecture, though sometimes deficient in solidity, was full of elegance and grace. His ornaments are exceedingly correct, and he very frequently introduced the Doric and Composite orders; he sculptured the members of the cornices, and often introduced bas-reliefs and statues, thus adding much to the decoration and majesty of his buildings. In sculpture, Sansovino executed many works, most of which were for the decoration of his edifices; his design for the sepulchre of Sig. Podacataro, in the church of S. Sebastiano, is greatly admired for its simplicity and elegance; and that of the Doge Veniero, in S. Salvatore, is still more beautiful. He executed the two statues between the lateral niches of this sepulchre at the age of eighty, and five years before, he sculptured the two colossal statues of Mars and Neptune, which adorn the Giants' Staircase in the Ducal palace. Sansovino was held in such high esteem, that when an extraordinary tax was raised by the Senate, he and Titian alone were exempted; thus the architect was accounted equal in his department to the head of the Venetian school of painting. He enjoyed, according to Vasari, unimpaired health and strength to the great age of ninety-one, when he died, November 27, 1570. Scamozzi mentions a useful work by Sansovino, relating chiefly to the construction of floors, which is now unfortunately lost.

TATORAC, V., an old engraver on wood, who executed, according to Papillon, a set of one hundred and fifty cuts for an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses, published in 1537, and a print of the Annunciation for a prayer book, dated 1530.

TAUNAY, NICOLAS ANTOINE, a French painter, born at Paris, and died there in 1830. He studied with Casanova, but he painted more in the manner of the French school. He was a universal painter. He painted several large pictures of the battles and victories of Napoleon, among which are the Passage of the Alps, the Battle of Lodi, the Battle of Ebersberg, the Triumphal Entry of the Imperial Guard into Paris, and many others. He also painted history, landscapes, seaports, pastoral and poetical subjects, sentimental and humorous pieces, games and village festivals. His cabinet pictures are the most esteemed out of France.

TAURINI, R., a French artist, born at Rouen. According to Papillon, he was a disciple of Albert Durer, and a skillful engraver on wood, but none of his prints are mentioned. He was called Monsieur Richard and Ricardus Gallus. He is also said to have been a skillful carver in wood and stone, and an architectural designer.

TAURISCUS. See APOLLONIUS.

TAVARONE, LAZZARO, a painter born at Genoa, according to Soprani, in 1556, and died in 1641, aged 85, though some place his death in 1631. He studied with Luca Cambiaso, and was his most distinguished disciple. He accompanied that master to Spain in 1583, at the invitation of Philip II., assisted him in his great works in the Escorial, and on the death of Cambiaso, he completed his unfinished pictures. He continued several years longer in the service of Philip, and afterwards returned to Genoa, rich in the designs of his instructor, which he inherited, and loaded with riches and honors. Lanzi says, "Luca seemed to live again in his scholar, so fully did he possess his style. He moreover distinguished himself by a method of coloring in fresco, which if I mistake not, raised him above all his predecessors in this school (the Genoese), and above all who succeeded him, except Carloni. This peculiarity consisted in a richness, brightness, and variety of color, which brings distant objects vividly to the sight, the whole composition appearing brilliantly illuminated, and the tints splendidly and harmoniously blended. One may, perhaps, occasionally wish them more soft, but in general they have all the richness of oil paintings." He executed many works for the churches, public edifices and palaces of Genoa, of sacred and profane histories, fables, and imaginary compositions, often so well preserved as to appear freshly painted. The principal of these are in the tribune of the cathedral, where he represented the patron saints of the city, and several subjects from the life of St. Lorenzo, which Lanzi says are the chef d'œuvres of his public works. Also the façade of La Dogana or the Custom House, where he represented St. George slaying the Dragon; "around it and above are numerous figures, portraits of eminent citizens, typifying the Virtues; of genii, with nautical weapons and the spoils of the enemy, some of which might pass for the work of Pordenone. It would have been fortunate, had his works been fewer and finished with equal care."

TAVELLA, CARLO ANTONIO, an eminent painter, born at Milan in 1668, and died at Genoa in 1738. Lanzi gives the following account of him. "The most justly celebrated landscape painter of this epoch (in the Genoese school), is Carlantonio Tavella, the scholar of Tempesta (Peter Molyn), at Milan, and of Gruenbrech, a German, who from the fires he introduced into his landscapes, was called Il Solfarolo. He at first emulated the last named artist; he then softened his style by studying the works of Castiglione, Poussin, and the best Flemish painters. Among the Genoese landscape painters, he ranks next after Il Sestri. His works are easily distinguished in the collections of Genoa, particularly in the Palazzo Franchi, which had more than three hundred pictures by his hand, and acquired for him the reputation of one of the first painters of the age. We are there presented with warm skies, beautiful distances in the landscape, and pleasing effects of light; the trees, flowers, and animals are gracefully touched, and with wonderful truth of nature. In his figures, he was assisted by the two Pioli, father and son, and often by Magnasco, with whom he was associated in the work. He sometimes inserted them in his pictures himself, copying them indeed from the originals, designed by his comrades; but identifying them by a style peculiarly his own. Tavella had a daughter, named Angiola, of feeble invention, but a good copyist of her father's designs. He also had many imitators, among whom Niccolo Micone, commonly called Lo Zoppo, most nearly resembles him."

TAVERNER, WILLIAM, an English amateur painter, who was a proctor in the Doctors' Commons. Lord Orford mentions some pictures by him, in the possession of the Earl of Harcourt and Mr. Fauquier, which he says might have been mistaken for the works of Gaspar Poussin. He died in 1772.

TAVERNIER, FRANÇOIS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1659, and died in 1725. There are no particulars recorded of his life, but he is said to have painted history with considerable ability.

TAVERNIER, MELCHIOR, a French engraver and printseller, who flourished at Paris about 1630. He engraved some portraits; also a few plates of ornaments, from his own designs. On an equestrian portrait of Henry IV. of France, he signs himself engraver and printer to the king.

TAYLOR, SIMON, an English painter of botanical subjects. He was much employed by Lord Bute and Dr. Fothergill. The collection of the latter, painted on vellum, was sold after the death of that eminent physician, to the Empress of Russia, for £2,000; but they cost the Doctor much more, as Taylor's charge was the round sum of three guineas for drawing a single plant. He died about 1794.

TAYLOR, T., an obscure English engraver, who flourished about 1735. He engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects, after various masters, which are indifferently executed.

TAYLOR, SIR ROBERT, an English sculptor and architect, was born in 1714. He was the son of a London stone-mason, who bestowed upon him only a common school education, and then placed him under Sir Henry Cheere, a sculptor. He was next sent to Rome, whence he was soon obliged to return, on the death of his father. He then commenced as a sculptor, and first attracted notice by Cornwall's monument; after which he executed a number of other works in sculpture, among which the principal are Guest's monument, near the north door of Westminster Abbey; the figure of Britannia, at the Bank of England; and the bas-relief in the pediment of the Mansion House, London. After this he abandoned sculpture for architecture. In 1756-58, he was employed in the alterations of the Old London Bridge, in connection with Dance, and he executed, among other works, the Stone Buildings at Gray's Inn, and Lord Grimston's seat at Gorbambury. He also obtained several lucrative appointments, and surveyorships to the Admiralty, Foundling Hospital, Greenwich Hospital, and the Bank of England. In 1783, he was appointed Sheriff of London, when he received the honor of knighthood. Taylor died in 1788, leaving a fortune of £180,000, which he left to his son, the late Michael Angelo Taylor, M. P., with the exception of a legacy to the University of Oxford, to accumulate for a term of years, and then to be applied to founding an institute for the study of the modern languages. This bequest having been incorporated with a similar one by Dr. Randolph for a picture and statue gallery, a building was begun in 1841, under the name of the "Taylor and Randolph Institute."

TAYLOR, WILLIAM SARSFIELD. This painter was born in Ireland in 1780, and in early life was attached to the Commissariat department of the British army. He afterwards devoted himself to art, and having been present at the siege of St. Sebastian, made that engagement a frequent subject of his pencil. His pictures, however, did not rise above mediocrity, and he is better known by his valuable writings, which consist of a Description of Trinity College, Dublin, in quarto, with plates after his own designs; a translation from the French of Merimée's Practice of Painting; a History of the Fine Arts in England, in two vols.; and a History and Practice of Fresco Painting. Taylor was for many years Keeper of the Model Academy in St. Martin's Lane. He died Dec. 23d, 1850.

TECTÆUS, an ancient sculptor, who is invariably named in connexion with his coadjutor, Angelion. They were of the Sicynian school, and are supposed by Sillig to have flourished about B. C. 548. The ancient writers particularly mention a statue of Apollo by these artists, and Müller says they imitated a very ancient statue of the Delian Apollo, made, as Plutarch states, in the time of Hercules.

TEDESCO, IL. See ÆLZHEIMER.

TEISSIER, JOHN GEORGE, a Dutch artist, born at the Hague in 1750. He painted portraits and landscapes with reputation, but was more celebrated for his faculty of imitating and copying the works of the old masters, for which reason he was much employed in repairing old paintings, which had sustained injury. He was a Director in the Academy of Design at the Hague, and a sub-director of the Museum. He was an excellent teacher, and instructed several pupils, who have distinguished themselves; among them are Bésanger, Valois, Harry, and Carbenthus. He died in 1821.

TEISSIER, JEAN, a French engraver of little note, who flourished at Paris about 1770. He studied under Philip le Bas, and engraved a few plates after Bénard and other masters.

TELFORD, THOMAS, an eminent Scottish architect and civil engineer, was the son of a shepherd in the pastoral district of Eskdale, in Dumfriesshire, and was born in the parish of Westerkirk, in 1757. He lost his father while yet an infant, and at the age of fourteen was apprenticed to a stone-mason in the neighboring town of Langholm. In 1780, he visited Edinburgh, and devoted much attention to drawing and architecture for two years, after which he removed to London, and was employed upon the quadrangle of Somerset House, then erecting by Sir William Chambers. About 1784 he was engaged to superintend the erection of a house for the resident commissioner in Portsmouth dock-yard, from the design of Mr. S. Wyatt; and in 1787 he was invited by Sir William Pulteney to take the superintendence of some operations at Shrewsbury Castle. At Shrewsbury, he was also employed to erect a new gaol; and he was subsequently appointed to the office of county surveyor, which he retained until his death. In Shropshire, upwards of forty bridges were erected under his direction. In 1793, he was engaged to construct the Ellesmere Canal—a series of channels intended to unite the Severn, the Dee, and the Mersey, and extending altogether to a length of over one hundred miles. In 1801 he was deputed by government to make a survey of the coasts and interior of Scotland, and to report generally upon desirable public works for the improvement of the country. In consequence of his reports, commissions were formed to construct the celebrated Caledonian Canal, which was opened throughout in 1823. Several other important canals in England and Scotland, were constructed either wholly or partially under his superintendence, besides the Gotha canal in Sweden, at the completion of which Telford received the Swedish order of knighthood, and other honors. Under the commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges, he constructed many works. His already elevated reputation was greatly increased by the ingenious alteration of Glasgow old Bridge, the erection of the new bridge at Glasgow, the light and elegant Dean Bridge at Edinburgh, the arch of 112 feet span over the Dee near Kirkcudbright, and the celebrated Menai Suspension Bridge. The latter work alone would be sufficient to establish his reputation. In 1803, Telford was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; in 1820, president of the Institution of Civil Engineers; and in 1827, a fellow of the Royal Society of England. He wrote several valuable articles in Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopædia, under the titles Architecture, Bridge, Civil Architecture, and Inland Navigation. Telford never married, and had no fixed habitation until late in life. He died at his residence in Abingdon street, Westminster, in 1834, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

TELLIER, JEAN LE, a reputable French painter, the nephew and residuary legatee of N. Poussin, born at Rouen in 1614. He painted history and portraits, and his works are much esteemed for their correct perspective, simplicity of style, and truthful imitation of nature, although they have little vigor of coloring. He executed many works for the churches and private collections of Rouen. Seventeen of his pictures were in the Museum of that city, among which were the Adieu of Paul and Silas; two Annunciations; two Assumptions; and St. Joseph carrying the infant Jesus in his arms, with the figures of life-size. In the church of S. Augustine are two pictures of great merit; a Holy Family, and the Miracles performed at the Tomb of St. Augustine. Le Tellier died in 1676.

TEMANZA, TOMMASO, an Italian architect, and an eminent writer on the art, was born at Venice in 1705. Having studied mathematics in the school of Padre Niccolo Comini and the eminent Marchese Poleni, he was appointed at the early age of twenty-two, one of the assistants in the commission of Engineers, and in 1742 became the chief of that body, at the resignation of Bernardino Zendrini. During the time of Temanza, there were few great architectural works erected in Venice, and he had little opportunity for displaying his abilities, except in the fine church of La Maddalena, in the Ionic order. His other principal works are the façade of St. Margherita, at Padua; the Rotonda, at Piazzolo, built at the expense of the Contarini family; and the bridge over the Brenta at Dolo. As a writer on the art, Temanza is more extensively known, especially by his Vite de' piu Eccellenti Architetti e Scultori Veneziani, 4to., Venice, 1778; considered one of the most copious and best-written works of the kind ever produced. He also published the Antichità di Rimini, folio, 1741; and left behind him another work, Degli Archi e delle Volte, e delle Regole generali dell' Architettura Civile, which was first edited in 1811. Temanza died at Venice in 1789.

TEMINI, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, and probably a painter, who flourished about 1622. There is a portrait by him of Carlo Gonzales, Duke of Mantua; it is slightly etched, and finished with the graver.

TEMPEL, ABRAHAM VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1618. He studied under George van Schooten, and painted small pictures of historical subjects and conversations, which are held in considerable estimation. He holds a respectable rank among the artists of his country who distinguished themselves by their high finishing, neatness of penciling, and delicacy of coloring. He particularly excelled in portraits, and in this branch few of his cotemporaries equalled him. He instructed several pupils, the most distinguished of whom was Francis Mieris the Elder. He died at Amsterdam in 1672.

TEMPESTA, ANTONIO, a very eminent painter and engraver, born at Florence in 1555. He first studied with Santo di Titi, and afterwards with John Strada. Lanzi gives the following admirable account of him. "Antonio Tempesti, of Florence, a scholar both of Titi and Stradano, was among the first to acquire a celebrated name in Italy for landscapes and battles. He practiced engraving, prepared cartoons for tapestry, and gave scope to his genius in the most fanciful inventions, in grotesques and ornamental work. He surpassed his master in spirit, and was inferior to none, not even the Venetians. In a letter on Painting, by the Marchese Giustiniani, he is adduced as an example of great spirit in design, a gift conferred by nature, and not to be acquired by art. He attempted few things on a large scale, and was not so successful in these as in small pictures. The Marchese Niccolini, the Order of the Nunziata, and several Florentine families, possess some of his battles, painted on alabaster, in which he appears the precursor of Borgognone, who studied his works attentively. He most frequently painted in fresco, as at Caprarola, in the Este Villa at Tivoli, and in some of the palaces at Rome, from the time of Gregory XIII., who employed him in the gallery of the Vatican, where most of the historical pictures are his work; in these the figures, a palm and a half high, display astonishing variety and spirit, accompanied by beautiful architecture and landscapes, with every species of decoration. He is not, however, very correct, and his tints are sometimes inclined too much to a brownish hue; but all such faults are pardonable in him, as being occasioned by the pictoric fury which inspired him, that fancy which hurried him from earth, and conducted him through novel and sublime regions, unattempted by the vulgar herd." Tempesta not only painted history, battles, and landscapes, but animals, huntings, cavalcades, processions, and grotesque ornaments, in all which he showed a wonderful fertility of invention; but his greatest excellence lay in his skirmishes and battles of cavalry, which are full of fire and spirit. One of his most celebrated works is the Murder of the Innocents, in the church of S. Stefano Rotondo at Rome. The extent of his genius, the variety of his powers, the fertility of his invention, and the vividness of his imagination, are evinced by the astonishing number of his etchings from his own designs, which his biographers say amounted to more than eighteen hundred. Bartsch (Peintre Graveur, tom. xvii.), gives a descriptive catalogue of fourteen hundred and sixty pieces by him, which he believes to be a complete list; Gori makes them amount to fifteen hundred and nineteen, according to the reports of different writers; but Brulliot inclines to the side of Bartsch. The earliest of his known etchings is dated 1589, and the latest 1627. With the exception of an occasional extravagance and incorrectness in design, they are very spirited and masterly performances, which both artists and connoisseurs may study with advantage. The principal are, a set of one hundred and fifty prints from Ovid's Metamorphoses; a very numerous set of subjects from the Bible, called Tempesta's Bible; a set of twenty-four plates from the life of St. Anthony; a set of thirteen plates of the Labors of Hercules, with a frontispiece; the four Ages of Man, in four plates; a great variety and number of huntings of different animals; many plates of battles, cavalcades, processions, and many from sacred and profane history. He sometimes signed his plates Ant. Tempestes, but usually marked them with one of the preceding monograms. His name is generally written Tempesta, but sometimes by the Italians, Tempesti, Tempestes, and Tempestino. He died in 1630.

TEMPESTI, or TEMPESTINO, DOMENICO, a painter and engraver, born at Florence, according to Orlandi, in 1652. He studied with Volterrano, and afterwards traveled through Europe, and finally settled at Rome, where he painted landscapes, and engraved some views from sketches he had made during his travels. Lanzi says it would appear that he was the same as Domenico dei Marchis, called Tempestino.

TEMPESTINO, IL, a Roman painter who, according to Pascoli, flourished at Rome about 1680. All that is known of him is, that he assisted Peter Molyn in his numerous works at Rome, in which he followed his manner so closely that he was called after him, Tempestino. Molyn married his sister, and afterwards assassinated her for the love of another woman. Lanzi says he not only assisted Tempesta, but often exercised his genius in landscape, in the style of Niccolo Poussin.

D or T TENIERS, DAVID, the Elder, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1582, and educated in the school of Rubens, who highly esteemed him for his assiduity and promising talents. For some time he applied himself to historical painting, and visited Italy for the purpose of studying the works of the most celebrated masters of the Italian school, but his genius leading him rather to landscape, he placed himself under the instruction of Adam Ælzheimer, at Rome, with whom he continued six years. Lanzi says he was one of the best imitators of Jacopo Bassano, in small, and that by his exquisite skill he acquired the surname of Bassano. Between the styles of his two masters, he formed an original one of his own, which, on his return to Antwerp, he practiced with great success. He painted cabinet pictures of rural sports, merry-makings, fairs, festivals, fortune-tellers, mountebanks, conversations, chemists' laboratories, &c., which he treated with such humor and ingenuity that they were greatly admired, and purchased with avidity. His works would have been considered among the happiest efforts of the art in that particular branch, had they not been so much surpassed by the inimitable productions of his son. His design is correct and tasteful, his coloring clear and harmonious, his touch light and delicate, and his chiaro-scuro excellent. He executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, which are not easily distinguished from those of the younger Teniers, as they are similar in style, and both used the same monogram. He died in 1649.

TENIERS, DAVID, the Younger. This celebrated painter was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1610. There is a good deal of contradiction about his early history, as with many other eminent painters. It is a remarkable fact in the history of art, that there is a vast deal more contradiction in the lives of the most eminent artists, as Raffaello, Rubens, and Claude Lorraine, than with artists of less note, such is the disposition of the human mind to romance. Young Teniers early showed a genius for painting, and he was carefully instructed by his father, whose style of design he always followed. It is said that he afterwards studied with Adrian Brower, and Rubens. That he was a pupil of Brower is in the highest degree improbable, because the latter was only two years his senior, and could not have been in Antwerp till Teniers had become an accomplished artist. Yet it is probable that he lived on friendly terms with him, frequented his studio, and profited by his example, for it is certain that he imitated that master's style in some of his pictures. It is also very certain that he frequented the school of Rubens, and probably received lessons from him in the principles of coloring; though he did not assist him in any of his works, he is known to have copied some of them. It is also said that his merit was so little regarded at first that he could not find sale for his works at Antwerp, and was obliged to make frequent visits to Brussels to dispose of them; and that he had the mortification to see the works of inferior artists, even of his pupil Tilburg, preferred to his own, till the Archduke Leopold, Governor of the Netherlands, chancing to see some of his productions, was so captivated with them that he took him into his service. Then it was that he became distinguished, and his works were appreciated and sought after. The absurdity of this story is sufficiently evident; his father was then a distinguished artist, whose works were sought after with avidity by the most distinguished persons, till he was eclipsed by his son. The probability is that his extraordinary talents had already excited universal admiration when the Archduke took him under his protection. At all events, the Governor conferred upon him extraordinary honor. He appointed him his principal painter, made him a gentleman of his bed-chamber, presented him with a gold medal and chain, and gave him the direction of his gallery, which contained the works of the most eminent masters of the Italian, Dutch, and Flemish schools. He copied, in small, the principal pictures of this collection, in which he imitated the style of each particular master so exactly that he was called the Proteus of painting. The powers of his pencil in this respect were incredible; he knew how to adapt it to the style of every eminent master, no matter how varied the touch and coloring, and he gave to these pasticci so strong a character of originality, that it was impossible to distinguish them, by sight alone, from the works of the very artists whose manner of thinking, composing, and pencilling he only imitated. These copies he caused to be engraved and published in a folio volume, dedicated to his patron. The first edition, containing about 200 engravings, was published at Brussels in 1660, and forms what is now called the Teniers' Gallery. He did not limit his mimic powers to merely copying, but he painted pasticci, or compositions of his own, so exactly in the styles of Rubens, Titian, Tintoretto, Bassano, and other eminent painters, that they have frequently been mistaken for original works by those masters. It was not, however, by his imitative faculties that he obtained his greatest celebrity. He was a constant and faithful observer of nature, which is discernible in all his works. His favorite subjects were landscapes with small figures, village festivals and merrymakings, Flemish fairs and kermesses, shooting at butts, playing at bowls, and other diversions, sports, and occupations of low life. That he might have an opportunity of studying from life the rustic character of the peasantry, their sports, rejoicings, quarrels, and combats, he established himself in a retired situation in the village of Perk, between Antwerp and Mechlin, where he could mingle with the people, and observe with a painter's eye their character under the impulse of the various passions; and it is surprising that he was able to give such an admirable variety to representations which, in their nature, appear confined and uniform. His landscapes, though perfect representations of nature, have an appearance of sameness and monotony, because he copied his scenery from the country where he resided, which was flat; but he amply compensates for this want of variety by the truth and simplicity of these homely views. His pencil is free and delicate, his trees are touched with a spirit and taste for which he is remarkable, his skies are light and floating, and there is a silvery charm in the coloring of his best works peculiar to himself. He is not less admirable in his interiors of cabarets, with peasants smoking, dancing, and regaling themselves, corps-de-garde, and chemists' laboratories, in which he surpassed Ostade in perspective, and equalled him in the chiaro-scuro. In all his works he shows a lively and fertile invention, and great facility of execution. It was not unusual for him to paint a landscape in a single day; and he used jocosely to observe, that to contain all the pictures he had painted, it would require a gallery two leagues long. Notwithstanding this facility, his pieces are always well finished in every part, his figures correctly drawn, and the passions remarkably expressed. His pictures are generally clear in all their parts, with a beautiful transparency; he had the art of relieving his lights, by the disposition of others, without the use of deep shadows, which produced a happy effect. This practice he is supposed to have learned of Rubens, who remarked that strong oppositions of light and shadow were not always necessary to produce effect in a picture, as is evinced by the coloring and tints of Titian.

David Teniers acquired an immense reputation, and his works were eagerly sought after by the princes and most distinguished personages of all Europe, even of Italy. The Archduke having sent some of his pictures to the king of Spain, that monarch was so much delighted with them that he employed his pencil for several years, and had a gallery built expressly as a repository for his paintings. He also received commissions from Don John of Austria, and Christina, Queen of Sweden. Lanzi says that the Duke of Savoy had a collection of near four hundred choice specimens of the Flemish masters, in which were many pictures by Teniers. His works, though exceedingly numerous, are justly held in the highest estimation, and, whenever they are offered for sale, command enormous prices. Many of them have been sold at public sale in Europe, at sums varying from 300 to 1500 guineas, and some in royal and public collections are estimated at 2000 and upwards. Teniers was also of great service to the landscape painters of his time, in decorating their works with his admirable figures, and the value of some of the pictures of Artois, Vanuden, and others, is greatly enhanced by such embellishment. Some critics have accused Teniers of representing his figures too short and clumsy, with too much sameness in their costumes and countenances; but it ought to be considered that he designed every object from life, and formed his ideas from the scenes with which he was conversant, and that his forms are exactly those of his models. Though he generally painted small cabinet pictures, he was capable of executing works on a large scale. Descamps mentions an altar-piece by him of the Temptation of St. Anthony, in the church of Meerbeck, near Mechlin, in which the figures are of life size. Some of them are not only of a large size, but contain a multitude of figures; thus a Fair at Ghent has 340 figures, a village festival 150, another 93, and his great picture at Schleissheim, 13 feet 6 inches by 10 feet, contains 1138 figures, those in the foreground being 12 inches high. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish masters, vol. iii. and supplement, gives a descriptive account of 900 pictures by him, which are doubtless authentic; but this must be far short of the real number of his genuine works, as there are 100 in the galleries of Schleissheim and Munich, and sixty-five in the royal collection at Madrid, not described by Smith, besides many others mentioned by various writers. There are also a multitude of spurious pictures attributed to him; Stanley says at least 500, which are considered genuine by the possessors. Some of his pupils imitated him very closely, and the rapacity of dealers has induced them to convert every picture having a sufficient resemblance in style, into an original Teniers, by erasing the name of the painter, and substituting the signature or monogram of that master. See Abshoven. The younger Teniers also etched some plates from his own designs, but it is difficult to distinguish them from those of his father, as they both used the same marks, and etched similar subjects. As far as the merits of the etchings are concerned, it is of no consequence; but G. du Vivier and Coryn Boel etched some imitations after pictures by Teniers, and marked them with his monogram. He died at Brussels in 1694, though some say in 1690.

TENIERS, ABRAHAM, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Antwerp about 1618. He was instructed in the art by both his father and brother, and painted Flemish festivals and conversations in the style of David Teniers the Younger, though not with equal excellence; yet they possess sufficient merit to pass with the inexperienced for the productions of his brother. He died in 1691.

TEODOLI, MARCHESE GIROLAMO, a distinguished Roman architect, was born in 1677. Descended from a noble Roman family, he was well versed in belles lettres and the sciences; he was fond of the study of architecture, and by attention to the best books, became an architect both in theory and in practice. At Rome he erected the admirable church of Sts. Pietro and Marcellino; the façade is an order of Ionic pilasters; the internal plan is a beautiful Greek cross, covered in the centre with an elegant cupola, and decorated mostly with the Ionic order. Among the other works of Teodoli are the theatre of Argentina; the church of Vicovaro, and the Casa della Madonna de' Miracoli, on the Corso at Rome. His private character is highly eulogized by Milizia. He died in 1766.

T or B or B, TERBURG, GERARD, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Zwoll in 1608. He was the son of a painter, who instructed him in the art, of whom little more is known, except that he had studied at Rome. Some writers suppose that he perfected himself under another master at Haerlem, but others assert that he had no other instruction. At all events, after acquiring considerable reputation, he traveled through Germany, Italy, and France. He resided some time at Paris, where his works were greatly admired. On his return to Holland, he met with the most flattering encouragement, and was one of the most popular painters of his time. He attended the Congress assembled at Munster in 1648, for the negotiation of peace, on which occasion he painted his celebrated picture representing the portraits of the plenipotentiaries and principal personages assembled there, regarded as his masterpiece. At the invitation of Count Pigorano, the Spanish ambassador, he visited Madrid, where he was much employed by the court and the principal nobility. The King conferred on him the honor of knighthood, presented him with a gold chain and medal, and magnificently rewarded him. He afterwards returned to his native country, and settled at Deventer, where he died in 1681.

The pictures of Terburg generally represent conversations, musical parties, ladies at the toilet, and similar domestic subjects. He particularly excelled in portraits. Though he had the most ample opportunities of studying the productions of the most eminent masters, he did not much improve his taste of design, which is neither correct nor elegant, nor did he change his manner of composition. He finished his pictures exquisitely, with a light and agreeable touch; his coloring is lively and transparent, and he shows a pleasing and skillful management of the chiaro-scuro. His greatest excellence lay in his draperies, and he was remarkable for introducing white satin in all his compositions, which he represented in an inimitable manner. The genuine works of Terburg are exceedingly scarce, and are only to be found in public, royal, and noble collections, where they are estimated enormously. Such was the labor he bestowed upon his pictures, that his known works, omitting portraits, do not exceed one hundred. Though he received high prices for his productions, their value has constantly increased; thus the Music Lesson was sold in 1767 for £112, and in 1826 it was bought by Sir Robert Peel at 920 guineas. Another, called the Letter, or Female Curiosity, was sold in 1762 for £144, and in 1837 it brought £640. The famous Congress of Munster, a picture only seventeen inches by twenty-two, in 1804 sold for £640, and in 1837 for £1890. For the fullest account of this master's works, the reader is referred to Smith's Catalogue raisonné, vol. iv. and Supplement.

TERENZI, TERENCE, called IL RONDOLINO, a painter born at Urbino, who flourished about 1600. He studied under Federigo Baroccio in his native city, and afterwards, according to Baglioni, visited Rome, where he obtained the patronage of Cardinal Montalto. He possessed an extraordinary faculty of imitating the works of the old masters, so as to deceive the best judges. Baglioni says he was a noted cheat, and that, "after having sold to inexperienced persons many of his own pictures for those of ancient masters, he attempted to practice the same deception upon Cardinal Peretti, the nephew of Sixtus V., and his own patron, offering to his notice one of his own pieces as a Raffaele; but the fraud was detected, and Terenzio in consequence banished from the court—a circumstance which he took to heart, and died while yet young." Others place his death in 1620.

Zani says there were two artists of this name: Terenzio d' Urbino, the scholar of Baroccio, whose history is recorded above; the other was a native of Pesaro, called Il Rondolino (the Swallow), an eminent artist, who flourished about 1550, which date is evidently an error, for Lanzi says "the Guida di Pesaro assigns Terenzio Terenzi called Il Rondolino to the school of Baroccio, whom it characterizes as an eminent painter, four of whose works are in public, and many more in the neighborhood of the city. It is also mentioned that he went to Rome, where he was employed by the Cardinal della Rovere, and that he painted a picture in the church of S. Silvestro. The picture in S. Silvestro in capite, which represents the Madonna attended by Saints, is ascribed by Titi to a Terenzio of Urbino, who, according to Baglioni, served the Cardinal Montalto." Lanzi then goes on to give his opinion that they are one and the same artist, and that at Rome he took his name from Urbino, the capital of Pesaro, though he was a native of the latter place.

TERLEY, N. VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1636, and died there in 1687. Little is known of him. It is said that he was a scholar of Rembrandt, and that his pictures exhibit a fine taste in design and composition, and agreeable coloring.

TERMISANO, DEZIO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, studied with Gio. Filippo Criscuolo. There is a picture of the Last Supper by him, in the church of S. Maria Chiazza at Naples, signed with his name, and dated 1597.

TERRY, G., an English engraver, who flourished from 1770 to 1788. He scraped some portraits in mezzotinto for the book publishers.

TERSAN, COMTE DE. See CAMPION.

TERWESTEN, AUGUSTINE, an eminent Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1649. He had a natural genius for painting, and without any instruction he had made sufficient progress in design to be employed by goldsmiths as a chaser on gold and silver, which business he followed till he was twenty years of age. He then studied two years with Nicholas Wieling, till that artist was invited to the court of the Elector of Brandenburg, when he placed himself under the tuition of William Dou-dyns. He next traveled through Germany and Italy, studying with great assiduity the works of the best masters, particularly at Rome, Florence, and Venice. At Rome, he applied himself to designing after the antique, and the works of Raffaele, and at Venice he made the works of Titian and Tintoretto the especial objects of his study. After a residence of six years in Italy, he returned to Holland, where he distinguished himself as one of the ablest artists of his time. His talents were chiefly employed in decorating the ceilings and apartments in fresco, of the mansions of the nobility at the Hague, Amsterdam, and Dort. His subjects were usually taken from Ovid, but he painted many from sacred and profane history. He possessed a lively genius, a ready invention, and a wonderful facility of hand; his design is correct, his draperies well cast, and his coloring chaste, natural, and brilliant. One of his most admired performances was a saloon he painted for the Burgomaster van Slingelandt at Dort, which Descamps commends in the highest terms. He was the principal reviver of the Academy at the Hague, which had fallen into decadence, and by his abilities and influence, he restored it to its former lustre. In 1690 he was invited to the court of the Elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Prussia, who appointed him his principal painter, and made him Director of the Academy at Berlin. He continued in the service of that monarch during the rest of his life, and decorated the royal palaces with many of his best works. He died at Berlin in 1711.

TERWESTEN, ELIAS, was the brother of the preceding, born at the Hague in 1651. He studied with Augustine, and for some time devoted himself to historical painting, but not succeeding to his expectations, he turned his attention to animals, fruit, flowers, and still-life, in which he was more successful. He painted birds admirably, for which reason he was called "The Bird of Paradise." He traveled to Italy, and settled at Rome, where he acquired considerable reputation, and was employed by the Elector of Brandenburg to procure the finest casts from the antique statues and sculptures for the Academy at Berlin; he purchased for that prince the valuable cabinet of gems, medals, and curiosities collected by the celebrated Bellosi. He died at Rome in 1724.

TERWESTEN, MATTHEW, was the younger brother of the two preceding artists, born at the Hague in 1670. He was first instructed by Augustine T., and afterwards studied with Daniel Mytens and William Doudyns. Possessed of a decided genius, and aided by the instruction of such able masters, he had made such progress, that at the age of twenty years, he was entrusted by his brother to finish some considerable works when the latter set out for the court of Berlin. He acquitted himself on this occasion with so much ability, that he received several important commissions, and met with the most flattering success. One of his earliest patrons was M. Schuilenberg, prime minister of the King of Holland, for whom he painted a ceiling, representing Diana and her Nymphs, which gained him great reputation. This encouragement, so far from rendering him self-sufficient and conceited, only inspired him with more ardor in cultivating his talents. He accordingly went to Italy, and arrived at Venice in 1694, where he frequented the school of Carlo Loti, and studied the works of Titian, Tintoretto, and Veronese with the greatest assiduity. He next went to Rome, where he found his brother Elias, and passed three years in designing after the antique, and the works of the great Roman masters. On his return to his native country in 1699, he was received with distinction, admitted into the Academy at the Hague, and found abundant employment. He was soon after appointed director of the Academy, which office he filled till his death, with great credit to himself and advantage to the students. Though he was chiefly occupied in decorating ceilings and grand apartments of the principal mansions of the city, with historical and fabulous subjects in fresco, he frequently painted altar-pieces and other sacred subjects for the churches, one of the best of which represents Christ's Agony in the Garden, in the Church of the Jansenists at the Hague. He also occasionally painted portraits, and there is one of the Princess Mary, afterwards Queen of England, and consort of William III., in the Museum at Amsterdam. He died in 1735.

TERZI, CRISTOFORO, a painter born at Bologna in 1692. He studied under Giuseppe Maria Crespi, and afterwards improved himself by a residence of several years at Rome. On his return to Bologna, he acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, and executed several works for the churches, but wrought mostly for the collections. One of his most esteemed works is a picture of St. Petronio kneeling before the Virgin, in the church of S. Giacomo Maggiore. Lanzi says that from the outset, he boasted a decision of hand, and with a few bold strokes of the pencil, was able to sketch very spirited heads, though he did not often practice in this manner, but finished his pictures with sufficient care. "Many collections at Bologna possess some of his half-length figures, and heads of old men, which are mistaken by less experienced judges for those of Lana." He died there in the prime of life in 1743.

TERZI, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Bergamo about 1520. He studied under Gio. Battista Morani, and according to Tassi, he distinguished himself by two pictures he painted for the church of S. Francesco at Bergamo, representing the Nativity of Christ, and the Assumption of the Virgin. Lomazzo mentions two noble histories of our Lord with his Apostles, in the church of S. Sempliciano, in his native city. He was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Maximilian II., who appointed him his painter, and retained him in his service for many years. Lanzi says he also distinguished himself by his works in most of the capitals of Italy. He is said to have engraved a set of portraits of the princes of the House of Austria, but they were executed by Gaspar ab Avibus, who signed them Gaspar Patavinus, incisor, 1569. Terzi died at Rome in 1600, at an advanced age.

TESAURO, FILIPPO or PIPPO, an old Neapolitan painter, born about 1260, and died in 1320. According to Dominici, he was a disciple of Tommaso de Stefani, whom he assisted in his works, and became one of the ablest artists of that period. The author above cited describes several of his works in the public edifices at Naples, but they have all perished except some frescos in the church of S. Restituta, representing the life of St. Niccolo, the Hermit.

TESAURO, BERNARDO. This old artist of the Neapolitan school is supposed to have been a descendant of the preceding; born about 1440. He was a disciple of Silvestro Buono, and was an artist of great reputation in his time. Though his works have mostly perished, there are sufficient remaining in the churches of Naples to show that he was a man of extraordinary genius. Lanzi says, "he is supposed to have been descended from that Filippo who is commended as the second of the Neapolitan school, and the father or uncle of Raimo. He made nearer approaches to the modern style than any of the preceding artists, more judicious in his invention, more natural in his figures and drapery; select, expressive, harmonized, and displaying a knowledge in gradation and relief, beyond what could be expected in a painter who is not known to have been acquainted with any other schools, or seen any pictures beyond those of his own country. Luca Giordano, at a time when he was considered the Coryphæus of painting, was struck with astonishment at the painting of a soffitto by Tesauero at S. Giovanni de' Pappacodi, and did not hesitate to declare that there were parts in it which no one could have surpassed in his own age, so fruitful in fine works. It represents the Seven Sacraments, and the portraits of Alfonso II., and Ippolita Sforza, whose espousals he represented in it, affords some light in fixing the date of the picture about 1480." Another fine work by him is an altar-piece of the Assumption of the Virgin in S. Giovanni Maggiore.

TESAUERO, RAIMO EPIFANIO. This painter was the son and disciple of the preceding, according to Dominici, and flourished about 1490. He was much employed in decorating with frescos, the churches and public edifices of Naples, and some pictures by him still remain in S. Maria Nuova, Monte Vergine, S. Lorenzo, and the Nunziata, particularly the Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth in the Nunziata, and the great altar-piece in S. Lorenzo, representing the Virgin and Infant Christ, with St. Anthony, St. Jerome, and St. John the Baptist, dated 1494. He was living in 1501.

TESI, MAURO, a painter born in the state of Modena in 1730. He studied under an obscure painter at Bologna, but possessing strong natural genius, he greatly improved himself by studying the architectural works of Mitelli and Colonna, and others at Bologna, by which means, says Lanzi, "he restored the art of architectural painting, which had degenerated at Bologna, to a judicious and solid style, sparing in decoration as it had formerly been, and in some parts still more philosophical and learned." His principal patron was the learned Count Algarotti, who made him his companion in his tours, and encouraged him to study and make excellent observations on the works of the ancients. He executed some beautiful works for his patron, for the Marchese Zambeccari, and others, but he died at Bologna in the flower of life in 1766, and his friends erected a marble monument to his memory in the church of S. Petronio, with this inscription. "Mauro Tesi elegantiae veteris in pingendo ornatu et architectura restitutori."

TESIO, a Piedmontese painter, who flourished at Turin in the latter part of the last century. He is supposed to have studied with the Cav. Beaumont. Lanzi says, "whether Tesio was instructed by Beaumont or others I cannot state; but I know that he repaired to Rome, and there became one of the best scholars of Mengs; and at Moncalieri, a delightful residence of the royal family, are to be seen some of the finest specimens of his talents." He died about 1800.

TESSIN, NICODEMUS VALENTINSON, an eminent Swedish architect, was born at Stralsund in 1619. There is little recorded of his history, but he was appointed crown architect by Queen Christina, in 1645; visited Italy for improvement, and was honored with a patent of nobility in 1674 by Charles XI. Among his principal works are the mausoleum of Charles Gustavus, the Royal Villa of Stromsholm; and the palace of Drottningsholm, completed by the following artist. Tessin died about 1688.

TESSIN, COUNT NICODEMUS, an eminent Swedish architect, the son of the preceding, was born at Nykoping in 1654. After completing his studies, first at Stockholm, afterwards at Upsala, he was sent to Italy, at the age of eighteen, in the suite of the Marquis del Monte. He studied four years at Rome, under Bernini, and, after making the tour of Italy, received from Charles XI. the appointment of future crown architect. On returning to Sweden, he was allowed by the King to prosecute his travels, conformably with his earnest wish for further improvement, and he spent three or four years in France and England. On finally settling in his native country, he received, in addition to his former appointment, that of city architect to the magistracy of Stockholm. In 1697, the royal palace was destroyed by fire, and Tessin availed himself of this highly favorable opportunity to erect one of the noblest edifices of the kind in Europe. His talents were frequently employed upon splendid decorations for festivals, and works of a similar nature. The Queen-dowager Hedwig Eleonora employed him to complete the palace at Drottningsholm, and to lay out the gardens both there and at Ulriksdal. Besides the cathedral at Calmar, and Oxenstiern's monument, Tessin executed or designed a great number of other buildings, including a project for rebuilding the palace at Copenhagen, which was partly carried into effect, many years after his death, when it was curtailed, and injured in other respects. Elevations of the original design were published by his son under the title of Regiæ Hafniensis Facies, &c. In addition to his professional occupations, Tessin was engaged in several offices at Court, and took a considerable share in public and political affairs. In 1714 he received the title of Count, and in 1728, at the time of his death, he was Chancellor of the University of Lund. His son, Count Charles Gustavus Tessin, born at Stockholm in 1695, possessed considerable architectural talent, but did not practice the art, except in completing the palace at Stockholm, after his father's death. He was chiefly distinguished as a statesman and diplomatist, and exercised his extended influence for the encouragement of arts and manufactures, particularly in the foundation of the Swedish Academy of Painting and Sculpture, which he first established in 1735. He died in 1771.

TESTA, PIETRO, a painter born at Lucca, and hence called at Rome, IL LUCCHESE. There is a great deal of discrepancy about the history of this painter and his real merits as an artist. Passeri and the best authorities place his birth in 1617, others in 1611; but all are agreed that he died in 1650. Lanzi gives the following account of him. "It is highly probable that he learned the principles of the art from Pietro Paolini at Lucca before he came to Rome. He there had several masters, but chiefly Pietro da Cortona, from whose school he was expelled because he treated the maxims of his master with contempt. He then put himself under Domenichino, on whose principles, says Passeri, he gloried to rely, but his style, in despite of himself, approached nearly to that of Cortona. He has also some resemblance to his friend Poussin, in his figures (which at one time he made too slender), in his landscapes, and in his study of the antique, of which he was deeply enamored, having applied himself to designing the finest specimens in architecture and in sculpture that Rome afforded. The Death of St. Angelo, in the church of S. Martino a Monti, a picture of great force, is the only piece in public at Rome, though he is frequently recognized in the galleries; there is a Joseph sold to the Ishmaelites, by him, in the Capitol, and a Murder of the Innocents, in the Palazzo Spada; but there are not many of his pictures elsewhere, for he engraved more than he painted. He left some oil paintings at Lucca, in the church of S. Romano, and S. Paolino, in the Buonvisi Gallery, and in other places; also two works in fresco; viz., an allegorical picture of Liberty, in the Senate House, and the small, but very elegant cupola of the Oratory in the Lippi palace. He settled at Rome, where he lived unhappily, and either from despair or some affront, drowned himself in the Tiber. His fate may teach young artists of genius, not to overrate their own talents, nor to despise those of others. By these failings he alienated the minds of his contemporaries, so that neither in reputation nor employment, was he so successful as many others, and his perpetual complaints occasioned doubts even of his sanity."

Others say that he had a passion for art from infancy; that he studied under Paolini; that in order to see the works of the great masters, he traveled on foot to Rome, disguised as a pilgrim; that he there first studied with Domenichino, and lastly with Cortona, till he was expelled for speaking disrespectfully of the talents of that master, when he devoted himself with the greatest assiduity to designing after the marbles and the remains of architecture; and it is said there was scarcely a vestige of antiquity in or about that capital, which he had not designed, and with which he was so familiar, that he could not draw from memory alone. He was also attentive in designing after the works of the most celebrated painters. Sandrart relates that he gave himself up entirely to these studies, suffering extreme poverty, destitute of all assistance and means, except what he could procure for his sketches and designs, which were not appreciated; that he found him in this condition, sketching among the ruins in the vicinity of Rome, when he took him home, fed, clothed, and lodged him, procured him employment in the gallery of the Prince Giustiniani, and recommended him to other persons of rank. Some writers do not hesitate to declare that Testa never produced any thing worthy of commendation; that his pencil was hard, his coloring crude, his genius licentious, his compositions crowded and confused, and his figures extravagant in their proportions.

Much of this discrepancy doubtless arises from the prejudice of his contemporaries, for it is conceded that he was of a melancholy and unsocial character, and probably this natural disposition was aggravated by disappointment and want of appreciation. Sandrart, himself a noted artist, and an excellent writer and critic on art, considered him an extraordinary genius; Passeri was a great admirer of his works, and thought that his tints and coloring, like those of Poussin, harmonised with his subjects. Whoever will examine his numerous prints, all of them from his own designs, must acknowledge that he possessed an extraordinary imagination, a perfect knowledge of the antique, and a wonderful facility of hand. His style of etching is bold, free, and masterly, resembling that of Antonio Tempesta, but of superior execution. Passeri says of his engravings, that he was a perfect master of invention, "such vigor of conception, such novelty, and such variety, were never the gift of any other artist. He is a poet in all his historic pieces; his composition is full of fancy; this however is not equally commended by all who look for the simple action without other accessories." Strutt says, "Pietro Testa drew with great taste, and marked the extremities of his figures in a very masterly manner. The characters of his heads are finely expressed, and the female faces are often very beautiful. When the extravagance of his fancy did not hurry him beyond the bounds of nature, his outlines are correct and elegant. The draperies of his figures are flowing and easy, and so contrived as to show the form of the figure very distinctly, yet these beauties are often obscured by ill chosen attitudes. He seems to have paid no attention to the management of the chiaro-scuro; his lights are scattered, without forming any great masses, and so produce little effect."

In the collection of Mariette, there were ninety-two etchings by this master. He sometimes signed them with his name, and at others with the above monogram. The following are among his rarest and best prints. He was drowned in the Tiber in 1650, some say accidentally, while he was sketching, and others, that he threw himself into the river in a fit of despair; Sandrart says that while endeavoring to recover his hat, blown off by a sudden gust of wind, as he sat sketching on the bank, he slipped and fell in.

Abraham sacrificing Isaac; P. Testa, fecit. The Holy Family, with Angels presenting refreshments; rare. The Virgin and Infant, who is embracing the Cross; rare. The Adoration of the Magi. The Crucifixion. Four plates of the History of the Prodigal Son; P. Testa, fe. Romæ. The Martyrdom of St. Erasmus. St. Jerome praying. Faith, Hope, and Charity; one of his rarest prints. Magdalene in the Desert; very rare. A young Woman in a Swoon, surrounded by Cupids; exceeding rare.

TESTA, GIOVANNI CESARE, was the nephew of the preceding, born at Rome about 1630, and practiced both painting and engraving. Little is known of him, however, as a painter. He executed quite a number of plates, chiefly after his uncle's designs, though some of them are from his own, and after the works of other masters. From resemblance of style, he is supposed to have studied with Pietro. His prints are usually signed with his name. Among others, are the following by him. Zani says he died young, in 1655.

The Portrait of Pietro Testa; J. Cesar Testa, sc. The Death of Dido; after P. Testa. The Centaur Chiron instructing Achilles to throw the Javelin; do. The Emperor Titus consulting Basilides respecting his expedition against Jerusalem; do. The Communion of St. Jerome; after the celebrated picture by Domenichino.

TESTANA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian engraver, born at Genoa about 1645. He resided chiefly at Rome, where he engraved, in conjunction with William Vallet and Stephen Picart, the plates from medals and antique gems for the work of Canini. He also engraved some plates after Pietro da Cortona, Agostino Caracci, and other masters. He was living in 1700.

TESTANA, GIOSEFFO, an Italian engraver, probably a relative of the preceding, born at Genoa about 1650. He established himself at Rome, where he engraved a part of the plates for a work entitled Effigies of the Cardinals now living, dated 1680. He subsequently engraved some plates after the Italian masters.

TESTELIN, LOUIS, a French painter and engraver, was born at Paris in 1615. He studied under Simon Vouet, and was elected one of the original members of the French Academy at its establishment in 1648, although he was then only 33 years of age. His presentation picture was a historical portrait of Louis XIV. In 1650, he was chosen a professor of the Academy. He painted, in 1652, a picture of the Resuscitation of Tabitha by St. Paul, which is considered one of the master-pieces of the French school; it is now in the church of Notre Dame, where is also another celebrated picture by him, of the Flagellation of Paul and Silas. His picture of St. Louis attending a sick Man, in the Hospital de la Charité, is also greatly admired. Testelin was a very intimate friend of le Brun, who highly esteemed his knowledge of the principles of the art. He died in 1655, aged 40; consequently his works are scarce. He engraved a plate of the Holy Family, after his own design.

TESTELIN, HENRI, a French painter and engraver, the brother of Louis T., was born at Paris in 1616. He studied under Simon Vouet, and attained sufficient reputation in portrait and historical painting, to be elected a member of the Academy. He was also appointed Secretary of that institution, and at the death of his brother, succeeded him as Professor of Painting. He wrote a work in folio, highly esteemed in his time, entitled "Sentimens des plus habiles peintres sur la pratique de la peinture et de la sculpture," &c., published in 1696, and embellished with plates engraved by himself. There are also about fifty plates, in sets, which D'Argenville attributes to this artist, although another authority says they were engraved by Louis Ferdinand, after Testelin's designs. The following are among his principal plates:

Studies of expression in Heads, in outline. Studies of antique Statues, with proportions. Studies of expression in Heads; after le Brun. The Israelites gathering Manna; after N. Poussin. The Holy Family; after Raffaele. This is from the picture in the Louvre, in which there are angels scattering flowers; also engraved by Edelinck. St. Michael vanquishing the Evil Spirit; after Raffaele.

TESTORINO, BRANDOLINO, an old painter of Brescia, whose name is placed in competition with Gentile da Fabriano, and, according to Morelli, "perhaps preferred to him." He is supposed to have assisted Altichiero in decorating the great hall in Padua, called Sala de' Giganti. His works have mostly perished, and the exact time he flourished is not known, though it must have been in the last part of the 14th, and the first part of the 15th centuries.

TEUCHER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver of whom little is known. He resided at Paris about 1750. He engraved a print called the Virgin of the Rose, after Parmiggiano, for the collection called the Dresden Gallery.

TEXIER, G., a French engraver, born at Paris about 1760. He studied with Jacques Philippe le Bas, and engraved some plates of landscapes, conversations, and serenades; also views in Switzerland, vignettes, and other book-plates. His plates are executed with the graver, in a neat, clear style. He was living in 1824.

TEXIER, VICTOR, was the son of the preceding. He was one of the engravers employed on the Musée Français and Musée Royal. He also engraved some views of the Alhambra, chemists' laboratories, and other subjects. He wrought with the graver, in a very neat and pleasing style.

TEXIS, JEROME, an old engraver, by whom there is a print of Mount Calvary, with Christ upon the Cross, signed Hieronimus Taxis, Carmagnolie. 1561.

THACKER, ROBERT, an English artist, who flourished in 1670. There is a large print by him, in four sheets, representing the Cathedral at Salisbury, signed with his name, with the title of Designer to the King.

THELOTT, JACOB GOTTLIEB, a German engraver, who flourished about 1730. He engraved some portraits, and a part of the plates for a work entitled "Representation des Animaux de la Menagerie de Prince Eugene, 1734." His plates are executed with the graver, in a neat, but formal style.

THEODORE, A., a Dutch artist, mentioned by Strutt as the engraver of a print representing a procession in Holland, dated 1636.

THEODORE, an artist who, according to Basan, was a scholar of Francis Milé, painted landscapes in the style of that master, and etched some plates from his designs, which are signed with his name. There is also a set of twenty-eight etchings after Milé, attributed to him, but Bartsch and Dumesnil say that they have a great resemblance to the prints of vander Cabel; Houbraken and Mariette attribute them to Gerard Hoet. It is probable that Theodore is the baptismal name of some unknown artist. The curious in such matters are referred to Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. v., and to Robert Dumesnil, Peintre Graveur Français, tom. i., for full descriptions of the prints, and their opinions on the subject.

THEODORE CASPAR, BARON DE FURSTENBERGH, one of the earliest mezzotinto engravers, of whom nothing is known with certainty, not even his family name. There are three or four prints by him, signed with his name, and a few others of very doubtful authenticity, attributed to him. He is variously called by writers Theodore Caspar, Theodore Caspar a Furstenbergh, and Theodore Caspar, Baron de Furstenbergh. His prints are not worth any disquisition, nor is it pretended that he was the inventor of the art, or that he improved it. He flourished in 1656, as appears from the date of one of his prints. See Siegen.

THEODORUS. There were several Grecian painters of this name, mentioned by Pliny, and Diogenes Laertius. The principal was an Athenian painter of considerable eminence. Among his most important works were the following: Clytemnestra and Ægisthus slain by Orestes; a picture of Cassandra, preserved formerly in the Temple of Concord; and several pictures of the events of the Trojan War, which were afterwards taken to Rome, and placed in the Philippian portico.

THEODORUS. There were two ancient Grecian artists of this name, who flourished between the years 800 and 700 B. C. One of them was the son of Rhœcus of Samos, a sculptor and architect, who executed a statue impersonating Night, in the temple of Diana at Ephesus, and erected, in concert with his son Theodorus, the famous Doric temple of Juno at Samos. According to the researches detailed in the "Antiquities of Ionia," it appears to have been a decastyle and dipteral temple, like that of Apollo Didymæus, 344 feet by 166. Vitruvius mentions a description of this temple by Theodorus, who, according to Pliny, constructed, in concert with Zmilus and Rholus, the labyrinth at Lemnos, supported by fifty immense columns, and so ingeniously contrived as to surpass, in the opinion of Pliny, both the Candian and Egyptian labyrinths. These two artists deserve everlasting remembrance for having invented the art of modeling in clay.

The second Theodorus was the son of Telecles, and invented, according to Pausanias, the mode of casting statues in iron. He is said to have been the sculptor of one of two magnificent vases, which were presented to the temple at Delphi, by Croesus, king of Lydia. Pliny mentions by him a work of great delicacy and minuteness—a brass statue of himself, holding in one hand a file, probably in allusion to his profession, and in the other a quadriga, or four-horse chariot, so small that a fly might cover it with its wings.

THEOLON, ETIENNE, a French painter, born at Paris in 1739. He studied with Joseph Vien, and painted interiors and conversation pieces with great reputation. His pictures are highly finished, and very rare, as he bestowed great labor upon them, and died young. He was admitted into the Academy at Paris in 1774, and died in 1781.

THEON, an eminent Greek painter, was a native of Samos, and flourished about the time of Philip and Alexander of Macedonia. According to Quintilian, he was considered among the first masters of the age, on account of his powers of invention, and the gracefulness of his execution. Ælian mentions an admirable picture by Theon, representing a youthful warrior, animated by martial spirit, and eagerly hastening to the fight. Pliny speaks of two, representing Thamyris playing the cithara, and Orestes in the act of killing his mother.

THEOTOCOPULI, or TEOSCOPI, DOMENICO, called DELLE GRECHE, IL GRECO, and EL GRIEGO. This eminent painter, engraver, sculptor, and architect, was a native of Greece, according to Palomino, and born in 1548. He quitted his native country, and visited Italy, where he studied painting under Titian, and also practiced wood engraving. Little is known concerning his works in the latter art, but Lanzi briefly mentions his name in such a manner as sufficiently shows his eminence, thus: "the art of wood engraving continued gradually to advance, and was cultivated by many distinguished men; such as Albert Durer in Germany; in Italy by Mecherino di Siena, by Do*menico delle Greche,* by Domenico Campagnola," &c. That author also says that he was employed by Titian to engrave some of his designs, and that his print after that master, representing the Submersion of Pharaoh, is a sufficient proof of his ability in wood engraving; also that Palomino was wrong in citing the date on this print as 1549, when Theotocopuli was only one year old. Zani, following Palomino's date, makes two artists; but Lanzi's correction explains the discrepancy.

None of the paintings of Theotocopuli have been certainly identified in Italy; but there are many in Spain, whither he went in company with Titian, at the invitation of Charles V. He remained in that country many years, during the rest of his life, and executed a large number of works in painting, sculpture, and architecture. His portraits and altar-pieces, in the style of Titian, Palomino says appeared to be from the hand of that master himself. He afterwards attempted a different style, but failed entirely. In 1577, when he settled at Toledo, Theotocopuli painted for the cathedral, a remarkable picture of the Parting of Christ's Raiment, which has received very high commendation from Bermudez, and others, being entirely in the style of Titian, and scarcely inferior to that master. His picture of the Interment of Don Gonsalvo Ruiz, in the church of Santo Tomé at Toledo, is commended as the finest picture in that city, and one of the noblest productions of Spanish art. He painted portraits in an admirable style, some of which are in the Royal Gallery at Madrid, and would do honor to Velasquez; his own portrait, and that of his beautiful daughter, are in the Spanish collection at the Louvre, where they are very highly valued.

As a sculptor and architect, El Greco gained considerable eminence, practicing both these arts in the same works, according to the general custom of his time. He designed the Casa del Ayuntamiento, or mansion house, of Toledo; also the churches La Caridad, and of the Franciscan convent at Illescas; for which edifices he executed a great part of the paintings and sculptures. In 1590, he designed the church of the Augustines at Madrid, called De Donna Maria de Arragon. He designed, also, several admirable monuments; but his grandest work, according to Milizia, was the church and monastery of the Bernard monks at San Domenico di Silos, of which he executed the whole—painting, sculpture, and architecture. According to Palomino, he died at Toledo in 1625, and was buried with great pomp, in the church of St. Bartholomew. His son, George Manuel Theotocopuli, was also distinguished in sculpture and architecture, and practiced both these arts in the Cathedral of Toledo, in 1625 and the following years. Among his other works, is an octagon edifice attached to the Cathedral, termed the ochavo; it is decorated with precious stones, and is used as the treasure-house of the Virgin. He died at Toledo in 1631.

THEW, ROBERT, an eminent English engraver, was born in the small town of Patrington, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, in 1758. At an early age he was apprenticed to a cooper, and continued at that business for a number of years; Chalmers states that during the war of American Independence, he served as a private in the Northumberland militia. According to the "Gentleman's Magazine," his attention was first directed to engraving about the age of twenty-six, when it is said he happened to see an engraver at work, and although destitute of any practical knowledge of drawing, he procured a copper-plate, and engraved an old woman's head, from a picture by Gerard Douw, with such extraordinary skill, that he was appointed historical engraver to the Prince of Wales, at the recommendation of Charles Fox, Lady Ducannon, and the Duchess of Devonshire. This story, however, is highly improbable, since considerable mechanical dexterity is indispensable to producing a good copper-plate engraving. A more credible account is, that about 1783 Thew settled at Hull, and commenced engraving shop-bills, cards, etc. Chalmers states that he engraved and published a plan of Hull, which is dated May 6, 1784; and that shortly afterwards he solicited subscriptions for two views of the Dock at that place. The latter are large aquatint plates, drawn and engraved by Thew, with the assistance of F. Jukes in the aquatinting department; and they were published in London, by Thew himself, in May, 1786. Copies of them are now preserved in the British Museum. In 1788, Thew was introduced to Alderman Boydell by the Marquis of Caermarthen, afterwards duke of Leeds, whose patronage he had obtained by the construction of a camera-obscura on a new principle; and Boydell immediately commissioned him to engrave Northcote's picture of the Interview between the young Princes, from Richard III., act iii., scene 1. This plate was published in 1791, at which time Thew held the appointment above alluded to, of engraver to the Prince of Wales. He subsequently engraved eighteen other plates for the Shakspeare Gallery, and part of a nineteenth; several of these are among the best in the collection, displaying an unusual amount of spirit and expression, as well as a high degree of mechanical skill. That of Cardinal Wolsey entering Leicester Abbey (Henry VIII., act iv., scene 2), from a picture by Westall, is particularly and deservedly celebrated as a fine specimen of stipple engraving; and in consequence of its superior beauty, proof impressions were charged double the price of any other in the entire work. Thew received but little instruction, and owed his success, according to Chalmers, to his native genius, aided by an industrious application, by which he rapidly attained great excellence in the art. The distinguishing characteristics of his practice consisted in most faithfully exhibiting the true spirit and style of each master; a most minute accuracy, a certain polish, and exquisite delicacy of manner; with the appropriate character given to all objects, while a mildness of tone and perfect harmony pervaded the whole piece. Thew died at Stevenage, in Hertfordshire, in 1802.

THIBOUST, BENOIT, a French engraver, born at Chartres about 1655. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went young to Italy, where he seems to have passed the rest of his life. He engraved a set of thirty-five plates, representing the life of St. Turribius, after Gio. Battista Gaetano, entitled Vita Beati Turribii Archiepiscopi Limani in Indiis, published at Rome in 1679. He also engraved a number of other plates, after the Italian masters, among which are the Crucifixion, after Gaetano; St. Teresa, and St. Bibiena, after Bernini; St. Tommaso d'Aquinas, after Calandrucci; St. Rosa kneeling before the Virgin, the Martyrdom of St. Peter, and St. Peter of Alcantara, after A. Baldi. His plates are executed with the graver, in a slight, open style, resembling that of Claude Mellan, though very inferior to those of that master. He was living in 1699.

THIELE, JOHN ALEXANDER, a German painter, born at Erfurt, in Saxony, in 1685, though some say in 1695. He is said to have first studied with an obscure landscape painter, named Manyoky, and afterwards with C. L. Agricola. He however chiefly owed his success to his own genius, and a diligent study of nature. His pictures represent the beautiful scenery on the banks of the Sala and the Elbe, which he depicted in a very natural and pleasing manner. He acquired considerable celebrity, and was appointed painter to the king of Saxony. He executed quite a number of spirited etchings from his own designs, consisting of views in Saxony, which are dated 1726 to 1743; those of the later dates are far superior to his earlier prints. He was the instructor of the celebrated Dietricy, and died at Dresden in 1752.

THIELEN, JOHN PHILIP VAN, an eminent Flemish painter of flowers, born at Mechlin in 1618. He was descended of a noble family, and was Seigneur or Lord of Cowenberg, on which account he usually signed his pictures J. P. Cowenberg. After receiving a liberal education in every branch of polite literature, a passion for painting induced him to place himself under the instruction of Daniel Seghers, the celebrated painter of flowers, under whose able instruction he became one of the most famous painters of his time in that branch of the art. He usually composed his subjects in the manner of Seghers, in garlands of flowers around some historical designs, or in festoons that encircled vases enriched with bas-reliefs. He copied every object after nature, cultivated the most beautiful flowers, selected them when they appeared in their fullest bloom, and grouped them with elegance and taste. His pictures are well composed, and very highly finished, and though they are less spirited and brilliant than those of his instructor, his touch is as light, his pencil as neat, and his coloring as transparent. He was much employed by the king of Spain, and most of his works are in the royal collections at Madrid. In competition with Seghers, he was employed to paint a picture in the Abbey of St. Bernard, near Antwerp, on which occasion he exerted all his abilities, and his performance was judged little inferior to that of his master. Weyerman highly extols a garland of flowers by him, encircling a sleeping Nymph, with a Satyr watching her, by Poelenburg. There are two capital pictures by him at Mechlin, representing St. Bernard and St. Agatha, surrounded by garlands of flowers, with insects, as natural as life. He sometimes painted landscapes, huntings, and architectural pieces, but he was not so successful in these subjects. He died in 1667.

THIELEN, MARIA THERESA, ANNA MARIA, and FRANCIS CATHERINE VAN, were the daughters of the preceding, who carefully instructed them in the art, and they all excelled in the same branch. Maria Theresa, the eldest, was born in 1640. She painted portraits and flowers in such an excellent manner, that Weyerman says her pictures were worth their weight in gold. Anna Maria was born in 1641, and Frances Catherine in 1645; they were not inferior to their sister in elegance of composition, delicacy of penciling, or softness of coloring—commendation too gallant and uniform to be of much value.

THIELENS, JOHN, a Flemish painter, who flourished at Antwerp, in the latter part of the 17th century. He painted the interiors of chemists' laboratories, workshops of sculptors, studios of painters, &c., in which he imitated the manner of David Teniers.

THIEMON, otherwise DIETHMAR, a painter, sculptor, founder, and gilder of the Middle Ages, was born in Bavaria, of noble parentage, about 1045. He was as well versed in mechanics as in the Fine Arts, agreeably to the custom of his time. He executed many works in painting and sculpture for the churches, particularly for that of St. Blaise, near the city of Ems. In 1079, Thiemon was appointed abbé of the diocese of Saltzburg; in 1090, he was chosen archbishop of that city. About the year 1099, he started for the Holy Land, where he died in 1101. It is said that he was taken prisoner by the infidels, who, on learning his skill in sculpture, commanded him to restore the arms of a brazen idol. Upon his refusing to do it, on account of religious scruples, he was put to death; and the Catholic church has placed him among the martyrs.

THIERS, BARON DE, a French amateur artist, who flourished about 1760. He etched a few plates of landscapes and other subjects, of small size, after Boucher.

THIM, MOSES, a German artist, who flourished at Wittenberg about 1613. He is said to have practiced both painting and engraving, and to have used the above monogram, but none of his works are specified. Zani says he was a printer, and denies that he ever engraved either on wood or copper.

THOMAN, or THOMANN, CHRISTIAN RAYMOND, a German engraver, who was living in 1733. He engraved some of the plates for the collection of prints from the antique marbles in the Dresden Gallery.

THOMANN, JACOB ERNEST, a German painter, born at Landau in 1588. After learning the rudiments of art in his native city, he went to Italy at the age of seventeen, and spent fifteen years at Rome, Naples, and Genoa. At Rome, he studied with Adam Ælzheimer, whose style he imitated with such success that it is sometimes difficult to distinguish their works. He acquired considerable reputation at Rome, and his works were much sought after. He afterwards visited Naples and Genoa, where his pictures were held in equal estimation. On the death of his friend and preceptor, he returned to Germany, and established himself at Landau, where he was appointed painter to the Emperor, and found abundant employment. Like the works of Ælzheimer, his subjects were usually landscapes of small size, decorated with small figures, from sacred and profane history; and he entered so completely into the spirit of that master in design, handling, and coloring, that his works have often been mistaken for those of his instructor. The German writers call him Jacob

Ernest Thoman von Hagelstein. He died at Landau in 1653.

THOMANN, PHILIP ERNEST, was the grandson of the preceding, born at Augsburg in 1657, and died in 1726. Little is known of him. He is said to have painted some works for the churches, and to have engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects in mezzotinto.

THOMAS, JOHN, a Flemish painter, born at Ypres, in or about 1610. He studied in the school of Rubens, and afterwards went to Italy, in company with his fellow pupil Diepenbeck, where he studied the works of the great masters with assiduity, and greatly improved himself. On his return to his own country, he distinguished himself, and executed several works for the churches, one of the best of which is an altar-piece in the church of the Barefooted Carmelites at Antwerp, representing St. Francis kneeling before the Virgin and Infant. He was invited, in 1662, to the court of the Emperor Leopold, who appointed him his principal painter, with a liberal pension, and retained him in his service till his death. This artist executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, and engraved several plates of portraits and other subjects in mezzotinto, among which are the portraits of the Emperor Leopold and Titian. He died at Vienna in 1673.

THOMASIN, PHILIP, a French engraver, born at Troyes, in Champagne, about 1536. He went young to Rome, where he resided the greater part of his life. Huber says he there studied under Cornelius Cort, whose style he followed with considerable success. He wrought entirely with the graver, in a clear, firm style. His prints are numerous, and amount to more than two hundred; about fifty of them are after the antique statues at Rome. He was living in 1613. The following are his most esteemed prints:

The Portrait of Philip Emanuel of Lorraine, Duke de Merceur. A set of fourteen plates, with the title, "Christ and the Twelve Apostles;" after Raffaele. St. Margaret; do. St. Cecilia; do. The School of Athens; do. The Dispute on the Sacrament; do. The Defeat of the Saracens in the Port of Ostia; do. The Conflagration of the Borgo Vecchio; do. The Holy Family; after Federico Zuccaro. The Adoration of the Magi; do. The Miracle at the Marriage of Cana; after Taddeo Zuccaro. The Nativity; after Ventura Salimbeni. The Purification of the Virgin; after F. Baroccio. The Last Judgment; after F. Vanni. Apollo and the Muses; after Bal. Peruzzi; a frieze.

THOMASSIN, SIMON. This artist is said to have been of the same family as the preceding, born at Troyes in 1638, though Zani places his birth in 1652, and his death in 1732. After learning the rudiments of design at Paris, he went to Rome, and studied in the French Academy in that city. He devoted himself to engraving, and acquired distinction. He was elected a member of the Academy at Paris, and appointed one of the engravers to the king. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a neat, clear style, but without much intelligence in the effect of light and shadow. His drawing is generally correct, though somewhat mannered, and his extremities are not marked with that freedom and lightness which distinguish the hand of a great master. His most considerable work is a folio volume of plates, from the statues and other marbles in the palace and gardens of Versailles. He also engraved a number of portraits and other subjects, among which are the following :

THOMASSIN, HENRI SIMON, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1688. After receiving instruction from his father, he became the pupil of Bernard Picart, and accompanied that master to Amsterdam, where he engraved several plates. On his return to Paris, he acquired considerable reputation, and was admitted into the Academy in 1728. His plates are executed with more freedom and spirit than those of his father, and he availed himself more of the assistance of the point. His prints are quite numerous, and some of them are considered very masterly productions. Among others are the following by him. He died at Paris in 1741.

PORTRAITS.

The Portrait of Louis XIV. presented to the Arts by Minerva; after L. de Boullongne; engraved for his reception into the Academy. 1728. Louis, Dauphin of France; after Tocqué. THOMOND, THOMAS, a French architect, born at Paris in 1759. He had scarcely acquired a knowledge of his profession, when the civil commotions obliged him and his family, with many other royalists, to quit France. He settled at St. Petersburg, and commenced practicing the art of painting, to which he was much attached, particularly in architectural and perspective pieces. The taste he displayed in those subjects, led at length to his being employed by the government in that department of art which he originally intended to follow, and he was commissioned in 1804, to improve and partly remodel the great Theatre, first erected by the German architect Tischbein, in 1783. Although not altogether free from the peculiarities of the French school, the façade and octastyle Ionic portico which he added to that structure, is one of the noblest pieces of architecture of the kind and date in Europe; and had the architect executed nothing else, that alone would have entitled him to rank higher in his profession than many who owe their celebrity as much to the number as the merit of their works. Thomond also erected several private mansions and other buildings at St. Petersburg, the mausoleum of the Emperor Paul at Pavlovsk, the theatre at Odessa, and the Pultava monument. His second important work was the grand Imperial Exchange, erected during the years 1804–1810, an insulated structure of the Roman Doric order, 256 by 300 feet, peripteral and decastyle at each end, though without pediments, and embellished with forty-four columns. Situated at the southern point of the Vassilievskii Island, immediately facing the Neva, it stands in the centre of a spacious square, upon a rich architectural terrace, which sweeps out so as to form a semi-circular esplanade in front, at each extremity of which is a flight of steps leading down to the river, and a massive rostral column, one hundred and twenty feet high. The architectural combination is exceedingly picturesque, and may be said to be unique. In 1808, Thomond published some of his buildings and designs, in a quarto volume; and he also wrote a treatise on painting. He died in 1813.

THOMPSON, HENRY, an English historical and portrait painter, born at Portsea in 1773. Little is recorded of him. He was a member of the Royal Academy, and filled the office of keeper of that institution for several years. In 1828, owing to ill health, he retired to his native place, where he died in 1843.

THOMSON, WILLIAM, an Irish portrait painter, born at Dublin. He settled in London, where he practiced with some reputation, and died there in 1800. His pictures are said to possess the merits of faithful likeness and a natural tone of coloring.

THOMSON, JAMES, an excellent English engraver, was born at Mitford, in Northumberland, in 1789. He was the fourth son of the Rev. James Thomson, M. A., of Nunriding Hall, and as he evinced at an early age considerable talent for drawing, he was articulated to Mr. Mackenzie, an engraver residing in Margaret street, Cavendish Square, London. After spending seven years under the latter, Thomson wrought for two years under Mr. Carden, after which he received commissions on his own account, and practiced the art in London for many years. He lived universally respected, and died in 1850, regretted by a large circle of friends. Among the principal works of Thomson, are the Three Nieces of the Duke of Wellington, after Sir Thomas Lawrence; Lodge's Portrait Gallery; an equestrian portrait of Her Majesty, attended by Lord Melbourne, the Marquis of Conyngham, &c., after Grant; the Museum Townley Marbles; the Bishop of London, after Richmond; Prince Albert, after Sir W. C. Ross; Portraits of Louis Philippe and his Queen.

THORNHILL, SIR JAMES, an eminent English painter, born at Weymouth, in Dorsetshire, in 1676. He was descended of an ancient family, but his father being in reduced circumstances, was compelled to sell his paternal estate, and young Thornhill was obliged to take care of himself. He accordingly set out for London, and having a genius for painting, his uncle Sydenham, the celebrated physician, rendered him assistance, and procured him instruction in art. The name of his master is not mentioned, but he was indebted more to his own talents and application, than to the precepts of his instructor. After acquiring some celebrity as an historical painter, he traveled through Holland and Flanders to France, and greatly improved himself. On his return to London his abilities soon attracted public attention, and his reputation rose to the greatest height.

He was commissioned by Queen Anne to decorate the cupola of St. Paul's cathedral, where he represented the principal events in the life of that apostle, in eight compartments, designed and executed in a grand style; these subjects were engraved in eight sheets by du Bosc, Beauvais, Baron, G. Vanderghucht and Simonneau. These works gave so much satisfaction that the Queen appointed him her first painter of history. He was afterwards employed to execute several public works, particularly an apartment at Hampton Court, which he embellished with subjects emblematic of the history of Queen Anne, and her consort George, Prince of Denmark. He painted some altarpieces for the churches, and was much employed in decorating the palaces of the nobility and gentry. Among his principal productions are the great saloon and the refectory in Greenwich Hospital. He was particularly patronized by George II., who conferred upon him the honor of knighthood. He sat in parliament several years, from his native town, and was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He copied the cartoons of Raffaele in Hampton Court of the same size as the originals, which occupied him three years; he also made another set of one-fourth the size; he also made numerous studies of the heads, hands, and feet, which he intended to publish for the use of students, but the work never appeared. At the sale of his effects after his death, the small set brought 75 guineas, and the large one more than £200; the latter was purchased by the Duke of Bedford, and many years afterwards, was presented to the Royal Academy. Sir James had a genius for portrait and landscape, though he did not practice those branches much; he had a good knowledge of architecture, and erected several private edifices; he also etched some plates from his own designs, executed in a bold, free style. Though he received only moderate compensation for his services, he acquired a handsome fortune. His demands were contested for his paintings at Greenwich Hospital, and while la Fosse, the French painter, received £2500, for his work at Montague House, Thornhill could obtain only forty shillings the square yard, for the cupola of St. Paul's, and the same for the apartments at Greenwich! He had a son named James, whom he instructed in the art, and for whom he procured the appointment of sergeant painter to the King, but he did not acquire any distinction; also a daughter, who ran away and married the inimitable Hogarth. He died in 1734.

THORWALDSEN, ALBERT. This preëminent Danish sculptor was born at Copenhagen, November 19, 1770. He was the son of Gottschalk Thorwaldsen, a native of Iceland, and his wife, Karen Gronlund, the daughter of a priest of Jutland. He was descended from the most renowned warriors and princes,—it being a well authenticated fact that his family goes back to the fabulous period of Danish history, as far as King Harold Hildetand (Harold of the Tooth of Gold), who was killed in 735, at the Battle of Bravalla. The descendants of Harold removed to Norway, from whence a part of the race emigrated to Iceland. One among them, named Olaf Paa, was distinguished for the wise and magnificent use he made of his fortunes, in the encouragement of painting and architecture; the Savan Finn Magnussen alludes to him with great commendation in his Researches on Danish Archæology. A tradition had long been preserved, that "the gods had promised Harold a descendant whose fame should spread from the extremities of the North, even to the sunny regions of the South." This tradition was at length fulfilled in the birth of the illustrious subject of this sketch. Almost the first things that drew his attention while an infant, were a sculptor's chisel, and a few pieces of work that bore resemblance to sculpture. He went to school but a short time during boyhood, and learned very little while there. He assisted his father at a very early age, and when only eleven years old commenced attending the free school of the Academy of Arts at Copenhagen. In two years he made such progress that he was enabled to improve his father's carvings, and he undertook to execute the head pieces of ships. At the age of 17, he obtained the silver medal of the Academy, for a bas-relief of Cupid reposing; and in 1791, when 20 years old, the small gold medal for a sketch of Heliodorus driven from the temple. At this time he was remarkably modest, and diffident of his own abilities. Two years after, he drew the grand prize, which entitled him to the royal pension; but as the latter privilege was then being enjoyed by another, he was obliged to wait three years, during which time he continued his professional pursuits, devoting also considerable time to general study, as he had much both to read and learn.

On the 20th May, 1796, Thorwaldsen set out for Italy in the Danish frigate Thetis, and after a voyage of almost interminable length, he reached Malta, where, losing all patience, he quitted the ship, and embarked in a vessel for Palermo, whence he sailed in the packet boat to Naples, arriving there in January, 1797. Without friends, and ignorant of the Italian language, the young sculptor's heart failed him, and he longed to return to Denmark which according to his own account he would have done, if he had found a Danish vessel about to leave Naples at that time. However, after a little while, he gained courage sufficient to engage a place in the coach of a vetturino for Rome, where he arrived March 8th. He brought letters of introduction to his distinguished countryman Zoëga, who however did not give him much encouragement, nor did he estimate his abilities very highly. The first years which Thorwaldsen passed in Rome, were frequently saddened by painful experiences. All Europe was agitated to such a degree that none escaped the shock—not even the savant in his retreat, nor the artist in his studio. The rough spirits of war invaded the realms of art. Notwithstanding this, the young sculptor prosecuted his art devotedly and enthusiastically, but without that encouragement which he had a right to expect. The term of his annuity was rapidly passing away, and he had not yet learned to depend on the strength of his own genius. In 1801, he prepared to return to Denmark; but before setting out he wished to complete a work designed as a gift to his country—Jason's Conquest of the Golden Fleece. He had already made the model, but becoming dissatisfied with it, he destroyed the work, and commenced another of larger dimensions. When it was completed, and shown to Canova—then arbiter in the art—he exclaimed, "Questa apena di quel giovane Danese è fatta di uno stilo nuovo e grandioso!" The work was also highly praised even by Zoëga; but Thorwaldsen, feeling that mere admiration, however gratifying, would not supply the place of ducats, determined to proceed immediately home; he made all necessary preparations, and the vetturino had already arrived at the door, when suddenly the sculptor Hageman of Berlin, his traveling companion, came to say that, in consequence of an informality in his passport, he could not yet begin his journey. This delay was followed by another, and not long afterwards the liberality of Thomas Hope relieved him from embarrassment. That English connoisseur having heard of Canova's praise of Thorwaldsen's work, visited his studio, and after regarding the model for a long time, asked the artist, "How much do you require to complete that statue in marble?" "Six hundred ducats," was the answer. "You shall have eight hundred," said the generous patron of art. Thorwaldsen remained in Rome.

From this time (1803), his star was in the ascendant; the statue of Jason was not indeed finished till many years after, but many celebrated works were done meanwhile; as the bas-reliefs of Summer and Autumn, and the Dance of the Muses on Helicon; Cupid and Psyche, and Venus with the Apple. His fame spread far and wide, and Christian, (then crown-prince), of Denmark, wrote him a pressing invitation to return to Copenhagen, communicating at the same time the discovery of a white marble quarry in Norway. Thorwaldsen was eager to return, but his numerous commissions rendered it impossible. During these busy years, he was accustomed to recreate at Leghorn during the summer seasons, at the beautiful villa of Baron Schubart, the Danish minister at Florence; he also executed some of his works there. In 1812, when arrangements were being made for Napoleon's entry into Rome, the architect Stern, who superintended the preparations, requested Thorwaldsen to prepare a plaster frieze for one of the large apartments in the Quirinal Palace. He undertook the commission, and in three months completed his plaster model, sixty feet in length, of his celebrated bas-relief of the Triumphal Entry of Alexander into Babylon. The Danes opened a subscription to enable him to reproduce this master-piece in marble, and their efforts were warmly seconded; it has been twice executed in marble, with slight variations, and is engraved in a series of plates by S. Amsler, of Munich, after drawings by Overbeck and others. During the course of his rapid and brilliant career, Thorwaldsen was occasionally disturbed by spells of deep melancholy, and it was in a single one of these sombre days that he modeled his celebrated bas-reliefs of Night and Morning, in 1815. At length, in July 1819, the entreaties of his countrymen determined Thorwaldsen to visit his native land. His progress through Italy and Germany was marked by many honors, and on arriving at Copenhagen, the 3d of October, he was received with acclamations by a vast multitude of his fellow citizens, and lodged in the palace of Charlottenburg. For a year he was entertained with public feasts and other demonstrations of gratitude from his countrymen; after which he started for Rome, visiting Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna, everywhere welcomed enthusiastically and overwhelmed with marks of distinction. At Warsaw he received several commissions, and executed a bust of the Emperor Alexander.

Thorwaldsen executed his principal works after his return to Rome—as Christ and the Twelve Apostles, and the large majestic statue of Copernicus, both placed in the church of Notre Dame at Copenhagen; also the monuments of Pius VII., Maximilian of Bavaria, the Poniatowski monument, and others. In 1823, he had a narrow escape of his life; a young lad, the son of his landlady, contrived to get hold of one of his pistols, which he had carelessly hung up loaded; ignorant of the danger, the boy discharged it at Thorwaldsen, but the ball, after grazing two of his fingers, passed through his dress without causing further injury. In 1838, the statues of Christ and the Apostles, the group of St. John preaching, and other works for the church of Notre Dame at Copenhagen, besides others for the palace of Christianburg, were finally completed, and the Danish government sent the frigate Rota to convey them and their sculptor to Denmark. Though enriched by the proceeds of his works, surrounded with every luxury of life, and enjoying at will all the advantages to be derived from a people who truly appreciated his genius, Thorwaldsen yet resolved to return to Copenhagen. Having transferred the above mentioned works and the original plaster models of all his sculptures, which he had carefully preserved, he bade adieu to the metropolis of art, which had so long witnessed the triumphs of his genius. On arriving at the port of Copenhagen, as the frigate sailed up towards the city, the vessels in the harbor were decked with flags, the cannon thundered from the batteries, and when the illustrious sculptor had landed and entered his carriage, the people detached the horses, and drew their much loved artist, amid the enthusiastic cheering of the excited multitude, through the streets to the palace of Charlottenburg, where his studio was already prepared, decked with wreaths and garlands of flowers. After this princely ovation, festival succeeded festival, until Thorwaldsen at length withdrew from the city to the beautiful villa of Nyso, the seat of his friend Baron Stampe, who showed him the greatest attention and kindness. During his absence on an excursion to the island of Moe, a studio was built for him in the garden of the villa, directly facing the sea. Here he finished some of his last compositions, Christ bearing his Cross; the Entry into Jerusalem; Rebecca at the Well; his own statue; the busts of the poets Oehlenschläger and Holberg; and those of his friends the Stampe family. In 1841, finding the climate disagree with him, he returned to Italy in company with the Stampe family, and he executed at this time his group of the Graces for the king of Wurtemberg. He returned however, to Denmark and Nyso the following year, and executed two bas-reliefs—Christmas Joys in Heaven, and the Genius of Poetry; the latter he presented to his friend Oehlenschläger, saying "It is your medallion." He intended to return to Rome in the summer of 1844, but was prevented by his death, which occurred very suddenly, on the 24th of March in that year, just after he had entered the theatre. The cause was subsequently ascertained to be disease of the heart. His remains lay in state in the Academy, and were interred with regal honors, beneath his own greatest productions in the cathedral church of Copenhagen. The news of his death was received with the deepest regret throughout Europe, and funeral honors were celebrated to his remembrance at Berlin and at Rome.

Thus ended the glorious career of Thorwaldsen.

Fortune had favored him with her choicest honors. The great were proud to have him in their halls; and the people, knowing that he sprang from their ranks, were proud of his fame. His prosperity did not alter in the least his genuine native modesty and simplicity of character. He was generous to all who needed assistance; he had a tender and compassionate heart; and his genius was allied to a gentleness and sweetness of disposition which charmed all who had access to him. Age had conferred upon him beauty of a most impressive character; "his face," said the poet Holberg, "had the plastic characteristic of one of his admirable statues; when he moved in the midst of a crowd, it would separate as if it felt the pressure of a superior being."

There has much been written, and much more been said, respecting the artistic merits of Thorwaldsen. His warmest admirers consider him the greatest of modern sculptors, and many have not hesitated to place him above Canova, and even to compare him with the antique. On the other hand, some question his power or fertility of invention, consider his style monotonous, and even rank him inferior to Canova in heroic vigor or robust strength of character. Amid such contradictory opinions, it is perhaps difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion; but it would be very difficult indeed to coincide with the latter opinion. Power of expression, was Thorwaldsen's peculiar excellence. He distinguished his smallest medallion by peculiar force, and from the minutest treatment his mind could at once rise to colossal composition, without exhibiting the least trace of littleness of style. Not so with Canova; although he frequently excelled the Dane in beauty of the female forms, many of his works are enfeebled by affectation and excessive finesse—defects nowhere to be found in those of Thorwaldsen, whose chief characteristic was that energetic enunciation in his figures which claims at once all the senses of the spectator. His imagination was inexhaustible; and the exquisite feeling which he threw into his works, is nowhere better exemplified than in his basso-relievos, "Night" and "Morning." Contrary to poetical usage, he characterized Night as the Mother of Humanity: for her gemmy crest is substituted the fillet of poppies, her star-studded mantle is also cast aside, and she has gathered to her bosom her sleeping children. The figures are floating rather than flying through the air; and an aspect of repose is given to the whole composition by the quiet attitudes, even to the lower limbs of the principal one, crossed as at rest; the companion of their shadowy flight is the "bird that loves darkness." Morning is equally beautifully described as a buoyant winged figure, speeding gracefully through the air, and strewing roses over the earth, accompanied by a torch-bearer, who does not rest upon his associate, although poised on her shoulder; his own wings are bearing him forward through the freshening air, which expands and moves the draperies by its gentle influences. Both these master-pieces of art are in the Chatsworth Gallery of the Duke of Devonshire.

Thorwaldsen was the greatest master of his age in basso-relievo; his highest excellence in statues is surpassed by the learning he displayed in low-relief—the most difficult part of sculptural composition. It was therefore his favorite style, and a great proportion of his works are executed in this manner. Of this class, some of his minor works are most expressive; besides those above mentioned, are his admirable versions of Death, Justice, Power, and Wisdom; but the largest are—the Triumph of Alexander, and the Procession to Golgotha, which is the frieze of the cathedral church of Copenhagen; immediately below is the numerous group of St. John preaching in the Wilderness, in full relief, in the pediment: in the vestibule are the four great Prophets; Christ and the Twelve Apostles are above and around the altar. The Triumph of Alexander, of which there is a copy in marble in the palace of Christianburg, (the first marble copy was made for Count Somariva's villa on lake Como), is a long triumphal procession in two divisions, one meeting the other. In the centre, Alexander, in the chariot of Victory, and followed by his army, is met by the goddess of Peace, followed by Mazæus and Bagophanes with presents to the conqueror. The subject is taken from the work of Quintus Curtius; the frieze is mostly symbolical, and perspective is nowhere introduced. The whole arrangement is admirable, especially that portion represented as coming from Babylon, comprising the General Mazæus with his family; female figures strewing flowers; Bagophanes placing silver altars with burning incense; musicians and attendants leading horses, sheep, wild animals, and other presents for the conqueror; next to these are symbolical representations of the river Euphrates, and the peaceful occupations of the Babylonians. The horses are inferior to the other figures, but the human forms are admirable, as is also the management of the costumes. His vast Swiss Lion at Lucerne, was carved from a rock near Berne of between sixty and eighty feet in height. The Poniatowski monument, in the great square at Warsaw, is a beautiful allusion, wrought out in a vein of the most graceful poetry; it is an equestrian composition, surmounting a fountain, by the water of which the horse is terrified, as if at the current of the river Elster. In England, Thorwaldsen is chiefly known by the statues of Jason and Lord Byron. Many years ago some admirers of the poet raised a subscription for a monument to be erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey. Chantrey was requested to erect it, but declined on account of the smallness of the sum subscribed; Thorwaldsen was then applied to, and cheerfully undertook the work. About 1833, the finished statue arrived at the London Custom House, but to the astonishment of the subscribers, the Dean of Westminster, Dr. Ireland, declined giving permission to its being set up in the Abbey; and as his successor entertained the same views, the statue remained upwards of twelve years in the Custom House, and was finally removed in 1845 to the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. The poet is represented of life size, seated on a ruin, with his left foot resting on the fragment of a column; in his right hand he holds a style up to his mouth; in his left is a book inscribed "Childe Harold:" he is dressed in a frock coat and cloak. Beside him on the left is a skull, above which is the Athenian Owl. The likeness is of course posthumous.

Thorwaldsen bequeathed all works of art in his possession, including plaster casts of his own works, to the city of Copenhagen, for the purpose of forming a distinct museum, to be called after his own name, on condition that the city furnished an appropriate building for their reception. The requisite sum was speedily raised, and the building nearly completed before his death. Besides the casts of his numerous works, which alone would constitute an imposing collection, the Thorwaldsen Museum contains many works of ancient and modern sculpture, numerous paintings by old and recent masters, casts, vases, engraved gems, cameos, terracottas, bronzes, medals, curiosities, engravings, prints of all descriptions, drawings, and books on the fine arts. With the exception of 12,000 dollars to each of his grandchildren, and the life-interest of 40,000 to their mother, Madame Poulsen (his natural daughter, born at Rome), to descend to her children, the whole of his personal estate, estimated at nearly 1,000,000 dollars, was to be converted into capital, and to be added to the 25,000 dollars already presented for the purpose by Thorwaldsen, to form a museum perpetual fund; for the preservation of the museum, and to add to the collection; for the purchase of the works of Danish artists, and for the encouragement of Danish art generally. On the day before his death, his monument was located, at his express desire, in the centre of this museum. His unfinished works were to have been completed by Prof. Bissen, of the Academy of Copenhagen, who was also appointed Superintendent of the Thorwaldsen Museum. The government is under five trustees, two of whom are always to be professors in the Academy, one a magistrate of the city, and one a lawyer. The president of the council is to be the senior trustee, and all questions are to be decided by a majority of voices.

T or H, THOURNEYSER, JOHN JAMES, a Swiss engraver, born at Basle in 1636. He received his first instruction from Peter Aubry at Strasburg, and next went to Paris, where he resided many years. He engraved some portraits of distinguished personages and other subjects, some of which are executed in the style of Francis de Poilly, and others with single strokes, in the manner of Claude Mellan. He engraved a part of the plates for a set of prints from select pictures published by Catherine Patin in 1691; also a variety of vignettes and other book plates. There are several of his plates in the Academy of Sandrart, among which are Latona, the Laocöon, and Antinous. He usually marked his plates with one of the above monograms. His name is sometimes written Thourneysen. He died in 1718. He had a son, called also John James, whom he instructed in the art, and who assisted him in his works. He was living in 1736.

THUFEL, or TEUFEL, JOHN, a German wood engraver, who, according to Professor Christ, was a native of Saxony, flourished about 1570, and executed some cuts marked with the initials I. T. F. He is also called the master of the picklock and the trefoil, and his prints date from about 1540 to 1568.

THULDEN, THEODORE VAN, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Bois-le-Duc in 1607. He was educated in the school of Rubens, and was one of his most distinguished disciples. He assisted that master in some of his works, and is said to have had a considerable share in forwarding the famous pictures for the gallery of the Luxembourg. He went to Paris in 1633, where he was employed to paint a series of twenty-four pictures for the church of the Mathurins, representing the life of St. John of Matha, which he etched and published. On his return to Flanders, he painted many works for the churches and public edifices of Antwerp, Mechlin, Bruges, Ghent, and other cities, so much in the style of Rubens, that some of them have been mistaken for the works of that master. He also painted much for individuals. He did not confine himself to history, but sometimes painted village festivals and the pastimes of the peasantry, in which he excelled. He painted small figures with great spirit and vigor, and frequently inserted them in the works of his cotemporaries, as Peter Neefs, Wildens, Mompers, and even in the hunting pieces of Snyders. Among his most celebrated works are the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian in the church of the Bernardines at Mechlin; the Martyrdom of St. Adrian, in the church of St. Michael at Ghent, and the Assumption of the Virgin, formerly in the church of the Jesuits at Bruges, which is considered his master-piece. He executed a large number of etchings in a clear, firm, and painter-like style, the principal of which are a set of twenty-four plates of the life of St. John of Matha, from his pictures before mentioned, at Paris, 1633; a set of 58 plates of the history of Ulysses, after the pictures by Primaticcio at Fontainebleau, 1640; a set of eight plates of Triumphant Arches designed by Rubens, for the Entry of Cardinal Infant Ferdinand into Antwerp, and a set of eight plates of the Prodigal Son, from his own designs. His name is sometimes erroneously written Tulden. He died, according to the best authorities, in 1676, but Balkema says in 1686.

THURMER, JOSEPH, a reputable German architect, was born at Munich in 1789. In 1817, at the age of twenty-eight, he commenced applying himself professionally to architecture, and studied under Prof. Fischer, with Gartner, Ziebland, Oehlmüller, and many others for fellow students. The following year he visited Rome, and afterwards joined Hubsch, Heger, and Koch in a professional excursion to Greece, where he spent five months in studying and drawing the Athenian antiquities, some few of which he published on his return, with the title of Ansichten von Athen und seine Denkmaler, 1823-6. Unlike some others, he was not such a prejudiced admirer of the Grecian style as to have no relish for any other, and he considered the Italian style of the time of Leo X., as equally worthy of the architect's attention. Accordingly, he united with Guttensohn in bringing out the Sammlung von Denkmaler, &c., or a "Collection of Architectural Studies and Buildings at Rome, of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries." The first number appeared in 1826; but not meeting with the encouragement it deserved, the work was discontinued. Its publication, however, was advantageous to Thurmer, since it recommended him to notice, and led to his receiving in 1827, at the same time, two different invitations, one from Frankfort, the other from Dresden, the latter of which he accepted, and was appointed professor-extraordinary, in the school of architecture. In 1832 he was promoted to the first professorship of architecture, in which post he effected much for the advancement of the art and the improvement of taste. He erected but few edifices in Dresden, the only public building there entirely by him being the Post-office; the Hauptwache or Guard House, was erected by him after Schinkel's designs. Thurmer died in 1833. In 1838 his friends and pupils erected a bronze bust and monument to his memory, in the Academy of Arts.

THURSTON, JOHN, an English designer, born at Scarborough in 1774, and died at London in 1822. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he was a tasteful and elegant designer, much employed by the booksellers in embellishing numerous editions of the British Poets and Novelists.

THYS, GYSBRECHT, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp about 1625. He studied with Adrian Hanneman, and according to Descamps, was one of the ablest portrait painters of his time, in which he imitated the style of Vandyck so successfully, that his works have sometimes been mistaken for the productions of that master. He also excelled in painting landscapes, decorated with small figures in the manner of Poelenburg. Balkema says he died in 1684.

THYS, PETER JOSEPH, a Flemish painter of flowers, born at Lier in 1749. He first studied in the Academy at Antwerp, where he gained several prizes, and afterwards with Koeck the flower painter, at whose house he became acquainted with Spaendonck, whom he accompanied to Paris. On his return he settled at Brussels, where he acquired considerable reputation. He was employed to paint some flower-pieces to decorate the orangery of the palace of Laeken, which possessed sufficient merit to induce the French to carry them to Paris in 1792. He was very skillful in imitating the touch and coloring of various masters, for which reason he was much employed in restoring old paintings. He died in 1823.

TIARINI, ALESSANDRO, an eminent painter, born at Bologna in 1577. He first studied with Fontana, and next with Cesi, when he was obliged to fly from his native city on account of a fatal quarrel. He sought refuge at Florence, and became the pupil of Passignano, who conceived so high an opinion of his abilities, that he subsequently became his associate in several works in Florence, Pisa, and other cities in the state. After an absence of seven years, he was enabled to return to Bologna, through the influence of Lodovico Caracci, who highly esteemed him, leaving behind him a few paintings executed in his first easy style, resembling that of Passignano. The following admirable account is condensed from Lanzi: "In such a style (of Passignano) he conducted his first work at Bologna, of St. Barbara, in the church of S. Petronio, which failed to please the public. To give it greater attractions, he next proceeded to copy from, and to consult Lodovico Caracci—not to attain his manner, but to improve his own; for, though he sprung from another school, he profited as much by his example and advice as if Lodovico had really been his master. This was a short task to a man of genius, well grounded in the theory of his art, and perhaps more philosophical than any other artist in Bologna. He soon became a different painter, and in his novel taste of composing, of distributing his lights, and of expressing the passions, he shone like a disciple of the Caracci; still, he preserved a character distinct from the rest, grounded upon his naturally severe and melancholy disposition. With him, all is serious and moderate; the airs of his heads, his attitudes, and his draperies, varied with few but noble folds, such as excited the admiration of Guido himself. He avoided, moreover, very gay and animated colors, chiefly contenting himself with light violets or yellows, and tawny colors, tempered with a little red; but so admirably laid on and harmonized, as to produce the finest feeling of repose to enchant the eye. His subjects, too, were well adapted to his taste, generally pathetic or sorrowful, such as Magdalens penitent, St. Peters and Madonnas in grief, some of which drew tears from the beholders, and are held in high esteem. Subsequently he became expert in foreshortening, and in all the intricacies of the art, more particularly in point of invention. There is scarcely one of his works that does not exhibit a certain novelty and originality of idea. When he represented the Virgin in grief, in the church of S. Benedetto, he drew her seated together with St. John and the Magdalen; the one upright, the other kneeling, and intently contemplating the Redeemer's crown of thorns; other incidents of the Passion are alluded to; all are silent indeed, but every eye and attitude is eloquent in its silence. In his altar-piece of St. John and St. Jerome, in S. Maria Maggiore, he shunned the trite expression of drawing them in a glory; but he feigned an apparition, through which the holy doctor, intent on his studies, appears to receive lectures in theology from the beatified Evangelist. His most distinguished production, however, is a picture of St. Domenico raising a Man from the Dead, in the church of that Saint, painted in competition with Lionello Spada, a work abounding in figures varied in point of feature, attitude, and dress, and everything highly select. Lodovico expressed his astonishment at it, and declared that he knew no master then to compare with Tiarini. As he survived to his ninetieth year, his works are exceedingly numerous. He dwelt a long time at Reggio, whence he often proceeded to other cities of Lombardy, which possess many of his altar-pieces and cabinet pictures. The Modenese Gallery abounds with them, among which his St. Peter struck with remorse, as he stands outside of the prætorium, is more particularly extolled; the superb architecture, the depth of night lighted up by torches, Christ's judgment beheld in the distance, all conspire to raise the tragic interest of the scene. He was also employed by the Duke of Parma to decorate his garden with frescos from Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, which were much extolled, but no longer exist. In short, Tiarini, next to the Caracci, was one of the most eminent artists of the Bolognese school, at least in point of composition, expression of the features and of the passions, perspective, power and durability of coloring, if not of the most exact elegance."

Other admirable works by this artist in the churches at Bologna are the Marriage of St. Catherine, and the Annunciation, in S. Agnes; the Nativity, in S. Salvatore; St. Catherine kneeling before a Crucifix, in S. Maria Maddalena; and a Dead Christ in the lap of the Virgin, in S. Antonio. Tiarini was also an excellent portrait painter, was several years in the service of the Duke of Mantua, who sat to him, and appointed him to paint all the members of his family, which gained him so much applause that all the nobility of Mantua flocked to him to be commemorated by his pencil. He died in 1668.

TIBALDI, PELLEGRINO, called PELLEGRINO DA BOLOGNA, an eminent Italian painter and architect, was born, according to Lanzi, at Valdelsa, in the Milanese, in 1527. He was taken to Bologna at a very early age, and was subsequently placed under the instruction of Bartolomeo Ramenghi, called Il Bagnacavallo. After copying some pictures of Giorgio Vasari in S. Michele in Bosco, and a few other select pieces, he went to Rome in 1547, and devoted his principal attention to the works of Michael Angelo. According to Baglioni, he executed a picture of the Archangel Michael, for the Castel St. Angelo, which gained him great reputation. He afterwards painted the ceiling of the chapel of St. Denis, in the church of S. Luigi de' Francesi, representing a battle, composed in a grand style; also, in concert with Marco da Siena, he painted the ceiling of the Capella Rovere, in the church of La Trinità de Monti, from the cartoons of Daniello da Volterra. The Cardinal Poggi was so highly pleased with these works, that he employed Tibaldi to ornament his villa near the Porta del Popolo, with some admirable works in fresco, and afterwards sent him to Bologna, to employ his architectural talents upon his own palace, now the Palazzo dell' Instituto, which is considered one of Tibaldi's principal works. Within this palace he executed several subjects from the Odyssey, which are more highly commended by Vasari than the works he executed in the chapel of his patron in S. Giacomo Maggiore, although the latter were most esteemed by the Caracci, particularly his pictures of St. John in the Desert, and the Division of the Just and the Unjust, upon which those eminent artists and their pupils bestowed a great deal of study. They evince the greatest art of composition, and form a most admirable school of design and expression. He painted almost entirely in fresco; consequently his oil pieces are very rare. His style was principally formed upon the models of Michael Angelo—vast, correct in drawing, bold and happy in the foreshortenings, yet at the same time tempered with so much mellowness and softness, as to induce the Caracci to denominate him the "Reformed Michael Angelo." Lanzi says, "at the great merchants' hall at Ancona Tibaldi exhibited, in his picture of Hercules, the true method of imitating the terrible in the style of Michael Angelo, which consisted in a fear of too nearly approaching him. At Loretto, and different other adjacent cities, he produced other histories, less celebrated perhaps, but all nearly as deserving of the burin as those at Bologna. Such is the Entrance of Trajan into Ancona, in possession of the Marquis of Mancinforte; and various exploits of Scipio, which decorate the halls of Marchese Ciccolini. It is a work conceived in a more refined and graceful taste than we meet with in other compositions of Tibaldi; and of the same composition I have seen some of his pictures on a very small scale; but rare, like all his pieces in oil; wrought with the exquisite finish of a miniaturist; mostly rich in figures, full of fine spirit, vivid coloring, and decorated with all the pleasing perspectives that architecture could afford."

According to Lanzi and others, Tibaldi relinquished painting about 1566, and did not touch the easel for twenty years. It is not known who instructed him in architecture, but he gained great distinction in that art, first at Bologna, in erecting the Palazzo dell' Instituto, for the Cardinal Poggi. He afterwards designed the Palazzo della Sapienza, or Collegio Borromeo, at Pavia; erected the church of S. Lorenzo, and that of the Jesuits, at Milan; the famous Loggia, at Ancona; the church of the Madonna, near S. Celso, at Bologna; restored the Archiepiscopal palace at Milan; and was appointed chief architect of the Cathedral in 1570; also engineer of the Milanese State. He designed the façade of that celebrated edifice, combining the Gothic and Greek styles, which has obtained for him about an equal amount of praise and blame. Tibaldi visited Genoa, and erected a number of excellent works in that city, among which the house of the Jesuits, called the "Casa Professa," with its church, is esteemed his best performance. A Genoese critic thus praises this work. "A more than irregular situation, surrounded by narrow streets, was the area presented to Tibaldi, although the society required vast and commodious arrangements. Such, however, was the ability of the architect, that, in devoting the best part of the ground to a very elegant church, he did not omit the least convenience with regard to the other parts. Every difficulty disappeared before him, and in such a manner that it seemed as if he had chosen the situation himself. Commodious offices, a large and light refectory, noble corridors, with excellent and well arranged rooms, a beautiful internal chapel, a large hall for recreation, and a magnificent library; an ample and commodious surgery, with a court and other conveniences, are unanswerable arguments that he not only possessed an uncommon genius, with an exquisite taste in decoration, but that he had a thorough knowledge of all that is required for the comfort and convenience of a great society. The building of the church is the most conclusive evidence of the sublimity of his talents, and his singular knowledge of decoration and proportion. It is divided into three naves. The large lateral chapels of the cupola are preceded by two others on each side, with smaller cupolas; as has also the other beyond the large chapel opposite the small door which leads to the side aisles. The proportions between the height, width, and length, are superior to any in Genoa. The principal decorations consist of the pilasters being encrusted with marbles, the base of which rests on the pavement at the presbytery, and the others on a simple plinth. What, however, is most astonishing, is the ingenious manner in which the principal entablature, with a majestic pediment, forming a portion of a circle, supported by six columns of black and yellow marble of Porto Venere, is continued over the great altar. These columns are each of a single block, and though lower than the pilasters, are beautifully proportioned, together with the architrave, frieze, and cornice, which is continued over the pilasters with admirable effect. The exterior façade is in equally good taste, and is carried up, perhaps judiciously, only to the first order, since the narrowness of the street would have prevented the second from being seen to advantage."

The fame of Tibaldi gained him, in 1586, an invitation from Philip II. of Spain to visit that country. He was employed both in architecture and painting; Milizia briefly states that he rebuilt the old royal palace, and several other works. Having expunged the unsuccessful productions of Federigo Zuccaro, in the lower cloister of the Escorial, by order of the king, he proceeded to paint several subjects in fresco, representing the Purification, the Flight into Egypt, the Murder of the Innocents, Christ tempted in the Wilderness, the Election of the Apostles, the Resurrection of Lazarus, the Expulsion of the Money-changers from the Temple, and the Resurrection of Christ. These works completely satisfied the king, being composed in a grand and copious style, the figures models of correctness, designed in a free and masterly style, with great attention to truth and nature. In the great church at Madrid are several pictures by Tibaldi, representing St. Michael with the Fall of the Angels, the Martyrdom of St. Lorenzo, and two very grand compositions of the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi, executed to replace those of Zuccaro. His most esteemed work in Spain, however, is the ceiling of the library, somewhat resembling Raffaele's School of Athens, where he has personified the Arts and Sciences, the four Doctors of the Church, with the ancient philosophers Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, and Seneca, accompanied with their characteristic attributes and insignia, with beautiful groups of children and figures supporting the cornice and festoons, in a variety of attitudes and foreshortenings; the whole designed with such grandeur and expression as prove him a worthy follower of Michael Angelo. After remaining nine years in Spain, Tibaldi returned to Italy, richly rewarded by Philip, who conferred upon him the title of Marquis of Valdelsa, his native place. The time of his death is variously stated; Zanotti makes it as early as 1591, but he did not return from Spain till 1595. It is therefore probable that Tiraboschi is correct, who says he died at Milan in 1598, aged 71.

TIBALDI, DOMENICO. This artist was the younger brother of Pellegrino T., born at Bologna in 1540; died in 1583. He acquired the elements of design in that city, and is said to have practiced the art of painting, but on very slender authority, as not even a single portrait is exhibited from his hand. As an architect and engraver, however, he attained great excellence. At Bologna he erected the Magnani palace, of two orders, without entablatures between, producing an harmonious unity: although the edifice is rather diminutive, it is arranged with such skill as to appear much larger than it really is. His chapel in the Cathedral was so greatly admired by Clement VIII., that he accounted it superior to any similar edifice in Rome. Among his other works at Bologna, are the great door of the city palace; the small church of the Madonna del Borgo; and the admired Dogana, or custom house, praised by Milizia as surpassing any other similar work.

As an engraver, Tibaldi executed a number of spirited etchings; Bartsch mentions only nine, as follow, but thinks there must be many more, as these exhibit such a skillful management of the burin as is only acquired by long practice.

1. The Repose in Egypt; from his own design. 2. The Holy Trinity; after Samacchini. 1570. 3. The Virgin with a Rose; after Parmigiano. 4. St. Francis of Assisi; copied from two prints by C. Cort; the landscape from one with the date 1567, and the figure from another with the date 1568, both after pictures by Girolamo Muziano. 5. The Penitent Magdalene; after Titian. 6. Peace; properly the Triumph of Peace; after his own design. 7. Portrait of Pope Gregory XIII.; after Pas- sarotti. 1572. 8. View of the grand Fountain in the Piazza Scaffieri at Bologna. 1570. 9. The Palace. This view of a magnificent palace, ornamented with columns and statues, is from a design of G. Alghisi. It is in two plates, with the date 1566; but Bartsch is of opinion that there should be a third plate to complete the composition, as only the left wing and centre are shown, and there are borders to the tops and bottoms and the left side, but none to the right.

TIDEMAN, or TIEDEMAN, PHILIP, an eminent painter, born at Hamburg in 1657. His father being in opulent circumstances, intended him for one of the learned professions, and gave him a liberal education; but Philip having a passion for painting, he permitted him afterwards to follow the bent of his genius, and placed him with Nicholas Raes, a respectable painter of history, with whom he studied eight years. The fame of Gerard Lairese next drew him to Amsterdam, where he became his disciple, and assisted him in the execution of some of his most important works. The talents he displayed recommended him to public notice, and on his leaving Lairese, he soon acquired a high reputation at Amsterdam, and was much employed in decorating the public edifices and the principal mansions of the nobility with historical and mythological subjects. In the composition and handling of his subjects, he followed the style of Lairese, and having had a classical education, he treated them with so much learning, judgment, and skill, that some of his compositions were regarded as models for the historical painters of his country. Among his most admired works was a saloon at Hoorn, painted for the family of Verschuur, in which he represented the leading incidents in the History of Æneas, with classical propriety, and great originality of invention. As he passed most of his life in Holland, he is ranked among the painters of the Dutch school. He died at Amsterdam in 1705.

TIEPOLO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an eminent painter, born at Venice in 1697. Lanzi says, "he was the last of the Venetian artists who acquired for himself a great reputation, and became celebrated in Italy, in Germany and in Spain." He studied under Gregorio Lazzarini, whose careful and academic style served to curb the natural impetuosity of his genius; he next studied the works of Gio. Battista Piazzetta, whose style he imitated for some time, as seen in his pictures of the Shipwreck of St. Satiro, in the church of S. Ambrogio at Milan. Lanzi says, "he subsequently became an assiduous imitator of Paul Veronese, whom, though inferior to him in the airs of his heads, he very nearly approached in his drapery and in his coloring. From the engravings also of Albert Durer, that store-house of composers, he derived no little advantage; he also diligently studied nature, in observing all the accidents of light and shade, and the contrasts of color best adapted to produce effect. In this branch he succeeded admirably, particularly in his frescos, for which he seems to have been endued by nature, with promptness, rapidity, and facility in great compositions. While others were accustomed to display the most vivid colors, he only availed himself in his frescos of what are termed low and dusky colors; and by harmonizing them with others of a common kind, but more clear and beautiful, he produced a species of effect, a sun-like radiance, unequalled perhaps by any other artist. Of this the grand vault of the Teresiani at Venice, presents a fine specimen.

He there represented the Santa Casa (Heaven), accompanied by numerous groups of angels finely foreshortened and varied, surrounded by a field of light, that appears to rise into the firmament. An artist who could produce such works on so grand a scale would have been truly great, had he succeeded in observing equal correctness in every part; in the whole, he always produces an agreeable effect. He is more correct and careful in his oil pieces, which are scattered throughout the metropolitan city, as well as the state."

Tiepolo acquired an immense reputation, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Venice, Rome, Milan, Padua, and other cities. He was also invited to the courts of Vienna and Madrid. He decorated the New Palace in the latter city with several splendid frescos, which were so much admired by the public, as to excite the jealousy of Mengs, then the popular court painter at Madrid, in the height of his celebrity, who severely criticised his works as defective in design, fantastical in composition, and meretricious in coloring. He was also attacked by Cochin and others, but he was ably defended by his friends Rossetti and Algarotti. "Where there is smoke there must be fire," and we may doubtless take the account of the ever candid and judicious Lanzi as just and true. There are about sixty etchings by this master, executed with taste, neatness, and spirit, from his own designs, among which are a set of twenty-four fancy subjects, another of ten fancy subjects of smaller size, besides single plates after his principal works, of which the Adoration of the Magi is esteemed the best. An admirable account of his works at Madrid may be found in Cumberland's Catalogue of Paintings in the royal palaces at Madrid. He died at Madrid in 1770. Zanetti says he died in 1769, aged 77; others place his birth in 1693.

TIEPOLO, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, was the son of the preceding, born at Venice about 1725. He was instructed by his father, whose manner he followed. He painted some works of his own for the churches of Brescia and other places, but chiefly wrought in conjunction with his father, whom he accompanied to Spain, and assisted in his works in the Palace at Madrid. He is supposed to have died there in or about 1795. We have about 100 spirited etchings by this artist, mostly from his own designs, and after the works of his father, executed in a style resembling that of Benedetto Castiglione, among which are the following:

A set of twenty-seven plates of the Flight and Repose of the Holy Family in Egypt. The Passion of Christ; in fourteen plates. A set of twenty-six Heads; in the style of Benedetto. The Virgin appearing to St. Theresa; after Gio. Bat. Tiepolo. St. Ambrose preaching to the People; do. A set of eight pieces of Satyrs, Turks, and Arabs.

TIEPOLO, LORENZO, was the youngest son of Gio. Battista T., by whom he was instructed in art, and whose style he followed both in painting and engraving. He etched quite a number of plates from his own designs, and after the works of his father. No further particulars are recorded of him.

TIERENDORFF, JEREMIA VAN, a Flemish painter, of whom little is known. He flourished at Ypres about 1626, where are two pictures by him; one representing Christ delivering the Keys to St.

Peter, in the church of St. Peter, and another of the Nativity, in the church of St. James.

TILBURG, EGIDIUS or GILES VAN, called THE ELDER, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1570, according to Balkema. He was a cotemporary of David Teniers, the Old, and painted similar subjects, as village wakes and festivals, conversations, and peasants regaling themselves, which were esteemed in his day. He settled at Brussels, where he died in 1622.

TILBURG, GILES VAN, THE YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding, born at Brussels in 1625. It is said that he received his first instruction from his father, at whose death he became the scholar of the younger Teniers, at the same time that Francis du Chatel studied with that master; and that he followed the style of Teniers with such success, that the latter had for some time the mortification to see the works of his pupil preferred to his own. The last assertion is probably as correct as the first, for his father died when he was only seven years old, David Teniers was fifteen years his elder, and one of his pictures is now worth more than a dozen of Tilburg's. It is more probable that he studied with Brower, or rather, his pupil, Craesbecke, whose style he more closely followed. He painted similar subjects to Teniers, as assemblies of boors, fairs, feastings, cabarets, conversations, corps-de-garde, &c., but they bear no resemblance to his style. In his coloring he approached nearer the manner and tints of Brower, but in his pencil and touch he was infinitely less spirited and delicate. He had a good knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, and gave his figures and objects a fine relief, though some of his pictures are too dark. His works however are held in high estimation in his own country, and are admitted into the choicest collections. His name is sometimes written Tilborch and Tilborgh. He died in 1678.

TILIUS, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Bois-le-Duc. He painted portraits and conversations in the highly polished manner of Terburg. There are no particulars recorded of him.

TILL, JOHN CHARLES VAN, a German engraver, whose prints date as early as 1644, and who died in 1676. He was chiefly employed in engraving small portraits and other book-plates.

TILLARD, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1740. He studied with Fessard, whom he greatly surpassed. His works are very numerous, chiefly book plates, executed in a very neat, pleasing style. The following are among his principal illustrative prints. He was living in 1786.

A portion of the views in Choiseul-Gouffier's Voyage de la Grèce. The Vignettes for an edition of Tasso; after Cochin. The figures for the quarto edition of Telemachus; after Monnet. The greater part of the prints for the Travels of the Abbé Chappe in Siberia. A suite of Savoyards, with the title "Mes Commissionnaires, mes Gens," &c. A Portrait of Pope Clement XIV.; after D. Porta. Hagar in the Desert; after J. Vernet. Russian Shepherds; after le Prince.

TILLEMANS, PETER, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1684. He is said to have excelled in copying the works of other masters, particularly the battles of Borgognone, and the landscapes of Teniers, in which last he preserved much of the freedom and spirit of the originals. He also painted landscapes with small figures, sea-ports, and views of his own composition or from nature, which were esteemed. He went to England in 1708, where he found considerable employment in painting views of country seats, huntings, and races, in which last he excelled, as he painted horses in great perfection. He was much patronized by the Duke of Devonshire and Lord Byron. He died at Norton, in Suffolk, in 1734.

TILLEMANS, SIMON PETER, a German painter, born at Bremen in 1602. Little is known of his early history. He went to Italy, where he acquired so much reputation as a landscape and portrait painter, that he was invited to Vienna by the Emperor Ferdinand, whose portrait he painted, as well as other members of the Imperial family, and the most distinguished personages of the court. He died there in 1670.

TILLIARD, F., a French engraver, who flourished at Paris about 1760. He engraved some portraits, executed with the graver, in a neat, finished style.

TILSON, HENRY, an English painter, who studied, according to Lord Orford, with Sir Peter Lely, till the death of that master, when he went to Rome in company with Dahl. After a residence there of seven years, he became an excellent painter of portraits in oil and crayons, but unhappily he went crazy, and shot himself. This happened about 1687, in the 36th year of his age.

TIMANTHES, an eminent Grecian painter, a native of Sicyon or Cythnos, was cotemporary with Zeuxis and Parrhasius, and flourished about B. C. 400. His works were distinguished particularly for their invention and expression, and it was one of the chief merits of his invention, that it suggested much to be supplied by the imagination of the spectator. Pliny says that, though in execution always excellent, his execution is invariably surpassed by his conception. As an instance of the ingenuity of his invention, that author mentions a picture of a Sleeping Cyclops, painted upon a small panel, but in which the painter had conveyed a perfect idea of the giant's huge size, by adding a few satyrs measuring his thumb with a thyrsus. Another work by Timanthes was the Stoning of Palamedes, the victim of Ulysses' revenge for having proclaimed his apparent insanity to be feigned; it was painted with such powerful expression, that Alexander shuddered when he beheld it at Ephesus. His most celebrated work, however, was that in which he bore away the palm from Colotes of Teos—the Sacrifice of Iphigenia. The tender and beautiful virgin was represented standing before the altar, awaiting her doom, and surrounded by her afflicted relatives. Much has been written concerning the propriety of Agamemnon's face being covered with his mantle in this picture. Quintilian, Cicero, and some modern critics, have supposed that the artist, having represented Calchas sorrowful, Ulysses much more so, and having expressed intense sorrow in the countenance of Menelaus, was in consequence compelled to conceal the face of the father. This criticism, however, can hardly be received, since Timanthes, whose greatest forte was expression, would certainly not have omitted such an admirable opportunity of displaying his powers, had he not been aware of the manifest impropriety of representing the father in any other manner than precisely that described. It is well known that the ancients considered the expression of severe grief indecorous, and that when they found themselves unable to repress their emotions at severe affliction, they concealed the face with the mantle. Moreover, notwithstanding many things might combine to render his presence indispensable at the sacrifice, it would be unnatural to suppose that Agamemnon could be an eye witness to his own daughter's immolation; although firmly convinced that his presence was necessary to sanction the dreadful deed, he could not look upon it. Timanthes' picture of a Hero, in the Temple of Peace at Rome, was so perfect in its proportions, and so majestic in its expression, that it appeared to reach the utmost height of the ideal. He competed with Parrhasius at Samos, and gained the victory; the subject of the painting was the Contest of Ajax and Ulysses for the Arms of Achilles.

TIMBRELL, H. This sculptor was born at Dublin in 1806. He studied under John Smith, and went to London in 1831, where he worked as an assistant in the studio of E. H. Baily for many years; at the same time studying his art in the Royal Academy, having become a student of that institution. In 1837 he obtained the gold medal for the best work in sculpture, "Mezentius tying the Living to the Dead," and in 1843 was elected travelling student, which he gained by his group of "Hercules throwing Lichas into the Sea." In 1845 he executed a beautiful group of a mother and two children, life-size, representing "Instruction." He was also engaged upon several important commissions, when he died at Rome, in 1849.

TIMOMACHUS, an eminent Greek encaustic painter, and a native of Byzantium. In the common text of Pliny, he is said to have flourished in the time of Julius Cæsar (Julii Cæsaris ætate); but Durand, in his Histoire de la Peinture Ancienne, &c., expresses an opinion that the word ætate is an addition of the copyist. According to Pliny, Cæsar purchased two pictures in encaustic by this artist, for eighty Attic talents (about $80,000), one representing Ajax the son of Telamon brooding over his misfortunes; the other, Medea about to destroy her children; both were dedicated in the temple of Venus Genetrix. The latter work was unfinished, which puts it beyond a doubt that it was not purchased of the painter himself; from a passage in Cicero (In Verr., i. iv. c. 60), it seems equally clear that both were purchased of the city of Cyzicus; and the enormous price of the pictures is only paralleled by the sums paid for the works of artists long before deceased. Pliny elsewhere mentions him, together with the more ancient and celebrated painters of Greece, with Nicomachus, Apelles, and Aristides; and it is quite probable that Timomachus lived cotemporaneously with Pausias, Nicias, and other encaustic painters, about B. C. 300. The two pictures above mentioned have been much celebrated by the poets; there are several epigrams upon them in the Greek Anthology, and in Ovid (Trist., ii. 525).

Utque sedet vultu fassus Telamonius iram,
Inque oculis facinus barbara mater habet.

"Ajax the son of Telamon is seated, showing his anger by his countenance; and the barbarous mother betrays by her eyes the intended crime." The unfinished picture of Medea was admired more than any of the finished works of Timomachus, as was the case with the Iris of Aristides, the Tyndaridæ of Nicomachus, and a Venus of Apelles. Pliny mentions also the following works by this artist: an Orestes; an Iphigenia in Tauris; Lecythion, a gymnasiast; a "cognatio nobilium"; two philosophers or others, with the pallium, about to speak, one standing, and the other sitting; and a very celebrated picture of a Gorgon.

TIMOTEO, DA URBINO. See VITE.

TINELLI, CAV. TIBERIO, an eminent painter, born at Venice in 1586. He first studied with Giovanni Contarini, and afterwards with Leandro Bassano, whose style he imitated. According to Ridolfi, he not only copied the works of Bassano, but imitated him so successfully in design, coloring, and handling, that some of his works are attributed to that master. He, however, abandoned historical painting for portraiture, in which branch he became the most eminent artist of his time. Lanzi says that he eclipsed his master Contarini, so famous in portraits, and that Pietro da Cortona, on beholding one of them, exclaimed that Tiberio had not merely infused into it the whole soul of the original, but added his own. He acquired an immense reputation, and found abundant employment at Venice, Rome, and Florence, among persons of the highest distinction, at his own prices. He treated his subjects in a novel manner, different from any other painter of his time. He generally represented his sitters under characters selected from sacred and profane history, and the classic poets, which, without injuring the likeness, gave interest to his pictures. Thus he represented Spinelli as Mark Antony, and his wife as Cleopatra, about to drink the dissolved pearls; young and beautiful females he portrayed as Aurora, Diana, Hebe, and other poetical deities and nymphs. He sometimes left his pictures unfinished, except the heads, or enveloped a part of the bust in clouds or wrapt it in drapery, at the desire of the parties, to diminish the price. He settled at Florence, where he lived, greatly respected, till some domestic calamity deprived him of his reason, when he opened a vein and expired, in 1638, aged 52. Among his historical works are mentioned, the Salutation of the Virgin, the Last Supper, and a Paradiso (Heaven), with a multitude of figures, executed so much in the style of Jacopo Bassano that they might be attributed to that master.

TINGHIUS, A. M., an artist who flourished about 1760, mentioned by Basan and Strutt as the engraver of a print of the Temptation of St. Anthony, from a drawing by Callot. Zani says he is the same as Antonio Meitinghius, a Florentine engraver, who flourished in 1627.

TINTI, CAMILLO, an Italian engraver, born at Rome about 1738. He engraved several plates after the Italian masters. He was employed by Gavin Hamilton, during his residence at Rome, to engrave several plates for his Schola Italica Picture.

TINTI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Parma, according to Affò, about 1550. He studied with Orazio Samacchini, at Bologna, but forming an acquaintance with the younger Caracci, he became attached to the school of Lodovico. He afterwards accompanied Annibale to Rome, where he resided some time. Lanzi says that he studied Tibaldi with great assiduity, and painted upon his model at S. Maria della Scala at Bologna, not without marks of plagiarism. "He subsequently established himself in his native city, where he selected for his chief model the works of Correggio, and next proceeded to study those of Parmigiano. The city contains many of his productions, both in public and in private, among which the Assumption, abounding with figures, in the Cathedral, and the Catino (Dome) at the Old Capuchin Nuns, are accounted some of the last grand works belonging to the old school of Parma."

TINTI, LORENZO, a painter born at Bologna, according to Zani, in 1626, and died in 1672; others place his birth in 1634, and his death about 1700. He studied with Gio. Andrea Sirani, in whose style he executed several altar-pieces and other works, for the churches at Bologna, the principal of which are the Scourging of Christ, in La Madonna del Piombo; and the Virgin and Infant, with several Saints, in S. Tecla. He etched several plates after the works of Elizabeth Sirani, Guido, Francesco Stringa, and others.

TINTORE, CASSIANO, FRANCESCO, and SIMONE DEL, three painters of Lucca, brothers, who were scholars of Pietro Paolini, and flourished in their native city in the latter part of the 17th century. Lanzi says, "Cassiano did not rise above mediocrity, and when one meets with an indifferent picture of the school of Paolini, it is usual to ascribe it to Cassiano. Francesco is recognized as an able artist in the Visitation of the Virgin, in the apartments of the Gonfaloniere, and pieces in the Motroni collection. Simone was expert in depicting birds, fruit, flowers, and other objects in the inferior walks of the art."

TINTORELLO, JACOPO, a painter of Vicenza, who flourished in the 15th century. Little is known of him. There are some of his works in the public edifices of Vicenza. Lanzi says he strongly resembles Vittore Pisanello in his style of coloring, though inferior to him in point of design, and that his picture of the Savior crowned with Thorns, at Santa Corona, reflects credit upon his school.

TINTORETTO, IL, or GIACOMO ROBUSTI. The name of this distinguished painter was Giacomo or Jacopo Robusti, but he was called Il Tintoretto because he was the son of a dyer. He was born at Venice, according to Ridolfi, in 1512. From his infancy, he discovered a passion for painting, which exhibited itself by his sketching upon the walls, with a piece of charcoal, everything that struck his fancy. His father, though very poor, far from curbing this propensity, encouraged him, had him instructed in the rudiments of design, and at length placed him as a disciple of Titian. How long he remained with that master is not known; Ridolfi says only ten days, which is evidently an error, as the best authorities agree that he studied with him long enough to thoroughly imbibe his principles of coloring, and to make such progress in design as to qualify him to pursue his studies without any further instruction. It is generally stated that he made such rapid progress, and showed such extraordinary genius, that Titian soon became jealous of his talents and banished him from his studio. Tintoretto had then arrived at manhood, and this unworthy treatment, instead of disconcerting him, only inspired him with the ambition and determination to rival his instructor. Lanzi gives the following admirable account of his course after this event. "He did not aspire, like many of his fellow-pupils, to the name of a follower of Titian; he burned with the ambition to become the head of a new school, which should carry the manner of that artist to perfection, adding to it all that was yet wanting; a vast idea, the offspring of a grand and fervid genius, as bold as it was great. Not even banishment from his master's school could damp his ardor. Constrained by circumstances to confine himself to an inconvenient apartment, he ennobled it with specimens of his early studies. Over the door he wrote, 'Michael Angelo's design, and the coloring of Titian'; and as he was an indefatigable imitator of the latter, so he was equally studious, both day and night, in copying the models taken from the statues of the former at Florence. To these he added many more of ancient statues and bassi-relievi. In a catalogue of ancient pieces of sculpture, cited by Morelli, is recorded a head of Vitellius, upon which he says Tintoretto was always employed in designing and learning. He was frequently in the habit of designing his models by lamp-light, the better to obtain strong shades, and thus acquire skill in the use of a bold chiaroscuro. With the same view, he wrought models in wax and plaster, and having draped them carefully, he adapted them to little houses made of paste-board and pieces of wood, supplying them through the windows with small lights, by which he might thus regulate his own lights and shades. He suspended the models themselves from the ceiling by means of cords, placing them in a variety of positions, and designing them from different points of view, the better to acquire a mastery of foreshortening as seen from below—a science then not so familiar to his school as to that of Lombardy. Nor did he neglect the study of anatomy by dissection, to obtain a thorough knowledge of the muscles and the structure of the human frame. He designed also the naked parts from life, as much as possible, in various shortenings and attitudes, in order to render his compositions as diversified as nature herself. By these studies he prepared himself to introduce the true method to be pursued by his followers, beginning with designing from the best models, and after having obtained the idea of a correct style, proceeding to copy the naked parts, and to correct their defects. To similar aids, he united a genius which extorted the admiration of Vasari, one of his severest critics, who pronounced it the most terrible of which the art could boast—an imagination fertile in ideas, and a pictorial fire which inspired him with vigor to conceive well the boldest character of the passions, and continued to support him till he had given full expression to them upon his canvass.

"Yet, what is the noblest genius, what are all the rarest qualities meeting in a single artist, without diligence, a virtue which of itself, says Cicero, seems to include all the rest? Tintoretto possessed it for a period, and produced works in which the most captious of critics could not find a shade of defect. Such is the Miracle of the Slave, adorning the college of St. Mark—a piece he executed in his 36th year, and which is held up as one of the wonders of Venetian art; the colors are Titian's, the chiaroscuro extremely strong, the composition correct and sober, the forms select, and the draperies studied; while equally varied, appropriate, and animated beyond conception, are the attitudes of the men assisting at the spectacle, in particular of the saint who lies to succor, giving an idea of the swiftness of an aerial being. There, too, he painted other beautiful pieces, whose merit extorted from the lips of Pietro da Cortona these words: 'Did I reside in Venice, not a festival should pass without still resorting to this spot, to feast my eyes with such objects, and above all with the design!' His picture of the Crucifixion, in the College of S. Rocco, engraved by Agostino Caracci, is also esteemed a picture of extraordinary merit, displaying so much novelty upon a hackneyed subject. Nor are other examples wanting of his surpassing powers in the same place, filled with pictures as various as new; but for brevity, I shall only record the Supper of our Lord, now at the Salute, having been removed from the refectory of the Crociferi, for which it was painted. Those who beheld it in its place, write of it as a miracle of art, inasmuch as the construction of the place was so well repeated in the picture, and imitated with such knowledge of perspective, as to make the apartment appear double its real size. Nor are these three works, to which he affixed his name as his favorite productions, the only ones worthy of his genius; Zanetti enumerates many more, conducted with the most finished care, all exhibited to the Venetian public, without including those dispersed throughout the cities of Europe.

"But diligence is rarely found long united to a rage for achieving much; the true source in this instance, as in numerous others, of false, or at least, inferior composition. Hence Annibale Caracci observed that in many pieces Tintoretto was inferior to Tintoretto, while Paul Veronese, an ardent admirer of his talents, was in the habit of reproaching him with doing injustice to the professors of the art, by painting in every manner, a plan that went far, says Ridolfi, to destroy the reputation of his profession. Similar exceptions will be found to apply to such of his works as, conceived at a heat, executed by habit, and in great part left imperfect, betray certain errors, both in point of judgment and design. Sometimes there appears a crowd of superfluous or badly grouped figures, and most generally all in the most energetic action, without any spectators regarding them in quiet, as was practiced by Titian, and all the best composers. Neither in these figures are we to look for that senatorial dignity which some discover in the works of Titian.

"Tintoretto aimed rather at liveliness than at grace, and from the studied observation of the people of his native state, perhaps the most spirited in Italy, he drew models for his heads as well as his attitudes, sometimes applying them to the most important subjects. In a few specimens of his Suppers, the apostles might easily be taken for gondoliers, just when their arm is raised, ready to strike the oar, and with an air of native fierceness, they raise the head to ridicule or dispute. He likewise varied Titian's method of coloring, making use of primary grounds no longer white and composed of chalk, but shaded, owing to which his Venetian pictures have felt the effects of time more than the rest. Neither was the choice nor the general tone of his coloring the same as Titian's; the blue or the ash-colored being that which predominates; one which assists the effect of the chiaroscuro as much as it diminishes the amenity of the whole. In his fleshes there appears a certain vinous color, more particularly in his portraits. The proportions of his bodies are also different; he does not affect the fulness of Titian; he aims more at lively action than the latter, and sometimes attenuates his figures too much. The least correct portion of his pictures is the drapery, few of them being free from those long and straight folds, or flying abroad, or in some other way too common and obvious. It would be useless to insist on his want of judgment, or rather his pictorial extravagance."

Lanzi, after having animadverted upon Vasari's terrible criticisms and wholesale condemnation of his works, proceeds: "He ought to have tempered the severity of his criticisms, however, by admitting that, if the author of that great work (the Universal Judgment at S. Maria dell' Orto) had bestowed as much pains upon the several parts as upon the whole, it would have been a magnificent production. Even in those pictures in which he wished to display the talent, as it were, of an improvisatore, he still vindicated his title to the name of a great master, in the command and rapidity of his pencil, in the manifestation of original powers, where he seems to triumph in his play of light, in the most difficult foreshortenings, in fanciful inventions, in relief, in harmony, and in the best supported of his pieces, even in the beauty of his tints. But his sovereign merit consisted in the animation of his figures, it being a universal opinion, that has almost acquired the force of a proverb, that the power of action ought to be studied by artists in Tintoretto. Upon this point, Pietro da Cortona used to say that, if we observe the whole of those pictures which have been engraved, no artist will be found equal to him in the pictoric fire which he infused into his forms. He flourished for a long period, exerting his talents till he could with difficulty make a catalogue of his works, still giving the rein to his divine ardor in many pieces of great size, or abounding with a great variety of actors."

Few artists have encountered such a storm of criticism as Tintoretto, and yet his best works have always extorted the admiration of his severest critics. The impetuosity of his genius, and the extraordinary promptness of his hand, together with an ardent desire of embracing every opportunity of distinguishing himself, induced him to paint several large works for the convents and churches of Venice almost gratuitously, as on several occasions, the prices he received were little more than enough to defray the expense of the materials. It is therefore not to be wondered at that he gave Annibale Caracci occasion to observe that Tintoretto was sometimes equal to Titian, and at others inferior to himself. Of the merits of his works he was fully sensible, as he particularly distinguished three of them, which he and others regarded as his masterpieces, viz., the Crucifixion in S. Rocco; the Last Supper, now at S. Maria della Salute; and Il Servo, or the Venetian Slave, condemned to Martyrdom by the Turks, invoking the protection of St. Mark. The last is regarded as his masterpiece; it was carried to Paris by the French, but restored in 1815. Some of his works are of enormous size; the Crucifixion is forty feet in length; and two others, the Israelites worshipping the Golden Calf, and the Last Judgment, are each about sixty feet high, filled with figures drawn in a grand style, with powerful coloring and masterly execution. Tintoretto also excelled in landscape and portraiture. He painted both in oil and fresco; most of his great works are executed in fresco. A just idea of his merits can only be formed by contemplating his numerous pictures in the churches, convents, public edifices, and palaces at Venice. Most of his works elsewhere only exhibit his infirmities. Ridolfi asserts that he finished some of his oil paintings almost as highly as miniatures, and Lanzi says there are not wanting at Venice specimens to prove so improbable a story. He retained his powers to a great age. One of his last productions was his Paradiso in the hall of the Great Council Chamber of S. Marco, an immense composition, abounding in figures, which Lanzi says was greatly esteemed by the Caracci. He was probably the most expeditious painter that ever appeared: of this a memorable instance is related. The members of the confraternity of S. Rocco, at Venice, desired Paul Veronese, Tintoretto, Salviati, and Zuccaro to prepare each a design for a picture to represent the Apotheosis of their patron Saint, or as some say of the Crucifixion, for their selection. On the day appointed for their decision, instead of a design, Tintoretto sent in a finished picture, so admirably executed as to extort the commendation of his competitors, who termed him Il furioso Tintoretto, un fulmine di Pennello (the furious Tintoretto and the lightning of the pencil). Sandrart says that he frequently painted without any preparatory design, as if he only sported with his pencil, and he seems to have executed his ideas almost as quickly as he conceived them. He wrought so fast, and at so low a price, that few of the other painters at Venice could get employment. The churches and halls of the different communities are overloaded with his productions. That of St. Roch alone contains above sixty pictures of sacred subjects by him, exhibiting such an extraordinary combination of beauties and defects as sets all criticism at defiance. There is a single etching by this great painter, from his portrait of the Doge Pacale Cicconia. He died at Venice in 1594, aged 82 years.

TINTORETTO, DOMENICO ROBUSTI, usually called DOMENICO TINTORETTO, was the son and disciple of the preceding, born at Venice in 1562. Lanzi says that none conferred greater credit upon the school of Tintoretto than his son Domenico. "He trod in the steps of his father, but like Ascanius following Æneas, 'non passibus æquis.' Still he boasts much resemblance in his countenances, in his coloring, and in harmony, but there is a wide distinction in point of genius, though some of his most spirited pieces have been ascribed to his father, or at least suspected of having been chiefly indebted to his hand. Many works, however, upon a large scale, are attributed to the son; those which he filled with portraits are by far the most commended, his merit in that branch having been thought by Zanetti equal to that of his father. One of these is to be seen in the college of S. Marco, where, as in the rest of his compositions, the figures are disposed with more sobriety than those of Jacopo, as well as finished with more care, and with more enduring colors. As he grew older, his style degenerated somewhat into that of a mannerist, which at that time much prevailed. By these distinctions, his productions may be frequently known from those of his father, and we may be able to refute the assertions of dealers, who, to obtain a higher price, indiscriminately attribute them to Jacopo. Yet Domenico produced many pieces, more especially portraits, for different collections, besides some mythological and scriptural histories, which he sometimes signed with his name, as in his picture of a penitent Magdalen, boasting such exquisite tints, adorning the Campidoglio." His principal works are in the Sala di Consiglio, and in the Scuola di S. Marco at Venice. He was very eminent in portraits, and painted many of the most distinguished personages of his time. His works must be numerous, as he continued to exercise his pencil till his death, in 1637, aged 75.

TINTORETTO, MARIETTA ROBUSTI, was the daughter of Jacopo, born at Venice in 1560. She was instructed by her father, and displayed great talents in portraiture. She painted many of the principal personages of Venice, and acquired so much distinction that she was invited to the courts of both Vienna and Madrid, which honors she declined on account of her attachment to her father, who idolized her, and could not bear to be separated from her. She died in the flower of her life, in 1590.

TIO, FRANCESCO, called FRANCESCO TIO DA FABRIANO. See FABRIANO.

TIODAS, a Spanish architect, very eminent and meritorious for his time, who flourished in the 9th century, in the reign of Alphonso the Chaste. About A. D. 840, by order of that monarch, he erected at Oviedo, the basilica of S. Salvador, with two other churches at the sides, one to the Madonna, the other to St. Miguel. The basilica was demolished in 1380, to make room for the present Cathedral, but the two others remain. That of Santa Maria is one hundred feet wide, divided into three naves, with six arches, all on pedestals; the great chapel and the two collateral ones are well proportioned, and adorned with famous marbles. The entrance to S. Miguel is from the Cathedral, by a flight of twenty-one steps, to a hall twenty feet high; from which twelve steps descend to a church ornamented with many delicate works, twenty-five feet long and sixteen wide, the vault of which, although resting on the walls, appears supported by six columns of different marbles, over which are the twelve Apostles, two to each column. Tiodas also built the royal palace at Oviedo, thus highly praised by King Alphonso in his Chronicles: "Cujus operis pulchritudo plus præsens potest mirari quàm eruditus scriba laudare." The church of S. Julius, erected by him without the walls, is said by Milizia to be a magnificent edifice, more resembling modern Greek than Gothic. Among the other works of this celebrated architect, were the churches of S. Maria and S. Miguel, at a short distance from Oviedo, erected by the desire of Don Ramiro, successor of Alphonso the Chaste. They are very highly praised by Milizia, particularly the latter, which he commends for its harmonious arrangement, and beautiful proportions. Tiodas was very highly honored, and richly rewarded by King Alphonso.

TISCHBEIN, JOHN HENRY, called THE ELDER, one of the most eminent painters of the last century, was the fifth son of a baker of Hayna, near Gotha, where he was born in 1722. He was first apprenticed to an uncle on his mother's side, who was a locksmith; but he displayed so much talent for drawing, that an elder brother, John Valentine, took him away from his uncle and placed him, in his fourteenth year, with a paper stainer and decorator of Cassel, named Zimmermann. He received, also, some instruction from van Freese, the court painter at Cassel, and soon gave proof of his ability. Tischbein met with an early and valuable patron in Count Stadion, through whose assistance he was enabled, in 1743, to visit Paris, where he remained five years with Charles Vanloo, and acquired his style of painting. From Paris he proceeded to Venice, and there studied eight months with Piazzetta; from Venice he went to Rome, where he remained two years; he again visited Piazzetta in Venice, and after a short time, in 1751, he returned to Cassel, where, in 1752, he was appointed cabinet painter to the Landgrave.

Tischbein excelled in historical and mythological subjects, which are his best pictures, painted from about 1762 to 1785. Many of his subjects are taken from the ancient poets, and some from Tasso; several of which are now in the Gallery at Cassel. He painted also a collection of female portraits, selected chiefly for their beauty, which is now in the palace of Wilhelmsthal, near Cassel. He also frequently copied his own pictures; but nearly all his works remain in his own country, on which account he is little known out of it. Of all the great galleries in Germany, the Pinacotheca at Munich is the only one that possesses a specimen of his works, and that is only a portrait. He painted very slowly, but was very industrious; generally commencing work at five o'clock in the morning, in the summer-time, and remaining at his easel until four o'clock in the afternoon. He painted in the French style; his coloring was a mixture of the French and Venetian, and in large compositions very gaudy; but his drawing and chiaro-scuro were excellent. In costume, like many of the Venetian painters, he was extremely incorrect; according to the critics, he generally contrived, in his ancient subjects, to make his actors look much more like Frenchmen and Germans than Greeks or Romans. In his religious pieces he was more successful: he was no follower of Lessing's theory of beauty, and considered beauty of little consequence.

Tischbein was chosen a member of the Academy of Bologna, and Director of the Academy of Cassel, which office he held at the time of his death, in 1789. In 1797, a biographical notice, with criticisms on his works, was published at Nuremberg, containing a list of one hundred and forty-four historical pictures by him, among which the following have been considered the best: the Resurrection, very large figures, painted in 1763, for the altar of St. Michael's church at Hamburg; the Transfiguration, in the Lutheran church at Cassel, 1765; Hermann's Trophies after his Victory over Varus, in the palace of Pymont, 1768; ten pictures of the life of Cleopatra, painted in the palace of Weissenstein, 1769-70; sixteen from the life of Telemachus, in the palace of Wilhelmsthal; an Ecce Homo, in the Roman Catholic chapel of Cassel, 1778; a Deposition from the Cross, and an Ascension, altar-pieces in the principal church of Stralsund, 1787; Christ on the Mount of Olives, an altar-piece presented by him to the church of his native place Hayna, 1788; the Death of Alces-tis, 1780; and the restoration of Alcestis to her husband by Hercules, 1777.

Tischbein was a man of very domestic habits: he had an old servant named Conrad Otto, without whom he used to say he would be perfectly helpless; he had a cook, also, who lived with him twenty-one years. Although twice married, he was a husband scarcely four years; he married his first wife in 1756, by whom he had two daughters; he lived with her three years, when she died; in 1759 he married her sister, with whom, however, he lived only a few months. His elder daughter Amalia, was a talented paintress; she was accustomed to sit to her father for many of the females in his historical works; the Academy of Cassel elected her a member of their body in 1780. After Tischbein's death, the Landgrave of Cassel purchased all the works that were in his house, and placed them together in the palace of Wilhelmshohe. There are a few etchings by this artist from his own designs, among which are the following. Venus and Cupid; Cupid stung by a Bee, complaining to Venus; Nymphs bathing; Hercules and Omphale; Menelaus and Paris; Thetis and Achilles; The Resurrection, after the picture he painted for the church of S. Michael at Hamburg.

TISCHBEIN, JOHN HENRY WILLIAM, called THE YOUNGER, the youngest son of John Conrad Tischbein, and nephew of the preceding, with whom he is sometimes confounded, was born at Hayna in 1751. He was instructed in historical painting by his uncle John Henry of Cassel; after which he studied landscape painting three years with his uncle John Jacob at Hamburg; in 1770 he went to Holland, where he remained two years, and in 1772 returned to Cassel and painted portraits and landscapes; he visited also Hanover and Berlin, and painted many portraits in both places. In 1779 he left Cassel, by the desire of the Landgrave, for Italy, but he spent about two years in Zurich, where he painted many portraits, and made the design of his celebrated picture of Conradin of Suabia, playing, after his sentence to death, a game of draughts with Frederick of Austria. In 1781, Tischbein arrived at Rome, where his first studies were some copies in oil after Raffaele and Guercino, and some drawings after Raffaele, Domenichino, and Leonardo da Vinci. His first original picture was Hercules choosing between Vice and Virtue; after which he painted his picture of Conradin of Suabia, now in the palace of Pymont. In 1787 he went to Naples, and the next year painted the portrait of the crown prince for the queen, who presented Tischbein with a valuable snuff-box and 200 ducats, expressing her complete satisfaction with the picture. His reputation rapidly increased, and in 1790 he was appointed director of the Neapolitan Academy, with a salary of 600 ducats. In 1799, at the breaking out of the French Revolution, he lost his post, but was allowed by the French authorities to return to Germany with his effects, consisting principally of the plates of his illustrations of Homer, his designs for Sir W. Hamilton's second collection of Vases, and some other works of art; and after a troublesome journey of four months, he reached Cassel in safety.

After his return to Germany, Tischbein resided principally at Hamburg, and at Eutin, in Oldenburg, near Lubec. His drawing was correct, and his expression and coloring good; he chiefly excelled in drawing animals. Most of his pictures are in the possession of the Grand Duke of Oldenburg; the following are three of his most celebrated works: Ajax and Cassandra, painted in 1805; "Let the little children come unto me," painted in 1806, for the altar of the church of S. Angari at Bremen; and Hector taking leave of Andromache, painted in 1810. He also painted the portraits of Klopstock, Heyne, and Blucher.—While residing at Naples, he published in 1796, a remarkable work on animals, in two parts, folio, entitled Têtes des différents Animaux, dessinés d'après Nature, pour donner une idée plus exacte de leurs caracteres. The first part contains sixteen designs of animals, and the first plate of this part is the celebrated design called in Italy, Tischbein's Laocöon, of remarkable power and spirit, representing a large snake attacking and destroying a lioness and her young in their den; the second part contains eight plates only, consisting of characteristic heads of men and gods—Correggio, Salvator Rosa, Michael Angelo, Raffaele, Scipio Africanus, Caracalla, Jupiter, and Apollo.

Tischbein's drawings for Sir W. Hamilton's collection of Vases, published at Naples in 1791, in 4 vols. folio, amount to 214: the work is entitled "A Collection of Engravings from Ancient Vases, mostly of pure Greek workmanship, discovered in Sepulchres in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, but principally in the environs of Naples, during the years 1789 and 1790; now in the possession of Sir W. Hamilton, published by William Tischbein, Director of the Royal Academy of Painting at Naples." The text, which is in French and English, is by Italinsky. In Gottingen, in 1801—4, he published in royal folio, his favorite work on Homer, with explanations by Heyne—Homer, nach Antiken gezeichnet von Heinrich Tischbein, Director, &c., mit erlauterungen von Chr. Gottl. Heyne, 1. VI.; each number containing six plates, the portraits of the Homeric heroes being engraved by Morghen. Tischbein also published other works, and etched several plates, after Paul Potter, Roos, Rosa da Tivoli, Rembrandt, &c. He died in 1829. There were several other artists of this family, of various degrees of merit; but they are unknown out of their own circles.

TISCHLER, ANTHONY, a German engraver, who flourished from about 1750 to 1775. He engraved among others, a part of the plates for the collection of prints, from the pictures in the collection of Count Bruhl.

TISIO, or TISI, BENVENUTO, called IL GAROFOLO. This eminent painter, ranked at the head of the Ferrarese school, was born in 1481. There is a good deal of discrepancy about him, which is thus explained by Lanzi: "Besides Benvenuto Tisio, surnamed Garofolo, from the place of his nativity, in the Ferrarese territory, there flourished at the same period, Gio. Battista Benvenuto, said by some to have been also a native of Garofolo, but called from his father's occupation, Ortolano (the Gardener); hence mistakes have been made as to his name, and our dilettanti have often been betrayed into errors, both from resemblance of name and style, so far as even to mistake the portrait of Ortolano for that of Tisio, and as such it is inserted in the edition of Vasari, published at Bologna. Several of the altar-pieces of the former have been transferred into the Roman galleries, where they are attributed to the latter, whose first manner, being more careful than soft and tasteful, may easily be mistaken for that of Ortolano.

"Tisio received his first education under Domenico Panetti, from whose school he went to Cremona and studied with Niccolo Soriani, his maternal uncle, and next under Boccaccio Boccaccino. On the death of Niccolo in 1499, he proceeded to Rome, where he resided fifteen months with Gian Baldini, a Florentine. Thence he traveled through various Italian cities, remained two years with Lorenzo Costa in Mantua, and then returning for a short time to Ferrara, finally proceeded back to Rome. These circumstances I relate, because there are a number of Benvenuto's works to be met with at Ferrara and elsewhere, which partake little or nothing of the Roman style, though not excluded as apocryphal, but attributed to his earlier age. After remaining a few years with Raffaello, (about two years according to most authors, and Lanzi himself says in another place, 'only a short time, but sufficient to enable him to become the chief of the Ferrarese school,') his domestic affairs recalled him to Ferrara. Having arranged these, he prepared to return to Rome, but at the solicitations of Panetti, and still more, by the commissions of Duke Alphonso, he remained in his native place and engaged with the Dossi in immense undertakings at Belriguardo and other places. It is observed by Baruffaldi, that the degree of Raffaellesque taste to be traced in the two Dossi, is to be attributed to Tisio. He conducted a great number of other paintings both in oil and fresco.

"The most happy period of Tisio dates from 1519, when he painted the Murder of the Innocents in S. Francesco at Ferrara; availing himself of earthen models, and copying draperies, landscapes, and in short, everything from the life. In the same church, is his Resurrection of Lazarus, and his celebrated Taking of Christ, commenced in 1520, and finished in 1524. No finer works appeared from his hand; nor better composed, more animated, or conducted with more care and softness of coloring; there only remains some slight traces of the fourteenth century in point of design, and some little affectation of grace,—if the opinion of Vasari be correct. The district formerly abounded with similar specimens of his works in fresco; and they are also met with in private, as that frieze in a chamber of the Seminary, which in point of grace and Raffaellesque taste is worthy of the burin. Many of his works in oil remain in the churches and private collections of Ferrara, at once so numerous and so beautiful as alone to suffice for the decoration of a city. His St. Peter Martyr, in the church of the Dominicans, supposed by some to have been painted in competition with Titian's great picture of the same subject, and in case of its loss, to have been able to supply its place, is a picture remarkable for its force; his Helen too, of a more elegant character, at the same place, is greatly admired, this gracefulness forming one of Benvenuto's most peculiar gifts. And indeed, not a few of his Madonnas, his Virgins, and his boys, which he painted in his softest manner, have occasionally been mistaken for the works of Raffaello. His picture of the Princes Corsini deceived good judges, as we are informed by Bottari, and the same might have happened with the portrait of the Duke of Modena, and others scattered throughout the Roman galleries, where are many of his pieces on a large scale, particularly in the Chigi palace. All these must be kept in view, in forming an estimate of the merits of Garofalo. His little pictures, consisting of scripture histories, are very abundant in different cabinets, the Prince Borghese alone being in possession of about forty; and although they bear his mark, a gilly-flower or violet, they were, I suspect, the productions of his leisure hours. Those in his style without this mark, are frequently the works of Pannelli, who was employed along with him; others are copies or repetitions by his pupils, who must have been numerous during so long a period." Lanzi in again briefly noticing him under the head of the Roman school says, "He imitated Raffaello in design, in the character of his faces, and in expression, and also considerably in his coloring, although he added something of a warmer and stronger cast, derived from his own school.—Rome, Bologna, and other cities, abound with his pictures from the lives of the Apostles. They are of various merit, and not wholly painted by himself. In his large pictures he stands more alone, and many of these are to be found in the Chigi Gallery. The Visitation of the Virgin, in the Palazzo Doria, is one of the finest pieces in that rich collection. This artist was accustomed, in allusion to his name, to mark his pictures with a violet (clove pink), which the common people of Italy call garofolo. It does not appear from Vasari, Titi, and Taja, that Garofolo had any share in the works executed by Raffaello and his scholars."

Tisio, though he devoted himself mostly to sacred history, was an universal painter. He was almost equal to Raffaele in portraits, and he occasionally painted landscapes in the highest excellence, two specimens of which are in the Palazzo Zampieri at Bologna. His works are extremely valuable, and scarcely to be found out of Italy. There is a fine specimen of his easel pictures in the English National Gallery, called the Vision of St. Augustine. He is generally called by the Italian writers Il Garofolo, from his mark, though some say, da Garofolo, from the place of his nativity, near Ferrara. It is generally stated that he was born at Ferrara. He had the misfortune to lose the sight of one of his eyes, yet he contrived to paint with as much beauty and correctness as ever, till his sixty-ninth year, when he became totally blind. He survived nine years, and died in 1559.

TITI, SANTO DI, an eminent Italian painter and reputable architect, was born at Città San Sepolcro, in the Florentine state, in 1538. According to Lanzi, he studied under Agnolo Bronzino and Cellini. He visited Rome, where Baldinucci says he entered the school of Baccio Bandinelli, and studied for a long time in that city. While residing there, he was employed upon some subjects in the chapel of the Palazzo Salviati, and painted a St. Jerome in S. Giovanni dei Fiorentini, besides executing several works in the Belvidere of the Vatican. By designing with great assiduity after the antique, and the works of the best masters, he returned to Florence with a style full of science and grace. Lanzi says "his beautiful is without much of the ideal; but his countenances exhibit a certain fullness, an appearance of freshness and health, that is surpassed by none of those who took nature for their model. Design was his characteristic excellence, and for this he was commended by his imitator, Salvator Rosa. In expression he had few superiors in other schools, and none in his own. His ornaments are judicious, and he introduced perspectives that imparted a dignity and a charm to his compositions. He is esteemed the best painter of this epoch, and belongs to it rather from the time in which he lived than his style; if we except his coloring, which was too feeble, and without relief." He seems to have devoted his chief attention to design and expression, and Borghini says that he was not deficient in coloring when he chose to exert his powers, as in the Feast of Emmaus, in the church of S. Croce at Florence, and in the Resurrection of Lazarus, in the cathedral at Volterra. There are also several of his works in the private collections at Florence, among which is his greatly admired Baptism of Christ by St. John, in the Palazzo Corsini, commended for its elegant and graceful composition, correct design, and vigorous coloring. Lanzi says that his picture of the Faithful receiving the Holy Spirit by the laying on of the Apostles' hands, may be viewed with pleasure, even after the three by Raffaele, which adorn that city.

It is not mentioned who was the instructor of Titi in architecture, but as Lanzi says he studied under Benvenuto Cellini, it is probable that he obtained a knowledge of the art from that master, although the latter principally employed his talents in sculpture. Titi's architectural works were principally distinguished for correctness in the proportions. Among the principal were the Villa Spini at Peretola; his own house, and the Casa Dardanelli at Florence. He was frequently engaged upon the decorations of splendid festivals, particularly those celebrated at the nuptials of the Duke de Bracciano. Titi was honored by the Florentines with the freedom of the city. He died in 1603.

TITI, TIBERIO, was the son of the preceding, born at Florence in 1578. He studied with his father, but chiefly devoted himself to portraiture, which he practiced with success. He had a singular talent for painting small portraits in vermilion (some say red lead), and was continually employed by Cardinal Leopold de Medici, who admitted them into his collection, which now forms a single cabinet in the Florentine Gallery. He was, however, capable of exercising his talents in a higher branch; he finished a picture of the Last Supper, began by his father and left incomplete at his death, in which he imitated the manner, touch, and tone of coloring so exactly, that it gained him general applause. He died in 1637.

TITIAN. The name of this illustrious painter was Tiziano Vecellio or Vecelli, and he is called by the Italians, Tiziano Vecellio da Cadore. He was descended of a noble family, and born at the castle of Cadore in the Friuli in 1477, and died in 1576, according to Ridolfi; though Vasari and Sandrart place his birth in 1480. Lanzi says he died in 1576, aged 99 years. He early showed a passion for the art, which was carefully cultivated by his parents. Lanzi says in a note, that it is pretty correctly ascertained that he received his first instruction from Antonio Rossi, a painter of Cadore; if so, it was at a very tender age, for when he was ten years old he was sent to Treviso, and placed under Sebastiano Zucati. He subsequently went to Venice, and studied successively under Gentile and Giovanni Bellini. Giorgione was his fellow-student under the last named master, with whom Titian made extraordinary progress, and attained such an exact imitation of his style that their works could scarcely be distinguished, which greatly excited the jealousy of Bellini. There is some little discrepancy among authors as to this period of Titian's history. It is universally stated that Giorgione was the first of the Venetian painters who broke through the dry and Gothic style that prevailed at that time in the Venetian school, and introduced a freedom of outline, a boldness of handling, a force of coloring, and a vigorous effect of chiaro-scuro before unknown; that Titian followed the manner of the Bellini till he saw the works of Giorgione, when he immediately changed his style; that when he was only eighteen years of age, he painted the portrait of the head of the noble family Barbarigo in so admirable a style that it excited universal admiration; that, soon afterwards, he was employed in conjunction with Giorgione to paint the two fronts of the Fondaco de Tedeschi, and that his portion of the undertaking was preferred to his competitor, and established his reputation. Now Giorgione was certainly Titian's fellow-pupil under Gio. Bellini, whom Durer pronounced the best painter of his time; and he was of the same age if Ridolfi's statement is correct, both being born in 1477. It is also stated by Ridolfi and others, that Titian painted in the labored style characteristic of the school in which he was bred, until, seeing the works of Giorgione, he resolved to change his style, and accordingly formed an acquaintance with that master, and painted in conjunction with him till the friendship was dissolved by jealousy, never afterwards to be renewed; that Titian's first works in his own original style were a picture of the angel Raphael conducting the young Tobias, and another of the Presentation in the Temple; and that on the death of Giorgione in 1511, he succeeded him in several important commissions in which he was employed. One of his most extraordinary early performances was a picture of Christ and the Tribute Money, painted in competition with Albert Durer, finished in the minute style of that master. Lanzi says that all his earliest productions were executed in a more minute and labored style than that of Durer. He further says that a few of his early portraits cannot be distinguished from those of Giorgione.—He also says that, "the first specimen he is known to have produced altogether in the Titian manner is preserved in the sacristy of St. Marziale, representing the Archangel Raphael with Tobias at his side, painted in the 30th year of his age." Here then we have a key to some important facts. Durer was in Italy twice—first in 1495, and next in 1506, in which year the Tribute Money must have been painted, and the Angel and Tobias in the following year 1507, or in 1510, according to the time of his birth. These facts are important, because they show that Titian did not manifest that precocity of genius claimed for him, except in imitation. He did not, like Giorgione, on leaving Bellini, strike out into a new, bold, and original style, but he followed in his course; and his own original manner was the result of a diligent study of nature, of patient labor, and mature judgment.

On the death of Giorgione, Titian rose rapidly into favor. He was soon afterwards invited to the court of Alphonso, Duke of Ferrara, for whom he painted his celebrated picture of Bacchus and Ariadne, and two other fabulous subjects, which still retained somewhat of the style of Giorgione. It was there that he became acquainted with Ariosto, whose portrait he painted, and in return the poet spread abroad his fame in the Orlando Furioso. In 1523, the Senate of Venice employed him to decorate the Hall of the Council Chamber, where he represented the famous Battle of Cadore, between the Venetians and the Imperialists—a grand performance, that greatly increased his reputation. This work was afterwards destroyed by fire, but the composition has been preserved by the burin of Fontana. His next performance was his celebrated picture of St. Pietro Martire, in the church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo, at Venice, which is generally regarded as his master-piece in historical painting. This picture was carried to Paris by the French, and subsequently restored by the Allies. Notwithstanding the importance of these and other commissions, and the great reputation he had acquired, it is said, though with little probability of truth, that he received such a small remuneration for his works, that he was in actual indigence in 1530, when the praises bestowed upon him in the writings of his friend Pietro Aretino, recommended him to the notice of the Emperor Charles V., who had come to Bologna to be crowned by Pope Clement VII. Titian was invited thither, and painted the portrait of that monarch, and his principal attendants, for which he was liberally rewarded. About this time, he was invited to the court of the Duke of Mantua, whose portrait he painted, and decorated a saloon in the palace with a series of the twelve Cæsars, beneath which Giulio Romano afterwards painted a subject from the history of each. In 1543, Paul III. visited Ferrara where Titian was then engaged, sat for his portrait and invited him to Rome. but previous engagements with the Duke of Urbino, obliged him to decline or defer the invitation. Having completed his undertakings for that prince, he went to Rome at the invitation of the Cardinal Farnese in 1548, where he was received with marks of great distinction. He was accommodated with apartments in the palace of the Belvidere, and painted the pope, Paul III., a second time, whom he represented seated between the Cardinal Farnese and Prince Ottavio. He also painted his famous picture of Danaë, which caused Michael Angelo to lament that Titian had not studied the antique as accurately as he had nature, in which case his works would have been inimitable, by uniting the perfection of coloring with correctness of design. It is said that the Pope was so captivated with his works that he endeavored to retain him at Rome, and offered him as an inducement the lucrative office of the Lead-en Seal, then vacant by the death of Frà Sebastiano del Piombo, but he declined on account of conscientious scruples. Titian had no sooner returned from Rome to Venice, than he received so pressing an invitation from his first protector, Charles V., to visit the court of Spain, that he could no longer refuse, and he accordingly set out for Madrid, where he arrived at the beginning of 1550, and was received with extraordinary honors. He was appointed a gentleman of the Emperor's bed-chamber, who conferred upon him the order of St. Jago, and made him a Count Palatine of the Empire. He did not grace the great artist with splendid titles and decorations only, but showed him more solid marks of his favor, by bestowing upon him life rents in Naples and Milan of two hundred ducats each, annually, besides a munificent compensation for every picture he painted. He also frequented his studio, and treated him with extraordinary familiarity. On one occasion, the pencil falling out of Titian's hand, Charles picked it up and presented it to the astonished painter, saying, "It becomes Cæsar to serve Titian." After a residence of three years at Madrid, he returned to Venice, whence he was shortly afterwards invited to Inspruck, where he painted the portrait of Ferdinand, king of the Romans, his queen and children, in one picture. Though now advanced in years, his powers continued unabated, and this group was accounted one of his best productions. He afterwards returned to Venice, where he continued to exercise his pencil to the last year of his long life.

Such is the contrariety of opinion among the most eminent critics as to the real powers and merits of this illustrious painter, that the learned Lanzi himself, accustomed to contemplate his works all his days, modestly declines entering the contest, but gives the following admirable summary from the best authorities. He says: "From the works he painted in the zenith of his fame, his critics have gathered the general idea of his style, and the greatest contest they have among themselves relates to his design. In this contest of opinion between true judges of the art, I shall decline interfering with my own, observing only, in justice to so extraordinary a genius, that if happier combinations had led him to become familiar with more profound maxims of design, he would probably have ranked as the very first painter of the world. For he would have been allowed to be the first and most perfect in design, as he is by all allowed to have no equal in coloring.

"By Mengs he is denied the title to rank among good designers, considering him in this respect an artist of ordinary taste, by no means familiar with the antique, however well he might have succeeded in its study, had he devoted his attention to it, possessing so very exact an eye in copying objects from nature. Vasari appears to be of the same opinion, where he introduces Michael Angelo observing, after viewing the Danaë of Titian, 'that it was a great pity the Venetian artists were not earlier taught how to design.'" The judgment formed of him by Tintoretto, though placed in competition with him, was less severe, namely, 'that Titian had produced some things which it was impossible to surpass, but that others might have been more correctly designed.' And among these more excellent pieces he might indisputably have included his St. Pietro Martire, in SS. Giovanni e Paolo, a piece, says Algarotti, 'which the best masters have agreed in pronouncing free from every shade of defect'; besides that fine Bacchanal, and a few others, ornamenting a cabinet of the Duke of Ferrara, and declared by Agostino Caracci prodigies of art, and the finest paintings in the world. Fresnoy was of opinion that in the figures of his men he was not altogether perfect, and that in his draperies he was somewhat insignificant; but that many of his women and boys are exquisite, both in point of design and coloring. This commendation is confirmed by Algarotti in respect to his female forms, and by Mengs in those of his boys. Indeed, it is almost universally admitted that in such kind of figures no artist was ever comparable to him; and that Poussin and Fiammingo, who so greatly excelled in this particular, acquired it only from Titian's pictures. Sir Joshua Reynolds also affirms, that 'although his style may not be altogether as chaste as that of other schools of Italy, it nevertheless possesses a certain air of senatorial dignity; and that he shone in his portraits as an artist of the highest character'; and he concludes by observing that he may be studied with advantage even by the lovers of the sublime.

"Zanetti assigns him the first rank in design among all the most distinguished colorists; asserting that he was much devoted to the study of anatomy and copying from the best antique; but supposes that he was not ambitious of affecting an extensive knowledge of the muscles, nor aimed at displaying an ideal beauty in his contours. For the rest, he adds that the Titian manner was uniformly elegant, correct, and dignified in its female forms and in its boys; elevated, great, and learned for the most part, in those of its men; while in testimony of his naked figures, he adduces the history pieces in the sacristy of La Salute, whose beauty of design appears to triumph, even in the extremities, while it boasts the rare merit of a striking acquaintance with the science of foreshortening, both appearing blended together. Had the historian been desirous of extending his notice to such works as are to be found in foreign parts, he might have added much valuable matter upon the subject of his bacchanals, and his pictures of Venus, one of which in the Florentine Gallery, was justly thought to vie with that of the Medici herself, the most exquisite triumph of Grecian art. For his skill in draperies, Zanetti further cites the example of his St. Peter, painted on an altar of the Casa Pesaro, with a very artificially wrought mantle, adding, that he occasionally sacrificed the appearance of the drapery, purposely to give relief to some neighboring object.

"Many critics have pushed the inquiries from the artist, into the peculiar character of his chiaro-scuro, and the most copious among these is Signor Zanetti, who devoted years to its examination. I select some of his observations, premising however that he left a large portion of them to the more studious, desirous themselves of developing them, in the works of Titian. And in truth, his pictures are the best masters to direct us in the right method of coloring, but like the ancient classics, that are equally open and equally the subjects of commentary to all, they are only of advantage to those who are accustomed to reflect. I have already mentioned the lucid clearness predominating in Venetian paintings, more especially in those of Titian, whom the rest adopted for their model. I then pronounced it to be the result of very clear primary grounding, upon which a repetition of colors being laid, it produces the effect of a transparent veil, and renders the tints of a cast no less soft and luscious than lucid. Nor did he adopt any other plan in his strongest shades, veiling them with fresh color when dry; renewing, invigorating them, and warming the confines that pass into the middle tints. He availed himself very judiciously of the powers of shade, forming a method not altogether that of a mere naturalist, but partaking of the ideal. In his naked forms, he cautiously avoided masses of strong shade and bold shadows, although they are sometimes to be seen in nature. They certainly add to the relief, but they much diminish the delicacy of the fleshy parts. Titian for the most part affected a deep and glowing light; whence, in various gradations of middle tints, he formed the work of the lower parts; and having very resolutely drawn the other parts, with the extremities stronger perhaps than nature, he gave to objects that peculiar aspect which presents them, as it were, more lively and pleasing than the truth. Thus, in his portraits he centres the chief power in the eyes, the nose, and the mouth, leaving the remaining parts in a kind of pleasing uncertainty, extremely favorable to the spirit of the heads, and to the whole effect.

"But since the variations of depth and delicacy of shades are insufficient, without the aid of colors, in this branch he likewise found for himself an ideal method, consisting of the use, in their respective places, of simple tints, copied exactly from life, or of artificial ones, intended to produce the illusion required. He was in the habit of employing only few and simple colors, but they were such as afforded the greatest variety and contrast; he knew all their gradations, and the most favorable moments for their application and opposition to each other. There appears no effort, no degree of violence in them, and that striking diversity of colors which seems to strive, one above another, for the mastery, as it were, has all the appearance of nature in his pictures, though really an effect of the most bold and arduous art. A white dress, placed near a naked figure, gives it all the appearance of being mingled with the warmest crimson, while he employed nothing beyond simple terra rossa, with a little lake in the contours, and towards the extremities. Certain objects, in themselves dark and even black, produce a similar effect upon his canvass; and which, besides enlivening the adjacent color, give force to the figures, wrought, as before stated, with gradual middle tints. It is said to have been his favorite maxim, transmitted to us by Boschini, that whoever aspires to become a painter, must make himself acquainted with three colors, and have them ready upon his palette, namely—white, red, and black; and that an artist, while attempting the flesh parts, must not expect to succeed at once, but by repeated application of opposite tints, and impasting of his colors.

"Here I shall subjoin some observations by the Cav. Mengs, who entered so deeply into the Titian manner. He pronounces him the first who, subsequently to the revival of painting, knew how to avail himself of the ideal, as it were, of different colors in his draperies. Before his time, all colors had been applied indifferently, and artists used them in the same manner for the clear and for the obscure. Titian was aware, if indeed he did not acquire this knowledge of Giorgione, that red brings objects nearer to the eye, that yellow retains the rays of light, that azure is a shade, and adapted for deep obscure. Nor was he less intimate with the effects of juicy colors, and was thus enabled to bestow the same degree of grace, clearness of tone, and dignity of color, upon his shades and middle tints, as upon his lights, as well as to mark with great diversity of middle tints, the various complexions and various superficies of bodies. No other artist, likewise, was more accurately acquainted with the mutual power or equipoise of the above three colors, upon which the harmony of pictures so much depends; an equipoise, too, so difficult in practice, to which not even Rubens, however excellent a colorist, perfectly attained.

“Both Titian’s inventions and compositions partake of his usual character; he produced nothing in which nature was not consulted. In the number of his figures he is inclined to be moderate; and in grouping them, he displays the finest unshackled art—an art he was fond of exemplifying by comparison with a bunch of grapes, where a number of single ones compose the figure of a whole, agreeably rounded, light through the openings, distinct in shades, in middle tints, and in lights, according as it receives more or less of the solar rays. No contrasts are to be met with in his compositions that betray a studied effect; no violent action that is not called for by the incidents of the story; the actors in general preserve their dignity, and a certain composure, as if each seemed to respect the assembly of which he formed a part. Whoever is attached to the taste of the Greek bassi-rilievi, in which all is nature and propriety, will invariably prefer the sober composition of Titian to the more fiery one of Paul Veronese and Tintoretto. Neither was Titian ignorant of those strong contrasts of limbs and action, then in such high vogue with his countrymen; but these he reserved for his bacchanals, his battle-pieces, and other subjects which called for them.

“It is admitted on all hands that as a portrait painter, he was quite incomparable; and to this species of excellence he was in a great part indebted for his fortune, smoothing, as it did, his reception into some of the most splendid courts of Europe. He was not less successful in depicting the passions of the mind. The Death of S. Pietro Martire, at Venice, and that of a devotee of St. Anthony, at Padua, display scenes than which I know not whether painting can afford us anything more terrific in the ferocity of those who strike, or more full of compassion in the whole attitude of the falling saint. And thus the grand picture of the Coronation of Thorns, in the Grazie at Milan, abounds with powers of expression that enchant us. He has also left us not a few examples of costume, and of erudition in the antique, every way worthy of imitation, as we may observe in the Coronation above mentioned, where, desirous of marking the precise period of the event, he inserted in the Prætorium a bust of Tiberius, an idea that could not have been better conceived either by Raffaello or Poussin. In his architecture, he sometimes availed himself of other works, particularly those of Rosa of Brescia; but his perspectives, like that of his Presentation, are extremely beautiful. He was equalled by none in landscape; and he was careful not to employ it as a mere embellishment, like some artists, who esteem themselves so highly in this particular, that they hardly scruple to present us with cypress trees growing out of the sea. But Titian always makes his landscapes subservient to history, as in that horrific wood, whose dreary aspect adds so much to the solemnity of St. Peter’s death; or to give force to his figures, as we perceive in those pieces where the landscape is thrown into the distance. His natural manner of representing the various effects of light, may be best gathered from the Martyrdom of St. Lorenzo, belonging to the Jesuits at Venice, in which he displayed such an astonishing diversity in the splendor of fire, in that of torch-lights, and in that of a supernatural light falling upon the martyr. He likewise expressed, with the utmost felicity, the time of the day in which the event is supposed to have taken place, and he frequently selected night-fall, drawing forth all its most beautiful attributes for the canvass.

“From the whole of this it may be inferred that Titian is not to be included in that class of Venetian artists whose rapidity of hand overpowered their judgment, rendering them somewhat careless and inaccurate; though at the same time we must speak of his celerity with some degree of reservation. A freedom of pencil must doubtless be granted him, and he thus applied it without failing in point of design, to his paintings in fresco, as they are to be seen at Padua, and which in some measure compensate us for the loss of those in the Venetian capital, in which city there is nothing of the same kind preserved, except, perhaps, his St. Christopher in the Ducal palace, a majestic figure, both in character and expression. We are not, however, to look for the same degree of freedom in his oil paintings. Indeed, he was by no means ambitious of displaying it, but rather encountered much painful labor to arrive at a perfect knowledge of his subjects. With this view, after throwing off a rough draught of his intended works, with a certain freedom and resolution, he was in the habit of laying them aside for some time, and again returned to them with an eye prepared to detect the least defect. The noble Casa Barbarigo, among a fine collection of his most highly finished pictures, preserves also a few of these first sketches. It is well known that he underwent extreme labor in the completion of his works, and at the same time was very solicitous to conceal the pains he bestowed upon them. Yet in some of his pieces, such spirited and resolute strokes of the pencil are to be met with, as seem to imprint upon every object the true character of nature, attain at once the points that have been long laboriously aimed at, and perfectly delight professors. To this practice he adhered in the zenith of his fame; nor was it till near the close of his life, that both his hand and his eyes failing him, his style became less elegant, being compelled to paint with repeated efforts of the brush, and with difficulty mingling his tints. Vasari, who saw him once more in 1566, even then was no longer able to recognize Titian in Titian, and it must have been more difficult in the few following years. Yet, as is customary with old age, he was not at all aware of his failings, and continued to receive commissions to the last year of his life. There remains at St. Salvatore one of these pictures, of the Annunciation, which attracts the spectator only from the name of the master. Yet when he was told by some one that it was not, or at least did not appear to have been, executed by his hand, he was so much irritated, that in a fit of senile indignation, he seized his pencil and inscribed upon it, “Tizianus fecit fecit.” Still the most experienced judges are agreed that much may be learned, even from his latest works, in the same manner as the poets pronounce judgment upon the Odyssey, the product of old age, but still by Homer. Several of these last specimens, distributed throughout private collections, are nevertheless doubtful, as well as some copies made by his pupils, but retouched by his hand; and in particular some Madonnas and Magdalens which I have seen in various places, displaying little or no variety. Upon this point we ought not to omit the account given by Ridolfi, of his having purposely left his studio open for the free access of his disciples, in order that they might secretly take copies of such pictures as he had placed there; that afterwards, when he found such copies became vendible, he retouched them with little trouble, and passed them for originals. The reporter of this incident added in a marginal note, 'behold what a degree of forecast!' and to this I might rejoin one of my own, 'note that the worth of Titian ought not to be estimated, as is too often the case, by this multiplication of originals.'

"Titian was by no means so excellent a master as an artist. Whether disliking the interruption and tediousness attaching to such a character, or apprehensive of meeting a rival, he was always averse to affording his instructions. He was extremely harsh with Paris Bordone, and even entered into decided hostility against him, an artist who burned with an ambition to resemble him. He banished Tintoretto from his studio, and artfully directed his own brother to mercantile pursuits, though he displayed uncommon talents for painting. 'Hence,' observes Vasari, 'there are few who can really be called his disciples, inasmuch as he taught little; but each learned more or less, according as he knew how to avail himself of the productions of Titian.' This great artist fell a victim to the plague in 1576, when within one year of completing a century."

In forming an estimate of Titian's design, it will be of service to compare the different systems practiced by different schools at the time he flourished. The system of the Venetian school was to paint everything from nature without the preparation of a cartoon; this method, though well calculated to give the painter greater promptness of execution, and a more commanding facility of hand, was also the means of introducing a want of correctness in design and purity of forms. On the contrary, the Roman and Florentine painters never painted a picture without having first prepared a model or cartoon, and corrected every figure by the antique. Titian, following the system of his countrymen, painted immediately from nature, and satisfied with its exact imitation, he was little sensible to ideal beauty of form, or to that elevated and dignified expression so essential to the higher order of historical painting. Tintoretto, on being banished from his school, immediately threw this in his teeth, by affixing over his door this inscription, "The coloring of Titian, and the design of Michael Angelo." Sir Joshua Reynolds says, in his Discourses, "Raffaello and Titian seem to have looked at nature for different purposes; they both had the power of extending their view to the whole; but one looked for the general effect produced by form, the other, as produced by color. We cannot refuse to Titian the merit of attending to the general form of his object as well as color, but his deficiency lay—a deficiency, at least, when compared with Raffaello—in not possessing the power, like him, of correcting the form of his model by any general idea of beauty in his own mind." In short, it may now be considered an established fact, that Titian justly ranks as the greatest colorist of modern times, but in design he was far inferior to many other painters of the Roman, Florentine, and even of his own school. In fact, he has been accused of occasional anachronisms in his historical works. He neither presents us, like Raffaello and Poussin, as a faithful historian, the precise locality of the scene, the strict costume of the time or country, nor the accessories best suited to the development of his subject. See Raffaello.

Most writers observe that Titian had four different manners, at as many different periods of his life; first that of Bellini, somewhat stiff and hard, in which he imitated nature, according to Lanzi, with a greater precision than even Albert Durer, so that "the hairs might be numbered, the skin of the hands, the very pores of the flesh, and the reflection of objects in the pupils seen:" second, an imitation of Giorgione, more bold and full of force; Lanzi says that some of his portraits executed at this time, cannot be distinguished from those of Giorgione: third, his own inimitable style, which he practiced from about his thirtieth year, and which was the result of experience, knowledge, and judgment, beautifully natural, and finished with exquisite care: and fourth, the pictures which he painted in his old age. Sandrart says that, "at first he labored his pictures highly, and gave them a polished beauty and lustre, so as to produce their effect full as well when they were examined closely, as when viewed at a distance; but afterwards, he so managed his penciling that their greatest force and beauty appeared at a more remote view, and they pleased less when they were beheld more nearly; so that many of those artists who studied to imitate him, being misled by appearances which they did not sufficiently consider, imagined that Titian executed his work with readiness and masterly rapidity; and concluded that they should imitate his manner most effectually by a freedom of hand and a bold pencil; whereas Titian in reality took abundance of pains to work up his pictures to so high a degree of perfection, and the freedom that appears in the handling was entirely effected by a skillful combination of labor and judgment, and a few bold, artful strokes of the pencil to conceal his labor."

The works of Titian, though many of his greatest productions were destroyed by terrible conflagrations at Venice and Madrid, are numerous, scattered throughout Europe, in all the royal collections, and the most celebrated public galleries, particularly at Venice, Rome, Bologna, Milan, Florence, Vienna, Dresden, Paris, London, and Madrid. The most numerous are portraits, Madonnas, Magdalens, bacchanals, Venuses, and other mythological subjects, some of which are extremely voluptuous. Two of his grandest and most celebrated works are the Last Supper in the Escorial, and Christ crowned with Thorns at Milan. It is said that the works of Titian, to be appreciated, should be seen at Venice or Madrid, as many claimed to be genuine elsewhere are of very doubtful authenticity. He painted many of his best works for the Spanish court, first for the Emperor Charles V., and next for his successor, Philip II., who is known to have given him numerous commissions to decorate the Escorial and the royal palaces at Madrid. Palomino reports that when the palace of the Prado was burned, the king on learning the disaster, earnestly demanded if the Titian Venus had escaped, and on being told that it was one of the few that had been saved, he exclaimed, "then every other loss may be supported." There are numerous duplicates of some of his works, considered genuine, some of which he is supposed to have made himself, and others to have been carefully copied by his pupils and retouched by himself; he frequently made some slight alterations in the backgrounds, to give them more of the look of originals; thus the original of his Christ and the Pharisees, or the Tribute Money, is now in the Dresden Gallery, yet Lanzi says there are numerous copies in Italy, one of which he saw at St. Saverio di Rimini, inscribed with his name, which is believed to be a duplicate rather than a copy. There are more than six hundred engravings from his pictures, including both copper-plates and wooden cuts. He is said to have engraved both on wood and copper himself, but Bartsch considers all the prints attributed to him as spurious, though a few of them are signed with his name, only eight of which he describes. There are two of his works in the English National Gallery, namely, the Bacchus and Ariadne, and the Rape of Ganymede; the Gallery of the Louvre boasts about twenty of his compositions, including portraits. Although Titian spent much time abroad, he was exceedingly attached to Venice, where he lived in great splendor, and maintained the rank due to his genius and reputation. For the lives of Titian's son, brother, and relatives, see Vecelli.

TITO, POMPILO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Rome, according to Prof. Christ, about 1685, and marked his plates with the initials P. T., and the date. He does not specify any of his prints.

TIVOLI, ROSA DA. See Roos.

TIZIANELLO. See TIZIANO VECELLI.

TIZIANO IL. See GIROLAMO DANTE.

TIZIANO, MARCO DI. See MARCO VECELLI.

TOBAR, DON ALONSO MIGUEL DE, an eminent Spanish painter, born at Higuera, near Aracena, in 1678. According to Bermudez, he went to Seville, and studied with Juan Antonio Faxardo, a painter of little note. He afterwards diligently studied and copied the works of Murillo, and became so exact an imitator of his style, in composition, heads, expression, coloring, handling, and every other peculiarity, that not only his copies, but his own compositions, have frequently been attributed to that master. One of his most celebrated copies is in the church of Santa Maria la Blanca at Seville, representing the Virgin, St. Joseph, and the Infant Jesus and St. John, which was considered a genuine production by Murillo till it was discovered that the original was in the Royal Palace at Madrid. In the church of S. Isidora at Seville, are two pictures representing the Good Shepherd and the Infant St. John, which Stanley says "are copies by him with variations, of the two originals by Murillo, so well known in England, formerly in the collection of Sir Simon Clarke, but now in those of the Baroness Rothschild, and the National Gallery." Probably the fathers of St. Isidora would dispute this assertion. It is said that he copied many of the easel pictures of Murillo, and that many of them, even in his time, were passed for originals. Of his original compositions, the most deserving of notice are the Virgin enthroned, holding the Infant in her lap, attended by Sts. Francisco and Antonio, called Our Lady of Consolation, in the cathedral of Seville, and the Divine Shepherdess, in the Queen of Spain's gallery, in which the Virgin is represented as a shepherdess feeding lambs with roses. He excelled in portraits, and painted many of the most distinguished personages of his time. In 1729 he succeeded Teodoro Ardemans as painter to Philip V., when he removed to Madrid, where he practiced his profession with great distinction till his death in 1758.

TOBIN, J., an English artist, who flourished about 1770. He etched some plates of landscapes, and executed some tinted plates after Both, Ostade, and other masters.

TOCQUÉ, JEAN LOUIS, a French painter, born at Paris in 1696. He first studied under Nicholas Bertin, and afterwards with Hyacinth Rigaud. He acquired distinction as a portrait painter, and was made a member of the Academy at Paris, and invited by the Empress Elizabeth, to the court of St. Petersburg, where he met with the most flattering encouragement. The Empress appointed him her painter, and he painted her portrait and those of the most distinguished personages of her court. He died in 1772.

TOEPUT, LOUIS, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1550. According to Descamps, he went young to Italy, where he passed the rest of his life. He was a versatile artist, and particularly excelled in landscape; he also painted Italian fairs, markets, and similar subjects, which were well designed, spiritedly touched, and finely colored. He was called in Italy Lodovico di Trevigi, after the place where he chiefly resided. He was living in 1604.

TOGNONE, ANTONIO, called also ANTONIO DA VICENZA, a painter of Vicenza, who studied with Zelotti. He is highly commended by Ridolfi for his uncommon talents, but he died in the flower of his life. There are several frescos by him in the churches at Vicenza.

TOL, DOMINICK VAN, was the nephew and disciple of Gerard Douw, and one of the most successful imitators of his style and subjects. He copied some of the works of his uncle so closely, that they might easily be mistaken for the originals, by the inexperienced. Stanley says that some of these copies, under his own name, have brought at public sale in England, prices varying from £150 to £350 sterling. He was not so successful in his original compositions, though some of his interiors, conversations, and domestic subjects, are highly wrought up and well colored. He was living in 1680. The Dutch writers mention David and Peter van Tol, but they are doubtless identical with Dominick, as he seems to be called by some simply van Tol, and by others, variously, Dominick, David, and Peter van Tol, the same history being applied to each.

TOLEDO, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Lorca, in Murcia, in 1611. According to Palomino, he was the son of Miguel de Toledo, an obscure artist, who instructed him in the rudiments of the art. Bermudez however says that he served in the army in his youth, distinguished himself for his gallantry, and was made a captain of dragoons. He went to Italy, and first studied under Aniello Falcone at Naples, afterwards proceeding to Rome, where he became the disciple and friend of Angelo Cerquozzi, called delle Battaglie.

On his return to Spain, he established himself at Granada, where he distinguished himself as a painter of battles and sea-fights, executed in the manner of Cerquozzi. His small easel pictures are numerous, spiritedly executed and highly esteemed. He also painted history, and there are some of his works in the churches at Granada, Murcia, Madrid, and Alcalá de Henares, the most esteemed of which is the Assumption of the Virgin, in the Colegio de San Esteban at Murcia, and the Conception, in the church of las Monjas, at Madrid. He was not so successful in his sacred subjects as in his battle-pieces. He died in 1665.

TOLEDO. See GIOVANNI BATTISTA

TOLMEZZO, DOMENICO DI, a painter of Udine, who flourished in the latter part of the 15th century. There is an altar-piece, painted in several compartments, and a picture of the Madonna, in the cathedral of that city, signed with his name, and dated 1479. Lanzi says they are executed so much in the Venetian style, that one might believe him to have been a disciple of that school.

TOLOSANO. See JEAN BARON.

TOMBE, NICHOLAS LA, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1616. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went young to Italy, and passed several years at Rome, diligently studying nature, and designing after the beautiful remains of antiquity, which abound in that city and its environs. He painted landscapes and architectural pieces, but his usual subjects were conversations and assemblies of both sexes habited in the Italian costume. He was fond of introducing into his designs the ruins and remains of ancient edifices, caves, grottos, and antique sepulchres, whenever his subject would admit of them. His situations are agreeably chosen, his distances recede with a pleasing degradation, his coloring is lively, his pencil free and spirited, and he decorated his pictures with numerous small figures, correctly designed and spiritedly touched. He also painted small portraits with success. On returning to his own country, he settled at Amsterdam, where he acquired considerable reputation and employment. He died there in 1676.

TOMKINS, PELTRO WILLIAM, an English engraver, born at London in 1760. He studied under Bartolozzi, whose manner he followed with distinction. He engraved several plates of portraits and other subjects after the eminent English painters of his time, but his best plates are those he executed for the publications, entitled "The British Gallery of Pictures," being a selection of the choicest pictures of the old Dutch and Italian masters in the possession of the English nobility and gentry; and that of the "Stafford Gallery." Some of these were printed in colors, and for beauty and delicacy of tint, are almost equal to highly finished drawings. He also engraved the illustrations for a splendid edition of "Thomson's Seasons," and other similar publications. His prints are beautifully and tastefully executed in the chalk and dotted manner. He died in 1840.

TOMKINS, WILLIAM, an English landscape painter, born in London about 1730. He was much employed in painting views of gentlemen's seats in England. His principal patron was the Earl of Fife, for whom he painted several views of his estate in Scotland. He also copied some of the landscapes of Hobbema, and other Dutch painters.

In 1763, he obtained the second prize of twenty-five guineas for a landscape, from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., and on the institution of the Royal Academy, he was elected an Associate. He died in 1792. He had two sons who were reputable painters in the same line.

TOMMAZI, TOMMASO, a fresco painter, born at Pietra Santa, who flourished about the middle of the 18th century. He was a scholar of the Melani. Lanzi says he was a man of vast conceptions, worthy of his masters, whom he succeeded, after their death, in several important commissions. One of his finest works is the ceiling of the church of S. Giovanni in Pisa.

TOMOLIUS, LUCA, an Italian engraver, whose name is affixed to a small portrait of F. Lælius Contesino, executed with the graver in a coarse style.

TOMS, W. H., an English engraver of little note, who flourished about 1740. He engraved several views and architectural subjects, a few portraits, and some book plates, indifferently executed.

TOMS, PETER, an English painter, supposed to have been a son of the preceding. He studied under Hudson, was elected one of the first forty Royal Academicians, and held a situation in the Herald's Office. His chief excellence lay in his drapery, for which reason he was much employed in that department by Sir Joshua Reynolds. He went to Dublin, to practice portrait painting, but not meeting with any success, he put an end to his life, in a fit of despondency, in 1776.

TONDUZZI, GIULIO, a painter born at Faenza, who flourished in the first half of the 16th century. He was a pupil of Giulio Romano, whose style he followed with distinction. There is a fine picture by him, of the Stoning of St. Stephen, in the church of S. Giovanni at Faenza, which has been attributed by some to his master; and another large altar-piece of the same subject, in the church of S. Stefano at Ravenna. He executed several works for the churches and public edifices of his native city, in competition with all the most distinguished artists of Faenza, who flourished at that time.

TONELLI, GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Florence, who flourished from about 1668 to 1718. He first studied with Jacopo Chiavistelli in his native city, and then went to Bologna, and became the disciple of Tommaso Aldrovandini. He acquired considerable distinction as a painter of perspective and architecture, and was employed in decorating several of the churches and public edifices at Florence and elsewhere.

TONI, MICHAEL ANGELO, a painter born at Bologna in 1640, and died there in 1708. He acquired considerable reputation for his copies and imitations of the great Italian masters, painted in small, for which he had a happy talent.

TONNO, a Sicilian painter, born in Calabria. According to Hackert, he was originally a servant to Polidoro da Caravaggio, who, perceiving in him a genius for painting, instructed him in the art. He painted a picture representing the Epiphany, in the church of S. Andrea, at Messina, in which he introduced the portrait of his master, and which evinces uncommon talent. His name is rendered infamous by the foulest ingratitude and the blackest crime—he murdered his benefactor to possess himself of his money, and was executed in 1543.

TOORVLIET, JAMES, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1641. It is not known under whom he studied, but after acquiring considerable reputation as a portrait painter, he was induced to accompany his friend Nicholas Rosendael to Italy in 1670. On his arrival at Rome, he was inspired by a desire to distinguish himself as a painter of history. He made the works of Raffaele his model in design, and studied them with enthusiasm. He next proceeded to Venice, where he was equally assiduous in contemplating the works of Titian, Tintoretto, and Veronese. After a residence of six years in Italy, he returned to his native city, where he commenced his new career with the most sanguine expectations; but he was sadly disappointed, for though he wrought in the Italian style, designed correctly, and colored sweetly, his works were not agreeable to his countrymen, so that he was obliged to return to portraiture. He frequently painted family groups in conversation, in which he was remarkable for judicious disposition of his figures, correctness of design and agreeable style of coloring. His name is sometimes erroneously written Torenfliet. He died in 1719.

TOPINO-LEBRUN, FRANÇOIS JEAN BAPTISTE, a French historical painter, was born at Marseilles in 1769. His first master is not mentioned, but he visited Rome, and studied painting for some time. He there formed an intimacy with David, imbibing his political opinions; and on returning to Paris, he entered the school of that master. He made excellent progress until the Revolution broke out, and then, like his instructor, forsook the easel for the stormy career of politics and violence. His operations for several years after, are a matter of French political history; but in 1797 he resumed the pencil for a short time, and produced his admirable picture of the Death of Cains Gracchus, which gained a prize at the exhibition, and was purchased by government for the Museum of Marseilles. He subsequently figured among the Jacobins, and in 1800, when the conspiracy against Bonaparte's life was discovered, he was accused and condemned to death, but probably unjustly, since the Biographie Universelle states that all the charges against him were reduced to a single one, namely, that the sculptor Ceracchi had previously said that Topino possessed a poniard intended to kill the First Consul; and Ceracchi, when brought before the judges, revoked his declaration. The career of the accused, however, marked him as dangerous to the ambition of Bonaparte, and he accordingly suffered death in the year 1801. His large picture of the Siege of Lacedæmon, he did not live to complete.

TORBIDO, FRANCESCO, called IL MORO, a painter generally stated to have been born at Verona, about 1500, Zani says in 1504; but he was probably born earlier, as it is agreed that he studied a short time with Giorgione, who died in 1511. He afterwards became the pupil of Liberale da Verona. Lanzi says he was a distinguished follower of the tints of Giorgione, and a true imitator of the diligence and design of Liberale, and that he was deficient in nothing, except perhaps we could wish to see somewhat greater freedom of hand. He was a severe critic upon himself, and spared no labor to perfect his works in every part; hence they are very rare. He painted a few altar-pieces and other pictures for the churches, the most remarkable of which are several frescos representing the Life of the Virgin, and the best of these is the Assumption, which Lanzi pronounces truly admirable; but the designs are not his, Giulio Romano having prepared for him the cartoons. There is an admired picture by him in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Venice, representing the Transfiguration. His easel pictures of sacred subjects are more frequently to be met with in the collections at Verona and Venice. He also excelled in portraits. He finished all his works with extraordinary neatness and precision, was one of the best colorists of his time, and had an excellent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro. He lived to a great age, and died about 1581, though the accounts are contradictory on this point; Fuseli says he died in 1522, aged 82 years, a palpable error, as Giulio Romano would have been only 32 at his death. Others say he died in or about 1581, aged 81.

TORELLI, CESARE, a Roman painter, who studied under Giovanni de' Vecchi, and was one of the numerous artists employed in the Vatican in the pontificate of Sixtus V., about 1585. Lanzi briefly notices him as a second class artist. He executed several works in fresco, in the Vatican, in the Scala Santa, and in St. John of Lateran. There are two Sibyls by him, larger than life, in the church of La Madonna del Orto, which are considered his finest works. He also wrought in mosaic. He died in 1615.

TORELLI, FELICE, a painter born at Verona, according to Zanotti, in 1667, or to Zani in 1670. He first studied under Santo Prunato in his native city, and afterwards with Gio. Gioseffo dal Sole at Bologna. Lanzi says he followed the style of Prunato in a great measure. He became a painter of strong character, fine chiaro-scuro, and no common merit in oil paintings for altars, which are to be found at Rome, Milan, Turin, and other cities of Italy. The most celebrated is one at the Dominicans of Faenza, representing St. Vincenzio casting out a demon from a female possessed. He died the 12th June 1748.

TORELLI, LUCIA, was the wife of the preceding, born at Bologna, according to Crespi, in 1677, and died in 1762. Her maiden name was Casalini. She painted some altar-pieces for the churches, but her chief excellence lay in portraits, in which branch she gained so much distinction, that her portrait was placed among those of celebrated artists in the Florentine gallery.

TORELLI, or TONELLI, MAESTRO. According to Ratti, he was a native of Milan, and a pupil of Correggio, whom he assisted in some of his works. Lanzi says that in conjunction with Rondani he painted the frieze at San Giovanni in Parma, from the designs of Correggio, and adorned the first cloister in the same monastery with singular felicity.

TORELLI, GIACOMO, an Italian architect, was born at Fano in 1608. He first gained considerable reputation in theatrical architecture, and invented a variety of scenic machines at Venice, and elsewhere, which were greatly admired. He visited Paris, where his talents gained him the favor of Louis XIV., and he was engaged as royal architect and machinist. He erected the famous theatre Le Petit Bourbon, and evinced so many novel and ingenious ideas in this and many other works, that he acquired fame and fortune. Having married Madame de Suez, a lady of noble birth, Torelli returned to Italy in 1662, and erected the theatre of Fortune at Fano, greatly admired for the size of its scenery, and the elegance of its architecture. Among his other works, was the Santa Casa at Fano, after the model of that at Loreto, presented by him to his native city. The King of France sent him repeated invitations to erect a theatre at Versailles, and other buildings; but he died in 1678, without performing the commission.

TORENBURG, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1737. He first studied under J. Ten Compe, and afterwards with C. Pronck. He painted landscapes and views of cities in the style of his instructor with considerable reputation. His drawings are also held in high estimation. There is a fine picture by him, in the Museum at the Hague, representing a View on the Amstel, near Amsterdam. He died at Nykerk, in 1785.

TORESANI, ANDREA, a painter born at Brescia about 1727. Lanzi says he painted some pictures for the churches of his native city, of Venice, and Milan. "His chief merit, however, lay in an inferior branch, that of painting animals, sea views, and landscapes, in the Titian manner, often accompanied by figures in tolerably good taste." He died in 1760.

TORNIOLI, NICCOLO, a painter of Siena, who flourished, according to Malvasia, about 1640. He resided some time at Bologna, where he painted two pictures for the church of S. Paolo, representing Jacob wrestling with the Angel, and the Death of Abel. He had a method of painting, or rather staining marble, with some chemical preparation, which struck into the stone, so that by sawing it in slabs, he duplicated his works, as is done in modern mosaic work.

TORRE, BARTOLOMEO, a painter of Arezzo, who flourished about 1600. According to Orlandi, he was much employed in decorating the houses and halls of the principal citizens of Arezzo and other places in its vicinity, with fresco histories, which he praises for the excellence of their coloring. He was assisted by his pupil Teofilo Aretini Torre.

TORRE, FLAMINIO, called DAGLI ANCINELLI, a painter born at Bologna in 1621, and died in 1661. He first studied under Jacopo Cavedone, next with Guido Reni, and afterwards with Simone Cantarini. His chief talent consisted in an easy and perfect imitation of every style. He copied the works of the most distinguished masters with such precision, that it was difficult to distinguish them from the originals, and he received a higher price for his copies, than many eminent artists could obtain for their productions. Though not learned in the theory of art, he painted some original compositions, designed in the manner of Cantarini, but colored more in the style of Guido. He was employed for some time at Modena as court painter, and executed some works for the churches at Bologna, the best of which is a Deposition from the Cross in S. Giorgio. He also painted some works for the collections, which Lanzi says are in better preservation than his church pictures, which he injured by an excessive use of rock oil. He executed some spirited etchings. Bartsch describes seven prints by him which he says are in great request among connoisseurs, being engraved with a fine point, in the taste of a designer who was consummate in his art, approaching the manner of Cantarini.— They are as follow:

1. Sampson; after Guido. 2. The Virgin, accompanied by the infant Jesus and St. John; his own design; dated 1639. 3. The Virgin, with St. Jerome and St. Francis; after Lodovico Caracci. 4. The Virgin and patron Saints of Bologna; after Guido. 5. St. John the Evangelist; from his own design; signed F. T. F. 6. Three Children bearing a Plateau, on which are two vases and a glass; signed G. R. T. Pan conquered by Love; after Agos. Caracci.

TORRE, GIO. BATTISTA DELLA, a painter, born at Rovigo, and a disciple of Carlo Bononi. He painted history in the style of his master. Lanzi says he was a man of genius, and his works are held in high estimation in the collections at Ferrara, where he chiefly resided. He died young in 1631.

TORRE, GIOVANNI PAOLO DELLA, a painter born at Rome. According to Baglioni, he was at first an amateur, and a pupil of Girolamo Muziano, but he showed such talents, and attained such proficiency, that he was employed by Cesare Nebbia to assist in the great works in the Vatican, and other places. See Nebbia.

TORREGIANI, BARTOLOMEO, a Roman painter, who studied under Salvator Rosa. Lanzi says he excelled in landscape, but failed in his figures; therefore he usually employed some other artist to assist him in his pictures. He died young, according to Passeri, about 1673.

TORRIGIANO, PIETRO, an eminent Italian sculptor, was born at Florence about 1472. He studied the antiquities in the gardens of Lorenzo the Magnificent, in company with Michael Angelo, but becoming jealous of the rising distinction of the latter, he one day assaulted him, and inflicted so severe a blow upon his nose, as to crush and disfigure that feature for life. Being obliged to quit Florence in consequence, Torrigiano went to Rome, where he was employed by Pope Alexander VI.; but he afterwards threw up his profession, and enlisted as a soldier, first under the Duke Valentino in Romagna, next under Vitelli and Piero de' Medici. According to the accounts of Vasari and Cellini, he was well suited to his new profession, being a large, handsome, and powerful man, gifted with great audacity, with more the air of a rough soldier than of an artist. But though he gained distinction by his prowess, and was promoted to the rank of an ensign, he entertained little expectation of rising higher, and accordingly returned to his original profession. He executed several bronze figures for some Florentine merchants, whom he accompanied to England. Having gained the favor of Henry VIII., he was employed in a variety of works, particularly the tomb of Henry VII., in Westminster Abbey, completed in 1519, for which he received the sum of £1,000. The tomb of Margaret, Countess of Richmond, in Henry VII.'s chapel, is also supposed to have been executed by him. While engaged upon Henry's tomb, he returned to Italy to procure assistants, and endeavored to prevail upon Benvenuto Cellini to accompany him; but the latter declares that he was so disgusted with Torrigiano, upon learning from him how brutally he had treated Michael Angelo, that he could not endure the sight of him.

After finally quitting England in 1519, Torrigiano visited Spain, where he executed several pieces of sculpture for convents, &c., and among others, a group of the Virgin and Infant, so beautiful that the Duke d'Arcos commissioned him to make a copy of it, at the same time promising a liberal recompense. When the work was finished, the Duke sent him two servants, bearing two bags of maravedis; but Torrigiano, on ascertaining that the vast heap of copper coin amounted to only thirty ducats, was so highly exasperated that he seized a mallet, and shivered his beautiful work into a thousand pieces. The Duke, filled with rage and shame, immediately accused him to the dreaded Inquisition, as a sacrilegious heretic, who had impiously destroyed a figure of the Holy Virgin. The unfortunate sculptor was accordingly condemned by that tribunal, but avoided the ignominious end which awaited him, by starving himself in the dungeon. Thus perished, in 1522, an artist of more than ordinary talent—a victim to the malice of an infamous noble, and the mercilessness of a most odious and sanguinary tribunal.

TORRENTIUS, JOHN. There is considerable discrepancy about this artist; but the following is condensed from Houbraken, who obtained his information from authentic accounts at Haerlem, where Torrentius was born in 1589. It is not known under whom he studied, but he excelled in painting conversations, domestic subjects, and still-life, which were so admirably designed, exquisitely finished, and delicately colored, that they were eagerly sought after. While he continued to paint these subjects, he lived in affluence, and was highly respected. At length he became exceedingly licentious, was a leader in the infamous sect called Adamites, and prostituted his pencil to the most lascivious and indecent subjects. He was at length arrested, condemned to the torture, and finally sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, and his obscene pictures to be burnt by the executioner. He was subsequently released, at the instigation of the English ambassador, when he went to London, but the profligacy of his conduct soon brought him into disrepute, and he returned to Holland, and died at Amsterdam in 1640, in obscurity and misery. Sandrart and others, say that he was born at Amsterdam, and died under the torture in 1640.

TORRES, CLEMENTE DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1665. According to Palomino, he was a disciple of Don Juan de Valdes. He acquired considerable reputation, and executed many works, both in oil and fresco, for the churches and monasteries at Seville and other places, besides many easel pictures for the collections. He went to Madrid in 1724, where he formed an acquaintance with Palomino, whom he praised in a sonnet, and the latter returned the compliment by describing him as a distinguished painter and a laurelled scholar of the Muses. He afterwards went to Cadiz, where he died in 1730. It is said that he was a skillful draughtsman, and that his drawings so strongly resemble those of Murillo as to pass for the productions of that master.

TORRES, MATIAS DE, a Spanish painter, born at Espinosa de los Monteros, in 1631. No correct opinion can be formed of his style or merits from the bombastic account of his biographer. He studied first with his uncle, an obscure painter at Madrid; next in the Academy; and afterwards received lessons in coloring from the younger Herrera. He executed several works for the churches and convents at Madrid, in which he attempted to emulate the daring style of Caravaggio, but missing his principles, he produced little more than blackness and obscurity. He, however, succeeded better in his easel pictures of landscapes and battle-pieces, executed in a free and graceful manner. "He challenged the arrogant Bocanegra to a trial of skill in any public place, the subjects to be selected by the spectators; but that boaster, after accepting the challenge, was fearful of the encounter, and slunk away from Madrid." He died in the public hospital in 1711. Stanley says there are some of his pictures in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg.

TORRI, or TORRE, PIETRO ANTONIO, a Bolognese painter, who studied under Francesco Albano. According to Malvasia, he distinguished himself as an architectural and perspective painter, and executed some works, in conjunction with other artists, for the churches and public edifices at Bologna, Venice, and other places. In the Guide to Venice, he is called Torrigli. In the church of S. Giuseppe, in the latter city, in conjunction with Ricchi, he executed some frescos, in which he painted the architectural parts, and the latter the figures.

TORRICELLI, or TORRICELLA, IL. See BUNFANTI.

TORTEBAT, FRANÇOIS, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1610, though some say in 1600, and 1626. He studied under Simon Vouet, whose daughter he married. He was an excellent painter of portraits, to which branch he chiefly devoted his talents. He etched a few spirited plates, after the works of Vouet, and from his own designs. Dumesnil describes twenty-five, twelve of which are anatomical plates. He died in 1690.

TORTEBAT, JEAN, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1652, and died in 1718. He studied with his father, and was a good painter of portraits.

TORTELLI, GIOSEFFO, a painter born at Brescia, who, according to Orlandi, was a disciple of Francesco Paglia, whose style he followed. He painted easel pictures of historical subjects for the collections, in a very spirited manner, designed and colored in the Venetian style.

TORTIROLI, GIO. BATTISTA, a painter of Cremona, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. He studied with Andrea Mainardi in his native city; afterwards proceeded to Rome, and thence to Venice, where Lanzi says he formed a style which partakes most of that of the younger Palma, with an evident imitation of Raffaele. He executed some works for the churches at Venice, the best of which is the Murder of the Innocents, in S. Domenico. He possessed excellent abilities, but died young. Zaist says he was born in 1621, and died aged 30; but Lanzi thinks he must have been born earlier, as he painted well in 1632.

TORTOREL, JEAN. See JACQUES PERISIN.

TOSS, J. The name of this artist is affixed to a spirited etching of the Adoration of the Shepherds. after C. Hochfield.

TOSSICANI, GIOVANNI, an old painter of Arezzo, who was a disciple of Giotto. He was an eminent artist in his time, and was employed in painting for the churches at Pisa, and over all Tuscany. His works have mostly perished; but his St. Philip and St. James still remain on the baptismal font in the church dedicated to those Saints at Arezzo. Lanzi says, "with him perished the best branch of the stock of Giotto."

TOURNIER, ROBERT, a distinguished French painter, was born at Caen in Normandy, in 1676. After acquiring the elements of the art under Lucas de la Haye, a Carmelite friar, he visited Paris, and entered the school of Bon Boullongne. He practiced the art with success for many years, and painted history and portraits, but generally preferred to exercise his talents upon smaller subjects, following the styles of Gerard Douw and Godfrey Schalcken. He was patronized by several persons of distinction, whose portraits he painted, particularly the regent Duke of Orleans, who took delight in seeing him paint. Tournier was chosen a member of the Academy in 1721, and professor in 1735. He painted several pictures for the churches, and some of his portraits and other works have been engraved by Chereau, Drevet, Sarrabat, Daullé, and others. Late in life, Tournier returned to his native place, where he died in 1752. Some writers notice him under the name of Tourniere, and Tournieres. There was also an engraver of this name, a native of Toulouse, who studied in Italy under Moses Valentin. He followed the style of his instructor for some time, and etched several plates after Guido, and Polidoro da Caravaggio.

TOWNLEY, CHARLES, an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished in the last part of the 18th, and first part of the present century. He engraved some plates of portraits and other subjects, from his own designs, and after other masters, among which are Leonardo da Vinci, Annibale Caracci, Domenichino, Peter Paul Rubens, and Rembrandt.

TOZZO, GIOVANNI DEL, a painter of Siena, who flourished about 1530. He was a cotemporary of Marco Bigio, and Lanzi says that they had such an extraordinary similarity of style that it is not easy to distinguish their respective performances. They both painted histories with small figures.

TRABALLESI, FRANCESCO, a Florentine painter, who, according to Baglioni, was a pupil of Ridolfo del Ghirlandaio, and flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Gregory XIII., who employed him in the Chiesa de' Greci (Greek church), which he had founded, where he painted two altar-pieces, representing the Annunciation, and Christ disputing with the Doctors. He died young. He had a brother, named Bartolomeo, who painted the fable of Danaë on the writing desk in the same edifice, and afterwards became the assistant of Vasari.

TRABALLESI, GIULIO, an Italian designer and engraver, born at Florence about 1728. He made the greater part of the designs for the collection of portraits of the Illustrious Men of Florence, engraved by Allegrini and others. He executed some spirited etchings after the Caracci, Guido, Cavedone, F. Brizzio, and other eminent painters. He was living in 1808.

TRAINI, FRANCESCO, a Florentine painter, who was the most distinguished disciple of Andrea Orcagna. He flourished in the latter part of the 14th century, perhaps as late as 1400, or even later. He could not have painted in 1341, as Orcagna was born, according to Vasari, in 1329, and died in 1389. He was far superior to his master as a painter, which is shown by his picture of St. Thomas Aquinas, in the church of S. Caterina at Pisa. It is a large composition, and the Saint stands in the middle of the picture, under the Redeemer, who sheds a glory on the Evangelists and him; and from them, the rays are scattered on a crowd of listeners, composed of popes, cardinals, bishops, doctors, and clergy. Arius and other innovators are at the feet of the Saint, as if vanquished by his divine doctrine; and near him appear Plato and Aristotle, with their volumes open—a circumstance not to be commended in such a subject. Lanzi says that though it exhibits little skill in grouping or knowledge of relief, abounding in attitudes too tame or too constrained, yet it pleases by a marked expression in the countenances, an air of the antique in the draperies, and a certain novelty in composition. Rosini has given a print of this picture in his "Storia della Pittura Italiana," plate 20. There are no other authentic works by Traini remaining. His name is sometimes written Triano and Triani.

TRAMAZZINO, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1561. Florentine Comte mentions a rare print by him, representing a solemn Entry into the city of Rome.

TRAMULLES, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Barcelona about the commencement of the 18th century. He was the son of a sculptor, who was employed in the Cathedral of Perpignan. He first studied under Don Antonio Viladomat, in his native city, and afterwards went to Paris, and from thence to Madrid, in each of which places he resided some time. In his style, he made the works of Luca Giordano his model, which he found at Madrid. On his return to Barcelona, he opened an academy, and had a great number of scholars. He executed some works for the churches and convents at Barcelona and Gerona, and others for the Cathedral of Perpignan, which gained him considerable reputation. He died at Barcelona in the 56th year of his age.

TRAMULLES, MANUEL, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Barcelona in 1715. He practiced both painting and sculpture. He studied painting under Viladomat, whose manner he at first imitated so closely that their works may be confounded. He afterwards adopted a style of his own, which was less agreeable in point of coloring. Like his brother, he opened a school, to study from the living model, which was much frequented. He decorated the Opera House, and the Chapter of Barcelona commissioned him to paint six pictures for the sanctuary in which repose the ashes of St. Olegario; also a large picture, with many figures, representing Charles III. taking possession of the Canon's stall in the Cathedral, which pertains to the kings of Spain. He also distinguished himself by his perspectives, in the church of Santa Maria del Mar; and his monuments in Santa Semana de S. Pedro de las Puellas. His principal works are in the churches and convents at Barcelona, but there are a few in those of Tarragona and Gerona. He died in 1791.

TRASI, LOBOVICO, a painter born at Ascoli, in 1634. He was for several years a fellow pupil of Carlo Maratti, under Andrea Sacchi at Rome. He afterwards became the disciple of Maratti himself, and after frequenting his Academy for some time, he returned to Ascoli, where he executed a great number of works, both for the churches and for individuals, in various styles. In his easel pictures he emulated Maratti, and in his frescos and altar-pieces, he adopted the less labored and more spirited manner of Sacchi, in which Lanzi says we may discover traces of that of Cortona. Such are his fine pictures of St. Nicholas and the Emfranchisement of a Christian youth from servitude, in the church of S. Cristoforo. There are some remarkable pictures by him in the Cathedral, painted in distemper, particularly that of the Martyrdom of St. Emidio. He died in 1694.

TRAVERSE, CHARLES FRANÇOIS DE LA, a French painter, born at Paris, was a scholar of Boucher. He gained the grand prize in the Academy, which entitled him to go to Rome with a pension from the crown, where he passed six years. He afterwards went to Naples to explore the excavations at Herculaneum. He next accompanied the Marquis D'Osson to Madrid, where he resided many years, and obtained considerable employment in painting small pictures of landscapes and flower-pieces. He afterwards returned to Paris, where he continued to practice his profession with reputation till his death, in 1778.

TRAVI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Sestri, in the State of Genoa, in 1613. When a boy, he was employed as a color-grinder in the studio of Bernardo Strozzi, who, perceiving in him a genius for painting, gave him lessons, and his taste inclining to landscape, he procured for him the instruction of his friend, Godfrey de Waal. Lanzi says he soon emulated both his instructors. From Waal, he learned the art of painting landscapes, with buildings in perspective and ruins, and from Strozzi to decorate them with spirited figures. He afterwards copied from nature, the beautiful country of the Riviera, with avenues of trees, rich fields, and fine orchards, which he embellished with beautiful and spirited figures, not so much painted as sketched by a few bold strokes of a master's pencil, to gratify the eye when viewed at a little distance. Although his pictures are not highly finished, they please us by their agreeable disposition, and degradation of distances; by their azure skies, the verdure of the trees, and their freedom of touch. Lanzi says his pictures abound in the State, and are found in all the best collections; but there are many bearing his name which were executed by his son Antonio, and are very inferior to his own productions. He is generally called Il Sestri, or Il Sordo di Sestri, on account of his deafness. He died in 1668.

TREBATTI, PAOLO PONZIO, a Florentine sculptor, who flourished in the first half of the 16th century. He is said to have studied under Michael Angelo, and afterwards visited France, where he passed the greater part of his life. Vasari, in his life of Primaticcio, says that Trebatti was employed to execute many figures in stucco, in high relief, for the palace at Fontainebleau. There is much contradiction among various writers, as to the dates of his birth and death, and the authenticity of some of his works; but the researches of Sauval (Antiq. de Paris), have indicated him as the artist of several sculptures now deposited in the Musée d'Angoulême. Among them are the bronze tomb of Alberto Pio da Carpi, with a reclining figure of that prince, in high relief, executed in 1535, and evincing considerable ability. The monuments of Charles de Magny and André Blondel de Rouancourt, in the same museum, are likewise attributed to him, although their authorship is not certain. Trebatti seems to have wrought mostly in concert with other artists, particularly with Jean Goujon, in his works at the Old Louvre. His death is placed with much probability in 1562.

TREMOLLIÈRE, PIERRE CHARLES, a French painter, born at Chollet in Poitou, in 1703. He went to Paris when young, and became the scholar of J. B. Vanloo, under whom he made remarkable progress. He gained the grand prize at the Academy, and went with the royal pension to Rome, where he studied six years. On his return from Italy, he stopped at Lyons, where he was employed to paint three pictures for the church of the Carmelites, representing the Nativity, the Presentation, and the Adoration of the Magi, which increased his reputation. In 1734 he returned to Paris, and in 1737 was elected a member of the Academy, on which occasion he painted for his reception picture, Ulysses shipwrecked on the Island of Calypso, which was admired. He painted several histories and fabulous subjects for the Hotel de Soubise, and was engaged in preparing a set of cartoons for tapestry for the king, representing the Four Ages of the World, but he died of consumption before their completion, in 1739. Tremolliere was considered one of the most promising artists of his country. He had an extensive genius; his compositions were noble and judicious, his design graceful and correct. He etched a set of studies after Watteau, and commenced the Seven Works of Mercy, from his own designs, but only lived to finish two of them.

TRENTO, ANTONIO DA. This artist was born at Trent, in the Venetian States, about 1508. He first studied painting under Parmiggiano, but by the recommendation of that master, devoted himself to engraving on wood in chiaro-scuro. He is supposed to have learned the art from Ugo da Carpi, to whom the invention is attributed. He executed quite a number of cuts, mostly after the designs of Parmiggiano, though some of them are after the works of Andrea del Sarto, Beccafumi, Salviati, and others. He generally used three blocks to each print; the first for the outline, the second for the dark shadows, and the third for the demitints.

Bartsch is of opinion that Antonio da Trento and Antonio Fantuzzi are one and the same artist; Zani is of a contrary opinion. We cannot enter into the discussion further than to say that it is agreed that both flourished about the same time (from about 1530 to 1545), though it is contended that one was a native of Trent, and the other of Viterbo or Bologna. It is said that Fantuzzi, who worked under the direction of Parmiggiano, absconded from his master, taking with him many of his drawings, etchings, and wood cuts; and that he went to France, and connected himself with Primaticcio at Fontainebleau, who engaged him to engrave some of his works on copper. Among the thirty-seven prints described by Bartsch, and attributed by him to Fantuzzi, are several that go to corroborate his statement, could he prove them to have been executed by him. On the other hand, there are several strong circumstances against the supposition. Those who are fond of such disquisitions are referred to Zani, "Enciclopedia delle belle Arti," and to Bartsch, "Peintre Graveur," tomes xii. and xvi.

TRESHAM, HENRY, an English painter and distinguished connoisseur, was a native of Ireland, and acquired the elements of design in West's academy at Dublin. He subsequently visited England, and painted small portraits for some time, after which he was favored with the patronage of Lord Cawdor, and was invited to accompany that nobleman in his travels to Italy. During a residence of fourteen years on the continent, he studied with great assiduity the antique, and the productions of the Roman school, and attained great correctness and elegance of design. He had a redundant invention, and great facility of composition, but paid less attention to coloring than to design. Tresham had already distinguished himself by several designs for the principal publications of his time, when Mr. Boydell projected his well known Shakspeare Gallery, and that liberal patron of art employed him to paint three scenes from the play of Antony and Cleopatra, which received the deserved approval of the public. Unfortunately for the art, his health became much impaired soon after this time, and prevented him from accomplishing much in the art. His long acquaintance with the works of the Italian masters, rendered him familiar with their merits and defects; consequently he was esteemed one of the ablest critics of his day, and his opinion was sought with eagerness by the connoisseur as well as the artist. His drawings with pen and ink, and in black chalk, evince uncommon ability; the latter, in particular, are executed with a spirit, boldness, and breadth not often found in such productions. During his latter years, Tresham superintended the publication of a collection of beautiful engravings, entitled "The British Gallery," from pictures by the old masters, of which he wrote the descriptions. The following tribute to his professional abilities and private character, is from the pen of an eminent cotemporary English connoisseur. "He was not less distinguished by the amiable qualities of his heart, than for the elegance of his taste as an artist; and he was equally beloved by a large circle of friends, as he was respected by his brother academicians." He died in 1814.

TREU, CATHERINE, a paintress of whom little is known. It is said that she was a daughter of Marquard Treu, an obscure painter, and born in 1747. She painted fruit and flower pieces in a beautiful style. There are some of her pictures in the Dusseldorf Gallery.

TREU, MARTIN, a German engraver, who flourished, according to Prof. Christ, about 1540. He was cotemporary with John Sebald Beham, and Henry Aldegrever, and from the small size of his prints, is ranked among the little masters. His plates are engraved from his own designs, and prove him to have been a man of genius. His prints, though inferior to the productions of the above named artists in clearness and precision of execution, are spirited, and possess much merit. They are sometimes marked with the initials M. T., and sometimes with one of the above monograms. Bartsch describes forty-two pieces by this artist; but Bruliot considers the list incomplete, and Malpe attributes to him thirteen large pieces of Christ and his Apostles, which are marked with the second or gothic monogram. Bartsch says also that there is no account of an artist of this name, and that it is a mere conjecture of Prof. Christ, and he supposes the prints to have been executed by an artist who flourished at the period mentioned, whose name is now lost. Some of the prints he describes are marked with the gothic monogram, so that it is not improbable that the prints in question were executed by two different artists.

TREVIGI, ANTONIO DA, an old painter of Trevigi, of whom there are notices from 1402 to 1414. In the church of S. Niccolo in that city, is a picture of St. Christopher of gigantic stature, which Lanzi says is tolerably well executed.

TREVIGI, DARIO DA, a painter of Trevigi, who flourished about 1474. He was a pupil and imitator of Andrea Mantegna. There are some of his works in the church of S. Bernardino, at Bassano, placed opposite those of Mantegna, as if, says Lanzi, to exhibit their inferiority; elsewhere they would appear more respectable.

TREVIGI, GIORGIO DA, an old painter, who flourished about 1437. According to Rossetti, he was an artist of considerable note in his time. He was invited to Padua in 1437, to paint the celebrated tower of the Horologe.

TREVIGI, GIROLAMO DA, a painter of Trevigi, whose pictures date from 1470 to 1492. According to Federici, he was a pupil and imitator of Squarcione, and his family name, Aviano. Lanzi says he found several of his works at Trevigi, signed Hieronymus Tarvisio, and judging from his style, "he was a very doubtful pupil of Squarcione." His pictures are very well designed, but poorly colored.

TREVIGI, GIROLAMO DA, a painter of Trevigi, born, according to Ridolfi, in 1508, and died in 1544. His family name was Pennacchi. Zani says he was the son of Pier Maria Pennacchi, a painter of little note, and was born in 1496. He has been confounded by some writers with the preceding artist of the same cognomen. He went to Rome while young, where he studied the works of Raffaele, and became a correct and graceful designer. He afterwards went to Venice, where little remains from his hand. He next went to Bologna, where about 1530 he was an assistant of Pupini. He afterwards painted a series of pictures in the church of S. Petronio, representing the life of St. Anthony of Padua, and the Presentation in S. Salvatore. Lanzi says that in these works he happily succeeded in uniting the excellencies of the Roman and Venetian schools, but did not live long enough to mature them, as he devoted himself to the occupation of a military engineer, to which service he fell a victim in England, in 1544. According to Ridolfi, he went to England in the reign of Henry VIII., who employed him as a painter, architect, and military engineer. He attended the King in his expedition into Picardy, and was killed at the siege of Boulogne in 1544.

Stanley says there is a picture by him in the collection of Lord Northwick, representing the Virgin with the Infant on a throne, surrounded by saints and angels, formerly in the church of S. Salvatore, at Bologna; it is signed HIERONYMUS TREVISIUS, P.

TREVILIO, or TRIVIGLIO, BERNARDO DA. See ZENALE.

TREVILLIAN, WILLIAM. The name of this engraver is affixed to a portrait of Oliver Cromwell's Porter, dated 1650.

TREVISANI, ANGELO, a painter born at Trevisani, according to Lanzi, though some say at Venice. He was educated at Venice, where he passed the rest of his days, and is ranked among the Venetian painters. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted history with reputation, as is evinced by his fine altar-piece in the church of La Carità, and other pictures in the churches at Venice; but he particularly distinguished himself as a painter of portraits, in which branch he acquired both fame and fortune. Lanzi says he formed a style of his own, not sublime, but very select, founded upon nature, and in part conformable to the schools then in vogue. His pencil displays diligence and research, especially in his management of the chiaro-scuro. He was living in 1753.

TREVISANI, CAV. FRANCESCO, was born at Trevisani in 1656, according to Lanzi and the best authorities, though some say at Trieste, Castel Franco, Capo d'Istria, Venice, and Rome. He was the son of an architect named Antonio Trevisani, who instructed him in the rudiments of art. He then became the disciple of Antonio Zanchi at Venice, whose principles he at first followed. Lanzi says he was called in Venice, Il Trevisani Romano, to distinguish him from Angelo T., the subject of the preceding article. After having acquired considerable reputation at Venice, a Venetian lady of noble family fell in love with him, and married him, but the lovers, fearing the displeasure of her parents, retired to Rome. Trevisani, possessing a happy talent of imitating the style of every master, soon abandoned his first principles, and adopted those of the most popular artists then resident in that city. At one time he appears a follower of Cignani, at another of Guido, or of other masters, and Lanzi says he was alike successful in all. He obtained the patronage of Cardinal Chigi, who employed him in several considerable works, and recommended him to the protection of Pope Clement XI. That pontiff commissioned him to paint one of the Prophets in St. John of Lateran, and afterwards employed him to decorate the cupola of the cathedral at Urbino, where he represented in fresco, subjects emblematical of the Four Quarters of the World, which Lanzi pronounces truly estimable for design, fancy, and coloring. After the death of Cardinal Chigi, he met with another powerful friend in Cardinal Ottobuoni, who employed him to adorn his gallery, for which he painted his celebrated picture of the Murder of the Innocents. The Duke of Modena employed him to copy several pictures by Correggio, Parmiggiano, and Paul Veronese, which he executed in such an exact and admirable manner, that he conferred upon him the honor of knighthood. He acquired an immense reputation, and abounded in commissions, more than he could execute; almost every person of distinction, passing through Rome, endeavored to procure a specimen by his hand. Lanzi says his pictures abound in the churches and collections at Rome. The Albicini family in Forli, possess many of his works in various styles, among them a small picture of the Crucifixion, an exquisite picture, which the artist considered his master-piece, and subsequently offered a large sum to obtain it back again. His works generally exhibit much elegance of design, a fine pencil, and a vigorous tone of color. It is not a little remarkable, that, notwithstanding his numerous commissions, he always wrought with diligence and care. He possessed an extraordinary talent of imitating the works of other great masters, and frequently copied them on commission. He was also a universal painter, and could paint almost equally well, history, architecture, portraits, landscape, animals, fruit and flowers. Among his best works at Rome are, the Death of St. Joseph, at the Collegio Romano; the Virgin contemplating the Instruments of the Passion in S. Maria in Vallicella; and his picture of Antony and Cleopatra, in the Spada palace, painted as a companion to Guido's Rape of Helen. There are many of his works in the various cities in the state, as Foligno, Camerino, Perugia, and Forli. He died in 1746, at the great age of 90 years, and is said to have still retained his energies, working to the last year of his life.

TREZZO, GIACOMO DA, a famous painter in mosaic, of the Milanese school, who died in 1595. According to the Abbé Conca, he was invited to the court of Philip II. of Spain to execute the Tabernacle for the church of the Escorial, which is esteemed the most beautiful and magnificent work of the kind in Christendom. For this, and other similar works, he was munificently rewarded, and acquired so much reputation, that the name of one of the principal streets, in which he lived, was changed to Jacome Trezzo.

TRIBOLO, NICCOLO DI, an able Italian sculptor, was born at Florence in 1500. He was originally bred to the trade of a carpenter, but becoming acquainted with Sansovino, he commenced studying with him. On leaving that master, he was employed to execute two statues of Sibyls for the façade of S. Petronio at Bologna, which at once established his reputation. They have been engraved in Cicognara's Storia della Scultura. He also executed several bas-reliefs for the doors of that church, which possess great merit. In 1525 Tribolo was obliged to quit Bologna, on account of the plague, but he soon returned and continued practicing the art until the death of his patron Bartolomeo Barbazzi, when he visited Pisa, and was employed by the sculptor Pietrosanta. While at Pisa, he was commissioned by Gio. Battista della Palla, who was collecting works of art for Francis I., to execute a statue of Nature, which, on being sent to Fontainebleau, was admired as a choice production of art. He seems afterwards to have practiced in his native city, for when Florence was besieged by Pope Clement VII., in 1529, he treacherously furnished that pontiff with plans and models of the city and its outworks. His services on that occasion obtained him Clement's patronage, who, among other things, employed him to assist Michael Angelo in the sculptures intended for the chapel of S. Lorenzo; and he had begun two figures, one representing Earth, and the other Heaven, intended to decorate the tomb of Giulio de' Medici, when he was disabled from proceeding further by an attack of ague; and he had hardly recovered, when the Pope's death put a stop to the work. He was subsequently employed by the Grand Duke Cosmo I., in laying out gardens and designing the fountains and statues of the Villa di Castello, near Florence. Vasari, his friend and biographer, gives a minute account of this extensive scheme of embellishment, but partly on account of Tribolo's remissness it was prosecuted slowly, and never completed. On purchasing the Palazzo Pitti, the Grand Duke engaged Tribolo to improve the gardens and decorate them with various works in sculpture; but he had hardly commenced his labors, when he was seized with an illness that caused his death, September 7th 1550.

TRICOMI, BARTOLOMEO, a Sicilian painter, who flourished at Messina about 1650. According to Hackert, he studied with Domenichino, though Lanzi says with Barbalunga. He devoted himself chiefly to portraiture in which branch he greatly excelled.

TRIERE, P., a French engraver, who flourished about 1780. He engraved some plates of historical subjects and conversations, after various masters, which are executed with the graver in a neat and pleasing style.

TRINGHAM, an obscure English artist, mentioned by Strutt, as the engraver of a few portraits and other subjects for the booksellers. He flourished about 1750.

TRIPPEL, ALEXANDER. This able sculptor was born at Schaffhausen, in Switzerland, in 1747. After acquiring the elements of design, he visited Copenhagen, and studied sculpture under Prof. Wiedevelt. He remained eight years in Denmark, and then went to Berlin, but meeting with little encouragement, he returned to Copenhagen, and gained several prizes at the Academy. He subsequently spent three years in Paris, and executed a fine model of his allegorical group of Switzerland, after which he settled at Rome in 1777, and practiced the art in that city for many years with good success. His works are distinguished for their noble simplicity, and beautiful execution. He was most successful in bas-reliefs and busts, among which last he executed one of Goethe for the Prince of Waldeck, which is praised by the poet for the excellence of its style. Another of his works is the monument to Salomon Gessner, at Zurich. Trippel died at Rome in 1793.

TRISTAN, LUIS, a Spanish painter, born, according to Palomino, near Toledo, in 1594, and died at Toledo in 1649; Bermudez places his birth in 1586, and his death in 1640. He studied under Domenico Theotocopuli, called El Greco, whom he surpassed in design and the purity of his taste. El Greco, then somewhat advanced in years, far from being jealous of his talents, was the first to applaud his works, and to commend him to the public. He executed many works for the churches and convents of Toledo, the most esteemed of which are in the Cathedral, and in Santa Clara. There are some of his works at Madrid. He also excelled in portraits. It is no mean proof of his ability, that Velasquez professed himself his admirer, and quitting the precepts of Pacheco, his instructor, formed his style from the works of Tristan.

TRIVA, ANTONIO, a painter born at Reggio in 1626. He was a disciple and imitator of Guercino, and acquired considerable reputation for several works he executed for the churches at Reggio, Venice, and other cities in Italy, which were celebrated by his friend, the poet Boschini. He was invited to the court of the Elector of Bavaria, in whose service he died in 1699. He was remarkable for using both hands with equal facility. He executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs, and after other masters. Bartsch describes four, and Füessli mentions five more. He had a sister named Flaminia, who possessed considerable genius, and executed some good works, even for the churches.

TROGER, PAUL, a German painter, born at Zell in the bishopric of Brixen, in 1695. After learning the rudiments of design in his own country, he went to Fiume, in the Venetian territory, and studied under Giuseppe Alberti. He established himself at Vienna, where he acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, and was made Director of the Imperial Academy. He also executed some spirited etchings of historical subjects and landscapes from his own designs. He died at Vienna in 1777.

TROGLI, GIULIO, a painter born at Bologna, according to Malvasia, in 1613, and died in 1685. He first studied under Francesco Gessi, but preferring perspective and architecture, he afterwards became the pupil of Agostino Metelli. He acquired considerable reputation, and published a work entitled "Paradossi della Prospettiva"; hence he was ever afterwards called Il Paradosso (the Paradox.) He died in 1685.

TROMBA, IL. See RINALDI.

TROMPETTA, IL. See PESARO.

TRONCHON, A. R., a French engraver, who flourished from about 1740 to 1760. He engraved some plates after Coypel and other masters.

TROOST, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1697. He studied under Arnold Boonen, and improved himself by a diligent study of nature. He painted history, comedies, conversations, and gallant subjects, in a very pleasing style, and was called the Dutch Watteau. His greatest excellence, however, lay in portraiture, and he was much employed in painting large pictures for the halls of the different societies and companies of Amsterdam, containing the portraits of the principal officers of the institutions. He there painted the Directors of the College of Physicians at Amsterdam, as large as life, and at full length, in one piece, which picture established his reputation. His most capital performance is a large picture in the Surgeons' Hall, representing the principal persons of that profession in Amsterdam, sitting round a table, on which is placed a subject prepared for dissection, while a professor appears as if explaining the parts previous to an operation. He was much applauded for his admirable portrait of Boerhaave, which is placed in the Anatomical Hall. His conversations, though occasionally broad, are true to nature, and faithfully portray the enjoyments of the high and the low, according to the manners and customs of the people of Holland in his day. His pictures are correctly designed and well colored. He painted in crayons as well as in oil, and his works are highly esteemed in his own country. The late Baron Verstolk de Soelen, Minister of State, possessed a large collection of his works, which were sold at public sale at Amsterdam in 1847, and brought large prices. Troost also engraved some prints in mezzotinto from his own designs. He died in 1750. He had a daughter named Sara, whom he instructed in the art. She painted portraits with reputation, both in oil and crayons, and made drawings of several of her father's works. She died in 1793.

TROOST, WILLIAM, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1684. He first studied with John Glauber in his native city, and next went to Dusseldorf, where he became a disciple of J. van Niekelen, painter to the court, whose daughter he married. At Dusseldorf, he is said to have painted the portraits of many persons of distinction. He afterwards returned to Amsterdam, where he settled, and devoted his talents chiefly to landscape, both in oil and India ink; the latter are considered the most valuable. His style in landscape resembles that of his first master, Glauber. His wife, Jacoba Maria van Niekelen, excelled in painting fruit and flower pieces, which art she learned of vander Myn.

TROOSTWYCK, WALTER JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1782. He studied both with Anthony and Juriaan Andriessen, and afterwards improved himself by copying the works of the best Dutch landscape and cattle painters, as Paul Potter, Adrian Vandervelde, and Karel du Jardin. He painted landscapes and cattle in the manner of those masters, which are much esteemed. He died in 1810.

TROPHONIUS. See AGAMEDES.

TROSCHER, JAMES, a German painter and engraver of little note, born in 1583, and died in 1624. Prof. Christ attributes to him some indifferent prints marked with the initials I. T. F.

TROSCHER, HANS, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg about 1592. He studied under Peter Isselburg, and gained considerable reputation by several plates, particularly a Set of Landscapes, the Court House at Nuremberg, and the portrait of Ferdinand II. In 1622, he went to Rome, and assisted Francesco Villamena in executing several important works. The Biographie Universelle praises him for his facility and delicacy of execution; Bryan says his style is greatly inferior to that of Villamena, both in design and execution, and that his plates, though neatly engraved, are stiff and labored. Troscher died at Rome in 1633, and was honorably interred in S. Maria del Popolo. His plates are generally marked with the above monogram, sometimes with the figure of a thrush added, in allusion to his name; among them are several emblematical subjects, portraits and frontispieces; also the following. The Conception of the Virgin, after Bernardo Castelli. A large Thesis, dedicated to Cardinal Prince Maurice of Savoy. The Emperor Julian, with a figure showing the heart of a Bull, upon which appears a cross surmounted by a crown, after Antonio Circignano. A portrait marked Fortunius Licetus, Philosoph. The portrait of Louis XIV., considered his best work.

TROSCHER, PETER. This engraver was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Nuremberg about 1620, and flourished until about 1661.

His plates were chiefly engraved for the booksellers; among them are several frontispieces and other book ornaments, executed with the graver, in an indifferent style, usually marked with the initials P. T.

TROST, ANDREW, a German painter of familiar subjects, was a native of Carniola. Little is known of him as a painter. He engraved some plates, which he marked with the above monogram. He was living in 1695.

TROST. See TROOST.

TROPPIA, CAV. GIROLAMO, a painter who is supposed to have studied with Carlo Maratti. Lanzi says he was certainly his imitator, and a successful one too. He executed some works for the churches at Rome, both in oil and fresco, the best of which are in S. Giacomo delle Penitenti, where he painted in competition with Romanelli. There are also some of his works scattered in the churches throughout the state, particularly at S. Severino. He died in the prime of life.

TROTTI, CAV. GIO. BATTISTA, called IL MALOSSO, an eminent painter, born at Cremona in 1555. He was the most distinguished disciple of Bernardino Campi, whose niece he married, and inherited his valuable studio. He acquired a brilliant reputation, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Cremona, Parma, Piacenza, and other cities of Italy. He was employed by the court of Parma to paint in competition with Agostino Caracci, on which occasion, says Lanzi, Trotti being most applauded, Agostino with pleasantry observed, "that they had given him a hard bone to crack;" hence he was called Il Malosso, which name he adopted, and transmitted as an hereditary appellation to his nephew; he also sometimes made use of it in signing his name, thus, Jo. Baptista Trottus dictus Malossus Cremon. faciebat, 1594. "Thus, he converted into a source of applause the satire, launched at him by Caracci, meant to convey that the people of Parma had preferred to him an artist of inferior worth; nor indeed was Malosso his equal in design or in solid judgment, though he could boast pictoric attractions which made him appear to advantage when opposed to other artists. He displayed little of Campi's taste except in a few of his first efforts; he afterwards studied Correggio, and most of all, emulated Sojaro, whose gay, open, and brilliant style, varied shortenings, and spirited attitudes, he exhibited in the chief part of his works. But he carried it too far, making an extravagant display of his white and other clear colors, without sufficiently tempering them with shade, insomuch that I have heard his paintings compared to those on porcelain, while he has been accused of want of relief, or, according to Baldinucci, of some degree of harshness. His heads, however, are very beautiful, smiling with loveliness, and of a graceful roundness, not unlike those of Sojaro, though he is apt to repeat them on the same canvass, nearly alike in features, colors, and attitudes. Here his rapidity of hand was alone at fault, for he was no way deficient in fertility of ideas. When he pleased he could give variety to his lineaments, as is seen in his Beheading of St. John, in the church of S. Domenico at Cremona, as well as to his compositions, for he repeated his Conception of the Virgin in S. Francesco at Piacenza, on several occasions, abounding with fresh ideas in every instance, nor do we often meet with any of his paintings throughout the numerous cities in which he was employed, that have much resemblance in point of invention. He was equally varied in his imitations when he pleased."

Trotti wrought with extraordinary facility, and executed a multitude of works, both in oil and fresco; hence he frequently laid himself justly open to the accusation of incorrectness, want of harmony, and mannerism. His most esteemed works in fresco, for which he was honored with knighthood, are in the Palazzo del Giordani, at Parma. His labors in the cupola of S. Abbondio at Parma, are on a magnificent scale, though designed from Giulio Campi; but they display, says Lanzi, a masterly hand and a strength of coloring fully equal, if not superior, to the design. Among his other works, most deserving of notice, are the Crucifixion, executed in the best Venetian taste in the cathedral at Cremona; his St. Maria Egiziaca, in the church of S. Pietro, in the same city, much in the Roman style, and a Pietà, in S. Abbondio, in which he emulated the Caracci. He died in 1612.

TROTTI, EUCLIDE, called also IL MALOSSO, was the nephew of the preceding, assisted him in his works, and was an able imitator of his style. The only works known, executed entirely by him, are two pictures of the history of St. James, in the church of S. Gismondo, at Cremona, and an altarpiece of the Ascension, in the church of S. Antonio at Milan, which Lanzi says displays much beauty, and a more serious and dignified manner, than is generally found in the works of the elder Malosso. Unfortunately he fell into extravagant and dissipated habits while young, committed a felony, was condemned to death, and died in prison, by poison, as is supposed, administered by his friends, to avoid the disgrace of a public execution. He is sometimes called Il Cav. Euclide Trotti.

TROUVAIN, ANTOINE, a French engraver, born at Montdidier in 1666. He is supposed to have been a pupil of Bernard Picart, whose style he imitated. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with great neatness and dexterity, and his prints produce a very pleasing effect. He was living in 1707. Among others, are the following by him:

PORTRAITS.

Peter Daniel Huet, Bishop of Avanches. 1695. Francis le Bouthellier, Bishop of Troyes. John Pesno, Painter and Engraver. 1698. René Anthony Houasse, Painter; after Torteat, John Jouvenet, Painter; after a picture by himself.

SUBJECTS.

The Annunciation; after Carlo Maratti. Christ restoring Sight to the Blind; after Ant. Coypel. The Marriage of Mary of Medicis with Henry IV., and the Minority of Louis XIII.; after the pictures by Rubens in the Luxembourg Gallery. Silenus drunk; after Ant. Coypel.

TROY, FRANÇOIS DE, an eminent French painter, born at Toulouse in 1645. He was the son of Nicolas de Troy, a painter of little note, by whom he was instructed in the rudiments of the art. He went to Paris while young, and studied under Nicholas Loir, where he made rapid progress, and soon distinguished himself. In 1674 he was admitted into the Academy, on which occasion he presented a picture of Mercury and Argus, which gained him so much reputation, that he received immediately several commissions for sacred and profane subjects. The brilliant success of Claude le Fevre as a portrait painter, induced him to devote himself more particularly to that branch, in which he became one of the most celebrated artists of the French school. He was sent by Louis XIV. to the court of Munich to paint the portrait of Maria Christiana of Bavaria, afterwards Dauphiness of France, which was subsequently placed in the gallery of Apollo, as an exquisite specimen of coloring and finishing. He also painted the portraits of many of the most distinguished personages of his time. His portrait, painted by himself, is in the Florentine gallery. His greatest historical work is in the church of St. Genevieve, representing the Magistrates of Paris invoking the protection of that saint, pronounced a grand performance. There is a very rare etching by him representing the Catafalque for the obsequies of Maria Teresa, Queen of Louis XIV. He died at Paris in 1730.

TROY, CHEVALIER JEAN FRANÇOIS DE, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1676. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Italy, where he resided several years, diligently studying the works of the best masters. On his return to Paris, he soon gained a distinguished reputation, and was elected a member of the Academy. On the first exhibition of his works, they were generally admired, and the best judges of the art commended the taste, invention, coloring, neatness of finishing, and happy union of simplicity and grandeur, which appeared in his compositions. He was employed by Louis XIV. to paint a series of cartoons for tapestry, representing the history of Queen Esther, and to decorate the Hotel de Ville with several large emblematical subjects, which gave so much satisfaction to the monarch, that he conferred on him the order of St. Michael, and honored him with other marks of his peculiar esteem. He subsequently appointed him director of the French Academy at Rome, where he resided the greater part of his life, and discharged the duties of his office with much dignity and credit. He had a fruitful invention, and an extraordinary readiness of handling; his touch was firm and free, and his coloring extremely pleasing; and in all his works he showed a just and natural expression of the passions in his countenances, as well as in the attitudes and motions. He was not less distinguished as a painter of portraits than of historical subjects, and his own likeness, painted by himself, is in the Florentine Gallery. He died in 1752.

TROYA, FELIX, a Spanish painter, born at San Felipe, near Valencia, in 1660. He studied with Gasparo de la Huerta, at Valencia, and painted history with considerable reputation. His works are numerous, and may be found in almost all the churches, convents, and public edifices at Valencia, San Felipe, and other places in that region of country, where he resided. He acquired a high reputation for the richness of his coloring, and the grand and imposing effect of his pictures, though his design is frequently incorrect. His best works are in the church of S. Agostino at Valencia, where he died in 1731.

TROYEN, JOHN VAN, a Flemish engraver, who flourished about 1650. He engraved some of the plates from the pictures in the collection of the Archduke Leopold, called the Teniers' Gallery, among which are, the Daughter of Herodias with the Head of St. John, after L. da Vinci; the Magdalene penitent, after Correggio; Christ healing the Sick, and the Adoration of the Magi, after P. Veronese; and the Entombment, after Porde-none.

TROYEN, ROMBOUT VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp about 1600. It is not known under whom he studied, but Harms, in his Chronological Tables, states that he went to Italy, and resided there some time; others say that he never left his own country. He distinguished himself as a painter of the ruins of ancient architecture, and other interesting objects in the neighborhood of Rome, which he embellished with figures representing subjects of sacred or profane history or fable. His style resembles that of Cuylenburg, and his pictures, like those of that master, have become much darkened in parts by age, from the use of improper colors. His cabinet pictures are the most esteemed. Balkema says he lived at Amsterdam, where he died in 1650.

TRUCHI, DOMINIC and L., two engravers, said to be French, but probably Italians, who flourished in London about 1730. They engraved some book plates.

TRUCHOT, a French painter of landscapes and architectural views, who lived in England some time, and died about 1823. Little is known of him except by his works, among which are a view of Canterbury Cathedral; a View of St. Michael's Mount; Abelard reading a Letter from Eloisa; Eloisa in Prayer before an Altar; the grand Staircase of the Palais Royal; Henry, Count de Bouchange, in a Cloister; also several interiors of churches and chapels, and views of ancient ruins in various parts of France. Some of his pictures are embellished with figures by Xavier le Prince.

TRUMBULL, JOHN. This eminent American painter was born at Lebanon, Conn., June 6th, 1756, and died in New York, November 10th, 1843, aged eighty-seven. His father was the first governor of Connecticut as an independent State, and the advantages of his birth gave to young Trumbull one of the best educations the country could afford. He graduated at Harvard College in the class of 1773, at the early age of seventeen; and having seen at Boston the works of Smybert and Copley, he determined to devote his time and talents to the profession of painting.

Boston and its environs had at this time become the seat of war; and the young artist, fired with a spirit which animated his countrymen, enrolled himself, at the age of nineteen, as an adjutant in the American Army, and marched to join the undisciplined forces which were assembling around the head quarters of General Gage. On the 17th of June, 1775, was fought the memorable battle of Bunker's Hill, at which time the young adjutant was stationed with his regiment at Roxbury. In July, General Washington arrived at Cambridge to take command of the troops which were besieging Boston; and being informed of the talent of Trumbull, he employed him to make a draft of the enemy's works, which he completed to the satisfaction of the commander-in-chief. In August, 1775, Trumbull was appointed aid to Washington; in the autumn of this year he was promoted to the office of brigade major, and in the succeeding year, 1776, he held the post of Deputy Adjutant General of the Northern Department under General Gates. Owing to some informality respecting the date of his commission, Trumbull became, at this time, dissatisfied with the service, and having witnessed many of the chief occurrences of the Revolution, he resolved to terminate his military career, and become the historiographer of these great events and of his early comrades.

With this view, he resided some time at Boston, studying the works of Copley and others, until 1780, when he embarked for France, and having made a short stay in Paris, proceeded to London, where he was kindly received by West, with whom he pursued his studies uninterruptedly till about the middle of November, when the news of the death of Major André was received, and a violent irritation was occasioned in the public mind. It was Trumbull's misfortune to lodge in the same house with another American gentleman, who had been an officer, and against whom a warrant had been issued to apprehend him for high treason. Instructions had been given to the officer who was to execute the warrant, to arrest, meanwhile, the painter, and secure his papers in expectation of finding something of importance; and in accordance with this order, Trumbull was arrested on the night of the 19th of November, and committed to prison. Immediately upon hearing of the arrest, West waited upon the king; represented the circumstances of his pupil's former and present situation; the long time which had intervened between his quitting the rebel army and his coming to England; and his present entire devotedness to the study of the fine arts. George the Third, after a moment's hesitation, replied, "this young gentleman is in the power of the laws, and I cannot at present interfere; but go to him, and assure him from me, that in the worst possible legal result, he has my royal word that his life is safe." This assurance, of course, softened in a great degree the rigor of an eight months' imprisonment, during which period he made the fine copy from West's picture of Correggio's St. Jerome, now in the gallery at New Haven.

In June, 1781, a change had taken place in the affairs of the two countries; the English government had begun to relax their severity, and Trumbull was admitted to bail by a special order of the king, in council, on condition of quitting the kingdom within thirty days, not to return during the war. Making the best of his way to Ostend, and from thence to Amsterdam, he embarked for his native country, where he arrived, after much detention, about the middle of January, 1782. Fatigue, vexation, and disappointment brought on a fever, which confined him to his father's house the principal part of the ensuing winter.

In the spring of 1783, the news arrived of the preliminaries of peace having been arranged, and Trumbull immediately formed the resolution of again visiting England; he arrived there in the early part of 1784, and recommenced his studies with West, by whom he was again kindly received. In the year 1786, he produced his first considerable historical work, the Death of General Warren at the Battle of Bunker's Hill. This his first patriotic work of art, having been seen and appreciated by both Adams and Jefferson, the former of whom was residing at that time as American minister at London, and the latter at Paris, he communicated to them his project of painting a series of national pictures, in commemoration of the principal events of the Revolution, preserving, as far as practicable, faithful portraits of those who had been conspicuous actors in the various scenes, as well as accurate details of the arms, dresses, and manners of the times, with all of which he had been familiar.

Finding that the Death of General Warren had given offence in London, and being desirous to conciliate, Trumbull determined to paint, before leaving England, a subject from British history; and selected the Sortie of Gibraltar, which was finished in the spring of 1789. In the autumn of this year, Trumbull returned to America, and devoted himself with great assiduity to the task of procuring portraits of all the distinguished characters in New York, then the seat of government, and in the summer of 1790, he was commissioned by the Corporation to paint a full-length of Washington, now in the Common Council room of the City Hall. It represents the General in full uniform, standing by a white horse, leaning his arm upon the saddle; in the background, a view of Broadway in ruins, as it then was, the old fort at the termination, and Staten Island in the distance. He passed the winter of 1790-1, in traveling through various parts of the country, to take portraits of illustrious individuals, and in the spring returned to New York, where he painted for the Corporation the whole length portrait of General Clinton, also in the Common Council room of the City Hall. In 1792, he was again at Philadelphia, and there painted the portrait of General Washington, now in the gallery at New Haven.

In May, 1794, he returned to England as Secretary to Mr. Jay, who had been appointed minister to Great Britain; and, in a residence of ten years, produced several pictures, the most celebrated of which are the Madonna au Corset rouge, from Raffaele; the Infant Saviour and St. John; and a Holy Family, all of which are now in the New Haven gallery. He returned to the United States again in 1804, but in consequence of the embarrassments of trade, and the unsettled state of the country, the fine arts were but illy supported here; and in 1808, he returned again to London, and remained abroad until his final return to the United States in 1816.

During his last absence, a change had taken place in the state of the arts in this country. Stuart, Sully, and Jarvis were each enjoying a high and deserved reputation; and although Allston had not yet arrived, the fame of his success had preceded him. The Capitol at Washington was rebuilding, and Congress, during the session of 1816-17, appropriated thirty-two thousand dollars for the purchase of four pictures, each eighteen feet by twelve, to be placed on the walls of the Rotunda. They selected for their subjects the Declaration of Independence, signed on the 4th of July, 1776; the Surrender of Burgoyne, on the 17th of October, 1777, to the American forces under General Gates, at Saratoga; the Surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in Virginia, Oct. 19, 1781; and the Resignation of General Washington, at Annapolis, Dec. 23, 1783. They authorized Trumbull to execute the work, which he performed in the space of seven years. These pictures are in the style of his master, West; and although some critics have found fault with the grouping of the figures, and the apparent stiffness of the principal officers, their merit in many particulars is of a high order, and they will ever be valuable for the faithful portraits they have handed down to us.

The last picture was scarcely finished in 1824, when Trumbull had the misfortune to lose his wife, the faithful and beloved companion of all the vicissitudes of twenty-four years. In his own words, "my best friend was removed from me, and I had no child. A sense of loneliness began to creep over my mind, yet my hand was steady, and my sight good; then why sink into premature imbecility?" He therefore resolved to begin a new series of his revolutionary subjects, on canvas six feet by nine, for the purpose of solacing his weary hours by occupation. The expenses necessarily incident to such an undertaking, soon diminished his pecuniary resources, and the thought occurred to him, that, although there was little probability of his being able to dispose of his pictures, either to individuals or to the State, it might be that some literary institution would be desirous of possessing them. An arrangement was finally concluded with Yale College at New Haven—a fire-proof gallery was erected, in which the pictures were arranged under his direction, and an annuity of one thousand dollars for the remainder of his life was settled upon the artist, who made one noble condition in this final disposition of his works, that, after his death, the entire proceeds of the exhibition should be perpetually appropriated towards defraying the expense of educating indigent scholars in Yale College. "I thus," says he, "have the happy reflection that when I shall have gone to my rest, these works will remain a source of good to many a poor, perhaps meritorious and excellent young man."

Among other valuable productions, the Trumbull Gallery contains, besides the small copies of the pictures at the Capitol, fifty three pictures by him, the principal of which are, the Battle of Bunker Hill; the Death of Gen. Montgomery, in the attack of Quebec; the Battle of Princeton, partly finished; the Capture of the Hessians at Trenton; the Death of Gen. Mercer, at the Battle of Princeton; Portrait of General Washington, painted at Philadelphia in 1792, for the city of Charleston, S. C.; a copy of Correggio's celebrated St. Jerome of Parma; and a copy of the Transfiguration, the master-piece of Raffaele. Five copies of his historical pictures, the Declaration of Independence, the Death of General Montgomery, the Death of General Warren, the Death of Gen. Mercer, and the Rout of the Hessians at Trenton, were purchased by the Wadsworth Athenæum at Hartford, and now adorn the walls of that institution. The Sortie of Gibraltar, and Priam receiving the Body of Hector, are the property of the Athenæum at Boston.

An association had been early formed in New York for promoting the Fine Arts, and Chancellor Livingston elected President. For a considerable period, the institution was sustained with some vigor, but it finally lost its vitality, and in 1816 it had nearly ceased to exist. During that year De Witt Clinton, who was then President of the Association, originated a plan, by which it was revived, under the name of the American Academy of Fine Arts. Delicacy required him to resign the presidency, and at his nomination, Trumbull was elected to occupy the chair, which he continued to do with great ability until the formation of the National Academy of Design, which went into operation in 1825, with Samuel F. B. Morse as President. During this period it may be said, no artist in this country gave instruction to so many scholars, and certainly no one displayed a warmer zeal in the cause of Art.

In the year 1837, Trumbull removed to New Haven, and resided there till 1841; when he returned to New York, in order to receive the advice of his favorite physician, Dr. Washington. He remained there until his death, in November, 1843. By his own request, his remains were interred in a sepulchre, built by himself, beneath his Monumental Gallery, at New Haven.

TSCHERNINGK, DAVID, a German engraver, who flourished about 1639. He engraved some frontispieces and other book plates, executed with the graver, in a poor style.

TSCHERNINGK, JOHN. There were two German engravers of this name; the elder was living in 1634, and the younger in 1685. They engraved some portraits and other book plates. There was a portrait painter named Andrew T., who flourished about 1660. Little is known of them.

TUAIRE, FRANÇOIS, a French painter, born at Aix in Provence, in 1794. He studied under Prudhon with the greatest assiduity, and being obliged also to give lessons in the art, to gain a subsistence, his constitution was injured by incessant application. The Empress Josephine commissioned him to paint a picture of Venus and the Loves, which was greatly admired, and gained him considerable reputation. In 1821 he executed a picture for the palace at Fontainebleau, representing Psyche in prison, condemned to separate grains of corn, and succored by Cupid. It was much admired for its design, coloring, and expression, and gained the gold medal at the exhibition in 1822. Tuairé finally ruined his health by excessive labor, and died in 1823.

TUBI, GIO. BATTISTA, a reputable Italian sculptor, was born at Rome about 1630. He visited Paris, and was elected a member of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture. He was employed in copying works from the antique; and his excellent talents in this respect are evinced by the Laocöon in the Versailles Park. There are also a number of original compositions by him at Versailles, representing the Fountain of Flora, Cupid, Galatea; and also a marble vase, with bas-reliefs, illustrating the victories of Louis XIV. in Flanders. At Paris he executed a number of works, among which are a statue of Immortality, on the tomb of la Chambre, and that of Religion, on the tomb of Colbert; both in the church of S. Eustache. Tubi also executed the mausoleum of Turenne, after the designs of le Brun, with the exception of the statues impersonifying Wisdom and Valor, which are by Marsy. This mausoleum was formerly in the church of the Abbey of St. Denis, but was transferred in 1800 to the church of the Invalides. Tubi died at Paris in 1700.

TUCCARI, GIOVANNI, a Sicilian painter, born at Messina, according to Hackert, in 1667, and died there in 1743. He studied with his father, Antonio T., who was a feeble disciple of Barbalunga. Though he painted much in other branches, he chiefly distinguished himself as a painter of battles and skirmishes of cavalry, and by the extraordinary facility of his pencil, "he multiplied these subjects almost beyond number. Many of them were sent to Germany, where they were engraved."

His name is frequently written Tucarri. He died in 1743.

TULDEN. See THULDEN.

TUNCOTTO, GIORGIO, an old Piedmontese painter, who was living, according to Count Durando, in 1473, when he painted in the church of S. Domenico at Alba. His works have mostly perished.

TURA, COSIMO, called COSMÈ DA FERRARA, an old painter, born at Ferrara in 1406, and died in 1469. He was a disciple of Galasso Galassi, and painted sacred subjects in the dry, gothic style which prevailed at that time. Several of his works are still preserved in the churches and public edifices of Ferrara. He was court painter in the time of the Duke Borso d'Este, and Tito Strozzi wrote a poetic eulogy upon him. His figures are treated in the style of Andrea Mantegna, the muscles clearly expressed, the architecture drawn with care, the bassi-relievi highly ornamented, and the whole labored in the most minute and exact taste. This is remarkable in his miniatures, which embellish the choral books in the Cathedral and the Certosa, which are shown to foreigners as extreme rarities. He painted both in oil and fresco; his oil paintings are executed in the same labored manner, as seen in his Annunciation and Nativity, in the Cathedral, the Acts of St. Eustace in the monastery of S. Guglielmo, the Virgin with various Saints in the church of S. Giovanni, and Christ praying in the Garden at the Cappuccini. He decorated the palace of Borso, Duke of Ferrara, with a series of twelve frescos, emblematical of the months of the year, which are mentioned by Baruffaldi as very remarkable productions for that early period. The month of the year was scientifically indicated in each picture by astronomical symbols, and classical deities, adapted to each. In each month he introduced the Duke in his usual employment at such season; in the judgment hall, in the chase, at spectacles, &c., with a great variety of circumstances, full of poetry in the execution. There is a picture by him, representing the Madonna with Saints, under splendid but overloaded architecture, in the Berlin Museum. Rosini, in his Storia della Pittura Italiana, tom. iii., gives an outline of a Madonna and Child by him, which is a chaste and beautiful composition. His name is sometimes written Turra.

TURCHI, ALESSANDRO, called L'ORBETTO, an eminent painter, born at Verona, according to Pozzo, and died at Rome in 1648, aged 66; though Passeri places his birth in 1580, and his death in 1650. D'Argenville, and other French biographers, followed by Pilkington, place his birth erroneously in 1600, as his instructor died in 1605. Pozzo says that he was surnamed Orbetto because when he was a child he guided an old blind mendicant about the streets, but Passeri declares that he derived it from a defect in one of his own eyes, which Lanzi says is confirmed by his portrait, blind in the left eye. At all events, Felice Riccio, called Il Brusasorci, perceiving in him a fine genius for painting when a lad, took him into his studio and carefully instructed him in the art, so that in a few years, says Lanzi, he encountered a rival rather than a disciple. On leaving the school of Riccio, he went to Venice, where he studied some time with Carlo Cagliari, and acquired a chaste and natural style of coloring. He next proceeded to Rome, where he diligently studied the works of the great masters, and formed a style wholly his own, in which he attempted to combine the Roman taste of design with the coloring of the Venetian school. He established himself at Rome, where he painted some altar-pieces and other pictures for the churches, in competition with the best followers of the Caracci, with Sacchi and Pietro da Cortona, the most esteemed of which are in the church of La Concezione, executed in competition with Sacchi and Cortona, in which he displayed talents not unworthy of his rivals. Among his other principal works at Rome, are the Flight into Egypt, in S. Romualdo; the Holy Family, in S. Lorenzo; and St. Carlo Borromeo, in S. Salvatore. His best works in public, however, are at Verona, and of these the most worthy of notice are his pictures of the Forty Martyrs in S. Stefano, and a Pietà in La Misericordia, in which last he emulated the grand style of the Caracci in composition, expression, and coloring. He was chiefly employed in painting easel pictures for the collections. Lanzi says that the Marchese Girardini, who was his principal patron, possesses, in his gallery at Verona, enough to enrich several collections, in which it is amusing to trace his progress from the inferior to the most correct specimens. Some writers have not hesitated to rank Turchi with Annibale Caracci, but Lanzi says such assertions "ought not to be listened to anywhere." However, he admits that he succeeded in emulating the design of Caracci on several occasions, with great success; though generally in his naked figures, which in Annibale approach the ancient Greeks, he was far from equalling him. In conclusion he says, "Still he exhibits so many attractions that he never fails to please us in every subject. He seems to have aimed at forming a union of various schools, and added to it a certain originality in giving dignity to the portraits introduced into his histories with the most animated, yet the most delicate complexions. He excelled in the choice and distribution of his colors, among which he introduces a reddish tint, which much enlivens his pictures, and is one of the indications by which we may recognize him as the author. He is said to have exercised exquisite care in the application of his tints, and to have possessed some secret art, by means of which they continue to attract the envy of posterity; but the truth is, he selected, purified, and kneaded well his colors, besides consulting chemists upon the subject. (How few artists seriously consider the importance of this subject; and how many noble works, by great masters, have been lost to the world by the use of injudicious colors, particularly those which chemically react, and in a few years entirely change the original harmonious effect to a discordant mass!) His Passion of the Forty Martyrs, in the church of S. Stefano, in regard to depth of color and foreshortening, partakes much of the Lombard; in point of design and expression, of the Roman; and in its coloring, of the Venetian school. It is one of the most studied, finished, and animated pieces he produced; there is a choiceness in the heads that approaches Guido's; and a skill in composition that throws into the background of the picture a great portion of the multifarious history, as appearing in a field of vast extent, where his figures were admirably varied, according to the distances in which they are supposed to appear. Yet he does not belong to that class of artists who go about in search of personages to fill their histories with figures. On the contrary, he seems to take more pleasure in introducing a smaller number. Thus, in his Pietà at La Misericordia, he exhibits only a dead Christ, the Virgin, and Nicodemus, but the whole is so well designed, arranged, and animated, as well as colored, that it is esteemed by many his masterpiece, and is certainly one of the best paintings in Verona."

TURCO, CESARE, a Neapolitan painter, born, according to Dominici, about 1510. He studied first with Antonio d'Amato, and afterwards with Andrea Sabbatini. He was a good painter in oil, but unsuccessful in fresco. There are some of his works in the churches of Naples, the most esteemed of which are the Baptism of Christ in S. Maria delle Grazie, and the Circumcision in del Gesu. He died in 1560.

TURESTIO, FRANCESCO, a Venetian mosaic worker, who, according to Zanetti, was living in 1618. He executed some beautiful pieces from the designs of Tintoretto, the younger Palma, Leandro Bassano, and other eminent painters.

TURK, THE. See LIOTARD.

TURNER, JOSEPH MALLARD WILLIAM, R. A. This eminent English painter of landscapes and marines, so highly distinguished during the present century, was born in Maiden Lane, Covent Garden, London, in 1775. His father, who carried on a respectable business as a hair-dresser, perceiving in him a strong inclination for art, permitted him to follow the bent of his desires. Young Turner was indebted for much sound advice, and the use of many valuable copies, to Dr. Munro, a distinguished connoisseur and amateur. In company with Girtin, he copied many water-colored drawings in his patron's collection; and they also produced at that time many admirable works in this branch of the art, so closely resembling each other in style, that their respective performances can hardly be distinguished, although Turner's exhibit more elaborateness of detail, yet no less breadth and richness of effect. It is said that the present elevated position of English painting in water colors is due in a great measure to the efforts of these two artists. In 1789, Turner entered as a student of the Royal Academy, and exhibited in the following year a View of the Archbishop's palace at Lambeth, executed in water colors. In 1793, he exhibited his first painting in oil; from 1790 to 1800, when he was elected Associate, he contributed to the exhibition of the Academy nearly sixty pictures. In 1802, he sent several works to the Academy, among which were the Tenth Plague of Egypt, and the Fall of the Clyde. In the same year he was chosen a Royal Academician, and for many years afterwards he painted a large number of pictures, by which he gained both fame and fortune.

Perhaps there is not a more difficult task for a writer on art, than to compose a criticism upon an eminent painter, a few months after his death; and from the novel course of Turner's genius, so many various opinions have been advanced by his detractors and admirers, that his true merits and demerits can hardly be ascertained. The points he most aimed at in his works were light and space; and their highly luminous qualities are their grand characteristics. He scarcely ever placed an important object in his foregrounds, but generally in the centre of his pictures, where also is the greatest mass of light; and opposed to the point of sight is the darkest and largest quantity of shade. These peculiarities are admirably illustrated in the "Golden Bough," an Italian landscape composition, engraved for the London Art Journal from the picture in the Vernon Gallery; while the effect of space and air in the same work, produced by the most delicate application of touch and tint, carries the eye over many miles of distance, where the exact character of the whole landscape can be discerned, till it is lost in the harmonious blending of earth and sky, into which fancy alone can penetrate.

Turner's breadth of effect and of shadow, and his brilliant representation of light, are often carried to extremes, which, though they may fascinate the eye of the uninstructed, can by no means satisfy the judgment of the connoisseur. His admirers ascribe the erratic course of his genius to his redundant imagination; they say that "great geniuses are always great experimentalists, and Turner's vast and comprehensive mind disdained to follow in the track marked out by others, however distinguished; hence he broke away from the trammels which the dogmas of schools would have interposed between him and his genius, and hewed out a way for himself through the world of nature, which none had ever passed before, and which few can hope to follow." Perhaps the true interests of art would have been better promoted, if his genius had been subjected to more severe discipline. Moreover, it is also said that "his mind was too poetically constituted to permit him to treat even the most commonplace subject in a common way; his faculty of conception was too expansive, his power of invention or creation too fertile, to permit him to become a mere imitator of nature; the pencil of the artist is like the pen of the poet, and we seem to be reading an epic when studying one of his pictures." Turner's abundant imagination is nowhere better exemplified than in his Venetian and other Italian views. These landscape compositions exhibit scenes of his own creation, decorated with every conceivable accessory, and invested with such a beauty and glory as they might have possessed in the Golden Age of the Poets. "In his Italian compositions," says Burnet, "the works of Virgil and Ovid were ransacked to people the scenes restored from the remains of ancient Roman architecture. If the sea-ports of England spring from his pencil, the heroes of Nelson, or of the songs of Dibdin, rise before the spectator, enlisting his feelings in the scene." His skies have been greatly admired; the variety of forms in the clouds, their perspective elongation and diminution; the bursts of sunshine from the azure openings; the black masses, "charged with deluges of rain," pouring their burdens through the enshrouding prismatic curtains, all combine to produce an effect of the most enchanting variety and originality.

Turner's early compositions are of a simple character, containing fewer parts than his later works; which arose not only from his being engaged in representations of extensive scenery—such as the embellishment of engraved subjects demanded, where a multitude of objects was required to be given in a small space—but also from his changing his conduct of light and shade from a breadth of shadow to a breadth of light, which gradually expanded to almost a want of solidity in his last paintings; this was also the reason for adopting a more brilliant style of color, since objects could not be rendered sufficiently distinct without cutting up the breadth of light, except by the contact of warm and cold color. The works of Turner indicate three distinct styles. The first shows the closest attention to the most minute detail of nature, and a sober, unaffected application of color. He afterwards launched into a bolder and broader use of his pencil, still adhering closely to form, and using the colors of his palette with great vigor and richness. In his last manner, he appears to have paid his entire attention to color, neglecting form altogether. The second class of his works are probably those upon which his future reputation must rest.

During the unusually long career of this artist, he produced so many pictures that it is quite impossible to insert a catalogue. His marines are generally signed in the trough of the sea, each letter flowing into the motion of the element. It is probable that his coloring will change in the course of time, as many of his pictures were commenced in water color, which renders the oil portion liable to crack and peel off the canvass. His later productions have much less oil in the vehicle than the earlier ones. Many of his works have been engraved, generally under his own supervision; and no pictures lose less of their beauty in this process than Turner's. Several engraved publications have emanated from his pencil, among which is the Liber Studiorum, published in 1808, and now very rare, consisting of a large number of studies or sketches, made in a remarkably free and powerful manner, in imitation of Claude's Liber Veritatis. His "Rivers of England" were engraved after a very beautiful collection of drawings in his possession at the time of his death. Among the other most admired works of this kind are the "Rivers of France," "England and Wales," "The Southern Coast," and his beautiful illustrations of the Poems of Scott, Byron, and Rogers.

The private life of Turner was quite eccentric, and many curious anecdotes are related of him, which cannot properly be recorded in this work. Notwithstanding his wealth, he lived on a very contracted scale; but the noble use to which he finally devoted his property—that of erecting an asylum for decayed and destitute artists—will cause his name to be remembered with blessing to the end of time. The annals of art contain the record of many a noble spirit, that has gone to ruin for the lack of such an institution, but who with its protection might have been the pride and delight of his country. All honor to the name of Turner for his expansive benevolence! He bequeathed to the nation the whole of his finished pictures, on condition that a suitable gallery be erected for their reception within ten years. Turner died in London on the 19th of December, 1851, and was buried in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, by the side of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Those who wish a more extended notice of the style and character of his works, are referred to the editorial remarks in the London Art Journal for February, 1852, together with a subjoined critique by the engraver Burnet; from which the materials of this sketch have been drawn.

TURPILIUS, a Roman Knight, who painted several pictures, formerly preserved at Verona. Pliny gives no information concerning him, except that he painted with his left hand.

TURPIN, PIERRE JEAN FRANÇOIS, an eminent French painter of natural history in water-colors, born in 1775. He made upwards of 6000 drawings in water-colors, beautifully executed on vellum, which were engraved to illustrate various works, among which may be mentioned the Travels of Humboldt and Bompland; the great works on Egypt; the Plants of New Caledonia; Les Icones de M. Decandolle; L'Iconographie Vegetale; L'Atlas du Dictionnaire des Sciences Naturelles; and Duhamel's beautifully illustrated treatise on Fruit Trees. He was living in 1831.

TURRITA, FRA MINO DA, OR FRA JACOPO TURRITA, so called from the place of his nativity in the Sieneſe territory, an old painter in mosaic, about whose history, and the time he flourished, there is much discrepancy. Suffice it to say that Lanzi ſays it is now clearly aſcertained that he was not a painter, but a worker in mosaic, and that he far ſurpaſſed the Greek artiſts of his time. The firſt work known to have been executed by him is in the tribune of the church of St. Giovanni at Florence, and is dated 1225. "On examining what remains of his moſaics in S. Maria Maggiore at Rome, one can hardly be perſuaded that it is the production of ſo rude an age, did not hiſtory conſtrain us to believe it." This work is dated 1495, but Lanzi ſays this muſt refer to the time when it was repaired, for it was finiſhed in 1289, and Turrita died ſoon afterwards; he had commenced another work in St. John of Lateran, which was finiſhed by Gaddo Gaddi in 1292. This explains much of the discrepancy as to the time he flouriſhed, yet Lanzi ſays he was the moſt celebrated moſaic painter of his time in 1225, when he executed his work at Florence, which would prolong his life and faculties to more than one hundred years. There was another Sieneſe painter called Maefiro Mino, or Minuccio, who flouriſhed at Siena in 1289, as is ſhown by a manuſcript in the Library of Siena of that date, in which is found the following memorandum. "Paid, on the 12th of Auguſt, nineteen lire to Maefiro Mino, the painter, who painted the Virgin Mary and other SS. in the council-room of the public palace, the balance, &c." Thus, ſays Lanzi, we diſcover another eminent painter of the name of Mino, who flouriſhed at Siena at the ſame time that Fra Mino was employed at Rome. "The picture alluded to remained in the Council Chamber even within my memory, with others, dated down to 1298. He there repreſented the Virgin and Child ſurrounded by angels, under a canopy ſupported by apoſtles and the patron ſaint of the city, a ſurpriſing production for the age." All theſe works are attributed by other writers to the one artiſt, Fra Mino, who, they ſay, was both a painter and a worker in moſaic. Granting that there were two, as ſeems evident, the discrepancy of dates is not obviated, unleſs we ſuppoſe that Maefiro Mino alſo wrought in moſaic.

TUSCHER, MARCUS, a German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1706. He ſtudied with J. D. Preisler, and afterwards went to Italy, where he reſided about ten years. He painted converſations and dramatic ſubjects, and engraved ſome plates of hiſtorical ſubjects, vignettes, portraits, and other book plates, from his own deſigns, and after other maſters. He is ſaid to have viſited France, Holland, England, and Denmark, in all which countries he practiced his profeſſion. Füssli deſcribes him as an univerſal artiſt, painter, engraver, ſculptor, carver in wood, architect and gem engraver. Lord Orford ſays he was a painter, architect, and engraver. He ſometimes ſigned his plates with his name, and at others with his initials, M. T. fecit. He is ſuppoſed to have died in Denmark about 1755.

TUTIANI, BARTOLOMEO, an engraver on wood, who is ſaid to have executed ſome cuts marked with a gothic monogram of his initials. Bartsch deſcribes only one cut with this mark, repreſenting Chriſt ſcoffed at by the Jews, which occurs in a book printed at Nuremberg in 1515; but there is no evidence that it was engraved by Tutiani.

TUTILO, a celebrated monk of the convent of St. Gall in Switzerland, who flouriſhed in the latter part of the 9th century. Tutilo, and Notker, of the ſame convent, were the moſt celebrated painters, ſculptors, and goldworkers of their time in Germany. The former made for the Abbot Salomo of St. Gall, a golden crucifix, richly ornamented with baſ-reliefs and precious ſtones. He alſo made a celebrated image of the Virgin Mary, in gold, for a church at Metz, by which he acquired great celebrity. In the church of St. Otmar, alſo at St. Gall, the altar of St. Gall was decorated with ſome copper plates, on which the life of that ſaint was engraved or carved by Tutilo. He is ſaid to have died in 896.

TYN, LAMBERT DE, a Belgian painter, born at Antwerp in 1770. He ſtudied with P. van Regemorter, and painted interiors with converſations by candle light, landſcapes by moonlight, and familiar ſubjects, with conſiderable reputation. He died in 1816.

TYROFF, MARTIN, a German engraver and publisher, who flouriſhed at Nuremberg about 1750. He engraved a conſiderable number of portraits and other book plates.

TYSON, MICHAEL, a fellow of Bennet College, Cambridge, was born in Stamford in 1740. His principal reſearches were in hiſtory, biography, and antiquities, which he very ably illuſtrated, according to Chalmers, both as a draughtſman and engraver. He painted for amuſement, and etched ſeveral plates, particularly the portrait of Archbiſhop Parker, taken from an illumination by T. Berg, preſerved in the library of Bennet College. Strutt mentions two prints by Tyſon, the portrait of Sir William Paulet, and that of Jane Shore, from an original picture at King's College, Cambridge; Chalmers alſo ſays he engraved the portraits of Michael Dalton, Jacob Butler, and ſeveral other of his private friends. Tyſon died in 1780.

TYSSENS, PETER, a Flemiſh painter, born at Antwerp in 1625. It is not known under whom he ſtudied, but he emulated Vandyck, and approaches ſo near the correct deſign, and chaſte coloring which characterize the productions of that eminent maſter, that it is not eaſy to diſcriminate between their reſpective performances. He greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf both in portraits and hiſtory, and after the death of Rubens and Vandyck, was conſidered one of the ableſt painters of his time. He was made director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1661. His compositions are copious and ingenious, his design more correct than is usual with the painters of his country, his coloring is strong, clear, and harmonious, and he usually enriched his backgrounds with magnificent architecture. He executed some altar-pieces and other works for the churches in Flanders, which sustain his reputation in the vicinity of the works of the greatest masters of the Flemish school. Among those most worthy of notice, are the Martyrdom of St. Benedict, in the church of the Capuchins at Brussels; the Crucifixion at the Barefooted Carmelites, and the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of St. James at Antwerp; the last mentioned has frequently been mistaken for a work by Vandyck. He died, according to the best authorities, in 1692, though Balkema says in 1682.

TYSSENS, AUGUSTINE, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp about 1660, some say about 1655; Zani places his birth in 1660, and his death in 1710; Balkema says he was born in 1662, and died in 1722. He studied with his father, but his genius leading him to landscape, he made the works of Nicholas Berghem his model, and became one of the most successful followers of his style. His landscapes are embellished with ruins, figures, and cattle, correctly designed and neatly touched; they are highly esteemed, and admitted into the choicest collections. He was director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1691.

TYSSENS, NICHOLAS. This artist is variously said to have been the elder and the younger son of Peter Tyssens, but it is agreed that he was born at Antwerp in 1660. After receiving instruction from his father he went to Italy, and passed some time at Venice, Rome, and Naples. He devoted himself to still-life, but he does not seem to have met with any great encouragement, though his pictures are said to be well composed and executed; they represent fruit, flowers, armor, sabres, and other military weapons, which he rendered interesting by a correct and faithful delineation, picturesque and ingenious arrangement, and an intelligent conduct of the chiaro-scuro. He was an excellent judge of the authenticity of old paintings, and was frequently commissioned to purchase valuable paintings. The Elector Palatine sent him through the Low Countries to purchase rare works for his gallery at Dusseldorf, which commission he executed to the entire satisfaction of his employer. Balkema says he died at London in 1719.

U

UBERTI, PIETRO, an eminent Venetian portrait painter, who flourished, according to Zanetti, about 1733. He was the son of Domenico U., an artist of little note. He is celebrated in the Guida di Venezia, for his portraits, particularly for eight, representing the Avogadori of his time, painted for the Avogaria (Court House); which was considered a very honorable commission, formerly bestowed upon Domenico Tintoretto, Tinelli, Bombelli, and other artists, all celebrated in the same branch.

UBERTINI, FRANCESCO, called IL BACCHIACCA, or BACHICCA, a Florentine artist, who flourished from about 1530 to 1557. He painted history with considerable reputation, and excelled in grotesque and ornamental subjects. One of his best historical works is the Martyrdom of St. Arcadio, in the church of S. Lorenzo at Florence. The latter part of his life was passed in the service of the Grand Duke, for whom he painted some historical works for his gallery, and executed some beautiful designs for tapestry. His historical pictures are generally of small size, with numerous figures, many of which, according to Lanzi, were sent to England. He also decorated various articles of rich furniture. Vasari says his best work was a cabinet, "ornamented divinely with flowers and birds in oil colors, for the Grand Duke."

UBERTINI, ANTONIO, was the brother of the preceding. He was a celebrated weaver of tapestry and embroidery. He executed some exquisite works from his brother's designs for the Grand Duke. He was also employed by the Prince Doria at Genoa.

UBERTINI, BACCIO, another brother of Francesco U. He was a scholar of Pietro Perugino. Lanzi says "he was a great colorist, and on that account was employed as an assistant to his master."

UCCELLO, PAOLO MAZZOCCHI, an old painter, born at Florence in 1349, and a disciple of Antonio Veneziano. He was one of the first who cultivated perspective; before his time, buildings had not a true point of perspective, and figures appeared sometimes as if falling or slipping off the canvass. He made this branch so much his hobby, that he neglected other essential parts. To improve his knowledge, he studied with Giovanni Manetti, a celebrated mathematician. He distinguished himself as a painter of animals, and particularly excelled in depicting all kinds of birds, of which he formed a large collection of the most curious; hence he was called Uccello (bird.) He acquired great distinction in his time, and some of his works still remain in the churches and convents of Florence. In the church of S. Maria Novella, are several subjects from the Old Testament, which he selected for the purpose of introducing his favorite objects of beasts and birds; among them are Adam and Eve in Paradise, Noah entering the Ark, the Deluge, &c. He painted battles of lions, tigers, serpents, &c., with peasants flying in terror from the scene of combat. He also painted landscapes, with cattle, figures, and ruins, possessing so much truth and nature, that Lanzi says he may be justly called the Bassano of his age. He sometimes painted figures of a colossal size; in the cathedral is a gigantic equestrian portrait of Giovanni Aguto, painted in green earth, and at Padua he painted several figures of giants in the house of Vitali. He was much employed in ornamenting articles of furniture, and in the Florentine gallery are the Triumphs of Petrarch, painted on small cabinets, which are attributed to him. Some of his pictures are signed Pauli Uccelli Opus. Rosini, plate 30, gives an outline of his picture of the Deluge. He was living in 1436.

UDINE, GIOVANNI DA, a painter born at Udine in 1494. His family name is variously called Manini, Nanni, and Ricamatore. Lanzi says that i the Carte Antiche of Udine, signed by him, there appears only the family name of Ricamatore, and that Nanni or Nani, are contractions of Giovanni, used by the common people in some parts of Italy, which have again been corrupted by historians into Manni and Mani. He is however, usually known in the history of art as Giovanni da Udine. According to Baldinucci, he was born in 1494, and died in 1564; but Renaldi, with better authority, places his birth in 1489, and his death in 1561. Discovering an early passion for painting, his father sent him to Venice, and placed him under the instruction of Giorgione. He had already acquired considerable reputation at Venice, when the fame of Raffaello inspired him with a desire to visit Rome, to enjoy the benefit of his instructions. Through the influence of his protector, the patriarch Grimani, and Count Baldassare Castiglione, he was admitted into Raffaello's studio, and was employed by him in painting the ornamental accessories in many of his works, consisting of animals, birds, fruit, and flowers, in which he particularly excelled. At the time he was thus engaged, the discovery was made of the precious remains of antiquity in the Baths of Titus, and Raffaello selected him to make designs from the beautiful grotesque ornaments in stucco, found in the different apartments. He not only succeeded in this to the entire satisfaction of his instructor, but he discovered a process of compounding stucco, which had the same appearance, and probably the same durability as that used by the Romans. He was now employed by Raffaello to execute the greater part of the arabesque and grotesque ornaments in stucco in the Loggie, and apartments of the Vatican, which he finished in so tasteful and masterly a style, that they have ever since been the objects of universal admiration. After the death of Raffaello he was employed by Clement VII., in conjunction with Pierino del Vaga, to decorate that part of the Vatican called La Torre di Borgia, where they represented the Seven Planets; the emblematical figures were designed by Vaga, and the grotesque ornaments and symbolical decorations by Udine. On the sacking of Rome in 1527, he fled to his native city, where he was employed some time. He was afterwards engaged by the family of the Medici at Florence, for whom he executed some considerable works. He also visited other cities of Italy, and everywhere left exquisite specimens of his hand. He returned to Rome in the pontificate of Pius IV., where he died, in 1561, and was buried, by his own request, in the church of La Rotonda, near the tomb of Raffaello.

Giovanni da Udine chiefly excelled in painting in fresco every species of arabesque and grotesque ornament, fruit, flowers, foliage, shells, aviaries, birds, animals, and all kinds of objects of still-life, which he imitated so exquisitely, as to deceive the eye; in animals and birds particularly, he is said to have reached the highest point of excellence. He was remarkable for counterfeiting with his pencil every species of furniture, and a story is told that a groom in the service of the Pope mistook one of his imitations of a carpet for a real one, and stooped down to take it up. He also painted occasionally these subjects in oil, and pictures claimed to be originals by him are to be found scattered in many collections in Italy, though Lanzi considers many of them of very doubtful authenticity; "not indeed, that he produced no specimens in oil, although it is extremely difficult to discover any that are certain; nor that he was incapable of drawing larger figures than such as are seen in his satyrs, in his boys and nymphs, with which he diversified the little landscapes, and the tracery of his grotesques." Vasari mentions some of his Standards, one of which, executed at Udine for the Fraternity of Castello, presents in large proportions, the Holy Virgin with the Infant Christ, and an angel making her an offering of the same castle. The original is still preserved in the chapel, though much defaced, with a copy made by Pini in 1653. There likewise remains in the archiepiscopal palace at Udine, among some grotesques, two scripture histories drawn in half-length figures, which, though not so perfect as the ornamental parts, are valuable for their rarity.

UDINE, GIROLAMO DA, a painter of Udine, who flourished about 1540. Little is known of him; there is an altar-piece, representing the Coronation of the Virgin, in the church of S. Francesco at Udine, bearing his signature. Lanzi says it exhibits novel invention, though rather strained, with a vigorous and effective style of coloring.

UDINE, MARTINO DA, called PELLEGRINO DI SAN DANIELLO. There is some discrepancy about the name of this painter, and the place of his nativity; some say that he was born at Udine about 1480, and others at the castle of San Daniello, about ten miles distant from Udine. Lanzi says that his name was Martino da Udine, but his instructor, Bellini, in honor of his rare genius, bestowed upon him the name of Pellegrino, to which the name of the country where he afterwards long resided and executed many of his best works was attached, so that he came to be called Pellegrino di San Daniello. He studied with Giovanni Bellini during that artist's residence at Udine, and, according to Vasari, had for his fellow-pupil Giovanni Martini, also a native of Udine. They were both men of genius, emulous to excel each other, and afterwards executed many works in competition at Udine, which proved of advantage to the reputation of both. According to his biographer, Renaldi, he executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Udine and San Daniello, both in oil and fresco, which raised his reputation nearly to a level with that of his instructor, whose works were then held in the highest estimation. In the Cathedral at Udine is his picture of St. Joseph with the infants Christ and St. John, which was esteemed not inferior to the picture of St. Mark in the same edifice by Bellini. His most celebrated performance is an altar-piece in S. Maria de Battuti, representing the Virgin with several female saints and St. John the Baptist, which displays a dawning of that breadth of style and mellowness of coloring afterwards carried to such perfection by Giorgione. In the church of S. Antonio at San Daniello, are several frescos of the Life of Christ by him, which are highly commended. The Duke of Ferrara invited him to his court, held him in the highest esteem, not only for his professional talents but for his various accomplishments, and loaded him with favors. He is allowed to have had a fine genius, a fertile invention, and in many respects to have been superior to Bellini. He died about 1545.

UGGIONE, or OGGIONE, or DA OGGIONE, MARCO, a painter born at Oggione, near Milan, about 1480. He was a favorite disciple of Lion-ardo da Vinci, and may justly be regarded one of the ablest artists of the Milanese school. Lanzi says he was celebrated for his frescos, and his works in the church and refectory of S. Maria della Pace, still retain the outline entire and the colors bright. "Some of them are in the church, and a very magnificent picture of the Crucifixion is to be seen in the refectory, surprising for the variety, beauty, and spirit of the figures. Few Lombard artists attained the degree of expression that is here manifested, and few to such mastery of composition and novelty of costume. He aimed at elegance of proportions; but in those of his horses, he is seen to be the disciple of Vinci. For the refectory of the Certosa at Pavia, he copied the Last Supper of Lionardo, and in such a manner as to supply in a measure the loss of the original. Milan boasts two of his altar-pieces in oil—one at S. Paolo in Compito, and the other at S. Eufemia—both excellent performances, in the style of his master, though the manner which he observed in his frescos, is more soft and analogous to modern composition." Stanley says that Uggi-one's copy of the Last Supper, painted for the Refectory of the Carthusians at Pavia, is now in the Royal Academy of Arts at London; it was imported into that country by a foreigner, in conjunction with Mr. Jones, a dealer in old pictures, and it was placed in that institution, mainly through Stanley's influence. The original, in the refectory of the Padri Dominicani at Milan, was painted in distemper, and Lanzi, though he does not expressly state it, strongly conveys the idea that the copy by Oggione was painted in fresco, for while he commends this work, he speaks of his oil pictures as being far inferior to his frescos.

UHLICK, an obscure German engraver, who flourished from about 1719 to 1740. He engraved some portraits in a neat, but stiff and formal style.

ULDERICO, HANS. See JOHN or HANS ULRIC, JOHN ULRIC PILGRIM; PASTI, and Preface, p. xiii.

ULFT, JACOB VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Gorcum, about 1627. It is not known with whom he studied, but his first occupation was painting on glass, and there are some of his windows in the churches of Gorcum and in Guelderland, which are little inferior to the works of the celebrated Dirk and Wouter Crabeth. He afterwards devoted himself to painting cabinet pictures of historical subjects, in which he acquired distinction. His pictures represent subjects from Roman history, processions, and markets, in which he introduced the most remarkable views in Rome and its vicinity; hence it has been supposed by some that he visited Italy, but the Dutch biographers have proved that he was never out of his own country. He had a perfect acquaintance with perspective and architecture, and copied his scenery from the prints and drawings of others, which he selected with judgment and taste. His works are generally crowded with figures, tastefully grouped, and he observed a marked attention to the propriety of costume. His pictures are very highly finished, and so labored as to appear like paintings on glass; yet they are highly esteemed in his own country, out of which they are scarcely known. His works are very rare, as he bestowed great labor upon them, and much of his time was occupied in discharging the duties of his office as one of the Burgomasters of the city. He died at Gorcum, some say, in 1679, though there is no certainty as to the exact time of his birth or death.

ULIVELLI, COSIMO, a painter born at Florence in 1625, and died in 1704. He studied under Baldassare Franceschini, whose style he emulated so closely that Lanzi says his works have sometimes been mistaken for those of his master, though to the intelligent observer they will appear less elegant in the forms, less chaste and effective in the coloring, and somewhat mannered and labored in the execution. Some of his best works are in the cloister of the Carmine, and prove him to have been an artist of ability.

ULRIC, HANS or JOHN, a real or supposed German artist, mentioned by Strutt as a skillful engraver on wood in chiaro-scuro. Baron Heineken conjectures that he flourished before the time of Ugo da Carpi. He is said to have marked his prints with the above monogram, composed of the initials I. and V. on a tablet, separated by two swords. But there is no certainty about him, either as to name, country, or the time he flourished, and a long dissertation, without further critical research, would amount to nothing. The monogram is very similar to that used by John Ulric Pilgrim, and it seems very probable that they are one and the same artist. See Pilgrim.

ULRICK, HENRY, a German engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg from about 1590 to 1628. He engraved some portraits and other subjects, among which are twelve circular prints, one of them of the Crucifixion. They are executed with the graver, in a stiff, formal style.

UMBACH, JONAS, a German painter and engraver, born at Augsburg in 1624, and died in 1680, according to Zani; but Brulliot says in 1700. He painted history with reputation, and executed a great number of small but spirited etchings from his own designs. Some of these are marked with his name, and others with a monogram composed of his initials. He had a son, also named Jonas, but there are no particulars recorded of him, except that he painted portraits.

UNTERBERGER, IGNATIUS, a distinguished German painter, was born in 1744, at Karales in the Tyrol. The Biographie Universelle states that his family has produced many artists, but none of them are mentioned. After acquiring the elements of design from his father, he visited Rome at the age of twenty, and studied under the direction of his brother. He designed the remains of Greek and Roman antiquity, composed several good historical subjects, and was among the artists employed to copy the Loggie of Raffaele in the Vatican, for the Empress of Russia. In 1776 he settled at Vienna, and exhibited several historical pictures, and representations of cameos and arabesques, which were greatly admired. From this time, Unterberger became the favorite painter of the minister Kaunitz, and his works were in great demand. They are distinguished for an elevated style of composition; and the management of the groups and masses of light, the drapery, and the coloring, are highly praised. His figures are full of animated expression, and he enriched his subjects of history with landscapes, decorated with animals and vestiges of ancient architecture.—Among the principal works of Unterberger are the Descent of the Holy Spirit, in the principal church of Koenigsgratz; and an allegorical subject impersonifying Peace and Love, as a young girl caressing a lamb. His picture of Hebe presenting ambrosia to Jupiter under the form of an Eagle, was purchased by the Emperor Francis II. for ten thousand florins, and placed in his own chamber. Unterberger practiced the art for many years, and died in 1797.

URBAIN, FERDINAND DE ST., an eminent French medalist, was born at Nancy in Lorraine, according to the Biographie Universelle, in 1654. His family had been ennobled by the Dukes of Lorraine. The accounts of his early life are very imperfect; he is said to have acquired a knowledge of design and painting without an instructor, and then to have left his native country for Germany. In 1671, he visited an uncle who was residing at Munich, and afterwards traveled through Germany and Italy for improvement. During this time, he must have attained considerable excellence as a medalist; for after arriving at Bologna he was received into the Academy, and appointed engraver to the municipal counsellor, who entrusted him with the direction of his cabinet of medals. After remaining in this position about ten years, Urbain was invited to Rome by Pope Innocent XI., who appointed him his medalist, and he discharged the duties of his office under that pope, and his successors Alexander VIII. and Innocent XII., executing many admirable medals and designs for the mint. He is also said to have been employed by the popes as an architect, but none of his edifices are mentioned. Finally, after twenty years spent at Rome, Duke Leopold I., wishing to recall him to Lorraine, succeeded in obtaining the pope's consent to his departure; and on Urbain's arrival, he received him with marks of great distinction, assigning him a liberal pension, with apartments in the mint at Nancy. During a period of thirty-five years spent in the service of dukes Leopold I. and Francis III., he executed a large number of medals for the royal houses of Spain and of Orleans, for the Elector Palatine, for the Italian princes, for cardinals, prelates, and illustrious men. He commenced a set of medals of the popes, which he did not succeed in completing; but his set of the Dukes of Lorraine was entirely finished by his own hand. It is said that all the matrices from his burin are in the Imperial Cabinet of Medals at Vienna. During a very long career, Urbain executed a large number of beautiful works, and in 1735, he was honored by Clement XII. with the order di Cristo. He died at Nancy in 1738, aged eighty-five.

URBANI, MICHAEL ANGELO, an eminent painter on glass, born at Cortona, who flourished about 1564. He was employed in painting the windows of the churches in Tuscany, and other parts of Italy.

URBANIS, GIULIO, a painter of San Daniello, who studied with Pomponio Amalteo, and followed his manner. Lanzi mentions a fresco by him at San Daniello, representing the Virgin with the infant Christ, seated upon a throne, surrounded by St. Thomas the Apostle, St. Valentine, and other Saints, signed Opus Julii Urbanis, 1574; it partakes of the taste of Amalteo and Pordenone.

URBANO, PIETRO, a painter of Pistoja, who flourished in the first half of the 16th century.

He was a disciple of Michael Angelo, whose style he emulated. Lanzi says he was a man of genius, but very indolent. There are some of his works in the churches of his native city.

URBINELLI, a painter who flourished at Urbino in the first part of the 17th century. His works are found in the public edifices and private collections in that city. Lanzi says, "he was a vigorous painter, an excellent colorist, and partial to the Venetian school."

URBINI, or URBINO, CARLO, a painter of Crema, who flourished there in the last half of the 16th century. His will is dated 1585. He executed some works for the churches and public edifices of his native city, as well as others for the collections. He was employed at Milan and elsewhere. Lanzi says he was one of the least celebrated, but one of the most deserving artists of his age. Some of his principal works are in a public hall in his native city, which he decorated with a series of national battles and victories.

URBINO, RAFFAELLE SANZIO DI. See RAFFAELLE.

URBINO, IL PRETE, or TIMOTEO and PIETRO DI. See VITE.

URBINO, TERENCE DI. See TERENCE.

URBINO, CROCCHIA DI, a painter of Urbino, whom, according to Baldinucci, the citizens of Urbino claim to have been a scholar of Raffaele, and assign to him a fine picture at the Capuchins in that city. He is a different artist from Della Vite.

URBINO, GIOVANNI and FRANCESCO DI, two painters of Urbino, whom Lanzi thinks were scholars of Federigo Baroccio, and though he is not positive, he says he feels a pleasure in restoring them to the glorious country from which they had been separated. "In the Descrizione odepórica della Spagna, we find Giovanni and Francesco di Urbino mentioned, who, about 1575, were both engaged by the court of Spain to decorate the Escorial. The latter came early in life to Spain, and being endowed with a noble genius, soon became an excellent artist, and is extolled by his cotemporary, P. Siguenza, and by all who have seen the Judgment of Solomon and his other pictures, in a choir in that magnificent place. He died young."

URBINO, LUCA DI, an Italian engraver, by whom there is a set of prints for a Drawing Book, from the designs of Michael Angelo, the Caracci, and other masters. On one of the plates in the book above mentioned he inscribed his name LUCAS DE URBINO, F.

URIA, PEDRO DE, a Spanish architect of the 16th century, by whom Milizia mentions only one work, the Bridge of Almaraz, over the Tagus, a few miles distant from Plasencia. It is a structure that may compare with the boldest efforts of this description. Two large Gothic arches form the bridge, 580 feet long, 25 feet wide, and 134 feet high. The piers are lofty towers, and that in the centre stands on a high rock. Another pier has a semi-circular projection between the arches, forming a piazza at the top, on which is an inscription, importing that the work was erected in 1552, at the expense of the city of Plasencia, under Charles V., by Pedro de Uria.

UROO, ENRICO, called also by the Italians, ENRICO DI SPAGNA, and ENRICO DELLE MARINE. See HENRY CORNELIUS DE VROOM.

USTAMBER, PEDRO DE. an architect who flourished in Spain during the eleventh century. According to Milizia, by order of King Ferdinand of Castile, he took down the old church of St. John the Baptist, of Leon; and erected another of stone, dedicated to St. Isidorus, whose remains were removed from Seville. Within this church is the sepulchre of the architect, a lofty tomb of polished stone, which imports that he also built the bridge called Ustamber.

UTRECHT, ADRIAN VAN. an eminent Flemish painter of subjects of still-life, was born at Antwerp in 1599. He painted fruit, flowers, shell-fish, dead game, birds, &c., sometimes together, and sometimes separate, with such elegance of composition, and remarkable truth and freedom of touch, that he received many more orders than he could execute. He frequently assisted other artists by painting the fruit and flowers in their pictures, and according to Houbraken and Descamps, he excelled all the other Flemish painters of still-life, except Francis Snyders. His best pictures were purchased by the king of Spain. His works are now very scarce, and command high prices. Van Utrecht visited Spain, where he was much employed by Philip IV.; and it was there he painted the magnificent assemblage of fruit in the large picture by Rubens of Pythagoras and his Disciples, which is now placed in Buckingham Palace. He died wealthy, at Antwerp, in 1651.

UYTENBROECK, MOSES, called LITTLE MOSES, from the small size of his prints. He was a native of the Low Countries, and according to the dates on his prints, flourished from about 1615 to 1646; some say he died in 1650, but this is uncertain. He painted small landscapes, embellished with subjects from history or fable, so much in the style of Cornelius Poelemburg that it is supposed that many of his works are now attributed to that master, and that he was his pupil. Of his etchings and engravings, Bartsch gives a description of fifty-eight (Le Peintre Graveur, tom. v.), to which Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has added nine more, with full particulars of the variations of those described by his predecessor. From some whimsical fancy, he variously signed his prints Uytbroeck, Utenbroeck, Vytbroeck, Vtenbroeck, Wtenbroeck, Wtenbroeck, Veit vander Broeck, Van Broeck, Broeck, and various other contractions, for which see Monograms, plate xxiii.

UYTENWÆL, JOACHIM, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1566. He was the son of a painter on glass, who brought him up to his own business till he was eighteen years of age, when he became the scholar of Joseph de Beer, with whom he studied three years, and then went to Italy, where he resided some time. At Padua, he became acquainted with the Bishop of St. Malo, whom he accompanied to France, and remained in his employment two years, when he returned to his native city, where he passed the rest of his life. He painted history in the manner of Bartholomew Spranger, and though his pictures are well colored and elaborately finished, his design, like that of his model, is generally incorrect, and his draperies often fantastical. His cabinet pictures of mythological subjects are the best. Van Mander commends two small pictures by him in the collection of the Elector Palatine, representing the Feast of the Gods, and Mars and Venus. They are elaborately finished and well colored. He died in 1624.

V.

VAART, JOHN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1647, and studied under Thomas Wyck. He went to England in 1674, where he painted landscapes, objects of still-life, and dead game, with considerable reputation, particularly the latter, in which he excelled. He also scraped a few indifferent portraits in mezzotinto. He died at London in 1721.

VACCA, FLAMINIO, a Roman sculptor of the latter part of the 16th century. He is less known as a statuary, than as a restorer of statues, although many of his own works adorn the churches, squares, and fountains of Rome. He wrought in that capital in the pontificate of Sixtus V., and was also invited into Tuscany. In 1594, he completed his manuscript entitled Memorie di varie Antichità di Roma, which was published by Ottavio Falconieri at Rome in 1704. It is inserted in Montfaucon's Iter Italicum, in a Latin translation, and has gained considerable celebrity for its author.

VACCARINI, BARTOLOMEO, an old painter of Ferrara, who flourished, according to Baruffaldi, about 1450. There are some of his works at Ferrara signed with his name, executed in the dry and gothic style of his time.

VACCARO, ANDREA, a painter born at Naples, according to Dominici, in 1598, and died there in 1670. He was a disciple of Cav. Massimo Stanzioni, on leaving whom, he adopted the style of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, which he followed for some time, with such success, that some of his earlier works, especially his cabinet pictures, have been frequently mistaken by good judges for the productions of that master. Lanzi says "he was the rival of Massimo, but at the same time, his admirer and friend; possessing great imitative powers, he was afterwards induced by the advice of Stanzioni, to adopt the style of Guido, in which he succeeded in an admirable manner, though not equal to his friend. In this style he executed his most celebrated works at the Certosa, at the Teatini, and at the Rosario, without enumerating his numerous productions in the collections." After the death of Massimo, he was considered the ablest artist of the Neapolitan school, and was without a rival until the return of Luca Giordano from Rome with a new style, from the school of Pietro da Cortona. Both artists were competitors for the large altar-piece in the new church of S. Maria del Pianti, representing the Virgin liberating the city from pestilence; the designs were submitted to Cortona as umpire, who decided against his own scholar, in favor of Vaccaro, observing that, as he was first in years, so he was first in design and expression. Giordano, however, soon carried all before him, and Vaccaro, now advanced in years, in attempting to compete with him in fresco, which he had not studied in his youth, lost his reputation.

VACCARO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver, said to have been born at Bologna in 1636, though probably at an earlier date, as Zani says he operated as early as 1650. He studied under Francesco Albano, but devoted himself chiefly to painting perspective and architectural pieces. He published a treatise on perspective, illustrated with plates engraved from his own designs. There is also a set of twelve perspective views of ruins, fountains, and other edifices in Italy by him, inscribed Fr. Vaccaro fec. He died in 1687.

VACCARO, DOMENICO ANTONIO. This artist was born at Naples in 1680, and is said by Milizia to have been a painter, sculptor, and architect; but he probably did not practice the first to any extent, as his name is not mentioned by Lanzi. After receiving a good education, he studied architecture, and attained considerable eminence. At Naples he built the church of the monastery of the Concezione, called di Monte Calvario, of nearly a circular form, interrupted by four arches, supporting four tribunes. He also constructed the Teatro Nuovo; modernized the church Monte Vergine near that of Gesu Vecchio; and built that of S. Michele Arcangelo, without the gate Spirito Santo. Vaccaro erected a number of other works at Naples and in other parts of the kingdom, among which are the Tarsia palace, the little palace of Caravita, at Portici; and the church of S. Giovanni at Capua.

VACCELLINI, GAETANO. See VASCELLINI.

VADDER, LOUIS DE, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1560. It is not known under whom he studied, but he is ranked among the ablest landscape painters of his country. From the grandeur of his style and the picturesque beauty of his scenery, it is supposed that he visited Italy, where he appears to have made the works of Titian the particular objects of his study, as his best works have a striking resemblance to the admirable landscapes of that great master. His touch is uncommonly firm and free, and his coloring, though vigorous, is tender and chaste. He had a good knowledge of perspective, and proportioned every object to its distance; his grounds are pleasingly broken, the forms of his rocks and trees are noble and select, and his pictures are usually distinguished by a vapory degradation, which is only to be found in the works of the most faithful observers of nature. It was his custom to frequent the fields before sunrise, to observe the gradual diffusion of light and its effects in unfolding the hills and mountains by the gradual dispersion of the mists and vapors. His works are not much known out of his own country, where they are deservedly esteemed, and found in the choicest collections. He executed some spirited etchings from his own designs, in a style resembling that of Lucas van Uden. He died at Brussels in 1623.

VAFFLARD, PIERRE ANTOINE AUGUSTIN, a French painter of the present century, whose career is now probably terminated, was born at Paris in 1777. He studied under J. B. Regnault, and subsequently practiced the art with reputation for many years. Most of his works are poetical subjects, well chosen, and ably executed; besides which he painted portraits, and subjects from the history of his country. The government purchased many of his productions, and employed him in restoring many of the decorations of the galleries at the Tuileries and Versailles. Among the principal works of Vafflard are, the Barricades in July, 1830; Molière reading his Tartuffe; and subjects from the lives of Henry IV. and Napoleon.

VAGA, PIERINO DEL. The name of this artist was Pietro Buonaccorsi, but he was called Pierino del Vaga, after one of his instructors, who conducted him to Rome, and was the means of introducing him into the school of Raffaello, and thus leading him to distinction. He was born at a small village near Florence, in 1500, and having the misfortune to lose his parents during infancy, he was taken under the care of Andrea de Ceri, whose house was much frequented by the young artists of Florence. At an early age, he discovered a decided genius for art, and was placed under the instruction of Ridolfo Ghirlandaio, with whom he made great progress. In 1515, he accompanied del Vaga, a Florentine painter of some note, to Rome, where he had the advantage of studying the antique, and the works of Michael Angelo. His merits becoming known to Giulio Romano and Gio. Francesco Penni, two of the principal disciples and assistants of Raffaello, they recommended him to the notice of that illustrious master, who received him into his academy, and employed him in the Loggie of the Vatican. Such was the versatility of his powers, that he was equally successful in assisting Giovanni da Udine in the stuccos and grotesque ornaments, and Polidoro da Caravaggio in his antique subjects in chiaro-scuro, as well as in executing several scriptural histories from the designs of Raffaello, the principal of which are, Abraham preparing to sacrifice Isaac, Jacob wrestling with the Angel, Joseph and his Brethren, the Battle of Joshua, the Passage of the Jordan, and the Capture of Jericho. On the death of Raffaello, he was employed by Leo X. and Clement VII., in conjunction with Giulio Romano and Gio. Francesco Penni, to finish the great works in the Vatican. Lanzi says that he was a relation, as well as a fellow citizen of Penni. One of the earliest works which he exhibited at Rome from his own composition was the Creation of Eve, in the church of S. Marcello, designed in the grand style of Michael Angelo, which Lanzi characterizes as a "most finished performance."

Pierino del Vaga was in full possession of public esteem, when the dreadful sacking of Rome by the Spaniards in 1527, so disastrous to the arts and artists in Italy, compelled him to fly from that capital, and having lost all his property, he arrived at Genoa in a state of distress in 1528, where he was liberally welcomed by the Prince Doria, who employed him for several years in the decorations of his magnificent palace, situated without the gate of S. Tommaso. It was here that he displayed the extent of his powers, and the fecundity of his invention; so that it has been a matter of dispute whether Giulio Romano, in the Palazzo del Te at Mantua, or Pierino, in the Palazzo Doria at Genoa, has done most honor to the great school in which they were educated. Lanzi says, "Pierino nowhere displayed his talents to such advantage as in the Doria Palace. He superintended the exterior decorations of the sculptures, as well as the interior ornaments of the stuccos, the gilding, the arabesques, the paintings in fresco and in oil. This place in consequence, breathes all the taste of the halls and loggie of the Vatican, the celebrated works of which attracted universal admiration, and in the execution of a part of which, Pierino had a considerable share. We find in the Doria Palace some small histories of celebrated Romans, of Cocles, for example, and of Scævola, which might pass for the compositions of Raffaello; a group of Boys at play, likewise, has all the air of that master; and on a ceiling, in the War of the Giants against the Gods, we seem to behold in conflict, the same persons whom Raffaello had represented as banqueting in the Casa Chigi. If the expression be not so noble, nor the grace so rare, it is because that grand specimen of art may be emulated by many, but equalled by none. It may be added that his style is less finished than Raffaello's, and that in his drawing of the naked figure, he, like Giulio Romano, partakes of the style of Michael Angelo." Pierino also decorated several apartments with subjects taken from Roman history, and the Metamorphoses of Ovid; he also designed for tapestry a series of cartoons of the history of Æneas. All these works are not, however, executed with equal care, and Lanzi says that his avidity for gain drew down upon him merited reprehension, for while Raffaele and Giulio Romano were indefatigable in their application, selecting only the best artists for their assistants, Pierino contented himself with preparing his cartoons, and entrusted their execution mostly or entirely to his pupils or assistants, some of whom were artists of inferior talents,—a practice which, though it added materially to his pecuniary advantage, was detrimental to his reputation. Vasari informs us that four of the chambers in the Doria palace were executed from the designs of Vaga by Luzio Romano, and some Lombards, his assistants. Nevertheless, Vasari considers him the best designer of the Florentine school, after Michael Angelo, and his partiality placed him at the head of all those who assisted Raffaele. Lanzi says, "It is certain that no one could, like Pierino, compete with Giulio in that universality of talent so conspicuous in Raffaello; and the subjects from the New Testament, which he painted in the Papal Gallery, were praised by Taja above all others. In his style there is a great mixture of the Florentine, as may be seen at Rome in the Birth of Eve, in the church of S. Marcello, where there are some children painted to the life, a most finished performance." Del Vaga also executed some works for the churches and public edifices at Lucca, Pisa, Genoa, and elsewhere. In the convent at Tivoli is one of his best works, representing St. John in the Desert, with an admirable landscape. Towards the close of his life, he returned to Rome, where, Lanzi says, "he might have effected the restoration of art, if his magnanimity had corresponded with the sublimity of his mind, but he did not inherit the genius of his master." Lanzi then goes on to accuse him of making a traffic of art, contriving always to abound in commissions and money, and that he employed the best artists to paint from his designs in order to make them dependent upon him, and thus prevent them from interfering with his commissions and emoluments. He was much employed by Paul III., who granted him a life pension of 25 ducats monthly. About 1543, Vaga undertook the direction of the paintings in the Sala Regia; he ornamented the ceiling, and directed the preparatory operations, all in the style of a great master; after which he applied himself to design the subjects for his pencil, when he died in 1547.

VAGNUCCI, FRANCESCO, a painter of Assisi, who flourished there in the first part of the 16th century. There are some of his works in the churches of that city, which Lanzi says are "executed in the spirit of the old masters," i. e., somewhat dry and hard.

VAIANI, ANNA MARIA, an Italian lady who flourished at Rome about 1650. She painted flower pieces, and engraved a part of the plates for the Justinian Gallery. Bartsch describes five prints by her, but with no great commendation.

VAIANO, or VAJANO, ORAZIO, sometimes called IL FIORENTINO, a painter born at Florence, who flourished about 1600. He resided a long time at Milan, where he executed many works for the churches and for individuals, which Lanzi says display diligence and judgment, though they are somewhat feeble in point of coloring. According to Orlandi, some of his pictures have been confounded with those of the elder Palma, "for what reason," says Lanzi, "it is difficult to conjecture, as there is little resemblance of style. In the distribution of his lights he much resembles the Cav. Roncalli." Some of his best works are in the churches of S. Carlo, and S. Antonio Abate at Milan. There are also several of his works in the churches and public edifices at Genoa. Bartsch says his name was Alessandro, and that he flourished about 1628. He describes a print by him of a Dead Christ, and another of a Magdalen, engraved from his design, by Sebastian Vajano; but these were doubtless different artists, of whom little is known. The name is sometimes written Vaiani.

 VAILLANT, WALLERANT, a Flemish painter and engraver, born at Lisle in 1623. After studying in his native city, he went to Antwerp, where he became the disciple of Erasmus Quellinus. Finding his genius best adapted to portraiture, he applied himself to that branch, and met with great encouragement. He went to Frankfort at the time of the coronation of the Emperor Leopold, whose portrait he had the honor to paint, which gained him great reputation, and abundant employment. At the invitation of Marshal Grammont, the French ambassador, he accompanied him to the court of France, where he added to his reputation by his portraits of the Queen Mother, and the Duke of Orleans. He now met with such constant employment and liberal prices, that in a few years, he was enabled to return to Flanders with a competent fortune. He painted equally well both in oil and crayons. He is said to have visited England in the suite of Prince Rupert, who communicated to him the then newly discovered process of mezzotinto engraving. He engraved quite a number of plates in that manner, from his own designs and after other masters, which he usually marked with one of the accompanying monograms. His brother and pupil, John V., was born at Lisle in 1624, and followed painting for some time with great success; but having married a rich lady of Frankfort, he devoted himself to commerce. Among other prints by Wallerant V., are the following. He died at Amsterdam in 1677.

PORTRAITS.

Prince Rupert. His own Portrait. The Portrait of his Wife. Desiderius Erasmus. John Frobenius, the celebrated printer of Basle. Sir Anthony Vandyck. Barent Graat, Painter.

VAILLANT, BERNARD, was the brother of the preceding, born at Lisle in 1625, though some say in 1627. The success of his brother induced him to adopt the same profession, and he received his principal instruction in art from him. He chiefly excelled in painting portraits in crayons, and accompanied his brother to Frankfort and Paris, and found considerable employment in that branch. On his return to the Low Countries, he settled at Rotterdam, where he passed the rest of his life. He also engraved several plates of portraits from his own designs, and after W. Vaillant and other masters, which he sometimes signed with his name, and at others marked with the above monogram.

VAILLANT, JAMES, was also the brother and scholar of Wallerant V., born at Lisle in 1628. He went to Italy while young, and passed two years at Rome. On his return to Flanders, he was invited to the court of the Elector of Brandenburg at Berlin, where he practiced both historical and portrait painting with considerable reputation. The Elector sent him to Vienna to paint the portrait of the Emperor, who presented him with a gold chain and medal. There is some discrepancy as to the time of his death; some say that he died young, without giving the date, others place his death in 1670; but Laborde and Zani, in 1691. This latter date may apply to the fourth brother, John V., mentioned in the second preceding article.

VAILLANT, ANDREW, was the youngest brother of Wallerant V., born at Lisle in 1629. He was instructed by him both in painting and engraving, and engraved some portraits after pictures by his brothers, one of which is dated 1689.

VAL, DU, an artist mentioned by Papillon as an engraver on wood, who flourished about 1650. His prints are remarkable for neatness and delicacy of execution; they are chiefly after the designs of James Stella and Nicholas Cochin. There is a set of twenty cuts by him, engraved for a work entitled "The Miraculous History of Notre Dame de Liesse," which are highly esteemed.

VAL, MARK DU, an engraver on wood, who flourished from about 1560 to 1580. His cuts are very indifferently executed.

VAL, SEBASTIANO D'. Little is known of this artist. There are two spirited etchings by him, one of which is dated 5558, which Zani conjectures to stand for the age of the world; this would make the artist to have flourished, he says, in 1558. It represents Prometheus tormented by the Vulture, inscribed Sebastiano D'Val, Ut. 5558; the other, representing the Repose in Egypt, is inscribed on a tablet, Sebastiano D. VL.; and on another tablet held by an angel, is written, Piu alto non so dir che Mater Dei. Zani interprets the signatures, Sebastiano de Valentini Utinense.

VAL, DU. See DUVAL.

VALDELVIRA, PEDRO DE, a Spanish architect, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century. According to Milizia, between the years 1540 and 1556, he erected in Ubeda the famous chapel del Salvador, by order of the Comendador, Don Francisco de los Cobos. He also erected a palace for that nobleman, which, like the chapel, is profusely ornamented. Among his other edifices, is the hospital and chapel of S. Giacomo in Baeza, erected in 1562, and considered one of the best buildings in Andalusia.

VALDES, DON JUAN DE LEAL, a Spanish painter, descended from an ancient family of Asturia, and born at Cordova in 1630. He studied in the school of Antonio del Castillo, and afterwards removed to Seville, where he became one of the most distinguished painters in that city, and lived on terms of intimacy with Murillo, who was a great admirer of his works. He was one of the founders of the Academy there, and succeeded Murillo as president of that institution. At the death of that master, he was esteemed at the head of his profession. His works are numerous in the churches at Seville, among which is the Triumph of the Cross, in La Caridad; there are also a number at Cordova, as the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, in the church of S. Francisco; and the history of the Prophet Elias, in the church of the Carmelites. Valdes is said to have distinguished himself as a sculptor and architect, but none of his works are specified. There are two prints attributed to him, one marked with his monogram, and the other with his name in full. He died in 1691.

VALDES, DON LUCAS DE, was the son of the preceding, born at Seville in 1661. He was instructed in art by his father, and painted history and portraits with considerable reputation. There are some of his works in the churches and public edifices of his native city. He also engraved several plates from his own designs. He died in 1724. He had a son named Juan, who engraved some plates of devotional subjects, and a few portraits, mostly for the booksellers.

VALDES, DON SEBASTIAN LLANOS DE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville about 1660. He studied under Francisco d' Herrera the Elder, and attained a high reputation among the artists of his time. His works are characterized by correctness of design and beauty of coloring, although they manifest some degree of mannerism. He aided greatly in establishing the Academy of Seville, and succeeded Murillo and Juan de Valdes in the presidency of that institution. Many of his pictures are to be found in the Spanish private collections. Among his large historical subjects, are a Magdalen, in the church of the Recolets at Madrid; and a picture of the Virgin surrounded by Saints and Angels, painted in 1669, for the church of St. Thomas at Seville.

VALDOR, JOHN, a Flemish engraver, born at Liege, who flourished from about 1620 to 1649. He went to Paris, where he chiefly resided, and engraved a considerable number of plates for the booksellers, representing Saints and devotional subjects, which are executed with remarkable neatness and precision. He also engraved a part of the plates for a book published at Paris in 1638, entitled Les Triomphes de Louis le Juste, which are his best performances.

VALENCIA, FRAY MATIAS DE, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1696. His name was Lorenzo Chafrión. After acquiring some knowledge of the art in his native city, he went to Rome, where he became the disciple of Corrado Giaquinto, whose style he adopted. On his return to Valencia he did not meet with much encouragement, and afterwards went to Granada, in hopes of being able to obtain some assistance from an uncle residing there, but being disappointed in his expectations and reduced to distress, he took refuge in a convent. There are some of his cabinet pictures in the collections at Valencia, and a picture of the Last Supper, in the refectory of his convent. He was drowned in 1749.

VALENCIENNES, PIERRE HENRI, an eminent French landscape painter, was born at Toulouse in 1750. His parents intended him for the study of music, but as he manifested a strong inclination for art, he was sent to Paris, and placed in the school of Doyen. Under that master, he acquired that historical style which forms the chief characteristic of his productions; but being more inclined to landscape painting, he visited Rome, and studied the works of N. Poussin and Claude Lorraine. On returning to Paris, he was chosen a member of the Academy, and formed a school which has produced the best French artists in landscape of the present day. He was an associate of the Academy at Toulouse, and a member of the Legion of Honor. The talents of Valenciennes, though unequal to those of his great models, were of a superior order; and he first, after Poussin, gave to his department in art that grandeur of style which elevates it to the rank of history. Among his best works are, Œdipus found on the island Cythera; Œdipus before the Temple of Eumenides; Philoctetes in the Isle of Lemnos; the Vale of Tempe; a View of the ancient city Trezina; the Dance of Theseus; and his masterpiece in the Louvre, according to the Biographie Universelle, representing Cicero, while questor in Sicily, discovering the tomb of Archimedes. Valenciennes wrote an admirable work on perspective, entitled Traité de perspective et de l'art du paysage, 1800, 4to. He died at Paris in 1819.

VALENTIN, PIERRE, a French painter, born at Colommiers en Brie, near Paris, in 1600. It is generally stated that he acquired a knowledge of design under Simon Vouet, in his own country, but Vouet quitted France in 1602, and did not return until 1627. Valentin therefore probably studied under some other master, as he visited Rome while still young, where he passed the rest of his life. He was one of the most judicious followers of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio. He acquired a high reputation at Rome, and enjoyed the protection of the Cardinal Barberini, nephew of Urban VIII., through whose influence he obtained the commission to paint a picture of the Martyrdom of Sts. Processo and Martiniano, for the Basilica of St. Peter, which is esteemed his best performance. He also painted for his patron the Decollation of St. John, in the Barberini palace, and St. Peter denying Christ, in the Corsini palace, which Lanzi says is a "delightful picture." His other principal historical works are, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, the Judgment of Solomon, and Susanna and the Elders, in the Louvre. His easel pictures are his best works, and Lanzi says they are frequently to be met with in the collections at Rome; they usually represent concerts of music, corps-de-gardes, fortune-tellers, card-players, and similar subjects. He was an artist of great promise, but died in the flower of his life, in 1632. The Italians call him Pietro Valentino.

VALENTINA, JACOPO DI, a painter of the Venetian school, born at Serravalle. There are some altar-pieces and other pictures by him in the churches of his native place, Ceneda, and elsewhere, painted in the style of Squarcione of Padua. He flourished about 1500.

VALERIANI, PADRE GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Aquila, who flourished at Rome, according to Baglioni, in the pontificate of Clement VIII. It is not known under whom he studied, but he imitated Sebastiano del Piombo, though Lanzi says he was too heavy in his design, and too dark in his colors. He afterwards entered the Society of the Jesuits, and much improved his first manner. His best works are in the Chiesa del Gesù, where he painted a fine picture of the Annunciation, and several subjects from the life of Christ.

VALERIANI, DOMENICO and GIUSEPPE, two painters, brothers, born at Rome, who studied under Marco Ricci, and flourished about 1730. According to Zanetti, Domenico excelled in landscape and perspective, and Giuseppe in figures; they wrought conjointly, each in his respective department, and were much employed in decorating the churches and public edifices, but more particularly the theatres, "in Venice, and indeed throughout Italy and other parts of Europe."

VALESIO, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter and engraver, who flourished at Venice about 1612. Little is known of his works as a painter, but he engraved a variety of frontispieces and other book plates from his own designs, and some portraits and other subjects after Pietro Faccini and other masters. His most considerable work is a set of plates of Hermits, engraved for a work entitled Illustrium Anachoretorum Elogia, written by Jacobus Cavacius, a Benedictine monk, published at Venice in 1612. His plates are executed with the graver, in a neat but formal style. He sometimes marked his plates Franciscus Valegius, f.

VALESIO, GIACOMO, an Italian engraver, born at Verona, who flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. His prints are dated from about 1574 to 1587. He engraved some plates after Paul Veronese and other masters, executed with the graver, in a style resembling that of Cornelius Cort. He also carried on the business of a print-seller.

VALESIO, NICCOLO, another engraver of Verona, probably a brother of Giacomo V. He flourished about the same time, engraved some book plates, and was also a publisher.

VALESIO, GIOVANNI LUIGI, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Bologna in 1561. He studied in the school of the Caracci, and, according to Malvasia and Lanzi, acquired a greater reputation than he deserved. He executed several works for the churches of his native city, the principal of which are, the Scourging of Christ, in S. Pietro; the Annunciation, at the Medicanti; and St. Roch curing the Sick of the Plague, in S. Rocco. Lanzi says these works have nothing of the grandeur of the school of the Carracci; they are dry in composition, and have little relief, yet they are executed in the exact method of the miniaturists. He afterwards went to Rome, where by his assiduity, ready wit, convivial and social qualities, he acquired much reputation and abundant employment. He was much patronized by the Lodovisi family, and his praise was sung by Marini and other poets of the day. "By means like these," says Lanzi, "he maintained his equipage in Rome, where Annibale Caracci, during many years, obtained no other stipend for his honorable toils than a bare roof for his head, daily pittance for himself and servant, with an annual payment of 120 crowns!" Bartsch, however, highly commends him as an engraver. He describes (P. G. tom. xviii.), one hundred and eleven prints by him, and mentions sixteen more on the authority of Malvasia. He approaches nearer to Agostino Caracci in his engravings, than any other artist of that school. He died at Rome in 1640.

VALET, or VALLET, GUILLAUME, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1636. He is supposed to have studied with François de Poilly. He afterwards went to Italy, and resided many years at Rome. He engraved a considerable number of plates after the Italian and French masters, which are executed chiefly with the graver, in the style of de Poilly, and though his prints are inferior to the works of that master, they possess considerable merit. He died in 1704. The following are among his principal prints:

PORTRAITS.

Charles Emanuel, Duke of Savoy. Louis, Duke of Mantua. Alessandro Algardi, Sculptor. Andrea Sacchi, Painter; after C. Maratti. The Bust of Peter Corneille, crowned by Melpomene and Thalia; after Paillet. Olympia Maldachini, Roma, 1657.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Nativity; after Raffaele. The Holy Family; do. Melchisedec bringing presents to Abraham; do. The Last Supper; do. The Holy Family; after Guido. Cornelius Bloemaert has engraved the same subject. The Holy Family; after Albano. A Repose in Egypt; after C. Maratti. The Virgin, with the infant Christ and St. John; after An. Caracci. The Annunciation; after Courtois. The Resurrection; after N. Loir. St. John the Baptist before Herod; after le Brun. The Adoration of the Magi; after Poussin. The Assumption of the Virgin; after J. Miel. The Holy Family; after James Stella. The Crucifixion; do.

VALK, or VALCK, GERARD, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1626. He studied with Abraham Blooteling, whose sister he married, and was afterwards taken into partnership with him. He went to England, where he was employed by David Loggan for some time. He also assisted Peter Schenck in his large Dutch Atlas, in 2 vols. folio, published in 1683. He wrought both with the graver and in mezzotinto, and some of his prints possess considerable merit. The following are among the best:

PORTRAITS WITH THE GRAVER.

Hortensia, Duchess of Mazarin; after Lely; one of his best plates. Robert, Lord Brooke. John, Duke of Lauderdale. Eleanor Gwyn; after Lely.

PORTRAITS AND SUBJECTS IN MEZZOTINTO.

VALK, PETER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Leuwarde in 1584. It is not known under whom he studied, but he at first imitated Abraham Bloemaert. He afterwards went to Italy, and passed several years at Rome. On his return to Holland, he acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history, portraits, and landscapes. He also engraved a few plates in the manner of Philip Galle, which are chiefly copied from the prints of that master.

VALKAERT, WAERNAERT VANDER, a Dutch painter and engraver, whose birth is variously placed at Amsterdam in 1572, 1575, and 1580. He studied under Henry Goltzius, and became a good painter of history and portraits, in the manner of his master. There are some pictures by him in the churches at Utrecht. He also etched some plates from his own designs, in a bold and spirited style. He died in 1625. His name is variously spelled, Warner, Warnard, and Waernaert Valker, Valkert, and Valkaert.

VALKENBURG, LUCAS VAN, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in or about 1530. He painted landscapes and portraits in small, with considerable reputation. He was patronized by the Duke of Lintz, for whom he executed many works. His death is variously placed in 1582 and in 1625. His name is sometimes written Valckenburg.

VALKENBURG, MARTIN VAN, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at VV. Mechlin about 1533, though some say in 1542. He accompanied his brother in his travels, and is said to have painted many pictures from the beautiful scenery in the vicinity of Liege and Aix-la-Chapelle. He frequently enriched his pictures with figures from ancient history or mythology. He sometimes marked his pictures with the above monogram. He died at Frankfort in 1574, though some say in 1636.

VALKENBURG, DIRK or THEODORE, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1675. He studied successively under Cuylenberg, Michael van Musscher, and John Weenix. He painted animals, huntings, and dead game, in the manner of Weenix; and his pictures, particularly of dead game, are accounted little inferior to the productions of that admired master. He was also an excellent portrait painter. In 1696, he set out to travel through Germany to Italy. He stopped some time at the court of Baden, where his pictures were greatly admired; he next proceeded to Vienna, with letters to the Prince of Lichtenstein, who received him in the most gracious manner. He soon acquired a distinguished reputation at that capital, and received so many commissions from the most distinguished persons, that he abandoned his projected visit to Italy, and in the course of a few years amassed a handsome fortune. The desire of revisiting his native country, induced him to abandon his brilliant and flattering career at Vienna, and he returned to Amsterdam, where his works were not less esteemed. He was employed by William III. to paint several pictures for his palace at Loo. He died of apoplexy in the prime of life, in 1721.

VALKENBURGH, FREDERICK, a German painter, born at Nuremberg in 1555. After studying in his native city, under an obscure artist, he went to Venice, where he studied the works of Titian and Paul Veronese, and formed a style of his own, agreeable and elegant, with rich and harmonious coloring, a light and clean pencil, and a delicate touch. His usual subjects were fairs, markets, sports, and dead game, though he sometimes painted history. He was also very successful in representing perspective views of public edifices and places in cities. He usually introduced a large number of small figures into his pictures, which he designed with tolerable correctness. His works are little known out of Germany, where they are held in considerable estimation. He died in 1623. His name is sometimes erroneously called Vallenburgh.

VALLE, GIOVANNI DA, an old painter who flourished at Milan about 1460. According to Lomazzo, he made great improvements in perspective. "He was one of the great inventors in the art of correctly viewing objects." He had a brother, named Carlo, also a painter, who was sometimes called Carlo Milanese. Their works have mostly perished.

VALLE, ANDREA DELLA. This architect was a native of Padua, and flourished in the 16th century. From the high commendation of Milizia, it would appear that he deserved greater reputation than he attained. His principal work was the Carthusian monastery, two miles from Padua, which is admirably constructed, and of such a beautiful design that it has been attributed to Palladio. Della Valle published an edition of the unprinted works of Palladio, in which he inserted five plates.

VALLEE, or VALEE, SIMONE, a French engraver, who is said to have been born at Paris about 1700, although a print is mentioned with his signature, dated 1706. He studied under P. Drevet, and executed several plates, which are etched and finished with the graver, in a neat, tasteful style. Among them are the following :

PORTRAITS.

John de Troy, Painter to the King; after Fras. de Troy. John Francis Savery, Curate of St. Menehoult; do.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Transfiguration; after Raffaele. St. John in the Desert; do. The Flight into Egypt; after Carlo Maratti. The Resurrection of Lazarus; after Girolamo Muziano. The Finding of Moses; after Francesco Romanelli. Christ bearing his Cross; after Andrea Sacchi. The Death of the Virgin; after M. Angelo da Caravaggio. The Sacrifice of Abraham; after Ant. Coypel. Christ calling to him the little Children; after P. J. Cazes. The Descent of the Holy Ghost; do.

VALLET, PIERRE, a French designer and engraver, who flourished at Paris in the first half of the 17th century. According to Dumesnil, he engraved one hundred and twenty-four plates for a work entitled "Les Aventures amoureuses de Theagene et Chariclée," published in 1613; a Plan of the City of Paris; and the Flowers in a work entitled "Le Jardin du Roy tres Chrestien Henri IV. Roy de France et Navarre. Dedie à la Roynne." His prints are executed in a neat and beautiful style. He was living in 1642.

VALLORY, CHEVALIER DE, a French amateur engraver, who flourished about 1760. He etched some plates of landscapes, after Boucher

VALPUESTA, PEDRO, a Spanish painter, born at Osma, in Old Castile, in 1614. According to Palomino, he was a disciple of Eugenio Caxes, and the most successful follower of his style. His principal works are in the churches and convents of Madrid; the most worthy of notice are a series of pictures representing the life of the Virgin, in the church of San Miguel; the Holy Family, in the Chapel of the Hospital del Buensuceso; and six pictures of the history of St. Clara, in the convent of the Franciscan Nuns. He died at Madrid in 1668.

VAN, VANDE, VANDEN, VANDER, and VON, are only articles prefixed to Flemish, Dutch, and German names, and when artists are not found in letter V. under one of these heads, they will be met with by referring to the proper initial letter, as Van Balen, see Balen; Vander Berg, see Berg; Vander Borch, see Borch; Von Müller, see Müller.

VANBRUGH, SIR JOHN, an eminent English architect, of Dutch extraction, was born in 1666. His grandfather was a citizen of Ghent, and removed to England at the time when Alva persecuted the Protestants. His son Giles married Elizabeth, youngest daughter and co-heir of Sir Dudley Carleton, and had a family of eight sons, among whom was the subject of this sketch. Little is known of John until he commenced writing for the stage, and it appears rather doubtful if he was ever regularly educated in architecture. He was sent by his father to France at the age of nineteen, and is said to have studied the art in that country; he subsequently entered the French military service for a short time, and his professional progress for several years after remains in obscurity. It is evident, however, that he had attained considerable skill previously to 1695, for he was then appointed one of the commissioners for completing the palace at Greenwich, when it was about to be converted into an hospital. In 1702, Vanbrugh was employed by Charles, the third Earl of Carlisle, to erect a mansion for him in Yorkshire, on the site of the ancient Castle of Hinderkelf; and he erected the palace of Castle Howard, an extensive and noble pile, 660 feet in length; although, like all his other works of this class, more satisfactory in its general character than when examined in detail. His patron Carlisle, then earl marshal of England, signified his approbation by bestowing on him the honorable and not unprofitable appointment of Clarendieux king-at-arms, in 1703. His work of Castle Howard also recommended him as architect to many persons of rank or wealth, for whom he erected stately mansions in different parts of the kingdom. Among these were King's Weston, near Bristol, greatly admired for the effect produced by its chimneys; Duncombe Hall, Yorkshire; Eastbury in Dorsetshire, built for Bubb Doddington, but subsequently demolished by Earl Temple; Seaton Delaval, Northumberland; Oulton Hall, in Cheshire; and Grimsthorpe, Yorkshire, considered one of his most important works. Most of his edifices appear to have been country seats and mansions, except a theatre in the Haymarket, which afterwards became the original Opera House.

About 1706, the nation voted, as a monument of atitude to the first Duke of Marlborough, a palace, to be named after the victory at Blenheim. Vanbrugh was appointed the architect, but although this high distinction and the excellence of his performance have greatly increased his posthumous fame, he was involved in great difficulties, in consequence of no specific appropriation having been provided by parliament, and being afterwards refused. During the queen's life, she furnished the necessary funds; but difficulties increased afterwards, and, to complete the architect's vexation, after the Duke's death, his wife Sarah discharged Vanbrugh from his post, and refused to pay him the amount due on his salary! The edifice was however completed according to the original model, and forms an honorable monument to the genius of the architect. Although Vanbrugh was greatly ridiculed by Swift and Pope, so that his merits were not appreciated in his day, posterity has at length accorded him full justice. Sir Joshua Reynolds was the first who ventured to bear testimony to the picturesque magnificence of Blenheim, besides which, the testimony of Sir Uvedale Price and others removed the prejudices against the architect. His works are distinguished for great variety of outline, although his style is occasionally somewhat heavy, as solidity and massiveness are its chief characteristics. The massive grandeur of the palace of Blenheim, is esteemed a fitting type of the talents of the hero for whom it was erected.

Vanbrugh evinced great talent as a dramatic writer, and his masterly powers in comedy are so well evinced in several plays, that, were it not for their strong libertine tendencies, which have properly banished them from the stage, and almost from the closet, he would be regarded as a standard classic author in English dramatic literature. His private character seems to have been amiable, and his conduct tolerably correct. He died at his own house in Whitehall, in 1726.

VANDAEL, JOHN FRANCIS, an eminent Flemish painter of fruit and flowers, born at Antwerp in 1764. He went early to Paris, where he greatly distinguished himself. On one occasion he drew the grand prize of 4,000 francs, and on two others, the large gold medal. He was patronized by the empresses Josephine and Maria Louisa, the Duchess de Berri, and other distinguished personages. Many of his pictures were to be seen in the chateaux of St. Cloud and Trianon. He was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and a member of the academics at Antwerp, Amsterdam, and Paris, as well as of several learned societies. His pictures are elegantly composed, and executed with all the truth and brilliancy of nature. He did not strictly confine himself to fruit and flowers, but often painted other subjects, into which he could introduce these with propriety as accessories; thus, two of the pictures which he painted for the Empress Josephine, now at Munich, represent the Tomb of Julia, and an Offering to Flora. He died at Paris in 1840. See, also, the article Dael.

VANDERLYN, JOHN. This eminent American painter was born in 1776, in the town of Kingston, Ulster county, of the State of New York. After receiving an academical education in his native place, he visited the city of New York at the age of sixteen, in company with his brother; and while there, he was offered by Mr. Thomas Barrow, an extensive dealer in engravings, a place as clerk in his store. Young Vanderlyn accepted the offer, and remained two years in his employment, acquiring and improving a taste for the Fine Arts, and also taking drawing lessons in moments of leisure. During this period, he made the acquaintance of Stuart, who allowed him to copy some of his portraits; also of Colonel Burr, who advanced him the means of prosecuting his studies under the direction of Stuart, and subsequently of going to France.

In 1796, Vanderlyn went to Paris, where he continued his studies under the most eminent French artists, and made the acquaintance of several distinguished men, who predicted from his earlier efforts the highest success. After a residence of five years, he returned to his native country, and soon obtained plentiful patronage. He painted two fine views of Niagara Falls, which were engraved, and gained him the warm friendship of Washington Irving, Allston, Monroe, and others. Notwithstanding this success, Vanderlyn revisited Europe in 1803, to purchase a large collection of pictures, and while sojourning at Paris, he executed his first historical composition, a work of great originality and vigor, representing the Murder of Miss McCrea by the Indians, during the early border wars of the State of New York. He then visited Rome, and applied himself to improvement with great assiduity, making copies after the Italian masters, which evinced considerable excellence, particularly a picture of Danaë from Titian, Antiope from Correggio, and a female figure from Raffaele's Transfiguration, which was retained for a long time in the collection of the late Philip Hone, Esq., but has recently passed into other hands. Among his original works, executed about this time, were his Ariadne, an original picture of singular beauty, which was greatly admired; and his large historical subject, "Marius on the Ruins of Carthage," which is considered his masterpiece. The strength, dignity, and truthfulness of the solitary general, as he sits baffled and disappointed, but not overcome, amid the fallen columns of the old African city, his wild eyes glaring around the desolation, but his face full of the great heart of the exiled Roman consul.—evinced a power of conception on the part of the painter, which gained the universal applause of his brother artists, while the depth and purity of the coloring excited their admiration. This grand work of art was removed to the Louvre, and in 1808 it drew the gold medal, and was honored by the praises of Napoleon, who highly complimented the author upon his genius.

Vanderlyn returned to this country in 1815, where his reputation was undoubtedly much higher than when he left it; and he soon received numerous commissions for portraits, among which were some of our most eminent men—Madison, Calhoun, Monroe, Clinton, &c. But he became interested in a plan for the introduction of panoramic exhibitions into the United States, and having obtained a privilege from the Corporation in New York city, he erected a building in the Park, to which he gave the name of the Rotunda. He exhibited there many fine views of the cities of Paris, Mexico, Versailles, Athens, &c.; but the project proved an unsuccessful speculation, and the Corporation resumed possession of the building. The effect upon Vanderlyn's finances was not less disastrous than upon his energies, and he never completely recovered himself in either respect. Had he devoted himself from the first to his proper department in art, doubtless his reputation and success would have been much greater than they were.

In 1832. Vanderlyn was commissioned to paint a full-length portrait of Washington, for the Hall of Representatives; and as soon as it was completed, he was voted $1500 additional compensation. In 1839 he was chosen to fill one of the vacant panels in the Rotunda of the Capitol, with a great national picture; he accordingly removed to Paris, and returned with his Landing of Columbus. The last work exhibited from his pencil was the portrait of President Taylor, at the National Academy of Design, in 1851. He died at his native place, Kingston, Ulster Co., Sept. 23, 1852.

VANDERVERT, HENRY, called by the Italians Enrico Vandervert, and in the Catalogue of the Colonna Gallery, Enrico Wandervert. All that is known of this painter is, that he was a native of Flanders, and went to Rome, where he became the disciple and imitator of Claude Lorraine. It is probable that he spent the rest of his life in Italy, as he is not mentioned by the writers of his country. Lanzi briefly notices him among the disciples and followers of Claude, as an artist deserving of commendation.

VANDI, SANTE, sometimes called SANTINO DA' RITRATTI, a painter born at Bologna, in 1653. According to Crespi, few persons could compete with him in portraiture, and he was constantly employed by princes and persons of distinction. He was much employed by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and Ferdinando Duke of Mantua invited him to his court and appointed him his painter, with a liberal salary, which situation he held till the death of that prince, when he returned to Bologna, and died there in 1716. He had the faculty of giving to his female sitters all the beauty, and to his male, all the dignity they possessed without injuring the likeness. "With him," observes Crespi, "disappeared the manner of producing portraits at once so soft and powerful, combined with such natural expression."

V VANDYCK, SIR ANTHONY. This eminent Flemish painter was born at Antwerp, March 22, 1599. His father was a glass-painter of Bois-le-Duc, in good circumstances, and early gave him instruction in drawing; he was also instructed by his mother, who painted landscapes, and was very skillful in embroidery. He studied afterwards under Henry van Balen, and made rapid progress in the art; but attracted by the fame of Rubens, he entered the school of that master, and showed so much ability as to be soon entrusted with the execution of some of his instructor's designs. Some writers, among whom D'Argenville was the first, assert that Rubens became jealous of Vandyck's growing excellence, and therefore advised him to devote himself to portrait painting; assigning the following anecdote as the immediate cause of this jealousy. During the short absences of Rubens from his house, for the purpose of recreation, his disciples frequently obtained access to his studio, by means of bribing an old servant who kept the keys; and on one of these occasions, while they were all eagerly pressing forward to view the great picture of the Descent from the Cross (although later investigations concerning dates, seem to indicate that it was some other picture). Diepenbeck accidentally fell against the canvass, effacing the face of the Virgin, and the Magdalen's arm, which had just been finished, and were not yet dry. Fearful of expulsion from the school, the terrified pupils chose Vandyck to restore the work, and he completed it the same day with such success that Rubens did not at first perceive the change, and afterwards concluded not to alter it. Walpole entertains a different and more rational view respecting Rubens' supposed jealousy; he thinks that Vandyck felt the hopelessness of surpassing his master in historical painting, and therefore resolved to devote himself to portrait. One authority states that the above mentioned incident only increased Rubens' esteem for his pupil, in perfect accordance with the distinguished character for generosity and liberality, which that great master so often evinced, and which forms very strong presumptive evidence against so base an accusation. Besides, his advice to Vandyck to visit Italy—where his own powers had been, as his pupil's would be, greatly strengthened,—may be considered as sufficient to refute it entirely. They appear to have parted on the best terms; Vandyck presented Rubens with an Ecce Homo, Christ in the Garden, and a portrait of Helen Forman, Rubens' second wife; he was presented in return by Rubens, with one of his finest horses.

At the age of twenty, Vandyck set out for Italy, but delayed some time at Brussels, fascinated by the charms of a peasant girl of Saveltheim, named Anna van Ophem, who persuaded him to paint two pictures for the church of her native place—a St. Martin on horseback, painted from himself, and the horse given him by Rubens; and a Holy Family, for which the girl and her parents were models. On arriving in Italy, he spent some time at Venice, studying with great attention the works of Titian; after which he visited Genoa, and painted many excellent portraits for the nobility, as well as several pictures for the churches and private collections, which gained him great applause. From Genoa he went to Rome, where he was also much employed, and lived in great style. His portrait of Cardinal Bentivoglio, painted about this time, is one of his master-pieces, and in every respect an admirable picture; it is now in the Palazzo Pitti at Florence, hanging near Raffaele's celebrated portrait of Leo X. Vandyck was known at Rome as the Pittore Cavalieresco; his countrymen there being men of low and intemperate habits, he avoided their society, and was thenceforward so greatly annoyed by their criticisms and revilings, that he was obliged to leave Rome about 1625, and return to Genoa, where he met with a flattering reception, and plentiful encouragement. Invited to Palermo, he visited that city, and painted the portraits of Prince Philibert of Savoy, the Viceroy of Sicily, and several distinguished per-ons, among whom was the celebrated paintress Sophonisba Anguisciola, then in her 92d year; but the plague breaking out, he returned to Genoa, and thence to his own country.

On returning to Antwerp, Vandyck was speedily employed by various religious societies, and his picture of St. Augustine for the church of the Augustines in that city, established his reputation among the first painters of his time. He painted other historical pictures, for the principal public edifices at Antwerp, Brussels, Mechlin, and Ghent; but acquired greater fame by his portraits, particularly his well-known series of the eminent artists of his time, which were engraved by Vorstermans, Pontius, Bolswert, and others. His brilliant reputation at length roused the jealousy of his cotemporaries, many of whom were indefatigable in their intrigues to calumniate his works. In addition to these annoyances, the conduct of the canons of the Collegiate church of Courtray, for whom he painted an admirable picture of the Elevation of the Cross, proved too much for his endurance. After he had exerted all his powers to produce a master-piece of art, the Canons, upon viewing the picture, pronounced it a contemptible performance, and the artist a miserable dauber; and Vandyck could hardly obtain payment for his work. When the picture had received high commendation from good judges, they became sensible of their error, and requested him to execute two more works; but the indignant artist refused the commission. Disgusted with such treatment, Vandyck readily accepted an invitation to visit the Hague, from Frederick, Prince of Orange, whose portrait he painted, and that of his family, the principal personages of his court, and the foreign ambassadors. Hearing of the great encouragement extended to the arts by Charles I., he determined to visit England in 1629. While there, he lodged with his friend and countryman, George Geldorp the painter, and expected to be presented to the King; but his hopes not being realized, he visited Paris; and meeting no better success there, he returned to his own country, with the intention of remaining there during the rest of his life. Charles, however, having seen a portrait by Vandyck, of the musician Nic. Lanier, director of the music of the King's chapel, requested Sir Kenelm Digby to invite him to return to England. Accordingly in 1631, he arrived a second time at London, and was received by the King in a flattering manner. He was lodged at Blackfriars, among the King's artists, where his majesty frequently went to sit for his portrait, as well as to enjoy the society of the painter. The honor of knighthood was conferred upon him in 1632, and the following year he was appointed painter to the King, with an annuity of £200.

Prosperity now flowed in upon the Fleming in abundance, and although he operated with the greatest industry and facility, painting single portraits in one day, he could hardly fulfil all his commissions. Naturally fond of display, he kept a splendid establishment, and his sumptuous table was frequented by persons of the highest distinction. He often detained his sitters to dinner, where he had an opportunity to observe more of their peculiar characteristics, and retouched their pictures in the afternoon. Notwithstanding his distinguished success, he does not appear to have been satisfied with eminence in portrait painting; and not long after his marriage with Maria Ruthven, grand-daughter of Lord Gowrie, he went to Antwerp with his lady, on a visit to his family and friends, and thence proceeded to Paris. The fame which Rubens had acquired by his celebrated performances at the Luxembourg, rendered Vandyck desirous to execute the decorations at the Louvre; but on arriving at the French capital, he found the commission disposed of to Nicholas Poussin. He soon returned to England, and being still desirous of executing some great work, proposed to the King through Sir Kenelm Digby, to decorate the walls of the Banqueting House (of which the ceiling was already adorned by Rubens), with the History and Procession of the Order of the Garter. The sum demanded was £8000, and while the King was treating with him for a less amount, the project was terminated by the death of Vandyck, December 9th, 1641, aged 42 years. He was buried with extraordinary honors, in St. Paul's cathedral. His high living had brought on the gout during his latter years, and luxury had considerably reduced his fortune, which he endeavored to repair by the study of alchymy. He left property amounting to about £20,000. In his private character, Vandyck was universally esteemed for the urbanity of his manners, and his generous patronage to all who excelled in any science or art, many of whose portraits he painted gratuitously.

According to Fuseli, Vandyck deserves the next place after Titian in portrait painting. Inferior to that master in richness and warmth of coloring, he surpassed him in almost every other respect. He is unrivalled for the delicate drawing and beauty of his hands; he was a perfect master of drawing and chiaro-scuro; he was admirable in draperies; with simplicity of expression and graceful attitudes, he combined both dignity and individuality; his heads are full of life and expression, without anything of the coldness and insipidity which are frequently found in the productions of the portrait painter. Although they are but little flattered, his portraits generally impress us with the feeling that he has not only selected the most suitable attitude for the figure, but that he has chosen the best view of the countenance. There are many fine portraits by him of distinguished personages, besides those of the King and royal family, in the mansions of the English nobility.

Although Vandyck acquired his great fame in portraits, he painted also many historical pieces, and he never at any time ceased operating in this department. Inferior to Rubens in boldness of conception and fertility of invention, he never could have equalled him in historical painting; but his compositions are arranged with judgment and propriety; he surpassed him in correctness of design, the delicate expression of his heads, and the truth, purity, and harmony of his coloring. His picture of St. Augustin, in the church of the Augustines at Antwerp, gained him great celebrity soon after his return from Italy; Reynolds observes that "it is of great fame, but that it in some measure disappointed his expectations; that it has no effect, from the want of a large mass of light, the two angels making two small masses of equal magnitude, while the figure of the saint is dressed in black." This is satisfactorily accounted for by the fact that Vandyck originally painted the drapery white, but was reluctantly obliged to alter it to black, on account of the prejudices of the monks, before he could obtain payment for the work; in P. de Jode's print of this picture, the idea of the artist is correctly followed, and the figure of the saint makes the principal light. His admirable picture of the body of Christ in the arms of the Virgin, with St. John and two Angels, is now in the Louvre, and is scarcely inferior to the Pietà of Annibale Caracci, in the exquisite expression of the head of the Virgin. Vandyck's best historical picture however, in the opinion of Reynolds, is the Crucifixion, in the church of the Recollets at Mechlin, of which he says, "This perhaps is the most capital of all his works, in respect to the variety and extensiveness of the design, and the judicious disposition of the whole. In the efforts which the Thieves make to detach themselves from the cross, he has successfully encountered the difficulty of the art; and the expression of grief and resignation in the Virgin is admirable. This picture, on the whole, may be considered one of the first pictures in the world, and gives the highest idea of Vandyck's powers: it shows that he had truly a genius for history painting, if he had not been taken off by portraits."

The works of Vandyck are very numerous, notwithstanding the shortness of his career; Smith describes upwards of 950 in the Catalogue raisonné, vol. iii., and Supplement. Many of the best are at Windsor Castle, Hampton Court, Wilton House, Blenheim, &c. Walpole thinks his masterpiece is the dramatic portrait of the Earl of Strafford, and his secretary, Sir Thomas Mainwaring, at Wentworth House; there is also one of this subject at Blenheim, which is highly praised by Dr. Waagen. At Wilton House there are twenty-five pictures by him—"here," says Walpole, "Vandyck is upon his throne, and the great portrait of Philip, Earl of Pembroke, with his family, though damaged, would serve alone as a school of this master." Charles I. was painted several times by Vandyck, sometimes on horseback. The superb head of Gevartius, in the National Gallery, though attributed to Vandyck, is by some critics assigned to Rubens. His series of one hundred portraits of the most eminent artists and others his contemporaries at Antwerp, were painted in small upon panels, in chiaro-scuro, before he left that city for the Hague. Walpole states that thirty-five of them were in his time in the collection of the Countess of Cardigan at Whitehall; the whole of the originals have been thrice published; the first edition by vander Enden, contains eighty plates; the second by Giles Hendricks, one hundred; the last edition is by Verdussen, who effaced the names and letters of the original engravers. The title is, "Icones Virorum doctorum, pictorum, chalcographorum, &c., numero centum, ab Antonio Vandyck pictore ad vivum expressæ, et ejus sumptu æri incisæ Antverpiæ." Vandyck etched some of the plates himself, besides a few other subjects, in a style of wonderful spirit and energy. Among them are the following:

Christ crowned with Thorns; A. Vandyck, inv. A Holy Family. A Bust of Seneca; and others.

VANDYCK, PHILIP, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1680. He was a scholar of Arnold Boonen, with whom he continued till he surpassed him, and then improved himself by studying the works of Mieris and Metz. He painted small portraits in the style of his master, but his best pictures are his conversations, gallant assemblies, and ladies at their toilet, or playing on musical instruments. In 1710 he established himself at Middleburg, where he was much employed. He was afterwards invited to the Hague, where he soon acquired an immense reputation, and his works were so much sought after, that he could scarcely supply the demand. His fame spread throughout Holland, Flanders, and Germany, and he was considered one of the ablest artists of that day in his line. He was also an excellent connoisseur; the Prince of Hesse Cassel commissioned him to paint several pictures, and employed him to purchase some of the choicest works of art he could find in Holland and Flanders, for the rich collection he was then forming at Cassel, all which he executed with judgment and taste, to the entire satisfaction of his patron. His cabinet pictures, though inferior to the admirable productions of Mieris and Metz, are highly finished and agreeably colored, and they are admitted into the choicest collections of his country. Two of his happiest productions, representing a young lady at her toilet, and another playing upon a guitar, were esteemed by the French connoisseurs worthy of a place in the gallery of the Louvre. These pictures were restored in 1815, and are now in the Museums at the Hague, and at Brussels. There are, however, two of his pictures in the Louvre, relating to the history of Abraham and Hagar. He also excelled in portraits, especially in those of a small size; he frequently painted family pictures, in which he introduced all the members of the family, even to the cats and dogs; he sometimes gave these subjects a historical turn; thus he painted a ceiling for M. Schuylenberg, representing the story of Iphigenia, into which he introduced the portraits of the whole family. He died at the Hague in 1752.

VANDYCK, FLORIS VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1577. Schrevelius mentions him as an admirable painter of flowers, which he says would even deceive the birds. He was also distinguished for his subjects of history, but they are extremely rare, even in Holland. Two of them were in the Louvre, representing Hagar presented to Abraham, and Hagar sent into the Wilderness.

VANDYCK, DANIEL, called by the Italians DANIELE VANDYCK. See DYCK.

VANETTI, MARCO, a painter born at Loreto, who flourished about 1720. He was a disciple of the Cav. Carlo Cignani, and a reputable follower of his style. He wrote the life of Cignani, which was published at Bologna.

VAN EYCK, JOHN, called by the Italians, GIOVANNI VAN EYCK, and GIOVANNI DA BRUGGIA, or DE BRUGES, and by Facio, who wrote his eulogy, Jo. Gallicus. See EYCK.

VANGELISTI, VINCENZIO, an Italian engraver, born, according to Zani, in 1738. He went to Paris when young, where he became the pupil of J. G. Wille. He acquired considerable reputation as an engraver, and executed some plates after Raffaello, Caracci, Guido, and other masters, in a neat and finished style. He instructed several pupils, who distinguished themselves, among whom were Longhi and F. Anderloni. He was the first director of the school of engraving, instituted at Milan in 1790, by Leopold II., and Longhi succeeded him. According to Ferrario, he went crazy, and after having defaced all his plates, he killed himself, in 1798.

VANGHELIS, NICHOLAS, a French historical painter, born at Paris in 1674. Little is known of him, though he must have been an artist of distinction, as he was appointed director of the French Academy at Rome, where he died in 1737. His works are said to be correctly designed, ingeniously composed, and agreeably colored.

VANLOO, JAMES, a Dutch painter, born at Sluys in 1614. He was the son of John Vanloo, a painter of little note, who instructed him in the rudiments of art. He afterwards went to Amsterdam, where he greatly improved himself. He then went to Paris, where he settled, and acquired considerable reputation as a painter of portraits and fancy pictures; he was admitted into the academy there, on which occasion he painted as his reception piece an admirable portrait of Michael Corneille, the elder. Houbraken mentions several fine pictures by him, representing Diana in the Bath, the discovery of the Pregnancy of Calisto, and a young lady playing on the Lute. He was a correct designer and an agreeable colorist. He died in 1670. He had a son, Louis Vanloo, whom he instructed in the art, and who was a good painter of portraits and history. He settled at Aix, in Provence.

VANLOO, JEAN BAPTISTE, was the son of Louis Vanloo, born at Aix in 1684. His father perceiving in him a genius for painting, carefully instructed him in the art. He went to Toulon, and executed several works for the churches, when the siege of that place in 1707, compelled him to return to Aix, where he continued five years, and found considerable employment in painting for the churches and convents, as well as for individuals, but he received so small a compensation that he could barely defray his expenses. The Prince of Carignan now took him under his protection, and enabled him to gratify his desire of visiting Rome, where he studied the antique and the works of the great masters with unremitting assiduity, and that he might not omit anything conducive to his advantage, he placed himself under the instruction of Benedetto Luti, one of the ablest artists of his time. He acquired considerable reputation at Rome, and executed several works for the churches and palaces, the most esteemed of which is the Scourging of Christ in S. Maria in Monticelli. He was invited to the court of Turin, where he distinguished himself by many works both in oil and fresco, for the royal palaces, the churches, and the palaces of the nobility. He also painted the portraits of the King and of the principal personages of his court. After realizing a handsome fortune, he went to Paris, where he lost it all in the famous Mississippi scheme. He was elected a member of the Academy, painting for his reception piece, Diana and Endymion; he was also chosen professor in that institution in 1735. He executed several works for the churches, the principal of which were, the Entry of Christ into Jerusalem, in St. Martin des Champs, and St. Peter delivered from Prison, in St. Germain des Prés. In 1737, he went to London, where he painted the portraits of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and several other persons of distinction. In 1742, the state of his health compelled him to return to Aix, where he died in 1746. He had a lively genius, a ready invention, and great facility of hand; his coloring was excellent, his touch light and spirited, and he gave his carnations a freshness and warmth, not much inferior to the tints of Rubens.

VANLOO, CHARLES ANDRÉ, called the CAVALIERE CARLO VANLOO, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Nice in 1705. He was first instructed by his brother, whom he accompanied to Rome, and studied some time under Benedetto Luti. He visited Paris in 1723, where he gained the first prize for historical composition, and was employed with his brother in repairing the paintings of Primaticcio in the palace of Fontainebleau. In 1727 he again went to Italy, and passed some time at Rome, diligently studying the works of the best masters. In that year, he drew the prize in design at the Academy of St. Luke, and afterwards painted his magnificent composition in a vault of the church of S. Isidoro, representing the Apotheosis of that Saint. He also studied sculpture for some time, and gained a prize by his proficiency in that art. His pictures of St. Francis and St. Martha gained him a pension from the Duke d'Antin, and the Pope conferred on him the honor of knight-hood. Thus elevated to distinction, he was invited to the court of Turin, where, according to Lanzi, he executed more works than his brother had done; the principal of these were a series of subjects from the Jerusalem of Tasso, in the royal palace. In 1734 he returned to Paris, and was admitted into the Academy the year following, on which occasion he painted his picture of Apollo and Marsyas as his reception piece. He soon acquired great distinction, and was one of the most popular artists of his time. After his admission to the Academy, he was successively appointed assistant professor, professor, and afterwards director. In 1752, Louis XV. conferred upon him the honor of knight-hood, and appointed him his principal painter, with a liberal pension, which situation he enjoyed till his death. He executed some works for the churches and public edifices at Paris, but wrought more for individuals; the principal are in the church of the Augustines. One of his most esteemed productions is the Marriage of the Virgin, in the gallery of the Louvre. By an attentive study of the antique and the works of the great masters during his long residence at Rome, he acquired a correctness of design and a simplicity of style, which had a useful influence in reforming the affected and gaudy manner then prevalent in the French school. His countrymen, in their enthusiasm and admiration of his talents, have not hesitated to attribute to him the design of Raffaello, the grace of Correggio, and the coloring of Titian; but a juster homage would have been to compare him with the best of the more modern Italian painters. He often varied his style of painting, finishing some of his pictures with a bold, free pencil; others, with softness and delicacy; he sometimes imitated the coloring and touch of Guido, of Carlo Maratti, or some other master. His imagination was lively and fertile, and he composed his subjects with care, judgment, and taste; his coloring is exceedingly natural, and his power in penciling enabled him to produce a pleasing effect, as well when his touch was strong and vigorous, as when it was tender and delicate. He died in 1765.

VANLOO, LOUIS MICHEL, was the son of Jean Baptiste Vanloo, born at Toulon in 1707. After studying under his father, he visited Rome for improvement, and gained the prize in design at the Academy of St. Luke. On returning to France, he went to Paris, where he was admitted into the Academy, and painted for his reception piece, a picture of Apollo and Daphne. He acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter, though he was more distinguished by his excellence in portraiture. Philip V. invited him to the court of Madrid, and appointed him his principal painter. After the death of that Monarch, he returned to Paris, where he continued to practice his profession with great success till his death in 1771.

VANLOO, CHARLES AMÉDÉE PHILIPPE, the brother of Louis Michel V., was born at Turin in 1718, and was honored in infancy by receiving the baptismal rites while in the arms of the Prince of Piedmont and the Princess Carignan. The Biographie Universelle states that he accompanied his uncle Carlo, and his brother Louis Michel, to Rome, and there attained similar success. On returning to France, he was invited to Berlin, where he resided a long time, sustaining the honor of his family as a painter of history and portraits.

VAN MANDER, CHARLES, a Flemish painter, born at Meulebeke, near Courtray, in 1548. He was descended of a noble family, and received an education suitable to his rank. He early discovered a genius for painting, and after studying successively under Lucas de Heere at Ghent and Peter Vlerick at Courtray, he went to Italy and spent three years in assiduously designing the vestiges of antiquity in the environs of Rome, and studying the works of the best masters. He there formed an intimate acquaintance with Bartholomew Spranger, in conjunction with whom he executed several works for the public edifices, as well as for individuals. At Terni, he painted one of his best pictures, representing the Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew. He accompanied his friend Spranger to Vienna, where he met with the most flattering encouragement. The Emperor would gladly have retained him in his service, but he declined the honor and returned to his native place. One of his first productions at Courtray, was a picture of Adam and Eve in Paradise, which gained him great reputation; the figures were elegantly designed, and finely colored, the landscape enchanting, and the animals executed with great spirit. He next painted a picture of the Deluge, which was highly applauded for the excellence of its composition, and the affecting manner in which he described the horrors of the scene, depicting in the most striking and pathetic manner the varied expressions of terror, grief, and despair.

Van Mander acquired a high reputation, had married, and was passing his days in tranquil prosperity, when the dreadful wars, which desolated the Low Countries, broke out and compelled him to seek refuge in Holland, which country had just shaken off the Spanish yoke, and he settled at Haerlem, where he formed an intimacy with Henry Goltzius, in conjunction with whom, he established an Academy in that city, into which he introduced the style of design which he had acquired in Italy. In 1604 he removed to Amsterdam, where he died, in 1606. Among the principal works he executed for the churches in Holland were, St. John preaching in the Wilderness; the Adoration of the Magi, and Christ bearing his Cross. His works are well designed, agreeably colored, and full of spirit, though somewhat mannered, especially his later productions; he also excelled in landscape. He distinguished himself not only as a painter, but as a writer. He wrote an account of the painters of antiquity, and the lives of the painters of the Italian and Flemish schools from the year 1366 to 1604. He was also a poet, and composed several tragedies and comedies, some of which were acted with applause.

VANNI, CAV. FRANCESCO, an eminent painter, born at Siena, according to Baldinucci and Lanzi, in 1565, though Malvasia, on the authority of Ugurgieri, places it in 1555, and others, in 1563. There is also considerable discrepancy about him in other respects, which we cannot enter into further than to say that, according to the best authorities, he received his first instruction from his father, a painter of little note, who dying when he was a child, his mother married for her second husband, Arcangiolo Salimbeni, (though there is some dispute on this point, and Niccolo Pio asserts that he was the uterine brother of the Cav. Ventura Salimbeni, who was born in 1557, see Salimbeni), who gave him further instructions, till he was twelve years old, when he went to Bologna, and became the pupil of Passarotti. At about sixteen he went to Rome, where he entered the school of Giovanni de' Vecchi, under whose direction he studied the antique, and made such rapid progress as to excite the jealousy of his fellow pupil Arpino. The works of Federigo Baroccio particularly attracted his attention; he made them his model, and imitated them with great success. On leaving Rome, he traveled through Lombardy, and improved his taste by studying the works of Correggio and Parmiggiano at Parma. On his return to Siena, he obtained much employment, and executed several works for the churches and convents, which gained him so much reputation, that he was invited to Rome by Clement VIII., who commissioned him to paint his admirable picture representing St. Peter rebuking Simon Magus. He painted this work on a slab of marble, for the church of St. Peter. It is designed and colored in the manner of Baroccio, and was prepared expressly to stand the humidity of the place. Lanzi says that, though somewhat injured by injudicious cleaning, it is still in good preservation, and an object of admiration. His works gave so much satisfaction to the Pope that he made him a knight of the Order of Christ. He painted several other works for the churches at Rome, the principal of which are St. Michael vanquishing the Rebel Angels, in S. Gregorio, a Pietà, in S. Maria in Vallicella, and the Assumption, in S. Lorenzo in Miranda. His best works however, are to be found at Siena, where he painted many pictures for the churches and public edifices, as well as for individuals, in which he approached nearer the elegant and graceful style of Baroccio. Lanzi says, "Vanni attached himself to the elegant and florid manner of Baroccio, in which he was eminently successful; this is to be seen not only in his works at Rome, but at Siena, and in other Italian cities, where he approaches the manner of that master, more closely than Viviani or any other of his pupils. His Marriage of St. Catherine, with a numerous group of angels, at the Refugio, is much praised in Siena; as is the Madonna surrounded by saints in Monna Agnese, and St. Raymond walking on the Sea, at the Dominicani, considered by some to be his best picture at Siena, where his works are very numerous. Among the finest pictures in the cathedral at Pisa, is the Dispute about the Seven Sacraments, painted in imitation of his brother Ventura Salimbeni, who had surpassed himself in his altar-piece of the angels. At the Umiltà of Pistoja, in the convent of the Camaldules of Fabriano, and at that of the Capuchins of S. Quirico, are some of his most exquisite performances; and they are so numerous in other places, that I do not imagine a full catalogue has ever been made out. He is generally a follower of Baroccio, as before observed, and amateurs, deceived by his coloring and the heads of his boys, which appear to be cast in the mould of Baroccio, frequently confound the works of Vanni with those of that master; but one acquainted with Federigo, will observe in him more grandeur of design, and a greater freedom of penciling. The pictures of Vanni, executed negligently, or at low prices, of which there are several at Siena, can scarcely be recognised for his. By his example and lessons, for he taught many pupils, the honor of painting was long supported at Siena." He died at Siena in 1610. He executed a few correct and spirited etchings from his own designs, which are highly esteemed.

VANNI, CAV. MICHAEL ANGELO, was the eldest son of the Cav. Francesco V., by whom he was instructed in the art, and whose style he followed, though he chiefly acquired his reputation from the invention of a new process of painting on marble, or rather staining it, in imitation of mosaic. Lanzi says, "the secret of coloring marble was discovered by Michael Angelo Vanni, who has transmitted the memory of the invention to posterity. He erected a monument to his father, with columns, ornaments, festoons, and figures of children; accompanied by a genealogy of the family, all designed on a white slab, and every part carefully and appropriately colored, so as to resemble mosaic of different marbles. It is supposed that the colors were imparted to the marble by some mineral essences, because they penetrated a considerable way. He entitles himself the inventor of the art, in the monumental inscription." There are some of his works in the churches and convents of Siena, but they are much inferior to the best productions of his father. He was living in 1656, at which time the monument above referred to was erected.

VANNI, CAV. RAFFAELLE, was the second son of Francesco V., born at Siena in 1596. He received his first instruction from his father, whom he had the misfortune to lose when he was fourteen years old. He afterwards went to Rome, where, according to Mancini, he entered the school of Antonio Caracci, under whose instruction he made such progress as even to surpass his father,—"an assertion," says Lanzi, "not sustained by the opinion of posterity." He is generally allowed to have been a bold and correct designer, and to have possessed an excellent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro. He imitated the style of Pietro da Cortona in the greater part of his works, which are numerous, and are to be found in the churches and public edifices at Rome, Siena, Florence, Pisa, and other cities. Lanzi says he not only strongly resembles Cortona in the fine taste of his shadows and in coloring, but several of his pictures have no small portion of the ideas of that master.—Among his finest productions are the Birth of the Virgin, in La Pace, and the cupola of S. Maria del Popolo, at Rome; the Martyrdom of St. Catherine, in the church of that Saint at Pisa; and the Procession of our Saviour to Calvary, in S. Giorgio, at Siena. He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke, in 1655, and both he and his brother were honored with knighthood.

VANNI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Florence, according to the inscription on his monument, in 1599. The Pisans claim him as a native of their city. Lanzi says that, "after taking lessons from Empoli and other masters, he studied with Cristofano Allori, and was superior to any other scholar of his school; he imitated his master admirably in his coloring, and rivalled him in design; he also imbibed from him his lessons of intemperance. Had he conducted himself with more propriety, and adhered to fixed principles, the genius he possessed might have raised him to more celebrity. He visited the schools of Italy, and copied, or at least designed, the choicest productions of each. Many praise his copies of Titian, of Veronese, and of Correggio." He, however, soon degenerated into mannerism, so that Lanzi says he did not leave one truly classical work. His masterpiece is his picture of St. Lorenzo, in the church of S. Simone, at Florence. He executed some masterly and spirited etchings, which are highly esteemed, although the drawing is not very correct. The principal are a set of fifteen plates from the paintings by Correggio, in the cupola of S. Giovanni at Parma; the Martyrdom of St. Placido, after the same; and the Marriage at Cana, after Paul Veronese. He died at Florence, in 1660.

VANNI, ANDREA DI, an old painter of Siena, of whom there are notices from 1369 to 1413. He was an eminent artist in his time, and executed many works for the churches and public edifices at Siena, Naples, and in other cities of Italy. There is a St. Sebastian in the convent of S. Martino, and a Madonna surrounded by Saints, in that of S. Francesco, at Siena, by him. Lanzi says, "He was likewise employed in public embassies, and like another Rubens, was a magistrate and ambassador of the republic to the pope."

VANNI. There were several artists of this name, who were natives of Pisa. From one Vanni, who flourished in 1300, sprung Turino di Vanni, who lived about 1343; also Nello di Vanni, who was employed, in conjunction with other artists, in decorating the Campo Santo. Bernardo di Vanni was the son of Nello, and a disciple of Orcagna. He painted many pictures for the palace of the Primate at Siena, as well as others for the public edifices.

VANNI, GIO. ANTONIO and GIO. FRANCESCO DEL, were the disciples, and probably relatives, of the Cav. Francesco Vanni. Some of their works are mentioned in the Guida di Roma.

VANNINI, OTTAVIO, a painter born at Florence, in 1585. After studying four years with Gio. Battista Mercati, in his native city, he went to Rome, where he became the disciple of Anastagio Fontebuoni; he also diligently studied the works of Raffaello and other great masters. On his return to Florence, he entered the school of Passignano, with whom he lived many years, and assisted him in his numerous works. Lanzi says he also painted many works for the collections, from his own designs, which, though well colored, are feeble in design, and labored in execution. He died in 1643.

VANNUCCHI. See SARTO.

VANNUCCI. See PERUGINO.

VAN OBSTAL, GERARD. This sculptor was born at Antwerp, in 1597, but seems to have gained his chief reputation at Paris. The Biographie Universelle states that he was chosen rector of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture. His bas-reliefs and works in ivory gained him considerable reputation, and his statue of Louis XIV., which was placed over the Porte St. Antoine, is esteemed his most remarkable work.

VANONE, ANDREA, a Lombard architect of the 16th century. According to Milizia, he removed from his native country, Lancio, in the Comasco, to Genoa, where he built the ducal palace—a stately structure, fortified with chains of iron. He was employed by the government in fortifications and other works, and led a long and honorable life. Milizia does not mention the time of his birth or death.

VANSOMER, or VAN SOMEREN, PAUL, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp about 1576. According to van Mander, he resided in Amsterdam in 1604, with his brother Bernard, where they practiced portrait painting with great success. The accounts of them are contradictory. Balke-ma says that both Paul and Bernard established themselves in Amsterdam, where they died—the former in 1641, and the latter in 1632. Paul Vansomer certainly visited England at the commencement of the 17th century, and died in London, January 5th, 1621, and was buried in St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. He acquired a high reputation in that country, and painted the portraits of many persons of distinction, which are dated from 1606 to 1620. Bryan says he was one of the ablest portrait painters who visited England before Vandyck. It appears that there were several artists named Vansomer. There was a Paul Vansomer, an engraver, who flourished at a much later date; he engraved a few prints in mezzotinto, an art not known in the time of the elder Paul.

VANTE, or ATTAVANTE, FIORENTINO, an old painter of Florence, who was living in 1484, and was much employed in ornamenting books with miniatures, for Matthias, king of Hungary, which were afterwards preserved in the Medicean and Estensean libraries at Florence. Lanzi mentions one he saw in the Library of St. Mark at Venice. "It is a work of Marziano Capella, where the subject is poetically treated by the painter. The Assembly of the Gods, the emblems of the Arts and Sciences, the grotesque ornaments, set off with little portraits, discover in Vante a genius that admirably seconded the ideas of the author; the design resembles the best works of Botticelli; the coloring is gay, lively, and brilliant, and the excellence of the work ought to confer on the artist greater celebrity than he enjoys."

VANUDEN, LUCAS. This eminent artist wrote his name Lucas van Uden, but he is generally called by English writers, Vanuden. He was born at Antwerp in 1595, and learned the art of painting from his father, an artist of little note, but he derived his chief excellence from an indefatigable study of nature. He passed all his leisure hours in the fields, where he designed the most beautiful scenes and picturesque objects with remarkable precision; he was particularly attentive to note the appearances and changes of the atmosphere, perpetually occurring from the time the rising sun dissipates the vapors, till it sinks beneath the horizon. He watched the effects of light on different objects, and suffered no incident which might prove of advantage to his art to escape his notice, not even those almost instantaneous beauties seen in the forms and colors of clouds and vapors, which are lost almost the moment they are beheld. All these he sketched on the spot, and afterwards introduced them into his pictures with the happiest effect. His manner is soft, tender, and delicate; his coloring natural and pleasing; his skies clear, often with light, floating clouds, beautifully adapted to, and harmonizing with the scene, and every object beautifully reflected and mirrored in the water; the forms of his trees select, and his foliage apparently in motion. His pictures represent views in Flanders; and, though the flatness of the country does not admit the extensive vistas so much admired in the works of Claude Lorraine and Niccolo Poussin, yet his scenery is always pleasing, the degradation of his distances admirable, and his prospects as extensive as his design would admit. In short, he was considered one of the most delicate and natural landscape painters of the Low Countries. His extraordinary merit recommended him to the particular notice of Rubens, who not only approved but admired his style, and often employed him to insert the backgrounds in his pictures, which Vanuden adapted to the rest of the composition with such harmony and taste that the whole seemed to be the work of one artist. Rubens, in return, used also to enrich the landscapes of Vanuden with historical figures. Vanuden's small landscapes are esteemed his best works; some of them bear so strong a resemblance to those of Rubens that they are scarcely distinguishable from those of that master, except by their size, and a less daring execution; they have the effect of those of Rubens viewed through a diminishing glass. Some of the later works of Vanuden are decorated with the figures of the younger Teniers, and, though he designed small figures well, these embellishments by other eminent masters greatly enhance the value of his pictures. His works are justly held in the highest estimation, and are found in the choicest collections. There are some admirable pictures by him on a larger scale than he usually painted, in the chapels belonging to the Cathedral of Ghent.

Vanuden executed some admirable etchings of landscapes, from his own designs, and after the works of Rubens, Titian, and others, which he usually marked L. or Lucas van Uden. Bartsch describes fifty-nine etchings which he attributes to him; but he acknowledges that several of these have so strong a resemblance to those of Louis de Vadder, that the most experienced connoisseurs find it difficult to distinguish them. Dumesnil attributes some of them to Jean Bonnacroy. For further particulars, the reader must be referred to Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. v., and Weigel's Supplement, and to Robert Dumesnil, Le Peintre Graveur Français, tom. iii. He died in 1660.

VANUDEN, JAMES, was the brother and scholar of the preceding, whose manner he imitated. He was very inferior to Lucas, though his works have often passed with the unlearned for the productions of his brother.

VANVITELLI, GASPARE, called DAGLI OCCHIALI. This artist was born at Utrecht in 1647, but he went to Italy while young, where he passed the rest of his life, and is ranked among the Italian painters. His family name was Witel, or Vanvitel, which he italianized to Vanvitelli. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted architectural subjects, perspective pieces, and views of sea-ports, in the manner of Canaletto; and, though his works are inferior to the productions of that master in the spirit and animation of his touch, and in the lustre and brilliancy of his coloring, yet his drawing and perspective are correct, and his tints natural and agreeable. As Canaletto was the painter of modern Venice, so Vanvitelli may be called the painter of modern Rome; his pictures represent the magnificent edifices in that city, to which he added landscapes when the subject admitted of it. He also painted views of other cities, sea-ports, villas and farm-houses. He painted a few large pictures, but most of his works are of small size; and these are the best. Lanzi says, "He was correct in his proportions, lively and clear in his tints, and there is nothing left to desire, except a little more spirit and variety in his landscape or in the sky, as the atmosphere is always of a pale azure, or carelessly broken by a passing cloud." The greatest merit in his works consists in the accuracy of his design, and the excellence of his perspective, which Lanzi says made his works alike useful to painters and architects. He died at Rome in 1736.

VANVITELLI, LUIGI. This eminent architect was of Dutch origin, and the son of the preceding artist, Gaspar van Witel, who, settling in Italy, was called Vanvitelli. Luigi was born at Naples, in 1700, and early manifested a strong inclination for art. At the age of twenty, he was employed by Cardinal Acquaviva to paint some frescos in the chapel of St. Cecilia; and he afterwards made some of the cartoons from celebrated pictures, preparatory to their being copied in mosaic on a larger scale, for St. Peter's at Rome. About this period also, he began to study architecture under Filippo Ivara, an eminent architect of that day. His first work in this art, was the restoration of the Palazzo Albani at Urbino, for the Cardinal di San Clemente; besides which he erected two churches in that city—S. Francesco and S. Domenico—that led to his obtaining the appointment of architect to St. Peter's at the age of twenty-six. He was also associated with Niccolo Salvi, in the undertaking for conducting the water Vermicino to Rome. About this time, there was a competition between all the most eminent architects of the day, for a façade to the church of St. John of Lateran; Salvi and Vanvitelli sent in designs, each of which were approved with an equal number of votes above all others, by the academicians of St. Luke; but, according to a memorial of Vanvitelli, the pope adopted the design of Galileo, not so much on account of superior merit, but rather for private reasons. However, neither Salvi or Vanvitelli was overlooked; the former was employed upon the Fountain of Trevi, and the latter was sent to Ancona, where he planned the Lazzaretto of a pentagonal form with a bastion, having first studied those at Leghorn, Genoa, and Venice. He also repaired and altered some churches and chapels in that city, and was occupied in a number of similar employments at Macerata, Perugia, Pesaro, and Siena. In 1745, according to Milizia, he went to Milan to design the façade for the Cathedral, which he intended to be of a style between the Gothic and the Greek; but the breaking out of the war prevented its execution. At Milan, he erected the archducal palace; at Rome, the convent of S. Agostino—his most important work in that city, and a most superb edifice—also an admirable chapel for the Portuguese ambassador, which was removed, and placed in the church of the Jesuits at Lisbon. In 1750, he arranged the ornaments of the tribune of St. Peter's, the illumination of the Cupola in a new style, the preparations for a consecration, the obsequies of the queen of England, and the removal of the Pietà of Michael Angelo.

By this time his reputation had increased to so great a degree, that when the king of Naples, afterwards Charles III. of Spain, determined to erect a palace at Caserta, that should be upon a scale hardly inferior to that of any other edifice of the kind in Europe, he at once made choice of Vanvitelli as the architect, and the corner-stone was laid with great pomp, in presence of all the court, Jan. 28th, 1752. This vast pile is an unbroken parallelogram of uniform design, all its fronts being nearly similar in their elevations; those facing the north and south are 730 feet, the others 570 feet in length; and the general height of the building is 102 feet, which is however increased to 162 feet at the angles, where there is a square pavilion enclosing a second order. The elevations consist of a very lofty basement, comprising a ground floor and mezzanine; and above that an Ionic order with two series of windows, and mezzanine windows in the frieze. Although it may be considered in some respects as the principal front, since it faces a spacious semi-elliptical piazza, enclosed by a uniform range of buildings for lodgings and stables, the south front is less decorated than that towards the gardens, for it has columns only in the centre and at the extremities; while in the other the order is continued throughout in pilasters, as well as in columns; yet the degree of unity thus kept up is attended with a very great drawback, for the narrower intercolumns between the centre and end breaks, cause the others to appear offensively wide, and those parts of the composition where there ought to have been greater richness, to look poor and straggling: this is particularly the case with regard to the centre, which is only three intercolumns in width; therefore that and its pediment become insignificant in comparison with the entire mass, a defect which is still further increased by the end pavilions being so much loftier. Owing to the great height of the basement, the cornice of the order forms no adequate finish to the general elevation. The interior of the edifice is divided into four courts, 162 by 244 feet; the depth of building which surrounds these courts, in which are the rooms, passages, &c., is 80 feet; in this dimension is comprehended the thickness of the walls, which are in some instances 15 feet. The courts are formed by other ranges of building crossing from north to south and from east to west, at the intersection of which there is a large and lofty octagon vestibule, crowned by a dome. On one side of this vestibule is the grand staircase—a most magnificent structure—and the chapel on the other, decorated with isolated Corinthian columns on pedestals. The chambers throughout the whole edifice are vaulted, and admirably arranged. Milizia characterizes this stupendous edifice as “a rare assemblage of vastness, regularity, symmetry, richness, ease and elegance.” Vanvitelli published in 1757, a large folio volume of the plans, &c., under the title of Dichiarazione de' Disegni del Reale Palazzo di Caserta.

Vanvitelli erected the great ranges of aqueducts for supplying the palace with water, forming one of the most stupendous works of the kind ever undertaken in modern times. He was also employed upon many other works at Naples, the principal of which are the cavalry-barracks, near the Ponte Maddalena, and the three churches of S. Marcellino, Della Rotonda, and La Nunziata. Among his works at other places, besides those already mentioned, are the public hall at Brescia, and the bridge at Benevento. For many years, Vanvitelli enjoyed a very prosperous career, and finally died March 1st, 1773.

VARCO, ALONSO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1645. He studied under Don José Antolinez, and painted landscapes in the style of that master with considerable reputation. He died there in 1680.

VARELA, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, said to have been born at Seville in 1606, though probably earlier, as Bermudez says he was employed by the convent of the Carthusians of Santa Maria, in 1618, and his Last Supper, in the Church of San Bernardo, one of his best works, is dated 1622. He was a disciple of Pablo de las Roelas, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He executed many works for the churches and convents, as well as for individuals at Seville, where he died in 1656.

VARGAS, ANDRES DE, a Spanish painter, born at Cuenca in 1613. He went early to Madrid, and became the disciple, friend, and imitator of Francisco Camillo. He executed some works for the churches and convents of Madrid, Cuenca, and Hiniesta, but wrought more for individuals. He injured his reputation, by regulating the quality of his work by the price received. He died in 1674.

VARGAS, LUIS DE, an eminent Spanish painter, the accounts of whom are very contradictory. Ac-ording to Palomino, he was born at Seville in 1528, and died in 1590; he says that, after learning the rudiments of the art in his native city, he went to Rome, where he studied some years, and directed his attention particularly to the works of Pierino del Vaga. On his return to Seville, finding himself unable to compete with Pedro Campana, whose works were then held in great esteem, he again went to Rome, and devoted seven years more to a diligent study of the works of Raffaele and other great masters. He then returned to Seville, and soon gave proof of extraordinary abilities. Cean Bermudez gives an entirely different account. He places his birth in 1502, and his death in 1568. He went to Italy in 1527, where he resided many years, and by a diligent study of the works of the great masters, he became one of the most correct and skillful designers of his time. Pacheco says he resided in Italy 28 years, and returned to Seville about the middle of the 16th century. All, however, agree that on his return to Seville he greatly distinguished himself by several admirable works on a grand scale, painted in fresco, for the churches and convents, which have perished, or so little remains of them, that little opinion of their merits can now be formed. Bermudez says, “De Vargas executed many works both in oil and fresco, equal to the productions of the best masters in Italy. Nothing can be more correct than his contours, grander than his forms, or better understood than his foreshortenings; for in these particulars he was superior to the most renowned of his countrymen who have followed him. If, in his smaller oil pictures, painted on panel, the aerial effect and gradations of light and tints had been equal to the splendor of his principal colors, the beautiful foldings of his draperies, the nobleness of the expression and of the attitudes, the graceful air of the figures, and the strict imitation of nature in the accessories, he would have been the best painter of Spain; but these defects were common in his time, and the greatest artists were not free from them.” Among his chief performances were Adam and Eve in Paradise, Christ bearing his Cross, in the cathedral, and the Virgin holding a Rosary, in the church of the convent of San Pablo; productions said to be worthy of the hand of Raffaele. He was accustomed to inflict scourgings and mortifications upon his body, and following the example of the Emperor Charles V., he used to lay himself in his coffin, to meditate on death.

VARIN, JEAN, a sculptor and medalist, was born at Liege in 1604. During his earlier years, he served as a page in the employment of Comte de Rochefort, but having a strong inclination for design, he devoted his leisure moments to its study. He at length attained so much excellence in engraving, that he was invited to Paris and commissioned to engrave the seal of the French Academy, then recently established, in 1635. The merit of this performance gained him the friendship of Cardinal Richelieu, and he was soon after appointed keeper of the mint. He executed a set of medals, commemorating various events in the reign of Louis XIII.; and after the death of that monarch, he was appointed, in addition to his former office, Intendant of Buildings to the Crown. Among his principal works in sculpture, are mentioned a Bust of Cardinal Richelieu; a marble statue of Louis XIII., placed in the palace at Versailles; and two colossal busts of that prince, one in marble, and the other in bronze. Varin was chosen one of the first members of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, established in 1664. He died in 1672.

VARIN, JOSEPH, a French engraver, mentioned by the Biographie Universelle, who appears to have attained considerable celebrity. He was born at Chalons-sur-Marne, in 1740, and studied under his father, who was a graver on metals, descended from Jeau Varin, and who taught a free school of design at Chalons. In 1755, Joseph assisted in executing a large map of the province of Burgundy, which gained him the honor of a medal. He visited Paris in 1760, in company with his brother, whose name is not mentioned, and found patrons in Crozat, Caylus, and others. They were engaged for many years upon various works, particularly the Voyage pittoresque de Naples et de Sicile, published by the Abbé de St. Non. The talents of Joseph Varin were also employed upon the Voyage en Grèce, by Choiseul Gouffier; the Voyage pittoresque de Syrie, de Phenicie, et de Palestine, by Cassas; and the Tableau de l'Empire Othoman, by Chev. Ohsson Mouradja. He also executed many views of cities and public buildings in France. This laborious artist unhappily lost the fruits of his labors during the civil commotions in France. He died in 1800.

VARLEY, JOHN, an eminent English painter in water colors, was born at London about 1777. He was about to be apprenticed to a silver-smith, when the death of his father left him at liberty to choose his own profession, and he at first obtained employment with an obscure painter at Holborn. Afterwards, when about fifteen or sixteen, he received some instructions from a drawing master named Barrow, and they went in company on a sketching excursion, which was of material advantage to Varley, as a view that he then made of Peterborough Cathedral brought him into notice. He next became acquainted with Arnold, the landscape painter, with whom he made a tour through North Wales about 1799. On returning from that excursion, he was for some time employed by Dr. Munro in making sketches for him of the scenery in the neighborhood of his residence at Fetcham, in Surrey. Two other excursions through Wales, in 1801 and 1802, produced him numerous subjects, which occupied his pencil many years in London, and established his reputation as the first in that department of art he had chosen. He was certainly among the first, if not the very first, who began to advance the art of water-color drawing to that of water-color painting, and to give that mode of execution a solidity and force, a freedom and breadth, which it had not before attained, and of which it was not supposed capable. Up to that time, scarcely anything had been produced beyond washed or tinted drawings, very little superior to the colored prints of the same period—raw and feeble in effect. On the other hand, Varley gave to his paintings nearly all the vigor of oil pictures, and by a mode peculiar to himself, for he wrought with great rapidity, and does not appear to have produced his effects by repeated sponging and other processes now in use, or by admixture of body-color; his colors look as if they had been laid on at once, and hardly re-touched. Varley was not an original member of the Water Color Society (established in 1804,) but he afterwards joined it, and sent many pictures to its exhibitions. Although he derived a good income from the sale of his works, and from his practice as a teacher, his numerous family, and want of either management or economy, kept him in continual embarrassment. He devoted much time to the study of judicial astrology, and is said to have made many extraordinary predictions. He was married twice, and died in 1842.

VAROTARI, DARIO, a reputable painter and architect, was born at Verona, according to Ridolfi, in 1539. He studied under Paul Veronese, and subsequently established himself at Padua, where he laid the foundation of a very flourishing school. According to Lanzi, his design is very chaste, and though his works occasionally resemble those of his instructor, his taste seems to have been formed on other models, particularly Titian, whom he frequently imitated in the airs of his heads. Although his coloring cannot boast the Venetian strength or beauty, it possesses great truth and harmony. He painted in the Polesine, at Venice, and at Padua, particularly in the church of S. Egidio in the latter city.

As an architect, Varotari erected a number of works, among which Milizia mentions a villa at Dola, for the Signori Mocenighi; a Casino on the Brenta for the famous Medico Acquapendente; and the graceful Montecchia de' Caodelista, not far from Praglia and Padua. While engaged in painting in this Casino, he accidentally fell from the first scaffold to the second, but without injury. His preservation appearing to him miraculous, he immediately went to Padua, and took the habit of the Santa Virgine. He died in 1596.

VAROTARI, ALESSANDRO, called IL PADOVANINO. This eminent painter was the son of the preceding, born at Padua in 1590. His father dying when he was only six years old, he was instructed by some artist, not mentioned. He however, derived his principal improvement by studying the works of Titian, which were at Padua, and some of his juvenile copies excited the surprise and admiration of artists. He was sent young to Venice, where he pursued his studies with unremitting diligence, and soon began to distinguish himself. He was called Il Padovanino, by which name he is generally known in Italy. Lanzi gives the following admirable account of him: "He first studied Titian's works in fresco, such as he found in Padua, and his copies still continue to attract the admiration of the greatest professors. In Venice he persevered in his assiduous attention to the same incomparable master, penetrating so far by degrees, into his peculiar characteristics, as to be preferred by many to any of Titian's other disciples. But comparison is always disagreeable, and I am inclined to think those who personally receive from the lips of great artists a few brief and sound rules as to what ought to be avoided, or achieved, in order best to resemble them, are entitled to a high degree of respect; all the speculations of the finest geniuses upon their works are not half so valuable; for the second century is fast passing away, since the oral traditions of the best colorists wholly ceased, and we have been attempting to attain their method, in which we cannot succeed. Padovanino was always equal to the task of handling any subject that had been before treated by Titian; his softer ones with grace, his more powerful with strength, his heroic pieces with dignity, in which last, if I mistake not, he surpassed any other disciple of this great master. Women, cavaliers, arms, and the Loves (gli Amori), and let us add, boys, were the favorite subjects of his pencil, which he exhibited to the most advantage, and which he most frequently introduced into his compositions. And he knew how to treat landscape as well, in which he has succeeded admirably in some of his small pictures. He was familiar with the science of the sotto in su (foreshortening on a ceiling, so as to produce a correct point of view, as seen from below), of which he gave the most favorable specimens in the church of S. Andrea di Bergamo, in three admirable histories of that saint. It is a work embellished with beautiful architecture and replete with graces in every part. He has approached agreeably near his model in the sobriety of his composition, in the very difficult use of his middle tints, in his contrasts, in the color of his flesh, and in smoothness and facility of hand. But Titian was still to remain unequalled in his art; and Varotari is not a little inferior to him in animation and in truthfulness of expression. Nor can I believe that his method of preparing his canvass, and of coloring it, was the same as that pursued by Titian's scholars, many of his pieces being much darkened, with the shades either deepened or altered. This is very perceptible even in his Dead Christ at Florence, a painting which the prince not very long since purchased for his gallery there. In other points, he appears to me to have observed the same method, in regard to his model, as Poussin did, who aimed at Raffaello's manner without reaching it, either from want of ability or a dread of falling into servility. His master piece is said to be the Supper at Cana, formerly in Padua, now in the chapter of La Carità, at Venice, engraved by Patina, among the Select Paintings. It has few figures in proportion to the place, a rich display of costume and ornament, dogs that appear like those of Paul Veronese, full of life; grand attendance of women of the most exquisite forms, warmed with more ideal beauty than those of Titian, and drawn in the most graceful attitudes; still, not every one will approve of his introduction of them for the service of such a table, in preference to men, as is the general custom. The above picture, however, does not boast such fresh and lucid tints as his four histories of the life of S. Domenico in the Refectory of S. S. Giovanni e Paolo, containing, as it were, the flower of Padovanino's best style. This very elegant artist spent his time between Venice and his native province, where alone his pictures abound in public; in other cities, they are rarely to be met with, and are scarce even in private collections. In forming a correct opinion of his merits, it is necessary to be upon our guard against a variety of copies, many of his disciples having so happily imitated him, that Venetian professors themselves with difficulty distinguish their hand from that of their master." He died in 1650.

VAROTARI, CHIARA, was the sister of Alessandro, and is said to have learned the rudiments of the art from her father. She is extolled by Ridolfi for the beauty of her portraits, and as fully deserving of the extraordinary honors conferred upon her by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who invited her to his court, and placed her portrait, painted by herself, in the Florentine gallery. The poet Boschini also celebrated her beauty, talents, and accomplishments. She was living in 1660, according to Borghini and Lanzi, though some say she died at Verona in 1639.

VAROTARI, DARIO, called GIOVANE, or the Younger, was the son and scholar of Alessandro V. According to Boschini, he was a physician, poet, painter, and engraver, but he seems to have practiced the fine arts merely for his amusement. Lanzi says, "In the index to the Carta del Navigar, we find him ranked with the Dilettanti, from the circumstance of his producing little in art, and this more with the object of presenting his pictures as gifts than of gain. Nevertheless, we meet with an encomium upon them sufficient to satisfy his claims, even of a good professor; besides which some of his portraits, and pictures emblematic of the virtues, with an excellent body of coloring, are equally extolled for the spirit of the attitudes and exquisite taste, in the manner of Giorgione." Bartsch describes two prints by him—the portrait of his grandfather, Dario V., and of Vincentius Gussonus, Eq., both signed with his name.

VASARI, LAZZARO, an old painter of the Florentine school, who flourished about the middle of the 15th century. According to Lanzi, he was the intimate friend of Pietro della Francesca, and the imitator of his paintings; he was also the great-grandfather of Giorgio Vasari, the first biographer of Italian artists. There was another Giorgio V., uncle of the latter, who modeled admirable vases in plaster, reviving the forms of the antique, in their basso-relievos, and their brilliant coloring. There are specimens of his skill now in the Florentine Gallery.

VASARI, GIORGIO. This eminent painter and writer on art, was born at Arezzo, according to Bottari, in 1512. He was descended from a family attached to the fine arts, and the great-grandson and nephew of the two artists mentioned in the preceding article. According to Lanzi's account, he was instructed in design by Michael Angelo and Andrea del Sarto; in painting by Rosso and Guglielmo da Marcilla, an eminent glass painter of that age. His chief improvement, however, was at Rome, whither he was brought by Cardinal Ippolito de' Medici, and introduced by that nobleman to his family, who afterwards loaded him with riches and honor. According to Lanzi, "after having designed all the works by Michael Angelo and Raffaele at Rome, and much after other schools and the antique marbles, he formed a style in which we discover traces of his studies; but his predilection for Buonarotti is apparent. After acquiring skill in painting figures, he became one of the most excellent architects of the age; and united in himself the various branches which were known to Pierino del Vaga, Giulio Romano, and their scholars, who followed the example of Raffaele. He could unaided direct the construction of a grand fabric, adorn it with figures, grotesques, landscapes, stuccos, gilding, and whatever else was required to ornament it in a princely style." By this means he became known in Italy; and was employed to exercise his talents in various cities. He painted a number of pictures in the Vatican; also in the Hall of the Chancery, where he executed a series of historical frescos from the life of Paul III., at the desire of Cardinal Farnese.

In 1544, according to Lanzi, Vasari was invited to Naples, to paint the refectory of the P. P. Olivetani, upon which he also exerted his talents in architecture, converting it from the Gothic into a better form; he altered the vault, and ornamented it with modern stuccos, which were the first seen in Naples. He remained in that city about a year, and painted a considerable number of subjects, with that rapidity and mediocrity which characterize the greater part of his works. In his own life, Vasari gives the idea of his being the restorer of taste in Naples; but, as Lanzi justly remarks, "it is not easy to conjecture why he should overlook many eminent painters, and even the illustrious Andrea da Salerno himself." The Neapolitan writers have always, and, as it seems, justly, complained of this neglect in his Lives of Italian Artists.

Besides his works at Rome and Naples, Vasari executed many others, among which are the Adoration of the Magi, in the Conventuali at Rimini; the Feast of Abasuerus, in the church of the Benedictines at Arezzo; and three sacred subjects in the refectory of S. Michele in Bosco, at Bologna. Brought into public notice by these works, honored by the esteem and friendship of Buonarrotti, and recommended by his multifarious abilities, he was invited to the court of Cosmo I. at Florence, whither he went with his family in 1553. He was employed by the Grand Duke in superintending the important works in the Palazzo Vecchio, among which the most considerable was the apartment of Clement VII., on the ceiling of which he represented that pontiff, in the act of crowning Charles V., and all around disposed the emblems of his virtues, his victories, and his most remarkable actions. The following criticism on his artistic merits is condensed from Lanzi. "Vasari aimed at too much, and for the most part preferred expedition to accuracy. Hence, though a good designer, his figures are not always correct; and his painting appears languid, from his meagre and superficial coloring. In his writings, he recommended the acquirement of compendious methods, and the 'expedition of practice'; in other words, to make use of former exercises and studies. This method is highly advantageous to the artist, because it increases his profits; but is prejudicial to the art, which thus departing from nature, degenerates into mannerism. Vasari often fell into this error, especially in his hasty productions, or where he borrowed the hand of others; as in the Hall of the Chancery at Rome, which he completed in one hundred days, to please the Cardinal, notwithstanding the admonitions of his friends, among whom Caro did not fail to remind him of the injury his reputation might sustain." Notwithstanding this, Vasari conducted several works with sufficient care to evince abilities of an uncommon order. Bottari does not scruple to compare some of his portraits to Giorgione; Borghini extols his Conception, in S. Apostolo, at Florence; Lanzi praises his Decollation of St. John, in the church at Rome dedicated to that Apostle, and says that if all his works had perished but the above, and some of those in the Palazzo Vecchio at Florence, his reputation would have been much greater.

As an architect, Vasari attained greater excellence than as a painter. At Rome, he erected a great part of the palace for Julius III., without the Porta del Popolo, and near the Arco Scuro.

According to Milizia, the exterior parts of this edifice, taken separately, are not very correct; but as a whole, the proportions are elegant. He was engaged for many years at Florence on various works, particularly the Palazzo Vecchio, of which he improved the form, and made several alterations in the internal arrangements. His best edifice, and in Milizia's opinion the most elegant in Florence, is the Palazzo Uffizi, commenced in 1561 by order of the Grand Duke, and completed after Vasari's death by Alfonso Parigi. The façade has a portico, with openings alternately circular and level; the centre opening is supported by double insulated columns, and the others by large piers with niches. Over the entablature of this portico, which is Doric, with a plain frieze, and dentels above the cornice, is a lofty attic; the windows are small. This idea evinces an improved taste. According to Maffei, the archivolts on the arches are managed with so great skill, that, although the interior façade rests upon them, even an experienced eye cannot perceive any settlement, nor is this arrangement in any degree prejudicial to the firmness of the building; and although another story has been added, containing an immense collection of busts, marble statues, &c., not a stone has moved from its original position. Vasari was of opinion that all archivolts, both ancient and modern, were fractured in the centre; he therefore took care to avoid this in his own work, by adopting the same plan as in the amphitheatre at Verona, where the key-stone is dove-tailed into the two lateral stones, which are so long and deep that they extend to the pilasters, and entirely through the walls. Vasari executed many other architectural works in various parts of Italy, among which were the designs for the palace and church of the cavaliers of Santo Stefano, at Pisa; and the beautiful cupola of the Madonna dell' Umilta, at Pistoja; he also restored the ancient church della Pieve, at Arezzo, besides many others. He was for many years employed to superintend the decorations in Florence, that were ordered by Cosmo I., and Prince D. Francesco. Lanzi says that the Florentine Academy of Design was reëstablished about 1561, principally through the exertions of Vasari. According to Bottari, he died in 1574, although his death is elsewhere placed in 1576.

As a writer on art, Vasari deserves considerable attention. He entered upon his work at the suggestion of Cardinal Farnese; and, according to Lanzi, his first intention was merely to collect anecdotes of artists, to be extended by Giovinio; but when it was discovered that he could write better than the latter, the whole task devolved upon him, although he had the assistance of various literary characters, in order to render the work more worthy of the public. Lanzi says that "he reckoned Buonarrotti the greatest painter that ever existed, exalting him above the ancient Greeks; and from his practice, held a bold and vigorous design as the summit of perfection, compared to which beauty and coloring were nothing. From such fundamental principles proceeded some of his obnoxious criticisms on Bassano, Titian, and even Raffaele himself. But this was the effect of his education, and we may observe on a few passages of his work, that, while we condemn his principles, we admire his history. He was the father of the history of painting, and has transmitted to us its most precious materials. Educated in the most auspicious era of the art, he has in some measure perpetuated the influence of the golden age." There are many chronological errors in Vasari's work, and no writer on art has endured such a storm of criticism and hostility; but he has doubtless rendered greater service to art than any other. Had it not been for his indefatigable study, and his researches in various parts of Italy, the most valuable information concerning the old masters of the Venetian, Bolognese, and Lombard schools, would have been lost to us forever, unless indeed some other able writer had devoted his talents to produce so elegant and finished a history. It was published at Florence in 1550, in two volumes, entitled Vite de' piu eccellenti Pittori, Scultori, e Architetti. In 1566, Vasari undertook a new tour, to prepare for the second edition, which was published in 1568. The best subsequent editions are, that of Bottari, Rome, 1759, 3 vols., 4to.; those printed at Leghorn, 1767, 7 vols. 4to.; at Siena, 1791-98, 11 vols., 8vo.; at Milan in 1807, 16 vols. 8vo. Mr. Bohn has also recently published an English edition at London, in his Standard Library.

VASCELLINI, GAETANO, an Italian engraver, born at Castello S. Giovanni in the Bolognese state, in 1740. He was instructed in design by Ercole Graziani, and in engraving by Carlo Faucci at Florence. He engraved some portraits from those in the Florentine Gallery, and some historical and sacred subjects after Titian, Andrea del Sarto, Sebastiano Conca, Volterra, and other masters.

VASCO, PEREYRA, a Portuguese painter, who flourished at Seville in the latter part of the 16th century, where he practiced with considerable distinction. He painted the Decollation of St. Paul, for the convent of that order, in competition with Alonso Vasquez and Mohedano. He was employed in the Cathedral of Seville in 1598. He is said to have executed many works, both in oil and fresco, for the churches and convents in Spain and Portugal. He died about 1600.

VASCO, called by the Portuguese GRAN-VASCO, or the Great Vasco. The accounts of this artist are very contradictory and uncertain. Whether he was the same as the preceding, or another artist is not known. It is said that his works are to be found in the churches and convents of Portugal, and that they are very numerous and held in the highest estimation. It would appear, also, that he had many imitators, whose works are frequently attributed to him. According to Berardo, who made diligent inquiries on the subject, but the result of whose researches has not yet been fully made known, he was the son of Francisco Fernandez, a painter of the city of Vizeu, where Vasco was born and baptized, on the 18th of September, 1552. For an account of his works, the reader is referred to "Les Arts en Portugal," by Count Raczynski.

VASCONI, FILIPPO, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Venice about 1720. He engraved some plates of views in Venice and its vicinity.

VASCONIO, GIUSEPPE, a Roman painter, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He is commended by Orlandi and the Guida di Roma. He executed some works for the churches, and was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke in 1657.

VASELLI, ALESSANDRO, a painter born at Rome, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He was a scholar of Giacinto Brandi, whose style he followed, according to Orlandi, with considerable success. Some of his works are mentioned in the Guida di Roma.

VASI, CAV. GIUSEPPE, a Sicilian designer and engraver, was born in that island in 1710. His instructor in the art is not mentioned. He visited Rome, and passed most of his life in that city, where he was much patronized by Benedict XIV. He published several views of the port of Ancona, and afterwards engraved for Charles III., king of Naples, the decorations of the festival in honor of the birth of his eldest son, which pleased that monarch so highly, that he assigned Vasi apartments in the Farnese palace at Rome. Encouraged by this distinction, he applied himself to engraving the finest ancient and modern edifices, fountains, and other monuments in the metropolis of art, which he published in one grand collection of ten volumes in 1761, under the title Delle magnificenze di Roma, &c. The success of this work determined him to proceed further, and he published in six sheets a View of Rome in perspective, from Mount Janiculum, dedicated to Charles III., which was greatly admired, and is now to be found in most European cabinets. Among the other works of Vasi, are his collection of plates in two volumes, entitled Tesoro sacro, cioè: le Basiliche, le Chiese, i Cimiterj e i Sanctuarj di Roma, &c., published in 1778. In 1777 he published a guide book, entitled Itinerario istruttivo di Roma nella pittura, scultura, e architettura, &c., containing a catalogue of all his plates up to that date. According to Bassano, Vasi died at Rome in 1785; although the Biographie Universelle places the date in 1782. Gio. Battista Piranesi, the celebrated architectural engraver, was his pupil.

VASQUEZ, ALONSO, a Spanish painter, born at Ronda, according to Palomino, in 1589, and died in 1650. These dates, however, are doubtless incorrect, as Bermudez says he was one of the artists employed in the magnificent decorations for the obsequies of Philip II. in 1598, and he died before Pacheco published his work in 1649. He studied at Seville, under Antonio Arfian, a scholar of Luis de Vargas, and acquired considerable reputation as an historical painter. He also excelled in painting fruit, flowers, and subjects of still-life. He was particularly distinguished for his intimate acquaintance with anatomy; his works are correctly designed, and executed with freedom and facility. The principal are in the monastery of the Barefooted Carmelites at Seville. He died about 1645. Juan Batista Vasquez, probably a relative of the preceding, was born at Seville in the 16th century, and practiced both painting and sculpture. His best performance in the former art is a picture of the Virgin and Infant, at the altar of the church of Our Lady of Granada.

VASSALLO, ANTONIO MARIA, a Genoese painter, who flourished about 1670. He studied under Vincent Malo of Cambray, the scholar of Rubens. He painted landscapes and animals, but chiefly excelled in flowers and fruit, which he colored admirably, and touched with great freedom and spirit. He also designed the human figure correctly, and gave proofs of much talent for historical painting; but he died young.

VASSEUR, JEAN CHARLES LE, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1734. He studied first with Daullé, and afterwards with Beauvarlet. He engraved a considerable number of plates after the works of the French, Dutch, and German masters. Among others are the following by him. He died in 1816.

The Triumph of Venus; after Boucher. The Death of Adonis; do. The Continence of Scipio; after Le Moine. Diana and Endymion; after J. B. Vanloo. Apollo and Daphne; after Luca Giordano. The Triumph of Galatea; after J. F. de Troy. The Parting of Hector and Andromache; after Restout. Alexander and his Physician; do. Tarquin and Lucretia; after A. Peters. The Milkmaid; after J. B. Greuze. Thais, or the beautiful Penitent; do. The Step-Mother; do. The Widow and the Curate; do. The Will destroyed; do. Lionardo da Vinci expiring in the arms of Francis I.; after Ménageot. The Four Seasons; after Gallet. A Holy Family; after R. Mengs.

VASSILACCHI, ANTONIO, called L'ALIENSE, or ALIENSE DA MILO, a painter born in the island of Milo, in the Archipelago, in 1556. According to Ridolfi, who wrote his life, he was sent to Venice when young, and placed under the instruction of Paul Veronese, under whom he made such progress and showed such a genius for historical painting, particularly for works of vast and imaginative character, as to excite the jealousy of that master, who dismissed him from his studio, at the same time advising him to confine himself to small pictures. Aliense, confident in his own powers, and suspecting that Veronese was practicing towards him the same disgraceful illiberality which Titian had shown to Tintoretto, followed the example of the latter, and redoubled his efforts to attain excellence. He designed from the antique, day and night; he exercised himself in acquiring a knowledge of the human frame; he modeled in wax; copied Tintoretto with the utmost assiduity; and, as if wholly to forget what he had learned of Paolo, he sold all the designs he had made in his academy. He acquired great distinction, was patronized by the Doge and principal nobility of Venice, was invited to the court of Spain by Philip II., and Sigismond, king of Poland, earnestly solicited him to enter his service; but preferring to remain in Venice, he declined these honors and emoluments. He executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Venice; also in other cities of Italy, particularly Perugia, generally on a grand scale. At first, Aliense could not entirely divest himself of the style of Veronese, and his earlier productions in the church of La Vergine, display much of that master. He afterwards formed a style of his own, founded on that of Tintoretto, which in boldness and energy of design, freedom and spirit of pencil, and vigor of coloring, approaches the best productions of that master. Such are his pictures in the church of the Holy Apostles at Venice, representing Abraham sacrificing Isaac, Cain slaying Abel, and the Brazen Serpent. In the Sala dello Scrutinio are several of his best productions, particularly the Destruction of Troy, which prove him to have possessed a very fertile and inventive genius.

Lanzi says, "Aliense has been accused by historians of having abandoned the style of Veronese for one less adapted to his genius; and moreover, of having been misled by the innovations of the mannerists. Sometimes, however, he painted with extreme care, as in his Epiphany for the Council of Ten; though in general he abused the facility of his genius, without fear of risking his credit, inasmuch as his rivals, Palma and Corona, pursued the same plan. In order to oppose his great enemy, Vittoria, he attached himself to another architect who possessed great influence, named Girolamo Campagna, the disciple of Sansovino; he moreover enjoyed the favor of Tintoretto. In this manner he obtained many commissions, both for the public palace and for the churches of Venice, besides being engaged in many works for other cities." He died at Venice in 1629.

VAST, VANDER. The name of this artist is affixed to some etchings of landscapes, executed in a spirited and tasteful style. Some writers conjecture, with little probability, that he is the same as Adrian de Weerd, or Veert, which see.

VAU, LOUIS LE, or LEVAU, a distinguished French architect, was born, according to D'Argenville, in 1612. Little is known of him, except by his works, but he acquired sufficient eminence to be appointed, in 1653, first Architect to Louis XIV., and Superintendent of Buildings to the Crown; and he discharged the duties of that office during the rest of his life. Milizia says, "his talents were of the highest class, and he practiced his profession with that assiduity and activity which are requisite to undertake and execute great projects." He was occupied upon the enlargement of the Tuileries, and ornamented the great gallery with a Composite order. Among his other works were, various alterations in Cardinal Mazarin's Chateau de Vincennes; the Chateau de Vaux, erected for M. Fouquet; the Chateau of Livry, for M. Bordier; and the hotels Pons and Colbert. Le Vau died in 1670. The College des Quatre Nations was afterwards erected from his designs, by his pupil François d'Orbay.

VAUGHAN, ROBERT, an English engraver, who flourished about 1650. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits of distinguished personages, for the booksellers, which are more praised for the characters they represent, than for the merit of the prints.

VAUGHAN, WILLIAM, an English engraver, probably a brother of the preceding. He flourished about 1660, and, like Robert Vaughan, was probably employed in engraving portraits and other subjects for the booksellers. He also engraved a set of thirteen plates of animals. His prints are poorly executed.

VAUQUER, a French designer and engraver, by whom there is a set of plates of flowers and ornamental foliage for goldsmiths.

VAYMER, GIOVANNI ENRICO, a painter born at Genoa in 1665, and died in 1738. He studied under Gio. Battista Gaulli. He painted history with reputation, but he chiefly excelled in portraits, in which branch he was very celebrated. Lanzi says he abounded in commissions, and that Genoa is full of his portraits. "He was called three times to Turin to paint the King and royal family, and was invited by very considerable offers to remain there, which, however, he always declined." So great was his reputation, that every foreigner of distinction, passing through Genoa, sat to him for his portrait.

VEAU, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Pavia in 1727, and died in 1768. He was an excellent painter of perspective and architecture in the decorative style.

VEAU, JEAN LE, a French engraver, born at Rouen about 1736. He went to Paris when young, and studied under J. P. le Bas. He engraved quite a number of plates of landscapes and other subjects after the French, Dutch, and German masters, which are executed in the neat and spirited style of his instructor. Zani mentions Jean Jacques le Veau, a French designer and engraver of landscapes, born in 1729, and died in 1785, perhaps the same artist.

VECCHI, GIOVANNI DE', a painter born at Borgo San Sepolcro in 1536. He went to Rome when he was young, and first studied under Raffaellino delle Colle, and afterwards with Taddeo Zuccaro, who was at that time employed by the Cardinal Alessandro Farnese in the embellishment of his palace at Caprarola, where, in conjunction with his instructor, Vecchi executed several considerable works. Lanzi says he was rather a competitor, than a scholar, of Zuccaro, that he was an eminent master, and that from the time he was employed by the Farnese family, he was considered a first rate artist. "He painted much for the churches at Rome, but chiefly excelled at Caprarola, when contending with Taddeo Zuccaro, and in the church of S. Lorenzo in Damaso, where he painted various histories of that martyr." Among his other principal works are the cupola of the Chiesa del Gesù, where he painted in fresco, the Four Doctors of the Church, and several histories of St. Jerome in the church of S. Maria d'Aracæli. He died at Rome in 1614.

VECCHIA, PIETRO, a painter born at Venice in 1605. He was educated in the school of Alessandro Varotari, called Padovanino, but he did not follow the style of that master. He applied himself to an imitation of the works of Giorgione and Pordenone, with such success that his works have frequently been mistaken for the productions of those masters, even by connoisseurs. He also imitated Titian and other masters very accurately. Lanzi says he inherited from his master an admiration of the old masters, as well as the art of imitating them. His powers were better adapted to familiar and fancy subjects, than to the dignity of history, and his best pictures represent armed soldiers, banditti, corps-de-garde, which he painted with great vigor and effect in the manner of Giorgione, though often bordering on caricature. Lanzi mentions one of some soldiers, in the possession of the senator Rezzonico at Rome, so exquisitely beautiful, that Giordano painted a companion to it, and Sandrart mistook another, in possession of the Count Palatine of the Rhine, for a genuine work by Giorgione, till he examined it, very critically. Lanzi says, "though his humor pleases us in some of his pieces, it disgusts in others, particularly in the Passion of our Saviour, in which the spectator ought never to be presented with cause for mirth; but Vecchia forgot this, and like Callot, introduced certain caricatures in his sacred pieces, of which specimens are to be seen in the church of the Ognissanti at Venice, and in various other places. In other points, with a style rather strong and loaded with shade, than pleasing, he showed himself an excellent artist, both in the naked parts and in his draperies, which he designed and colored at the same time, in the Academy. His fleshes are dark red, his handling easy, his color thick and heavy, the effect of his lights new and studied, and his whole taste so far from any appearance of mannerism and of such a composition, that to one unversed in pictorial history, he would appear to have flourished at least two centuries before his real time." His talent in imitating the works of the old masters, induced the Doge and Senate of Venice to employ him to copy in oil, some of the historical works in mosaic in the church of St. Mark, which he performed with great ability. He also painted two altar-pieces from his own designs, in the same edifice, representing the Crucifixion, and Christ driving the Money-changers out of the Temple; both accounted excellent performances. Melchiori bestows upon him particular commendation for his talent of restoring ancient paintings, as he could happily imitate the touch and color of any master; hence he conjectures that he acquired the appellation of Vecchia; his family name was Muttoni. He is variously called Pietro Vecchia, or Pietro da or della Vecchia. He died in 1678.

VECCHIETTA, LORENZO DI PIETRO, called also DA SIENA, was a Siennese painter and sculptor, born, according to Vasari, in 1424. His pictures are characterized by that hardness of style, so common among the Siennese painters of that age; there are a few of them remaining at Siena, and one is mentioned by Lanzi, in the Medicean Gallery, dated 1457. He probably studied sculpture under Donatello, in which he attained much more distinction, and his superior talents gained him the commission to execute the bronze Tabernacle of the grand altar in the cathedral at Siena, with the marble ornaments. The beauty of this work excited the admiration of his cotemporaries, and gained him commissions for various works in sculpture in the edifices of Siena, among which were two statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, in the Loggia del Banco, tastefully designed, with great delicacy of execution; a statue of Christ, in the hospital of the Scala; and several works in bronze for the Baptistery of S. Giovanni. Vecchietta completed the latter edifice, and is said to have finished some of the works of Donatello. He died, according to Vasari, in 1482. The Biographie Universelle places the birth of this artist in 1482, and his death in 1540; but this is doubtless an error.

VECCHIO, IL, DI SAN BERNARDO. See FRANCESCO MINZOCCHI.

VECELLI, or VECELLIO, TIZIANO. See TITIAN.

VECELLI, or VECELLIO, FRANCESCO, was the brother of Titian, born at Cadore, in the Friuli, in 1483. He was instructed by his brother, and is said to have shown such extraordinary talents as to excite the jealousy of his brother, who persuaded him to engage in other pursuits. Be this as it may, he entered the army, and followed the career of arms for many years, till the restoration of peace in Italy, when he returned to Venice, and resuming his pencil, he executed several altar-pieces and portraits in the style of Titian, possessing so much merit as to excite the alarm of that master, who, dreading a powerful competitor in Francesco, artfully contrived to induce him to devote his attention to the decoration of cabinets with small historical pieces and other subjects, for which at that time, there was a great demand. In 1531

he wholly relinquished painting and devoted himself to mercantile pursuits. Though Titian was exceedingly jealous of the secrets of his art, and carefully withheld his instruction from those whom he might fear to educate as rivals; it is hardly credible that he could have treated his own brother with such duplicity and illiberality, and such a charge ought not to be tolerated without undeniable evidence. Titian was only six years older than Francesco, and if we are to believe his biographers, notwithstanding all his talents, he received such paltry remuneration for his works, till he was almost fifty years old, that he was not only poor, but in embarrassed circumstances;—grant this, and he could have little cause of jealousy. Francesco, moreover, was evidently an erratic and wayward genius, not apt to practice a profession long that merely afforded him his bread, he joined the army; when disbanded, he returned to painting for a time; then became a merchant, and finally, he threw away his time and money in the idle pursuit of alchemy, a chimaera at that time thought attainable, in which many great minds were engaged. As to decorating cabinets, Titian and other great artists did not disdain such employment. His principal works are the Transfiguration, in the church of S. Salvatore at Venice, and the Nativity, in that of S. Giuseppe at Belluno, a picture frequently attributed to Titian. Some of his cabinet pieces are still preserved, and are generally attributed to Titian. The time of his death is not known.

VECELLI, ORAZIO, was the son of Titian, born at Venice in 1540. He studied with his father, and followed his style with great success. He particularly excelled in portraits, in which branch he was esteemed little inferior to his father. He accompanied his father in his travels to Rome, Madrid, and Germany. He painted in the palace of the Doge at Venice, in conjunction with Tintoretto and Paul Veronese, some excellent works, which were all destroyed in the conflagration of that edifice. Little is known of him, the glory of the father having entirely eclipsed the son; and none of his historical works are particularly recorded. The paucity of his works is accounted for by his untimely death; yet he lived to the age of Raffaello, and enjoyed the advantages of early and most excellent instruction; therefore it is reasonable to suppose that his works are now mostly attributed to his father. He died in 1576, the same year as his father, which contradicts the story that, after the death of the latter, he devoted his life to pleasure, and squandered his patrimony in the ridiculous pursuit of the philosopher's stone. It were to be wished that historians would confine themselves to facts, dates, and probabilities, and not relate fables and suppositions for truths; the history of art would not then be so full of contradictions.

VECELLI, MARCO, called MARCO DI TIZIANO, was the nephew and scholar of Titian, born at Venice in 1545. He was the favorite disciple of his great instructor, and approached nearer to his style, both in composition and color, than any of his other relatives. He accompanied him in his journeys to Rome and Germany, and assisted him in his works. There are some of his pictures in the Palazzo di S. Marco at Venice, one of the most esteemed of which is an allegorical subject on the Peace of Italy, in the ante-chamber to the Sala del Consiglio; another admired work by him represents the Doge Leonardo Donato, kneeling before the Virgin and Infant, in the Sala della Bussola. He also executed some considerable works for the churches at Venice, Treviso, and in the Friuli, one of the most remarkable of which represents Christ fulminating the World, and the Virgin with several Saints interceding, in SS. Giovanni e Paolo at Venice. Another admired production is in the parish church of Cadore; it represents the Crucifixion, with two laterals of the Controversy and Martyrdom of St. Catherine. Lanzi says, "In simple composition and mechanism of the art, he was a good disciple of his master, but he had not the genius to inspire his figures and interest the eye of the beholder, like his great cotemporary." Marco also excelled in portraits. His known works are not numerous, and doubtless many of his productions are attributed to Titian, as he lived to the good age of 66 years, and died in 1611.

VECELLI, TIZIANO, called TIZIANELLO to distinguish him from his father, was the son of Marco. The time of his birth and death are not known. Lanzi says, "He flourished about the beginning of the 17th century, when mannerism began its innovation upon the Venetian school of painting. And those specimens by him, possessed by Venice at the Patriarchal church, at the Servi, and elsewhere, exhibit him in a very opposite taste to that of his predecessors; his forms are larger, but less imposing; his pencil full and free, but destitute of softness of hand;—so powerful is the influence of prevailing taste, over even family descent and education. In portraits, nevertheless, and in heads, very capriciously varied and ornamented, I find him to be in much esteem among artists." He died about 1650.

VECELLI, FABRIZIO, was the son of Ettore Vecelli of Cadore, a relative and probably a brother of Titian. Lanzi says, "his name had hitherto been confined to his native place, Cadore, until brought to light by Renaldi, who traced his origin to another branch of the Vecelli, and gives an account of a fine picture he executed for the Council Hall of the parish, and for which he was paid sixteen gold ducats, no despicable price for the period when he flourished. He died in 1580."

VECELLI, CESARE, was the brother of Fabrizio, and flourished towards the close of the 16th century. The accounts of him are very contradictory, which Lanzi reconciles and explains. "He was the brother of Fabrizio, and like him, long unknown to pictorial history, although his productions are pointed out at Lintiai, at Vigo, at Candide, and at Padola. His name is more familiar to engravers, inasmuch as he gave to the world two works of etchings, during his residence at Venice. One of these, which is very scarce, contains Ogni sorte di mostre di punti tagliati, punti in aria, &c., the other De gli Habiti Antichi e Moderni di diverse parte del mondo, Libri due fatti da Cesare Vecellio; this last has been several times republished, and once in 1664, with a false title, where Cesare is mentioned as a brother of the great Titian." The false title above referred to is as follows: Raccolta di figure delineate dal gran Tiziano, e da Cesare Vecellio suo fratello diligentemente intagliate. There is a fine picture by him in the I. R. Pinacoteca of Milan, representing the Father supporting the crucified Son, with the Holy Spirit hovering above, to complete the triad.

VECELLI, TOMMASO. This artist was also a kinsman of Titian, brought to light by Renaldi, who highly commends his picture of the Annunciation, in the parish church of Lozzo; and another of the Last Supper, which he pronounces estimable. He died in 1620.

VECQ, JAMES LA, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1625. He studied with Rembrandt, whose style he followed for some time with considerable success, but he afterwards abandoned it for that of John de Baan. He painted history and portraits, particularly the latter, with reputation. He died at Dort in 1674.

VEEN, MARTIN VAN. See HEMSKIRK.

VEEN, OTHO and GILBERT VAN. See VENIUS.

VEENHUYSEN, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam, about the middle of the 17th century. He engraved a set of views of the public edifices in that city, published with descriptions in Dutch and French, in 1656. They are executed in a neat but slight style. He was living in 1677.

VEGLIA, MARCO and PIERO, two painters of Venice, brothers, who flourished, according to Zanetti, in the first part of the 16th century. They were reputable painters, though their works partake much of the dry and gothic style of the Bellini.

VELA, CRISTOBAL, a Spanish painter, born at Jaen in 1598. He studied successively under Pablo de Cespedes and Vincenzo Carducci. He settled at Cordova, where he was chiefly occupied in painting for the churches and convents. He was esteemed a correct designer, though he was languid and feeble in his coloring. His works have mostly perished, or been injured by unskillful restoration. In the cloister of the convent of San Augustin at Cordova is a series of the Prophets by him, designed in a grand style. He was drowned by falling into the well of his own house, at Cordova, in 1658.

VELASCO, DON ACISCLO ANTONIO PALOMINO DE CASTRO Y, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Bujalance in Valencia, in 1653. He is usually called Palomino by foreign writers. His parents afterwards removed to Cordova, where young Palomino was educated for the church, but having a passion for painting, which he had cultivated to some extent, he placed himself in 1672, under the instruction of Juan de Valdes, on the return of that painter from Seville to Cordova, under whom he made rapid progress. In 1675, he formed an intimacy with Juan de Alfaro, and in 1678 accompanied him to Madrid, where he assisted him in some of his works. He next formed a friendship with Juan Carreno, and with Coello; the latter employed him to assist him in painting the ceiling of the Queen's Gallery at the Alcazar; in which he displayed so much ability that Coello, having other works in hand in the Escorial, left him to complete the work, which he did so much to the satisfaction of the king that he named him one of his painters, but without a salary. On the marriage of Charles II. to Donna Maria Ana de Neoburg in 1690, he designed the arches and other decorations for the bridal entry into the city, which confirmed him in his office with its emoluments. The arrival of Luca Giordano at Madrid in 1692, according to Bermudez, caused some consternation among the Spanish painters, but Palomino maintained his position, and Luca not being so well versed in Christian theology as in heathen mythology, Palomino was able to instruct him in the subjects he was called upon to paint, which he did with such delicacy and perspicuity that the great Italian painter, embracing him, exclaimed, "the work is already finished"—a very improbable story. In 1697 he went to Valencia, where he executed some important works, the principal of which were some frescos in the presbytery of the church of San Juan del Mercado. In 1705, he was employed to decorate the convent of S. Esteban at Salamanca with some frescos, representing the Church Militant and Triumphant, accompanied with many allegories. On his return to Madrid, he was employed on many works for the churches and convents. In 1715, he published the first volume of his "Museo Pictorico," on which he had been engaged many years, and in 1724 the second volume appeared. He painted the Chartreuse of Granada, where he represented St. Bruno supporting the World, with a Glory of Angels and Saints; also five pictures for the grand altar at Cordova, and the hieroglyphics which adorned the funeral of Donna Maria Luisa de Saboya. He died at Madrid in 1726, and was buried with great pomp in the church of S. Francisco.

Palomino has not inaptly been termed the Vasari of Spain; like that artist, he abounded in commissions and degenerated into mannerism, and he was the first writer of any note on Spanish art. His employment was incessant, and he left the execution of many of his designs to his scholars, particularly to Dionisio Vidal. Palomino is better known out of his own country as a writer on art, than as a painter.

VELASCO, LUIS DE, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Toledo from 1564 to 1606, when he died. Little is known of him. He painted history and portraits, and there are some of his works in the Cathedral at Toledo, though most of his productions are attributed to other masters. His design is said to be noble, his drawing correct, and his coloring harmonious; his style exhibits a knowledge of the antique and of the best Italian masters.

VELASCO, CRISTOBAL DE, was the son of the preceding. He was instructed by his father, and followed his precepts. In 1598, he painted the portrait of the Archduke Albert. He also painted seven views of cities in Flanders for Philip III., to decorate his hunting residence in the woods of Valsain. He had a son, Matias de Velasco, whom he instructed in the art, and who accompanied the court of Philip III. to Valladolid, where he was employed to paint several histories of the Virgin, for the royal nunnery of the Carmelites.

VELASQUEZ, DON DIEGO RODRIGUEZ DE SILVA Y. This most eminent painter of the Spanish school, was born at Seville in 1594. He was descended from a noble family, originally of Portugal, which had been reduced by the troubles of their country, and had settled in Andalusia. Although his parents were in very narrow circumstances, they gave Diego a liberal education; and, as he manifested an extraordinary genius for art, he was placed under the tuition of Francesco Herrera the elder. The principles of that master, whose chief ambition was to obtain effects true to nature, are to be traced in all the works of his pupil. Herrera being of a very violent temper, he treated Velasquez so cruelly that he quitted him, and entered the school of Francisco Pacheco. The latter was learned in the theory of art, and an able designer; but he exercised no influence over the style of his pupil; and the reason why Velasquez remained five years in this school, was perhaps explained at the end of that time, when he married Pacheco's daughter. Meanwhile, he devoted himself faithfully to studying the theory of the art, and to the imitation of nature. Like Caravaggio, the leader of the naturalist school in Italy, he determined to represent things as they are, and not as they ought to be; he accordingly procured a peasant lad as a model, and painted his commonplace form, rags, and nakedness, under every aspect and attitude. He also made many designs from nature of peasants and ordinary people, in peculiar habits and occupations, and produced many faithful and striking representations of the manners and characters of the lower orders of the people, designed and painted with great fidelity and spirit. Like Murillo, Velasquez was taught to draw and color at the same time, beginning with subjects of still-life, and those the most ordinary, such as meat, vegetables, and kitchen utensils; hence the generic term Bodegones, by which they are still known. Thus he obtained an early mastery over his materials, a habit of close imitation, and a marvellous power of representing nature and texture. One of the most celebrated of these early productions is his picture, now in the new palace at Madrid, of the Old Water-Carrier at Seville, whose tattered garment exposes parts of his body through the rents, giving drink to a Boy out of his barrel; exhibiting considerable science in muscular anatomy, and a wonderful degree of nature and expression.

After painting subjects of this familiar description for a few years, his thoughts were turned towards the higher branches of the art by the contemplation of the paintings of Luis Tristan, whose style was a compound of Titian and El Greco; and he visited Madrid in 1622, for the purpose of seeing the treasures of art in the rich collections of that city. He was welcomed by Don Juan de Fonseca, and other Sevillians, and painted a portrait of the poet Gongora—a commission from Pacheco—after which he returned to Seville. Meanwhile, the influence of Fonseca was not idle, and Velasquez was recalled to Madrid the following year, by the Conde Duque de Olivarez, the prime minister of the tastes and pleasures of King Philip IV. Velasquez having painted the great man's portrait, immediately rose to that fortune which never deserted him during a long career of prosperity. As soon as the King saw the portrait of his favorite, he sat for his own, and the young painter, exerting all his powers, produced a picture of the King in armor, mounted on a magnificent steed, with a background of beautiful scenery. The picture was exhibited at Madrid in the open air; the connoisseurs joined in exalting Velasquez above all his predecessors; and the King—a true judge of art—ordained that none but the new Apelles should paint him. He was next employed to paint the infants Don Carlos and Don Fernando, and the equestrian portrait of Olivarez.

He was appointed principal painter to the King, with a liberal salary, besides a munificent remuneration for his pictures.

Although thus greatly honored by his own and foreign princes (among the latter was Charles I. of England.)* Velasquez had not yet attempted any great historical composition; and as Vincenzo Carducci and Eugenio Caxes, his predecessors in royal favor, had distinguished themselves by painting the expulsion of the Moors by Philip III., he determined to depict that important event of Spanish history, and produced a magnificent composition, representing the King armed in the centre, commanding a party of soldiers, who are escorting a company of Moors of different ages and sexes, to an embarkation which awaits them in one extremity of the picture; on the other side is represented an impersonification of the kingdom of Spain, as a majestic matron in armor, with part of a stately edifice. It is signed Didacus Velasquez Hispanensis Philip IV. Regis Hispan. pictor ipsiusque jussu fecit, anno 1627. This celebrated performance established the fame of Velasquez, and he was appointed one of the King's chamberlains, with an additional stipend to support his new dignity. In the same year, 1627, Rubens visited Madrid, to discharge the duties of his embassy; and the two great masters formed an intimate friendship. Rubens associated with no other artist but Velasquez, and was accustomed to walk with him alone to the Escorial. His frequent dissertations upon Italian art, inspired the Spaniard with the greatest desire to visit that country, and he had no sooner expressed his wish to that effect, than the King directed Olivarez to supply him with a plentiful sum of money, and the warmest letters of recommendation.

Velasquez embarked at Barcelona in 1629, and on landing at Venice was lodged in the hotel of the Spanish ambassador. He contemplated with surprise and admiration the works of Titian and Tintoretto, and after a few months went to Rome, where he was very kindly received by Cardinal Barberini, nephew to Urban VIII., who procured him apartments in the Vatican. Here he had constant access to the works of Raffaele and Buonarrotti, which he studied with the greatest assiduity. From the Vatican he removed to the Villa de' Medici, but falling a victim to malaria, was soon carried down an invalid to the Piazza de Spagna below, and lodged in the palace of the Condé Monterey, the ambassador of Spain, who watched over his patient, and restored him to health. During his residence at Rome, he painted his two celebrated pictures of Jacob with the Garment of Joseph, and Apollo at the Forge of Vulcan; which he sent home to the King.

From Rome Velasquez passed to Naples, where he felt at home amid the works of Caravaggio, Stanzioni, and Ribera. With the last he lived in the closest intimacy, but preferred the flowing style and cheerful composition of Stanzioni, between whose manner and his own the resemblance cannot be mistaken, as is evident from comparing their works in the gallery at Madrid. He painted the portrait of Donna Maria of Austria, consort of Ferdinand III., and after an absence of a year and a half, returned to Spain. Philip IV. had meanwhile remained true to his promise of sitting for his portrait to no other painter, and he now appointed Velasquez one of the gentlemen of his wardrobe, with a studio in his palace, of which the King kept a private key, for the purpose of visiting him daily unceremoniously, as Charles V. had done to Titian.

* * Velasquez painted a portrait of Charles I., which for many years was supposed to be lost; but it has been discovered within a few years, and in 1850 was in the possession of Mr. John Snare of Reading, England, who exhibited it in that year in the city of Edinburgh.

Thus enjoying the sunshine of royal favor, Velasquez went on rapidly producing many admirable works. He painted the magnificent equestrian portrait of Philip IV., from which the great carver Montanez made a model in wood, in order to be sent to Florence, where it was cast in bronze by Pietro Tacca, and is now placed in the gardens of the Buon Retiro. This success led to new honors; Velasquez was appointed to an office about the King's person, and in that capacity followed Philip into Arragon and Catalonia in 1643 and 1644. In the former of these years the Conde Duque de Olivarez was disgraced, but Velasquez had the honesty and boldness to continue to show respect to his original patron, nor did Philip IV. resent this uncourtier-like gratitude. In November, 1648, he made a second journey to Italy on a particular embassy to the Pope; also to purchase modern pictures for the King, and to procure moulds from the best antique statues for the projected Academy. He embarked at Malaga, landed at Genoa, passed rapidly to Milan, Venice, Florence, and Parma, and thence hastened to embrace his friend Ribera at Naples. Returning to Rome, he was presented to Innocent X. and painted his portrait, which is now the gem of the Doria collection, and the only real specimen of his art in Rome. Lanzi says, "he renewed in this portrait the wonders which are recounted of those of Leo X. by Raffaele, and Paul III. by Titian; for this picture so entirely deceived the eye as to be taken for the Pope himself." He was elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke, and received many flattering attentions and honors, among which were a gold medal, presented him by the Pope. He persuaded Michael Angelo Colonna and Agostino Mitelli to visit Spain, to assist in the decorations of the royal palaces.

The Inquisition had always persecuted nudity, and Spain was deficient in models from the antique. The lax and voluptuous Philip IV. protected the license of Greece and Italy, and Velasquez, feeling the value of exquisite form,—in which he was very deficient—and knowing that the opportunity might never again occur, collected a large number of casts from the antique, besides many admirable works by eminent modern masters. After three years' absence, he returned to Spain with his cargo, and was received by the King with his usual favor. He was now in his full power, and painted his finest pictures. In 1656 he received the much coveted cross of Santiago, which the King drew in with his own hand, upon a portrait of Velasquez, painted by the artist himself. The nobles resented this profanation of a decoration hitherto given only to high birth; nor were the difficulties removed without a papal dispensation, and a grant of Hidalguia. About this time, he was raised to the lucrative and honorable post of Aposentador Mayor, the duties of which were to superintend the lodgment of the King in his frequent migrations. Much of his precious time was thus taken from art. In 1660 he was sent to prepare the royal quarters during the journey from Madrid through the Castiles to the Bidassoa, when he erected on the island of Pheasants the temporary saloons for the conferences which terminated in the marriage of the Infanta Maria Teresa with Louis XIV. Velasquez appeared here for almost the last time, remarkable among the noble crowd for his tasteful costume and the arrangement of his diamonds. He returned to Madrid July 31, worn out with fatigue by preparations which any lord of the bed-chamber might have superintended. He died one week after, on the 7th of August, 1660, and was buried with the most distinguished funeral honors in the church of San Juan. Seven days after, his wife died, broken-hearted at the loss of her gentle and excellent husband, and was laid by his side in the same grave. In his private character he was most highly esteemed and beloved by all who knew him.

It is somewhat remarkable that the best English dictionaries of painting contain no criticism upon the characteristics of this great painter, at all commensurate with his extraordinary merits, and his position at the head of the Spanish school. The critical remarks in this article are derived from the various authorities of Mengs, Pacheco, Carducho, and Bermudez.

Velasquez drew nothing from the antique, and his visit to Italy produced no change in his style. He held up the mirror to his own age alone—all was his own, original, national, and idiosyncratic: he shrunk from any change by which loss might be risked; and notwithstanding the truth, character, and powerful painting of his works, they are singularly marked with the most ordinary forms, copied from nature as he observed her from day to day. His style was based on Herrera, Caravaggio, Ribera, and Stanzioni—a compound of all, not a servile imitation of any. His drawing was admirable, correct and unconstrained; his mastery over his materials unequalled; his coloring was clear and clean; he seldom used mixed tints; he painted with long brushes, and often as coarsely as floor-cloth; but the effects when seen from the intended distance were magical, everything coming out into its proper place, form, and tone. He painted with a rapid, flowing, and certain pencil, with the greatest ease, and absence of art or effort. There was no showing off of the artist;—loving Art for itself alone, he passed his whole soul into his subject, without one disturbing thought of self: having conceived his idea, he worked it rapidly out, taking advantage of everything as it turned up, correcting and improving it as he went on.

He pursued every branch of painting excepting the marine, and excelled almost equally in all. His portraits baffle description and praise;—they must be seen to be known. He depicted the minds of men; they live, breathe, and seem about to walk out of their frames. His power of painting circumambient air, his knowledge of lineal and aerial perspective, the gradation of his tones, in light, shadow, and color, give an absolute concavity to the flat surface of his canvass,—we look into space, into a room, into the reflection of a mirror. The freshness, individuality, and identity of every person are quite startling; nor can we doubt the anecdote related of Philip IV., who, mistaking for the original the portrait of Admiral Pareja in a dark corner of Velasquez's room, exclaimed, as he had been ordered to sea, "What! still here?" He was inferior to Vandyck in representing female beauty, partially because he had not his advantages; the oriental jealousy of the Spaniards revolted at any female portraiture, and still more at any display of beauteous form: his talents, moreover, were most decidedly for depicting the man. He caught the high bred air of the Hidalgo, his grave demeanor and severe costume, with perfect truthfulness, never flattering any, not even royalty. In landscape he is said to surpass all other Spanish artists; his scenes are full of local color, freshness, and daylight, whether verdurous court-like avenues, or wild rocky solitudes. The animals in his pictures are perfectly admirable, and his beggars, urchins, and drunkards, are ranked with the performances of Murillo and Teniers.

Unlike most of the artists of Spain, Velasquez was patronized little by the church; his patrons were knights and kings. Consequently he comparatively neglected the religious and legendary; but his Crucifixion, painted in 1638, and now in the convent of S. Placido at Madrid, would be sufficient, if he had done nothing else, to have immortalized his fame. It is designed with his usual nature and simplicity, but with an expression in the features, an affecting air in the reclining of the head, and an harmonious tone of coloring, at once so tender, and of such effect, that it cannot be surpassed. In historical performances, Velasquez was most eminent. Mengs describes his famous picture of General Pescara receiving the keys of a Flemish citadel from the governor of the place. The group of generals, soldiers, citizens, and horses, &c., and the striking effect of the town and landscape in the background, have established the fame of this great work, and Mengs calls it his master-piece, pronouncing it faultless in every respect, except that the lances are too long—a trivial remark, not to have been expected from such an authority, but tending rather to enhance than depreciate the merits of this celebrated performance.

The genuine and finest works of Velasquez remain at Madrid; in other cities of Spain they are quite as rare as in other parts of the world. This remarkable fact results from the unusual character of his career; he commenced in the royal service, and so continued to the end, rarely condescending to work for the church or for private patrons. All his great pictures were thus monopolized, and hung up in the royal palaces, not to be purchased, and nearly inaccessible to travelers. Unlike the works of the other Spanish masters, they were not scattered abroad in the French wars, and only two—the Jacob and the equestrian portrait of Philip IV.—were sent to Paris. The great gallery at Madrid contains a sufficient number of the pictures of Velasquez, to give the connoisseur a correct idea of his extraordinary power and universality of talent. Of his portraits and landscapes, quite a number have been transferred to the private collections in England, and the grand landscape with a representation of a Boar-hunt, according to the old Spanish fashion, is now in the National Gallery. It was formerly in the great palace at Madrid, but was presented by Ferdinand VII. to Sir H. Wellesley, afterwards Lord Cowley, and was purchased for the National Gallery for £2200.

VELASQUEZ, ALEXANDRO GONZALEZ, a Spanish painter and architect, was the son of a sculptor of little distinction, born at Madrid in 1719. He studied in the Academy of that city, and made such rapid progress, that at the age of nineteen he was commissioned to paint, in concert with his brother Luis, the decorations of the theatre of the Retiro. In 1744 he was entrusted to superintend all the works of painting and sculpture executed at St. Ildefonso, and was afterwards occupied during three years in making the plans and elevations of the palace at Aranjuez. In 1752, Velasquez was elected by the Academy sub-director in the department of architecture; and in 1762 he was chosen for the same office in that of painting. The Biographie Universelle states that there are a number of architectural works by Alexandro at Madrid, which do honor to his talents, and Milizia specifies only one, the modernizing of the church las Ballecas, where he ornamented the inferior part with Ionic pilasters, and placed Corinthian columns to the altars. He instructed many pupils, and died in 1772.

VELASQUEZ, ANTONIO GONZALEZ, a distinguished Spanish painter of the last century, the brother of the preceding, was born at Madrid in 1729. He visited Italy with the King's pension, and studied in the school of Corrado Giaquinto, where he made rapid progress, and was commissioned to paint the frescos which adorn the church of la Trinità de Castelli. He returned to Spain in 1753, and painted the cupola of the chapel of Our Lady of the Pillar, in the cathedral at Tarragona, which gained him considerable reputation. At Madrid he also executed a number of works, in concert with his two brothers, Luis and Alexandro, in the monastery de las Salesas, the convent of the Incarnation, and various other edifices, by which he gained so much reputation that Charles III. appointed him court painter in 1757. In 1765 he was chosen director of the Academy of Painting, and discharged the duties of that office until 1785. During this period he executed many fine works, particularly in fresco, which were greatly admired. Few painters of his country have possessed the qualities of grace and facility, in so high a degree as Antonio Velasquez, and his abundant imagination enabled him to produce a large number of sketches and drawings of all kinds, among which his beautiful sketch of the Foundation of the Order of the Golden Cross, has been engraved by Salvador Carmona. He died in 1793, leaving three sons, who practiced the Fine Arts with success.

VELASQUEZ, LUIS GONZALEZ, the brother of the two preceding artists, was born at Madrid in 1715. After acquiring the elements of design from his father, a sculptor of little note, he studied in the Academy at Madrid, and was afterwards commissioned to execute the decorations of the theatre of the Retiro, in concert with his brother Alexandro. About 1752, he painted the cupola of the church of St. Mark in fresco, which occupied him several years, and was so greatly admired, that the King appointed Luis a sub-director of the Academy, and subsequently painter to the royal cabinet. He died in 1764.

VELDE, ADRIAN VAN DE, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1639. The history of his brief life is very similar to that of Paul Potter. Discovering a passion for the fine arts, even in his infancy, which exhibited itself by his sketching upon walls, or whatever else came to hand, all kinds of animals and objects that struck his fancy, his father was induced to place him under the instruction of John Wynants, with whom he made extraordinary progress, and continued several years. Wynants was one of the ablest landscape painters of his time, accustomed to draw everything from nature, and he educated his pupil in the same excellent system. Young van de Velde's application was incessant, and he was accustomed to pass the greater part of his time in the fields, studying and sketching every object and appearance that could prove of advantage to his pursuit. The scenes and situations of his landscapes, his trees, skies, clouds, animals, &c., were all sketched from nature, a practice he continued as long as he lived, nor did he neglect to study the human figure, which he designed with great accuracy, and was soon able to embellish the landscapes of his instructor. Wynants did not design the figure well, and had heretofore employed Philip Wonwerman or John Lingelbach to insert them in his works. Some of the finest landscapes by Wynants are adorned with the figures and cattle of Adrian van de Velde, which greatly adds to their value. Such was his excellence in these auxiliary embellishments, that many of his cotemporaries applied to him for similar assistance; the pictures of vander Heyden, Hackaert, Hobbema, Ruysdael, Verboom, and Moucheron, are frequently decorated with his figures and animals.

The pictures of van de Velde are full of truth and nature; in the choice of his subjects, the agreeableness of his scenes, and the excellence of his coloring, he has hardly been surpassed by any of his countrymen. Though his landscape is confined to the pasture in which cattle are grazing, it captivates by its truth and simplicity. His trees are natural and well formed, the leafing sharply and accurately marked, his herbage and plants fresh and juicy; his skies clear and brilliant, and his pictures exhibit a sparkling glow of sunshine almost peculiar to himself; he was careful to depict the effects of light upon every particular object, and happily expressed its effects through the branches of the trees, on the surface of water, on his cattle, and every part of his scenery. His figures and animals are designed with remarkable correctness and precision, with great life and spirit in the actions and attitudes; he particularly excelled in the representation of cows, oxen, sheep, and goats. His touch is light and delicate, yet free and full of spirit. Though he had not the advantage of a regular education in the higher branch of historical painting, yet he executed several works for the Roman church at Amsterdam, which prove that he possessed an extensive and varied genius, and that he would have shone in that branch, had he devoted his attention more to it. These represent several subjects taken from the Life and Passion of Christ, the chief of which is the Descent from the Cross, the figures being half life size. His pictures are deservedly held in the highest estimation, and are only to be found in the choicest collections. He wrought with great facility and unceasing application, as is evident from the large number of his genuine works, executed entirely by himself, besides the many pictures of Wynants, and others, which he decorated with figures and animals. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné of the works of the Dutch and Flemish masters, vol. v., and Supplement, gives a descriptive account of about 180, which are considered authentic. The value of his works has increased amazingly within 70 or 80 years. Thus,

No. 2. A Mountainous Landscape, in which Jacob, his family, and his servants, appear conducting their flocks and herds, sold in 1765 for £130; in 1811 it brought at M. le Brun's sale at Paris, £960.

No. 5. Watering Cattle, sold in 1754, for £135; in 1810, it brought £688; it is now in her Majesty's collection.

No. 8. Peasants with cattle fording a Stream, sold in 1771 for £280. In Sir Simon Clark's sale in 1840, it was bought by Sir Robert Peel for 760 guineas.

No. 15. A Landscape with peasants, cattle, and sheep, sold in the famous Braamcamp collection in 1771, for £218; in 1822, it brought £746; it is now in the Museum at Amsterdam.

No. 26. La Chasse Royale was sold in the Lormier collection in 1763, for £53, and at the Count Perregaux's sale in 1841, it was purchased by the Baron Rothschild for £1125!

Adrian van de Velde executed quite a number of charming etchings, from his own designs. Bartsch describes 21, to which Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has added four more. They are usually marked A. V. V. f., or A. V. Velde, f., though sometimes A. V. V., or A. V. V. F., or Adrian Van de Velde f., and one A. V. V. His name is variously written by English writers, Vandevelde, Vandervelde, and Van de Velde. He died at Amsterdam in 1672, in the flower of his life.

VELDE, ESAIAS VAN DE, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1597, according to the best authorities, though some say about 1590. He studied under Peter Denyn, an artist of little note, and painted landscapes with figures and cattle, but his principal subjects, in which he excelled, were battles, skirmishes of cavalry, marchings of soldiers, attacks of banditti, &c. His pictures are usually of small size, ingeniously composed, agreeably colored, and touched with a light, neat, and spirited pencil. His expertness in small figures procured him almost constant employment from his cotemporaries, who were anxious to have their landscape or perspective views adorned by his pencil. He was remarkable for his fondness of draping his figures in the Spanish costume. His works, during his life time, were highly esteemed, and brought high prices, but they subsequently sunk considerably in value. He executed a number of neat and spirited etchings of landscapes and other subjects from his own designs, which are usually marked with his initials, or Esijas Vander Velde, invent. He died at Leyden in 1648.

VELDE, JAMES VAN DE, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Leyden in 1598, according to the best authorities, though some say about 1595. He painted landscapes and merry-makings, but was chiefly distinguished as an engraver. He engraved a great number of landscapes, views, and other subjects, chiefly from his own designs, which are executed in two entirely different styles, directly opposite to each other. His landscapes and views are chiefly etched, and his point is free and spirited; his lights are broad and clear, and though his shadows occasionally want strength, they generally produce a pleasing and masterly effect. His other prints are executed with the graver, sometimes assisted by the dry point, in a highly finished style, resembling that of Count Goudt; these chiefly consist of night pieces, or scenes by candle-light, and such subjects as require a great depth of shadow. He is generally called John Van de Velde, or Vander-velde, but usually signed his prints Jan (James) van der Velde. The time of his death is not known, but his prints are dated from about 1615 to 1645. The following are the principal :

A set of Thirty-six Landscapes, entitled Playsante Landschappen, door Jan van der Velde. Twelve plates representing the Twelve Months, 1616; another set of the Twelve Months, larger. The Four Seasons, in four plates; after Valck. 1617. Four plates of the History of Tobit; after Uytenbroeck. The Four Elements; after Buytenwegh. The Four Times of the Day. A set of six Landscapes with ruins, figures, and cattle; after G. vander Horst. A series of plates representing the Spanish Troops, marching in the Low Countries in the years 1638, 1641, and 1645, with other military scenes; after Jacob Martss de Jonge. Also a great variety of landscapes, views, portraits, and other subjects, from his own designs, and after other masters.

VELDE, WILLIAM VAN DE, the Elder, generally called the Old, an eminent Dutch marine painter, was born at Leyden in 1610. He is said to have been bred to the sea; this report, however, is very doubtful, and probably arose from circumstances connected with his profession. It is not known by whom he was instructed; but before he was twenty years of age, he had acquired considerable reputation as a painter of marine subjects, which he usually represented in black and white, in imitation of drawings in India ink. He drew everything after nature, and became one of the most spirited, correct, and admirable designers of marine subjects of his country. He made an incredible number of drawings on paper, heightened with India ink, all of them sketched from nature with uncommon elegance and fidelity. His talents recommended him to the notice of the States of Holland, and Descamps says, they furnished him with a small vessel to accompany their fleets, that he might design the different manœuvres and engagements; that he was present in various sea-fights, in which he fearlessly exposed himself to the most imminent danger, while making his sketches; he was present at the severe battle between the English and Dutch fleets, under the command of the Duke of York and Admiral Opdam, in which the ship of the latter, with five hundred men, was blown up, and in the still more memorable engagement in the following year, between the English under the Duke of Albemarle, and the Dutch Admiral de Ruyter, which lasted three days. It is said that during these engagements he sailed alternately between the fleets, so as to represent minutely every movement of the ships, and the most material circumstances of the actions with incredible exactness and truth. So intent was he upon his drawing, that he constantly exposed himself to the greatest danger, without the least apparent anxiety. He wrote over the ships their names and those of their commanders; and under his own frail craft V. Velde's Gallijodt or Myn Gallijodt. After having executed many capital pictures for the States of Holland, he was invited to England by Charles II., who had become acquainted with his talents during his residence in Holland. He arrived in London about 1675, well advanced in years, and the king settled upon him a pension of an hundred pounds per annum until his death, in 1693, as appears from this inscription on his tomb-stone in St. James's church. "Mr. William van de Velde, senior, late painter of sea-fights to their Majesties, King Charles II. and King James, died in 1693." He was accompanied by his son, who was also taken into the service of the king, as appears from an order of the privy seal as follows: "Charles the Second, by the grace of God, &c., to our dear Cousin, Prince Rupert, and the rest of our commissioners for executing the place of Lord High Admiral of England, greeting. Whereas, we have thought fit to allow the salary of one hundred pounds per annum unto William van de Velde the Elder, for taking and making draughts of sea-fights; and the like salary of one hundred pounds per annum unto William van de Velde the younger, for putting the said draughts in color for our particular use; our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby authorize and require you to issue your orders for the present and the future establishment of said salaries to the aforesaid William van de Velde the Elder and William van de Velde the Younger, to be paid unto them, or either of them, during our pleasure, and for so doing, these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge. Given under our privy-seal, at our palace of Westminster, the 20th day of February, in the 26th year of our reign."

Many of the large pictures of sea-fights in England, and doubtless in Holland, bearing the signature, W. van de Velde, and generally attributed to the son, were executed by him from the designs of his father. Such are the series of twelve naval engagements and sea-ports in the palace at Hampton Court, though signed like the best works of the younger van de Velde; they are dated 1676 and 1682.

VELDE, WILLIAM VAN DE, the Younger, was the son of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1633. He received his first instruction from his father, but afterwards studied with Simon de Vlioger, an eminent painter of sea-pieces, whose works were then held in the highest estimation. He possessed extraordinary talents, and not only surpassed his father, and all his cotemporaries, but he arrived at a perfection in the particular branch to which he devoted himself universally allowed to be unequalled. "The palm," says Lord Orford, "is not less disputed with Raffaele for history, than with van de Velde for sea-pieces." He had already acquired a distinguished reputation in his native country for his admirable cabinet pictures, when he accompanied his father to England, where his talents not only recommended him to the notice of the king, who settled upon him a pension of one hundred pounds, but to the principal nobility and personages of his court, for whom he executed many of his most beautiful works.

Like his father, the younger van de Velde designed everything from nature, and his compositions are distinguished by a more elegant and tasteful arrangement of his objects, than is to be found in the productions of any other painter of marines. His vessels are designed with the greatest accuracy, and from the improvements which had been made in ship-building, they are of a more graceful and pleasing form than those of his predecessors; the cordage and rigging are finished with a delicacy, and at the same time with a freedom almost without example; his small figures are drawn with remarkable correctness, and touched with the greatest spirit. In his calms the sky is sunny and brilliant, and every object is reflected in the glassy smoothness of the water, with a luminous transparency peculiar to himself. In his fresh breezes and squalls, the swell and curl of the waves is delineated with a truth and fidelity which could only be derived from the most attentive and accurate study of nature; in his storms, tempests, and hurricanes, the tremendous conflict of the elements and the horrors of shipwreck are represented with a truthfulness that strikes the beholder with terror.

The works of the younger van de Velde are very numerous, and the greater part of them are in England, where Houbraken says they were so highly esteemed that they were eagerly sought after in Holland, and purchased at high prices to transport to London; so that they are rarely to be met with in his native country. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné, vol. vi. and Supplement, describes about three hundred and thirty pictures by him, the value of which has increased amazingly, as may be seen by a few examples. The marines now in the Earl of Ellesmere's collection, one a View of the Entrance to the Texel, sold in 1766 for £80, now valued at £1,000; the other sold in 1765 for £84, now valued at £500. A Sea-View formerly in the collection of Sir Robert Peel sold in 1772 for only £31; brought in 1828, £300. The Departure of Charles II. from Holland in 1660, sold in 1781 for £82; it brought recently, at public sale, £800. A View off the Coast of Holland sold in 1816 for £144; it brought, in Sir Simon Clarke's sale in 1840, £1,029. A View on the Sea-Shore, 16 inches by 12, sold in 1726 for £9, and in 1835 for £108. The picture known as Le Coup de Canon, sold in 1786 for £52, in 1790 for only £36, but in 1844 it brought 1,380 guineas.

The drawings, and especially the sketches and studies of the younger van de Velde are very numerous, and prove the indefatigable pains he took in designing his vessels, their appurtenances, and the ordonnance of his compositions. His sketches are executed in black lead only; his more finished drawings with the pencil or pen, and shaded with India ink. He executed these with wonderful facility; it is recorded that he was so rapid in his sketching, that he frequently filled a quire of paper in an evening. Stanley says that during the years 1778 and 1780, about 8,000 of his drawings were sold in London at public auction. Some of his choicest drawings in India ink, brought at the sale of M. Goll de Frankenstein at Amsterdam, in 1833, and at that of the late Baron Verstolk de Soelen, in the same city in 1847, prices varying from £27 up to £144 each. He inherited his father's drawings, and all these seem now to be attributed to him. He died in 1707.

VELDENER, JOHN, a German book publisher, supposed to have been a designer and engraver on wood, who flourished about 1480. All that is known of him with any certainty is that he published at Louvain two works entitled "Fasciculus Temporum," 1474, and "Caroli Viruli formulæ Epistolare," 1476; also at Culembourg, "Speculum Humanæ Salvationis," 1483; and "Historia Santæ

Crucis," in the same year; all of them in Latin, and embellished with wood-cuts, executed in the rude style of the age. Whether he really designed and engraved the cuts which embellish these books, is a question that has exercised the industry and ingenuity of several able writers to maintain or refute, without eliciting anything positive. The cuts, not being the earliest specimens of the art, are not worth the disquisition, and those fond of such intricacies must be referred to the works of Heineken, Santander, Ottley, Zani, Jackson, and others, who have written learnedly and elaborately on the subject. His name is sometimes written Veldner, and the Italians call him Giovanni di Westfalia.

VELI, BENEDETTO, a Florentine painter who flourished about 1650. Little is known of him. Lanzi says he painted in the Cathedral of Pistoja, the Ascension of Christ, placed at the entrance of the presbytery. It is the companion to one of the Pentecost by Gregorio Pagani, which sufficiently proves that it possesses uncommon merit. Zani calls his name Velli, and says he operated in 1588.

VELLANI, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Modena in 1688, and died in 1768. According to Tiraboschi, he studied under Francesco Stringa, whose style he followed, though Lanzi says he was not a very accurate designer. He executed many works for the churches of Modena, and in the State.

VELLETRI, ANDREA DA, an old painter, born at Velletri. There is a picture by him in the Museo Borgia at Rome, representing the Virgin surrounded with Saints, signed with his name, and dated 1334. Lanzi says that in execution it approaches the Sienese school. There was a Lello da Velletri, who painted an altar-piece in several compartments in a church at Perugia, about 1487. It is signed Lellus de Velletro, pinsit.

VELTRONI, STEFANO, a painter born at Monte Sansovino, who was living in 1568. Lanzi says he was a man of slow parts, but very respectable in art. He assisted Vasari in some of his works at Rome, and afterwards accompanied him to Naples, Bologna, and Florence.

VENANZI, ANTONIO, a painter about whose Christian name and place of nativity there is much discrepancy; he is variously called Giovanni, Giovanni Battista, and Francesco. Suffice it to say that Oretti read on his picture of St. Onofrio, in the Carmine at Pesaro, Ant. Venantius Pisauriensis, 1688; and on his tomb, that he died on the 2d of October, 1705, aged 78. Lanzi says, "Gio. Venanzi (or Francesco) had been already instructed by Guido, when he entered the school of Simone Cantarini, though he resembles neither of these masters so nearly as he does the Gennari. When we inspect his two beautiful histories of St. Anthony, in the church of that Saint at Pesaro, we might pronounce him their disciple." In the church of SS. Gervasio and Protasio at Bologna, is a fine picture by him, representing the Descent of the Holy Ghost. It is said that he was employed at the court of Parma.

VENDRAMINI, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, born at Roncade, near Bassano, in 1769. After studying in his native country, he went to England, where he became the pupil of Bartolozzi. In 1805 he went to St. Petersburg, where he remained about two years, and was patronized by the Emperor. An accident is said to have hastened his return. Being employed by the Emperor to engrave a design upon a very valuable antique gem, representing Alexander and Olympia, the laurel that encircled the brow of Alexander was broken, and although it was privately repaired, he soon after returned to England, where he died in 1839. Among his principal plates are the Vision of St. Catherine, after Paul Veronese; St. Sebastian, after Spagnoletto; Leda, after Lionardo da Vinci; and the Raising of Lazarus, after Sebastiano del Piombo.

GF VENENTI, GIULIO CESARE, a Bolognese amateur artist, born about 1609, and died, according to Zani, in 1697. He studied painting under Filippo Brizio, and is said to have studied and practiced art with the zeal of a professor. He executed a few spirited etchings after Ann. Caracci, Parmigiano, Canuti, and others, which he marked with the above monogram.

VENEZIA, JACOMETTO DA, a painter born at Venice, who flourished, according to Morelli, in 1472. He was very celebrated in his day for his small cabinet pictures of historical subjects for private ornament, as well as for portraits and miniatures.

VENEZIA, MAESTRO GIOVANNI DA, an old Venetian painter, who was living in 1227. He wrought in the old Greek style; little remains from his hand.

VENEZIA, LORENZO DA, a Venetian painter, who was living about 1358. He is commended by Zanetti for his altar-piece in the church of St. Anthony of Castello, signed Laurentius de Venetiis, 1358, for which he was paid 300 gold ducats. There are several other pictures bearing his signature—one in the possession of the noble family of Ercolani at Bologna, signed MANU LAURENTII DE VENETHIS, 1368. Lanzi attributes to him a fresco, representing Daniel in the Lion's Den, in the church of Mezzaratta, near Bologna, inscribed Laurentius, P. The work bears no resemblance to the style of Giotto, and appears to have been completed about 1370.

VENEZIA, NICCOLO DA, called also NICCOLO DA VENEZIANO, an eminent Venetian artist in embroidering tapestry. He flourished in the time of Pierino del Vaga, and was in the service of the Prince Doria at Genoa when that artist arrived there, and he introduced him to the court.

VENEZIA, MAESTRO PAOLO DA, an old Venetian painter of whom, according to Morelli, there are notices from 1333 to 1346. In the great church of St. Mark at Venice is a very curious Ancona (tablet) divided into several compartments, representing the figure of a dead Christ, with some of the Apostles, and various historic incidents recorded by the Evangelist, which is thus noticed by Zanetti. "Among the specimens of simple painting in St. Mark's, the ball centre of the great altar is remarkable for several small tablets of gold and silver, on which are painted several figures, in the ancient Greek manner. San Pietro Urseolo had it constructed about the year 980 at Constantinople, and it was removed to this place in the time of the doge Ordelafo Faliero, in 1102, though it was afterwards renovated by the command of the doge Pietro Ziani, in 1209." Lanzi says this was certainly the work of Paolo and his two sons; underneath, it bears this inscription, which escaped the notice of Zanetti: Magister Paulus cum Jacobo et Johanne filiis fecit hoc Opus. He mentions another work by him in the church of the Padri Conventuali at Vicenza, signed Paulus de Venetiis pinxit hoc opus, 1333. "He is the earliest of the Venetian painters in the national manner (i.e. the old Greek style improved), of whom there exists a work with the indisputable name of the author"

VENEZIA, FRA SANTO DA, a Capuchin monk, who, according to Lanzi, flourished in 1640. Lanzi commends him as an artist worthy of notice, and says he was much employed in painting for the churches and convents within the Venetian territory.

VENEZIANO, AGOSTINO. See MUSIS.

VENEZIANO, CARLO. See SARACINI.

VENEZIANO, SEBASTIANO. See PIOMBO.

VENEZIANO, ANTONIO, a painter born at Venice, according to Vasari, in 1310, and a scholar of Angiolo Gaddi; although Baldinucci, an excellent authority, asserts that he was a native of Florence, and acquired the surname of Veneziano from his long residence at Venice, where he executed many works, among which were several in the Ducal Palace. The latter were destroyed by fire in 1573. It is probable, however, that he was a scholar of some other master, as Angiolo Gaddi was not born until 1324. Baldinucci also states that he afterwards quitted Venice, on account of the intrigues of the painters in that city. His style was less dry and formal than the generality of his cotemporaries, and he is said to have attained a higher degree of perfection in fresco painting than the artists of that day. The principal works of Veneziano are at Pisa and at Florence, among which are several subjects from the history of St. Ranieri, in the Campo Santo at Pisa; and his most celebrated performance at Florence, representing the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes. He died in 1384. The supposed portrait of him in the Florentine gallery, is considered by Lanzi as being in too modern a style for this age; and he thinks it represents another Antonio Veneziano, who flourished about 1500, and painted a picture of St. Francesco at Osimo, in the manner of the time. It was originally inscribed with his name, which has been erased, and that of Pietro Perugino inserted.

VENEZIANO, DOMENICO, an eminent Venetian painter, born in 1420. He was a favorite scholar of Antonio da Messina, who had learned the art of oil painting from John van Eyck, and communicated the secret to his pupil. He afterwards resided some time at Loreto and Perugia, and finally settled at Florence, where his works were greatly admired, both on account of their merit and the novelty of the process. He unfortunately formed a connexion with Andrea del Castagno, an eminent Tuscan painter, who treacherously murdered him, in order that he might be the sole possessor of the secret. Castagno artfully concealed the atrocious deed till he was upon his deathbed, when he confessed the crime, for which innocent persons had suffered. This catastrophe happened in 1476. His principal works are in the church of S. Lucia and the monastery degli Angeli at Florence. See Antonio da Messina, and Andrea del Castagno.

VENIER, PIETRO, a painter born at Udine, who, according to Renaldi, died at an advanced age in 1737. He studied at Venice, and executed many works both in oil and fresco. His best works are some frescos in the ceiling of the church of S. Jacopo at Udine, which are commended by Lanzi, who says he there appears to great advantage.

VENIER, NICHOLAS, an engraver, who executed a set of twelve plates, representing the months of the year, after Bassano.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, OTHO, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1556. His parents being persons of distinction, gave him a classical education, and to gratify his passion for painting had him instructed in design by Isaac Nicholas, and in painting by Jodocus van Wingen. Being compelled to leave his own country on account of the civil wars, he retired to Liege to pursue his studies, where his talents recommended him to the notice of Cardinal Grosbeck, who advised him to go to Rome, and gave him letters of commendation to Cardinal Masuccio, who received him with the greatest kindness, and entertained him at his palace. He entered the school of Federigo Zuccaro, and at the same time studied the antique and the works of the great masters with assiduity. After a residence of several years in Italy, he set out to return to his own country, and passing through Germany, he stopped some time at Vienna in the service of the Emperor, who endeavored to retain him by flattering offers, which he declined, and passing on to Munich and Cologne, he executed several works for the Duke of Bavaria and the Elector. On his arrival at Brussels, Alessandro Farnese, Prince of Parma, then Governor of the Netherlands, took him into his service, and appointed him principal painter to his court. He painted the portrait of his protector, and executed several historical works, which established his reputation as one of the ablest artists of his time. On the death of the Prince he went to Antwerp, where he established himself, and was employed to execute some works for the churches and public edifices. He also opened an Academy, and had the honor of instructing Rubens. When the Archduke Albert, who succeeded the Prince of Parma in the government of the Low Countries, made his public entry into Antwerp, Venius designed the triumphal arches erected on the occasion, which displayed so much ingenuity and taste, that the Prince invited him to Brussels, appointed him his principal painter, and master of the mint, which offices he filled with great reputation till his death.

Otho Venius had a lively and fertile invention; his compositions are learned and judicious, and his design, founded on that of the Roman school, was more elegant and correct than that of any of his cotemporaries of the Flemish school. The airs of his heads are graceful and expressive, his draperies are cast with ease and propriety, and he was one of the earliest artists of his country who had a thorough knowledge of the principles of the chiaro-scuro. Among his principal works are, the Last Supper, in the cathedral at Antwerp; the Marriage of St. Catherine, in the church of the Capuchins at Brussels; the Resurrection of Lazarus, in the church of St. Bavon at Ghent, and the Adoration of the Magi, in the cathedral at Bruges. He also distinguished himself in literature as well as in the arts, and published several works, embellished with plates from his own designs, engraved by his brother Gysbert Venius; the principal are, a History of the War of the Batavians against Claudius Civilis and Cerialis, from Tacitus; Horace's Emblems, with Observations; the Life of Thomas Aquinas; and the Emblems of Love, divine and profane. He died at Brussels in 1634.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, GERTRUDE, was the daughter of Otho V., born at Brussels about 1600. She was instructed by her father, and painted cabinet pictures of historical subjects, and portraits, in which last branch she chiefly excelled. Her coloring was clear and lively, and her touch delicate. The portrait of her father, painted by herself, was engraved by Rucholle.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, GYSBERT, was the younger brother of Otho V., born at Leyden in 1558. It is not known under whom he studied, but his style resembles that of Cornelius Cort. He engraved several plates after the Italian masters, for which reason some suppose that he accompanied his brother to Rome. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, his drawing is tolerably correct, and the character of his heads is well expressed. He engraved a great number of plates from the designs of Otho V., chiefly emblematical subjects, and some portraits which possess considerable merit. He died at Antwerp in 1628. The following are his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Ernest, Duke of Bavaria; in a medallion, supported by Fame. Cardinal Alessandro Farnese; after Otho Venius. Giovanni da Bologna. 1589.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Four Seasons; after Raffaele del Colle. 1589. These have been incorrectly stated to be from the designs of Raffaele d'Urbino. The Espousal of Isaac and Rebecca; after Bal. Peruzzi; in five sheets, in the form of a frieze; fine and scarce. The Visitation of the Virgin to St. Elizabeth; after F. Baroccio. The Crucifixion; do. The Emblems of Horace; after Otho Venius. The Emblems of divine and profane Love; do. The Life of St. Thomas Aquinas; a set of several plates; do.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, ROCHUS, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1650, and died at Haerlem in 1706. He excelled in painting live and dead game, and birds, which he finished with great care.

VENNE, ABRAHAM VANDER, a Dutch portrait painter, born in 1586, and died in 1650. There is a portrait of William I. by him in the Museum at Amsterdam.

VENNE, ADRIAN VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1589, and died at the Hague in 1662. He studied under Jerome van Diest. He possessed a lively imagination, and executed many beautiful designs to embellish the various Dutch publications of his time. He also painted history, battles, and portraits. As he wrought with great facility, his works are very numerous and are said to possess considerable merit. The subjects of some of the most interesting are the famous battles fought in Flanders, painted on canvass of immense size. His pictures are generally marked with one of the preceding monograms. There was a Hubert vander Venne, supposed to have been a relative of Adrian, who flourished at the Hague about the same time. He painted bas-reliefs, groups of children, vases, and other ornaments. Also a John vander Venne, who flourished at Brussels. He painted landscapes, which were sometimes decorated with figures by Bout.

VENTURINI, ANGELO, a Venetian painter, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century. According to Zanetti, he was a pupil of Antonio Balestra, and painted both in oil and fresco. His principal works are in the church of Gesù e Maria at Venice, of which he decorated the ceiling, and various portions of the walls with frescos.

VENTURINI, GASPARO, a painter of Ferrara, who flourished about 1594. After having studied under Domenico Mona. as is conjectured by Baruffaldi, he went to Genoa, and became the disciple of Bernardo Castelli, whose style he followed. He executed some works for the churches, but wrought mostly for individuals. Lanzi says his coloring partakes of that ideal taste so pleasing in the works of Castelli.

VENTURINI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, and probably a painter, born at Rome, in or about 1619. His style of engraving strongly resembles that of Gio. Battista Galestruzzi, and it is supposed that he was a disciple of that master. He etched a number of plates after the works of the Italian masters, among which is a set after Polidoro da Caravaggio, from the designs of Galestruzzi.

VENUSTI, MARCELLO, a painter born at Mantua in 1515. According to Baglioni, he first studied under Pierino del Vaga in his native city, and afterwards went to Rome, where his talent recommended him to the notice of Michael Angelo, who employed him to execute many works from his designs. Lanzi says, "he was a young man of great talents, but diffident, and probably standing in need of more instruction than Pierino afforded him; this he afterwards received from Michael Angelo, whose style he adopted, without affectation, and executed his designs in an excellent manner. He thus colored two Annunciations for altar-pieces, one of which was set up in the church of St. John of Lateran, and the other in Della Pace. He is also said to have painted some cabinet pictures after the designs of Buonarotti, as the *Limbo** in the Colonna palace, Christ going to Mount Calvary, and some other pieces in the Palazzo Borghese, also the celebrated copy of the Last Judgment, which he painted for the Cardinal Farnese, that still exists at Naples. Although a good designer, and the author of many pieces, he obtained greater celebrity by clothing the inventions of Michael Angelo in exquisite beauty, especially in small pictures, of which Vasari says he executed a great many." These copies were executed on a much larger scale than the originals, and the beauty of his coloring and neatness of his finishing, won the admiration of Buonarotti, which, together with the fact that he employed Sebastiano del Piombo to assist him in competing with Raffaelle, shows that that great artist was not so insensible to the advantages of fine coloring, as some have pretended. Venusti executed many works for the churches at Rome, both in oil and fresco, from his own designs, which are greatly admired for the grandeur of their composition, correctness and elegance of design, excellence of coloring, and neatness of finishing. He is sometimes called by the Italians, Mantuano. Vasari and Orlandi erroneously call him Raffaelle Venusti. He died in 1576.

VERAT, DARIUS, an engraver mentioned by Strutt as the engraver of a print signed Alex. Verat, pinx. Darius filius sculp. These names signify Alessandro and Dario Varotari, which see.

VERACINI, AGOSTINO, a Florentine painter, who studied under Sebastiano Ricci, whose style he followed. He executed some works for the churches at Florence and elsewhere, which, according to Lanzi, gained him considerable reputation. He died in 1762.

VERALLI, FILIPPO, a painter of Bologna, who was living in 1678. According to Malvasia, he was a disciple of Francesco Albano, in whose style he painted landscapes, which were greatly admired. Lanzi also commends him as an excellent painter of rural views, which are much prized in the collections.

VERBEECK, or VERBEECQ, PHILIP, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Haerlem, who flourished about 1620. Little is known of him, except that he engraved some plates, in a style said to so nearly resemble that of Rembrandt, that his prints have sometimes been mistaken, even by connoisseurs, for the productions of that master. If this be the case, Rembrandt was the imitator, as Verbeeck flourished before him, and it would seem probable that he was one of the several masters from whom Rembrandt derived instruction. There were several artists whose names are variously spelled as above, of whom little is known, but who seem to have flourished in the first half of the 17th century, and were probably of the same family.

VERBEECK, or VERBEECQ, PETER, a Dutch painter born at Haerlem, who flourished about 1640. He painted landscapes, hunting parties, halts of travelers, conversations, &c. He is said to have been one of the instructors of Philip Wouwerman, whose early pictures bear some resemblance to his style. There are a few etchings signed P. C. Verbeeck, which are dated from 1619 to 1639, perhaps the same artist. His style is also said to resemble that of Rembrandt. There are also some prints signed G. Verbeeck.

VERBIUS, or VERBUIJS, ARNOLD, a Dutch painter, born at Dort, in or about 1646, and died in Friesland in 1704. He painted history, portraits, and lascivious subjects, from which last circumstance, he was called the Libertine.

VERBOOM, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known, except from his works. He flourished about the middle of the 17th century, and painted landscapes in a style partaking of those of Waterloo and Both, but not so warm as the latter. His pictures are very rare, and little known out of his own country. Bartsch describes two etchings by him, one of which is signed V' Boom f., which are extremely rare. It is supposed that there are others, which do not bear his signature. There is a set of six landscapes engraved after him by Gronsveld. Bartsch calls him A. H. V. Boom; others Abraham Verboom. He sometimes signed his pictures A. Verboom. His landscapes are occasionally enriched with the figures of Wouwerman, or Lingelbach. There is a fine landscape by him, with figures preparing for the chase by Lingelbach, in the Museum at Amsterdam.

VERBRUGGE, ANDRIESZ GYSBERT, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden, according to Immerzeel, in 1633; Füessli says he died at Delft in 1730, in his 77th year, which makes his birth twenty years later. He was a scholar of Gerard Douw, whose style he followed with considerable success. He passed some time in England, and afterwards settled at Delft, where, it is said, many of his portraits and cabinet pictures are to be found in the collections.

VERBRUGGEN, or TERBRUGGEN, HENRY, a Dutch historical painter, born at Utrecht in 1588. After studying under Abraham Bloemaert, he went to Italy, where he resided ten years, chiefly at Rome and Naples. His talents recommended him to the patronage of several persons of distinction, and he executed several works for the churches, one of the best of which, was a Deposition from the Cross, in one of the principal churches of Naples. On his return to his native country, he settled at Middleburg, where he acquired a high reputation. When Rubens made his tour through Holland, he was particularly struck with the works of Verbruggen, and pronounced him one of the ablest artists of his country. His pictures are well composed, correctly designed, finely colored, and executed with a bold and spirited pencil. His name is generally written Terbruggen, and the best authorities agree that he died at Utrecht in 1629, but some say at Middleburg in 1640.

VERBRUGGEN, GASPARD PETER, a Flemish painter of fruit and flowers, born at Antwerp in 1668. He was the son and scholar of Peter Verbruggen, a painter of whom little is known except that he was director of the Academy at Antwerp in 1659. After having acquired considerable reputation in his native city, he established himself in 1706 at the Hague, where he was employed in conjunction with Matthew Terwesten in decorating the mansion of the Greffier Fagel, in which the figures were painted by Terwesten, and the festoons of flowers, fruit, and other ornaments, by Verbruggen. In 1708, he was elected a member of the Academy at the Hague. His works were greatly admired, and he found such abundant employment, that in the course of a few years, he amassed a competent fortune, with which he returned to Antwerp, where he is said to have devoted most of his time to company and amusements, painting chiefly at night, so that he became careless, and his later productions are inferior to his earlier ones. In his manner he exhibits the loose, free, and spirited touchings of John Baptist Monnoyer, rather than the polished finishing of van Huysum, and his coloring had more of brilliancy than of truth and nature. He particularly excelled in frescos, for which his style and great facility of hand were adapted. His manner of painting ceilings and saloons with festoons of flowers and fruit, was truly grand; and his coloring and grouping of objects, showed extraordinary skill and judgment. He died at Antwerp in 1720.

VERBRUGGEN, PETER and HENRY FRANCIS. There were two sculptors and wood carvers of this name, who executed various excellent works, according to Stanley, in the cathedral and churches at Antwerp, as pulpits and confessionals, and also many of the carved decorations in numerous noble mansions in Belgium. The time when they flourished is not stated, nor has the author been able to obtain any definite information concerning them. It is probable that their works were all of a decorative character, and executed in wood. During the civil commotions, some of them were sold, and sent to England.

VERCELLESI, SEBASTIANO, a painter born at Reggio, who was living in 1650. According to Tiraboschi, he was a disciple of Lionello Spada, and executed some works for the churches of his native city, but was mostly employed by individuals. He was a reputable follower of his master's style.

VERCELLI, FRA PIETRO DA, an old painter of the Milanese school, who, according to Della Valle, flourished at Vercelli about 1466. There is an altar-piece by him in the church of S. Marco, in that city.

VERCHIO. See CIVERCHIO.

VERCRUYS. See KRUGER.

VERDIER, FRANÇOIS DU, a French historical painter, designer, and engraver, born in 1651, and died in 1730. He studied under Charles le Brun, and copied many of the works of his master, by which he is better known than by his original compositions. His drawings in black and red chalk, heightened with white, in which he appears to have copied or imitated those of his master, are numerous in France. He also engraved some plates after le Brun, and others after his own designs. He is sometimes called van Hawken, for what reason is not mentioned.

VERDIZZOTTI, GIOVANNI MARIA, a Venetian painter, poet, and disciple of Titian, was born at Venice in 1525, and died there in 1600. According to Ridolfi, he was an intimate friend of Titian, who instructed him and took every pains to make him a proficient in the art. He excelled in painting landscapes in the style of his master, usually of small size, which he enriched with figures representing some subject of history or fable. He showed Titian every mark of respect and affection, and acted as his secretary when he had occasion to correspond with persons of high rank. He translated the Æneid and Ovid's Metamorphoses into Italian, and on the death of Titian, wrote a Latin poem in honor of his memory. Lanzi says, "he was one of Titian's literary friends, who painted, under his direction, several landscapes which are much esteemed in different collections, where they are extremely rare."

VERDOEL, ADRIAN, a Dutch painter, born at a small village on the Meuse, in or about 1620, and died at Flushing in 1681. He is said to have first studied under Leonard Bramer; next one of the de Wittes, and lastly Rembrandt, whose manner he followed. His design was more correct, and his compositions more elevated, than those of Rembrandt, but in harmony of coloring, and in the effect of the chiaro-scuro, he was far inferior to him. His works are very rare, as he quitted painting for commercial pursuits.

VERDUSSEN, JOHN PETER, a painter who flourished from about 1743 to 1763, when he is supposed to have died. He painted hunting pieces, cavalcades, horse-fairs, and other subjects, in which animals form the principal objects, in a style of excellence. There are some of his works in the Munich collection.

VERELST, SIMON, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1664. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted flowers and fruit exquisitely. He went to England early in life, in the reign of Charles II., where his works were extremely admired, and he gained abundant employment. He sometimes painted history, and oftener portraits; in which the beauty of the flowers always so entirely eclipsed the figures that they passed for flower-pieces. His conceit was unbounded. He called himself the king of painters, and used to exhibit an historical piece on which he had labored many years, and to boast that "it contained all the several manners and excellencies of Raffaele, Titian, Rubens, and Vandyck." He died in 1710.

VERELST, HERMANN, is said to have been the elder brother of the preceding. He also excelled in painting fruit and flower-pieces. He went to Rome, and afterwards settled at Vienna, where he appears to have resided many years, till 1683, when that city being besieged by the Turks, the success of his brother induced him to go to England, where he remained till his death in 1700.

VERELST, CORNELIUS, was the son of Hermann, born at Vienna in 1667. He studied with his father, accompanied him to England, and painted similar subjects with success.

VERELST, MARIA, was the daughter of Hermann, and is said to have been born at Vienna in 1630, evidently an error of more than forty years. She studied with her father, but was chiefly indebted to the instruction of her uncle Simon, with whom she chiefly resided, for her proficiency in art. She excelled in painting portraits of a small size, which were admired for the delicacy of her touch, and the neatness of her finishing. She was an accomplished musician, performed on several instruments, and spoke and wrote the German, Italian, French, English, and Latin languages with fluency and elegance.

VERELST. See VERHELST.

VERENDAEL, N., a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1659. It is not known under whom he studied, but he painted fruit and flower pieces in an exquisite manner, in which he appears to have emulated the delicate finishing of Abraham Mignon. His compositions exhibit both genius and judgment, and show that he studied everything after nature. His works are esteemed next to those of Mignon and van Huysum, and are to be found in the choicest collections of his country. His flower pieces are preferred to his pictures of fruit. He died in 1717.

VEREYCKE, HANS, a Flemish painter, born at Bruges in 1510. He painted landscapes in an agreeable and masterly style, and also portraits with considerable reputation. He was called by his cotemporaries Little John. He is supposed to have died in or about 1569.

VERGARA, NICOLAS DE, the ELDER, a Spanish painter and sculptor, born at Toledo about 1510. His works are chiefly to be found in the cathedral of Toledo, where he directed the works in painting and sculpture for thirty-two years, after 1542; and they are commended for an elevated taste of design, good taste in the accessories, and beauty of the forms. Vergara also executed a part of the paintings on glass in the same edifice, which were continued and completed by his sons, Nicolas and Juan, after his death in 1574.

VERGARA, JUAN DE, the son and scholar of the preceding, was born at Toledo about 1540. He distinguished himself as a painter, sculptor, and architect, and assisted his father and brother in executing the glass paintings in the cathedral, which occupied about forty years. He succeeded his father as director of the works in painting and sculpture in that edifice. Vergara contracted a close intimacy with El Mudo, who is said to have expired in his arms. He died at Toledo in 1606.

VERGARA, JOSÉ, a Spanish painter, was born at Valencia in 1726. At a very early age he manifested a strong inclination for art, and the Biographie Universelle states that he competed in the school of Evaristo Munoz for the prize offered for the best drawing after the living model, when only seven years old. He formed his style from the prints of Spagnoletto, and is also said to have studied the works of Coypel and Paolo de Matteis. His portraits are very numerous, and he painted many pictures for the churches of Valencia and the cities of that province, in oil, fresco, and distemper, generally characterized by correct design and excellent coloring. Among the most remarkable, are mentioned the Conception of the Virgin, in the Library of the convent S. Francisco at Valencia; and a picture of Telemachus and Mentor, placed in the Academy of that city, and afterwards transferred to the Academy of S. Ferdinando. Vergara was chosen director of the Academy of San Carlos at Valencia, and discharged the duties of that office until his death in 1799.

VERGAZON, HENRY, a Dutch painter of landscapes and ruins, who went to England in the reign of William III., where he was chiefly employed by Sir Godfrey Kneller, in painting the backgrounds to his pictures. He sometimes painted portraits of a small size.

VERHAECHT, TOBIAS, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1566. After studying in his native city and acquiring considerable reputation, he went to Italy for improvement. He resided some time at Florence, where his talents recommended him to the patronage of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, for whom he painted several large landscapes and views. He next went to Rome, where his works were much admired. On his return to Flanders, he acquired a brilliant reputation, and was considered one of the ablest landscape painters of his time. Rubens testified to his merit, and used to say that Verhaecht was his first and best instructor in that branch of the art. His scenery is grand and extensive, and he exhibited a more perfect acquaintance with aerial perspective than any of his cotemporaries. He frequently embellished his pictures with the ruins of ancient edifices, which he had designed during his residence in Italy. As he was not so successful in designing figures, he usually employed the eminent painters of his time, particularly Franck, to insert them in his pictures. He died in 1631.

VERHAGHEN, PETER JOSEPH. This historical painter was born at Aerschot, in South Brabant, in 1728, according to Immerzeel; although Balkema places his birth in 1720. The account of his life is contradictory, since it is stated that he studied under Kerkhove and Besschev, whereas the former died in 1724, and the latter was born in 1739. Verhaghen applied himself with great assiduity, and attained sufficient excellence to gain the patronage of Prince Charles of Lorraine. It would appear that he practiced the art for a number of years at Louvain, a city not far from his native place, and painted many pictures remarkable for their coloring. At the expense of the government he visited France, Sardinia, and Italy; and while sojourning at Rome he painted two pictures which attracted much attention, representing Christ crowned with Thorns, and Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus. The latter was greatly admired for its rich composition and beautiful coloring, and gained for the artist an audience with the Pope, Clement XIV., who presented him with two gold medals. Verhaghen afterwards visited Vienna, and was patronized by the Empress Maria Theresa, to whom he presented his picture of Christ at Emmaus, placed in her Majesty's bed-chamber. She presented him with a gold snuff-box, and appointed him her principal painter; but these favors did not induce him to remain long at Vienna, and he accordingly returned to Louvain in 1773, where the citizens honored him with a general reception. Verhaghen painted with great rapidity, and executed many works for the churches and convents of his country, which, though finely colored, were often defective in drawing and finishing. He died in 1811.

VERHELST, or VERELST, EGIDIUS or GILES, a German sculptor and engraver, was the son of a Bavarian sculptor, and born in that kingdom in 1742. He is said to have followed the profession of a sculptor for several years in various German cities; but none of his works are mentioned, and he probably gained greater distinction in the theoretical branch of the art, as he was appointed Professor of Design in the Academy at Manheim. It appears that he also practiced engraving, but being desirous of further improvement, he visited Paris, and studied under J. G. Wille. On returning to Germany, he settled at Munich, and engraved various portraits and other subjects, in the neat and finished style of his instructor. Among them are the portraits of the Electors of Bavaria and of Treves; a set of five plates for a translation of Tasso's Jerusalem; and Two Heads, characteristic of Innocence and Simplicity, for the work of Lavater.

VERHELST, PETER or PAUL, a Dutch painter, born about 1614. Little is known of him. He painted familiar subjects, in which he imitated the styles of Douw, Mieris, and Slingslandt, with considerable success. One of his pictures is signed P. Verhelst, 1659.

VERHEYDEN, FRANCIS PETER, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1659. He followed the profession of a sculptor till he was about forty years old, and was one of the artists employed in modeling the figures and ornaments for the triumphal arches erected on the public entry of William III. into that city in 1691. Soon after this, while associating with some artists who were employed with him at the King's palace at Breda, he tried his hand at painting, and with such success that he was induced to abandon sculpture and devote himself entirely to painting, against the advice of all his friends. Being captivated by the works of Francis Snyders, he made them his model, and by assiduous application was soon able to paint similar subjects, such as huntings of wild boars, stags, and other animals, in a style of such excellence as surprised every body. His pictures are ingeniously composed, correctly designed, and executed with a freedom and spirit little inferior to the distinguished artist he adopted as his model. His coloring was good, and he acquired a freedom of touch and a boldness of penciling that is surprising when we consider the late period of life at which he commenced painting. He also excelled in painting fowls and dead game in the manner of Hondcooter, and he touched the plumage with a lightness and truth almost equal to that master. His pictures are scarcely known out of his own country, where they are found in the choicest collections. He died in 1711.

VERHEYDEN, MATTHEW, was the son of the preceding, born at Breda in 1700. His father dying when he was eleven years old, he studied successively under Michael Carré, Terwesten, and Netscher. He afterwards went to the Hague, and studied portraiture under the Chev. Karel de Moor. Little more is known of him, except that he is said to have practiced portrait painting with a success that enabled him to live in comfort, and to acquire a competent fortune.

VERHOEK, PETER CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Boodegraven in 1642, according to the best authorities, though some say in 1633, which last date is evidently an error, as he studied under Abraham Hondius at Rotterdam, who was born in 1638. Orlandi calls his name Verhuik, saying that he was born at Rotterdam in 1648, and that he was living in 1718. After acquiring considerable reputation as an able designer of animals, he went to Italy, and stopping at Bologna, he was so captivated with the works of Borgognone, that he studied them incessantly, and distinguished himself as a painter of battles and skirmishes of cavalry in the style of that master. He afterwards visited Rome, Naples, and other cities, and his works were everywhere greatly admired. He painted both in large and small size; his figures and horses are correctly designed, and touched with great spirit and animation; his coloring is lively and full of force. He also painted landscapes in a pleasing style, which he decorated with small figures in the manner of Callot. Lanzi says, "Cornelio Verhuik of Rotterdam was also a pupil of Cortese (Borgognone), and resided several years at Bologna. Besides his battle-pieces in his master's manner, displaying strong and vivid coloring, he painted in the Flemish style, markets, fairs, and landscapes, which he enlivened with small figures like those of Callot." It is evident that Cornelio Verhuik of the Italians is the same as Peter Cornelius Verhoek of the Dutch, and not a different artist, as some have supposed. He seems to have passed most of his life in Italy.

VERHOEK, GYSBERT (GILBERT), was the brother of the preceding, born at Boodegraven in 1644. He first studied under Adam Pynaker, but he did not follow his style. He is said to have studied afterwards with his brother, and to have painted similar subjects with success, though it is not known that he ever went to Italy. He painted battles, marches of cavalry, and encampments. He particularly excelled in drawing the horse in every action and attitude, and his pencil was very animated and peculiarly adapted to the subjects he painted. He was remarkably studious to improve himself, and took great pains to make numerous sketches of men and horses in different motions, actions, and attitudes, to introduce into his compositions. His works are little known out of his own country, where they are frequently met with in the collections. He died in 1690.

VERHULST, PETER, a Dutch painter, born at Dort. Little is known of him. He is said to have studied under William Doudyns, and to have painted fruit, flowers, and insects, in the style of Otho Marcellis.

VERKOLIE, JOHN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1650. He was the son of a locksmith, who brought him up to his own business till he was twelve years of age, when he met with an accident which confined him to his bed for three years. It was during this painful and tedious confinement that he discovered a genius for painting by amusing himself in copying prints, in which he showed great talent. After his recovery he was placed under the instruction of John Lievens, but he remained with him only about six months, and further improved himself by studying and copying the works of Gerard Pietersz van Zyl, whose works were then held in high estimation, and whose style he imitated so successfully as to be able to complete some of the unfinished works of that master. He painted historical subjects and conversations, which, though somewhat defective in design and deficient in elegance and grace, are well colored and executed with a neat, tender, and delicate pencil. He however chiefly excelled in painting portraits of small size, which were admired. Verkolie was one of the earliest engravers in mezzotinto in Holland, and executed some portraits and other subjects from his own designs, and after other masters. He died in 1693.

VERKOLIE, NICHOLAS, the son of the preceding, born at Delft in 1673. He studied under his father, and for some time painted small portraits and domestic subjects in his style, but afterwards applied himself to historical painting, and distinguished himself as one of the ablest artists of his time. Among his most esteemed works are three pictures formerly in the collection of M. de Neufville at Amsterdam, representing Moses rescued from the Nile, David and Bathsheba, and Peter denying Christ. His composition is simple and judicious, his design is more correct and graceful than is usual with the artists of his country; his coloring is tender and harmonious, and his pencil is firm, though delicate. His works are found in the choicest collections of his country, where they are deservedly admired. He sometimes painted night pieces, to which he gave a surprising effect. He also excelled in designing and drawing in India ink. He likewise distinguished himself as an engraver in mezzotinto, and carried that art to a much higher degree of perfection than his father. He engraved quite a number of portraits and other subjects from his own designs and after the Dutch masters. He died at Amsterdam in 1746.

VERMEER, JOHN. See MEER.

VERMEULEN, CORNELIUS, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1644. It is not known under whom he studied, but he went young to Paris, where he passed some time. He afterwards returned and settled in his native city, where he executed with the graver in a neat clear style, a considerable number of portraits. He also engraved some historical subjects, but these are inferior to his portraits, as the drawing is incorrect. The following are his most esteemed prints :

PORTRAITS.

Maria Louisa of Orleans; after Rigaud. Philip V. of Spain; after Vivien. Maximilian Emanuel, Elector of Bavaria; do. Louis de Luxembourg, Marshal of France; after Rigaud. Maria Louisa de Tassis; after Vandyck. Peter Mignard, Painter; from a picture by himself. Nicholas vander Borch, Painter; after Vandyck.

SUBJECTS.

Bacchus and Erigone; after Guido; for the Crozat Collection. Mary of Medicis escaping from the city of Blois; after the picture by Rubens, in the Luxembourg Gallery.

VERMEULEN, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter of little note, born at Dort in 1732, and died there in 1813. He was a good colorist, and chiefly occupied himself in copying the works of the Dutch masters. He was also a restorer and dealer in old paintings.

VERMEULEN, ANDREW, the son of the preceding, born at Dort in 1763, was instructed by his father, and painted landscapes with figures, horses, and cattle, in a lively and pleasing style. He also painted winter scenes with figures skating and amusing themselves on the ice. He died in 1814.

VERMEYEN, or MAYO, JOHN CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Beverwyck, near Haerlem, in 1500. He was the son of an obscure painter named Cornelius V., who probably instructed him in the art. The Emperor Charles V. appointed him his principal painter, and honored him with many marks of his particular esteem. He attended that monarch in all his expeditions, was present at all his battles and sieges, and designed on the spot all the fortified places attacked, the different encampments of the army, and every memorable action of the whole war by sea and land. In 1535 he was present at the siege and capture of Tunis, and made designs of the principal events, from which he afterwards executed cartoons for the tapestry to adorn the Escorial. He was remarkable for having a long beard, which he is said to have cultivated with such care that it grew down to his feet, and the Emperor in his merry moods would tread upon it; hence he was called Johannes Barbatius, Barbalonga, Barbato, and other significant names.

He is said to have been skilled in mathematics, geometry, and architecture. Most of the works he executed while in the service of the Emperor, are supposed to have perished in the conflagration of the Prado. He passed the latter part of his life at Brussels, where he executed several works for the churches and public edifices, which are highly commended by Vanmader. There are two pictures by him in the church of St. Gery, representing the Nativity and the Resurrection. He was likewise a good portrait painter.

Verneyen was also an engraver. Brulliot claims the credit of being the first to notice him as such, and he describes four prints by him, marked with the above monogram, which he says properly signifies John Cornelisz. They are of small size; three are dated 1545, and one, 1546. They represent the Virgin and Child, accompanied by an angel; a Man duped, a composition of several half-length figures; a young Woman with a Cat, half-length profile; a young Woman seated on a Couch, apparently sewing. He died in 1559.

VERMIGLIO, GIUSEPPE, a painter born at Turin, who was living in 1675. Little is known of him except by his works. Lanzi regards him as one of the ablest artists of the Piedmontese school. He highly commends his picture of Daniel in the Lion's Den, in the Library della Passione at Milan, and says that "for correctness of design, beautiful forms, expression highly studied, and colors warm, varied and lucid, it is one of the most valuable pictures painted at Milan since the time of Gaudenzio Ferrari. From the imitative style of the heads it is evident that he studied the Caracci, and was not a stranger to Guido, but in coloring he seems to have imitated the Flemish artists. It is improbably reported at Milan, perhaps from resemblance of style, that he instructed Daniello Crespi. I consider him as the finest painter in oil that the ancient state of Piedmont can boast, and as one of the best Italian artists of his day. Why he painted so near Turin, and yet had no success in that city, and why he was not distinguished by his own sovereign, though well received at the court of Mantua, I have not been able to discover." He executed several other fine works for the churches at Milan, Mantua, Alessandria, and Novara. He enriched the backgrounds of his pictures with beautiful landscapes, or magnificent architecture. Thus, his Daniel in the Lion's Den is enriched with architecture in the style of Veronese, and his Christ and the Woman of Samaria, in the Refectory of the P. P. Olivetani at Alessandria, is decorated with a beautiful landscape and a magnificent view of the city of Samaria in the distance. The latter is supposed to be one of his last works, and is dated 1675.

VERNET, CLAUDE JOSEPH, a celebrated French marine and landscape painter, was born at Avignon in 1714. According to Fiorillo, at the age of five years he manifested great skill in drawing. After receiving instructions from his father Antoine Vernet, he visited Rome at the age of eighteen, and commenced studying under Adrian Manglard. The beautiful views of Genoa, Naples, and other parts of Italy, served to develop his talent, and are said to have determined him to fix upon marine landscape as his principal study. He subsequently studied with Bernardino Fergioni, and soon attained a high degree of excellence. For some time he lived in great poverty, glad to paint for the slightest remuneration; he executed a piece for a suit of clothes, which brought 5000 francs at the sale of the collection of M. de Julienne. He also painted several panels for coach-builders, which were subsequently taken out, and framed as works of great value. Vernet remained in Italy twenty years, including some time spent in Greece and the Greek islands; and made elaborate sketches of many of the most interesting and beautiful spots on classic ground. He painted a great variety of landscapes, sea-views, and other marine subjects, which gained him great reputation. They possess the beauty and freshness of nature, and are excellent in every respect, but mostly in the admirable management of light and shade, and aerial perspective. He was deficient only in a knowledge of the rigging and construction of ships; his figures are arranged with unusual taste, remarkably well drawn, and touched with great neatness and spirit. His moonlight effects are admirable, and likewise his representations of water, particularly when agitated and boisterous. The pictures painted by Vernet in Rome, for the palaces Rondanini, Borghese, and Colonna, are among his best works; those in the Palazzo Rondanini were executed much in the style of Salvator Rosa, whom he imitated with great success; but he afterwards forsook Salvator's manner for one as conspicuous for its delicacy of coloring as the other was for its force.

In 1743, Vernet was chosen a member of the Academy of St. Luke; and about the same time he married Miss Parker, the daughter of an English Roman Catholic, who was an officer in the Pope's marine. His reputation at length reached France, and he was invited to Paris in 1752, by Louis XV. Embarking at Leghorn in a small felucca, he sailed to Marseilles. A violent storm happened on the way, which terrified some of the passengers; but Vernet, struck with the grandeur of the scene, requested the sailors to bind him to the mast-head; and there he remained, absorbed in admiration, and endeavoring to transfer the scene to his sketch-book. His grandson, Horace V., painted an excellent picture of this scene, and exhibited it at the Louvre in 1816. About 1753, Vernet was chosen a member of the French Academy, and presented for his reception piece a Sea-port at Sunset, which is now in the Louvre. In the same year he was commissioned to execute pictures of the principal sea-ports of France, of which he painted fifteen views, occupying him ten or twelve years. These works are of large size, and are now in the Louvre; but he was only paid 7500 francs each, including his traveling expenses. In 1766 he was elected one of the Council of the Academy, and Louis XV. gave him apartments in the Louvre. From 1752, when he returned to France, until his death in 1789, Vernet painted upwards of 200 pictures, mostly from his designs made in Italy, which were held in the highest estimation. His extraordinary talents enabled him to surpass every landscape painter in Europe, Richard Wilson being the only one who disputed the palm with him. They had become acquainted in Rome, and exchanged pictures; Vernet kept Wilson's in his studio at Paris, and is said to have remarked to English connoisseurs who visited him, that they had no occasion to come to him for pictures when they had such a painter at home.

There are a few neat and spirited etchings by him, among which are a Landscape, with a Bridge and part of a Village; a Shepherd and Shepherdess; a View of a market-place; and a Canal, with Fishermen.

VERNET, ANTOINE CHARLES HORACE, a distinguished French painter, the son of Claude Joseph V., was born at Bourdeaux in 1758. He studied the art under his father, and at the age of seventeen gained the second prize in the Academy of painting. In 1782 he gained the grand prize, which entitled him to a residence in Italy, with the royal pension. After spending some time in Rome, he returned to Paris, and in 1787 was made a member of the Academy. Vernet excelled chiefly in battle and parade pieces of large dimensions, in which he commemorated the battles of Rivoli, Marengo, Austerlitz, Wagram, the Departure of the Marshals, and many other events of French history, which occurred during his artistic career. More pleasing to many are his smaller scenes, mostly referring to battles and camps; and there are also numerous small equestrian portraits by him, showing unusual skill in depicting the horse. His studies from nature, and his hunting pieces, especially the lithographical ones, are much sought after by connoisseurs, possessing a vivacity and boldness of conception, in which his only rival was his eminent son Horace, the following artist. The twenty-eight plates in folio, illustrating the campaign of Bonaparte in Italy, are esteemed among his most successful efforts. Vernet was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and the Order of St. Michael. He died in 1836. Many of his pictures have been lithographed.

VERNET, HORACE. This eminent French battle painter of the present century, the son of Antoine Charles Horace V., was born at Paris, in the Louvre, in 1789. In early youth he manifested a strong inclination for art, and received his chief instruction from his father. He was obliged for some time to perform all kinds of illustrative work, in order to obtain a subsistence, and having failed in obtaining the grand prize, he turned his attention to that department of art for which he felt himself best adapted—the incidents of the camp and field. His pictures of the Taking of a Redoubt, the Dog of the Regiment, the Battle of Tolosa, the Barrier of Clichy, or Defence of Paris in 1814, (both of which last, exhibited in 1817, now hang in the Luxembourg gallery), besides many more, followed in quick succession, keeping up continually and incessantly, the public admiration. The critics violently opposed him, but the truth and spirit of his productions gained great admiration from the people. His pictures of the Battles of Jemmapes, Valmy, Hanau, and Montmirail, executed about 1820, were more satisfactory as works of art, than some others of his earlier works, particularly the Massacre of the Mamelukes, and they approach much nearer to historical painting. The details are executed rapidly, but with care and fidelity, the generals and personages in the front are speaking portraits, the whole scene is full of appropriate life and action, impressing the beholder with a most accurate and vivid conception of the event.

Vernet, from the first, paid little attention to the antique, and united his influence with that of the innovators against the school of David. It was perhaps for these reasons that his works were refused admission into the Louvre in 1822. Accordingly, he made an exhibition room of his atelier, and admitted the public to a numerous collection. In 1826, however, he was chosen a member of the Institute, and in 1830, director of the Academy at Rome. In the latter capacity he visited Italy for the first time, and resided five years among the works of the best masters. Inspired with ideas which he had not hitherto been able to gratify, he commenced studying those great productions, and sent a Judith and Holofernes to the Paris exhibition of 1831; but it obtained little success. His picture of the Arresting of the Princes at the Palais Royal, by order of Anne of Austria, was much better received, and was placed in the Palais Royal by order of the King. Vernet also produced various other works while at Rome, but on returning to Paris in 1835, he found the public favor still turning to his usual and best subject, the French soldier life. Accordingly he recurred to his original study, and exhibited in the following year his battle pieces of Friedland, Wagram, Jena, and Fontenoy, in which were apparent all his usual excellencies. The Algerian war at this time afforded him an admirable opportunity of exhibiting his talents, and a whole gallery at Versailles was set apart to be decorated by his pencil, called the Constantine Gallery, after the most important feat yet performed by the French troops in Africa, the capture of the town of Constantine. For this he depicted many scenes from the Algerian war, besides various military events which occurred in Europe during the reign of Louis Philippe, such as the Occupation of Ancona, and the Entry of the Army into Belgium. The Taking of the Smalah, from the Algerian war, preserved in this gallery among many other of his works, is said to be the largest canvass in existence. There are also in the Gallery of French History at Versailles, several others by him, as the Battle of Bouvines, Charles X. reviewing the National Guard, and Marshal St. Cyr. These latter works are said to illustrate the peculiar excellencies of the artist, as well, if not better, than any others, being full of that vivacity, energy, and truthfulness, which he so eminently displays. Vernet's powers of memory were most remarkable, so that he rarely employed the model, and generally wrought out his subject at once in the definitive size, without making a smaller sketch beforehand, and painting with a rapidity that is truly wonderful. His knowledge of military tactics is un mistakeable, particularly in giving prominence to the chief aim of the victorious army, and for indicating the event of the battle by the movements of the lines. His domestic scenes, rural feasts, huntings, and caverns of robbers, are also much esteemed, and all his works are the more impressive on account of their perfect freedom from affectation. There are many of them in the public galleries and private collections throughout Europe, and the sketches for Dupont's magnificent edition of the Henriade, published in 1824, were also from his fertile pencil.

In 1850, Vernet started to Rome, for the purpose of making the necessary sketches for a finished picture of the siege of that city, which was intended to be much larger than any of his former works. He is living at this time, (1852,) aged 63.

VERNICI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Bolognese

painter, who was brought up, according to Malvasia, in the school of the Caracci. He painted history with considerable reputation, and was appointed principal painter to the Duke of Urbino, in whose service he died in 1617. His principal works are in the churches of Pesaro and Urbino. He was also a good portrait painter.

VERNIGO, GIROLAMO, a painter born at Verona, who died of the plague in that city in 1630. It is not known under whom he studied, but Lanzi ranks him among the eminent landscape painters of the Venetian school. He says "he was particularly celebrated in his native city for the beauty of his landscapes, for which reason he was called Girolamo da' Paesi." See Paesi.

VERNIQUET, EDMÉ, a French architect, was born at Chatillon on the Seine, in 1727. After completing his studies at Dijon, he commenced practicing his profession, and erected many churches, chateaux, bridges, and various other works throughout Burgundy, which surpass in taste and solidity all the other works in the province of that period. He also executed various works in Maine and Poitou, and finally settled at Paris in 1774. Appointed architect of the Royal Gardens, he carried out the projects conceived by Buffon, elevating them to their subsequent height of magnificence. Verniquet was engaged for many years upon a plan of the city of Paris, which was published in 1796, in a grand atlas of seventy-two sheets. It is a work of great beauty and merit, highly praised by Lalande, (Bibliogr. Astronomique, 694.) He died in 1804.

VEROCCHIO, ANDREA, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, and goldsmith of the fifteenth century, was born at Florence in 1432. Vasari says he had little genius, but was the most laborious man of his time; Baldinucci makes him a scholar of Donatello. He first distinguished himself as a goldsmith, both at Florence and Rome; he then devoted himself solely to sculpture in bronze and marble. His first work in marble was a monument in the Minerva at Rome, to the wife of Francesco Tornabuoni, which is now in the Florentine Gallery, and exhibits good expression in the figures, but very imperfect execution. His next work was a colossal bronze figure of David, now also in the Florentine Gallery. Verocchio executed several other works in metal, by which he acquired great reputation; the principal were the monuments in San Lorenzo, of Giovanni and Pietro, the sons of Cosmo de' Medici; and the Incredible of St. Thomas, in the church of Or San Michele at Florence, finished in 1483; it is a colossal group of two figures, weighing 3981 pounds, and for which, according to Baldinucci, he was paid 476 gold florins, although Manni, in a note appended to that authority, says 800 heavy florins. According to Vasari, Verocchio left nothing to be wished for in this work; and having attained perfection in sculpture, he began to turn his attention to painting.

His practice in sculpture had made Verocchio an able designer; his academy was frequented by many disciples, among whom were Pietro Perugino and Lionardo da Vinci. He painted very few pictures, however, and finally relinquished painting upon finding himself surpassed by Lionardo da Vinci, whom he had ordered to paint the figure of an angel, in a picture of the Baptism of Christ by St. John. The work of the youth so greatly excelled that of Verocchio, that the latter thenceforward devoted himself to sculpture. Vasari mentions many designs and cartoons by him, some of which were copied and imitated by da Vinci.

Verocchio's fame having reached Venice, he was called to that city to cast an equestrian statue of Bartolomeo Colleoni, the celebrated general, but having completed the model of the horse, he was informed that Vellano of Padua was to execute the figure of the general; whereupon he was so greatly offended, that he immediately broke the head and feet of his horse, and quitted Venice without giving any notice to his employers. This independent spirit so exasperated the signory of Venice, that they wrote to Verocchio, and told him he had better not return to Venice, if he valued his head; and the artist replied that he should be mindful of their admonition, for they were as little capable of restoring him his head as they were of finding another head sufficiently beautiful for his horse! They now earnestly solicited his return, promising him twice the remuneration formerly agreed to; he therefore returned and cast his model, but caught cold in the casting, and died a few days afterwards, before the statue was quite completed, in 1488. This work was finished by Alessandro Leopardi, who cast the pedestal, and fixed it in its present position in the Piazza di Santi Giovanni e Paolo, in the year 1495. Verocchio's remains were taken by his favorite scholar Lorenzo di Credi to Florence, and were deposited in the vault of Michele di Cione, in the church of S. Ambrogio. The following inscription is over the vault: S. (for Sepulchrum) Michaelis de Cionis et Suorum et Andree Verocchi, filii Dominici Michaelis, qui obiit Venetiis M. cccc. lxxxviii.

Verocchio had many distinguished scholars in sculpture, as well as in painting; among them were Lorenzo di Credi, Nanni Grosso, and Francesco di Simone. According to Bottari, he was one of the first who made plaster casts from the human body; but not the first, as Vasari states, for Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxv. 12, 44.) says it was invented by Lysistratus, the brother of Lysippus, in the time of Alexander the Great. It is probable that Vasari referred only to the artists of modern times.

VERONA, BATTISTA DA. See ZELOTTI.

VERONA, STEFANO DA, called also STEFANO DA ZEVIO (Piacenza). See STEFANO.

VERONA, FRA GIOVANNI DA, a monk of Oliveto, born in 1469 and died in 1537. He was very celebrated in the art of decorating the choirs and sacristies of churches with inlaid work of wood. Lanzi says, "he surpassed all his predecessors, and practiced the art in various cities of Italy, and at Rome itself, in the service of Pope Julius II., but still more successfully in the sacristy of his own order, where his works are still to be seen in the best condition." At first woods of different colors were employed, and large edifices, temples, colonnades, and architectural views were represented; the art was afterwards improved by using artificially stained, as well as natural woods, and by adding figures. Many of the old churches in Italy and in other countries of Europe, are decorated in this manner, and many artists acquired distinction in the art. See Lendinara.

VERONA, JACOPO DA, an old painter, born at Verona, who was living in 1397. Lanzi says he is only known by his numerous paintings in fresco, in the church of St. Michele at Padua, executed in the style of Giotto, some of which still remain entire.

VERONA, MAFFEO DA, a painter born at Verona in 1576. He studied under Luigi Benfatto, but derived his chief improvement from studying and copying the works of Paul Veronese, whose style he adopted. According to Ridolfi he painted both in oil and fresco, and particularly excelled in the latter; he wrought with great facility and executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Venice. He also painted several works for the churches of his native city, and for the cathedral at Udine. Among his principal works at Venice are two altar-pieces, representing the Descent from the Cross, and the Resurrection, in the church of S. Marco; and Christ bearing his Cross and the Crucifixion, in the chapel of St. Isidore in the same church. He died in 1618.

VERONA, PADRE MASSIMO DA, a painter born at Verona in 1599 and died in 1679, aged 80. He was a Capuchin monk; hence he is sometimes called Il Padre Massimo Cappuccino. According to Melchiori, he was a disciple of Marc' Antonio Bassetti, whose careful style he followed, and executed many excellent works for the different churches of his order. He particularly commends four large pictures by him in the Cathedral at Montagnana.

VERONA, FRA SEMPLICE DA, a Capuchin monk, born at Verona about 1574, who, according to Melchiori, studied first under Brusasorci, and next with Fra Santo of Venice. He became a good artist, and executed some works for the churches and convents within the Venetian territory. He was also employed at Rome. Lanzi says there is a fine picture of St. Felice, by him, at Castel Franco, which was engraved in 1712. He died in 1654, at an advanced age.

VERONESE, ALESSANDRO. See TURCHI.

VERONESE, CLAUDIO. See RIDOLFI.

VERONESE, PAOLO. See CAGLIARI.

VERRIO, ANTONIO, a painter born at Naples in 1634. It is not known under whom he studied. He went to France and settled at Toulouse, where he was probably employed in designing or directing the manufacture of tapestry, as he was invited to England by Charles II. to take charge of his manufactory of tapestry at Mortlake, but instead of engaging him in this business on his arrival, he employed him in decorating the ceilings of Windsor Castle. He was also employed by King James and William III., as well as by some of the nobility. Though he found much employment at liberal prices, he was a very indifferent artist, and his performances are not worth recording. He died at Hampton Court in 1707.

VERRYKE, HANS. See VEREYCKE.

VERSCHAFFELT, CHEVALIER PIETER, a Flemish sculptor, known among the Italians as Pietro Fiammingo, was born at Ghent in 1710. After acquiring the elements of the art from an obscure carver in wood, he visited Paris and entered the school of Bouchardon. In 1737 he went to Rome, where Benedict XIV. commissioned him to execute various works in sculpture, particularly a bust and a marble statue of himself, of life size. His works are found at Rome, Bologna, Naples, and Ancona, and are highly esteemed by the Italians. After leaving Italy, Verschaffelt went to London, and was invited by the Elector of Manheim to fill the office of sculptor to his court, and also to assume the directorship of the Academy of Fine Arts in that city. During the forty years of his subsequent career, he enriched Manheim and Schwetzingen with various works in sculpture, and also superintended the architectural operations carried on by the government. He died at Manheim in 1793.

ISV VERSCHURING, HENRY, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Gorcum in 1627. His father was a captain of infantry in the Dutch Service, and intended him for the profession of arms, but his naturally delicate constitution, with a genius for painting, induced him to place him under the instruction of Theodore Goverts, a portrait painter, with whom he continued till he was thirteen years old, when he went to Utrecht, and became the scholar of John Both. After studying six years under that eminent master, he went to Rome, where he frequented the Academy, to design from the living model, and diligently studied the antique, and the works of the best modern masters. He also designed the ruins and vestiges of superb architecture, not only in and about Rome, but in every part of Italy that he visited. His landscapes are copied from nature and generally show a judicious and agreeable choice of scenery. These he enriched with architecture, ruins, figures and animals, which always correspond to the locality of the scene, the time, manners and customs of the country. He also had a genius for painting huntings, battles, and animals, in which last he particularly excelled. His works were much admired at Rome, Florence and Venice, in all which places he passed some time. After a residence of ten years in Italy, he returned to his own country and settled at Dort, where he distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes, and more particularly of battle-pieces, attacks of banditti, plundering and sacking of villages, &c. The desolating wars which ravaged his country at this time, gave him frequent opportunities of designing his subjects on the spot. He followed the armies into the field, and was very curious in observing the actions, movements and attitudes of horses, and the engagements, retreats, and encampments of armies.

Verschuring possessed a fertile and inventive genius, and as he always designed every thing from nature, there is no appearance of mannerism in his works, but all looks like reality and truth. His landscapes are admirable, his scenery beautiful, his figures correctly designed and touched with spirit, his coloring remarkably transparent, his penciling neat, and he finished his pictures very highly. His battle-pieces are full of fire and truth, and his figures and horses are correctly designed and touched with lightness and spirit. He was a man of estimable character, much beloved by his fellow-citizens, who chose him one of their Burgomasters. He was drowned near Dort in 1690, by the upsetting of a boat. He also executed a few spirited etchings of battles, dogs, and other subjects from his own designs.

VERSCHURING, WILLIAM, was the son of the preceding, born at Gorcum in 1657. He was first instructed by his father, but having a taste for a different branch of the art, he was allowed to follow his inclination, and he became the scholar of John Verkolie. He painted small portraits, conversations and domestic subjects, in the pleasing style of that master. After acquiring considerable reputation, he abandoned painting for commerce. He died in 1715.

VERSCHUUR, LIEVEN, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known. He was born at Rotterdam, probably about 1630, as he was the companion of John vander Meer in his travels to Italy. He excelled in painting sea-pieces, river views, and moonlight scenes; his style somewhat resembles that of Simon de Vlioger, equally free in execution, and perhaps more lively in color. There are two fine pictures by him in the museum at Amsterdam, one of which represents Charles II. of England entering the port of Rotterdam. He had a brother named Albert, who was a good portrait painter. They both died in the same year, 1691.

VERSTEEG, or VERSTEIGH, MICHAEL, a Dutch painter, born at Dort, in 1756. It is not recorded by whom he was instructed, but he at first painted landscapes with figures and cattle in a very pleasing style, somewhat resembling that of Janson, though evidently aiming at the older and greater masters. His coloring though verdant is yet warm, and his pictures are elaborately finished, even to the foliage of his trees. He afterwards abandoned landscape, and painted interiors and conversations by candle-light, in which he distinguished himself. In his pictures of this class, without reaching the excellence of Schalcken in penciling, he often equals him in the effects of his light and shadow, and his works are found in the best collections of his country. He acquired distinction, and was elected a member of the Royal Institute of the Netherlands and of the Academy of Painting at Antwerp. His works are found in the best collections of his country. He lived to an advanced age, and died about 1840.

VERSTRAELIN, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1620. He engraved several plates, among which is one representing Maurice, Prince of Orange, lying dead, surrounded by his officers and guards.

VERTANGEN, DANIEL, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague, in 1598. He studied under Cornelius Poelenburg, whose style he closely imitated. He painted landscapes with small figures, of Nymphs bathing, Bacchanals, and other subjects taken from Ovid. Though his pictures are far inferior to those of his instructor in force and beauty of coloring, yet they are so well composed, agreeably colored and highly finished, that they readily pass with the inexperienced for the genuine works of Poelenburg.

VERTUE, GEORGE, a distinguished English engraver and antiquary, was born at London in 1684. According to Walpole, he was placed at the age of thirteen with a French engraver of arms on plate, who had the chief business of London. Three or four years afterwards, his master left the country for France, and Vertue returned to his parents. After studying drawing for two years longer, he formed an engagement with Michael Vandergucht, the engraver, and remained with him seven years, acquiring a good knowledge of copper-plate engraving. He received instruction and advice from several painters, and commenced business on his own account in 1709. After operating for the booksellers about one year, he gained the patronage of Kneller, when his works began to draw attention, and Lord Somers employed him to engrave a plate of Archbishop Tillotson, which was much admired, and proved the ground-work of his reputation. In 1711, an Academy of Painting was instituted by Kneller and other artists of the day, and Vertue was among the first members. In 1717, at the revival of the Society of Antiquaries, he was appointed its engraver. For many years, the university of Oxford employed him to engrave their Almanacs; and in 1730, he published his twelve heads of poets, esteemed one of his capital works. In 1740, he published his proposals for the commencement of a valuable work, his historical prints, drawn with extreme care and fidelity, and executed in a most satisfactory manner.

Vertue deserves great credit for his industrious and protracted researches concerning the history of the arts and artists in England, which he continued for about forty years, and collected a large amount of information in many volumes of manuscript. These were purchased after his death by Horace Walpole, who compiled and digested from them his Anecdotes of Painting in England. Vertue died in 1756, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. His works are extremely numerous, and consist of portraits, copies from old pictures, and antiquities of every kind. Walpole has given a complete list of them, among which are the following:—

VERVEER, ARY HUBERTSZ, a Dutch painter,

born at Dort in 1646. He was much esteemed by his countrymen for his historical compositions, in which he usually designed the figures naked. In attempting to imitate the magical coloring of Rembrandt, his tints became gloomy and obscure. His best performances are painted in a rough, unfinished manner, and appear to be the productions of negligence and despatch.

VERWILT, FRANCIS, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam in 1598. He first studied under Cornelius de Bois, a landscape painter of little note, and afterwards became the disciple of Cornelius Poelemburg, whose style and subjects he imitated successfully. His pictures are correctly designed and highly finished; his coloring is brilliant and clear, and though his works are much inferior to those of his master, they possess considerable merit, and readily pass with the unlearned for the genuine productions of Poelemburg. He died in 1655.

VERZELLI, TIBURZIO, a painter born at Recanati, and died there about 1700. Lanzi commends him as an excellent painter of perspective and architectural pieces, little known beyond his native place. "The noble family of Calamini, of Recanati, possess, perhaps his best picture, the Elevation of S. Pietro in Vaticano, one of the largest and most beautiful works of this kind that ever I saw, which occupied him several years in finishing."

VEYTH. See VYTH.

VIA, AGOSTINO A., an Italian engraver, by whom there is a print of Daniel in the Lions' Den, after Pietro da Cortona.

VIA, ALESSANDRO DELLA, an Italian engraver, who flourished at Venice about 1730. He engraved some portraits and other subjects, in an indifferent style, among which is one of the Virgin and infant Christ, with St. Sebastian and other saints, after Paul Veronese.

VIANEN, JOHN VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1660. He was chiefly employed in engraving frontispieces and portraits for the booksellers. His plates are executed with the graver in a neat style, though without much effect.

VIANI, ANTONIO MARIA, called IL VIANINO, an Italian painter, was a native of Cremona, according to Zaist, and flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. After acquiring a knowledge of the art from the Campi, eminent painters of Cremona, he was invited to Mantua by the Duke, Vincenzo Gonzaga, and commissioned to execute several pictures for the churches, among which were his St. Michael in S. Agnese, and the representation of Heaven, at the Orsoline; both in the style of his instructor. He was also employed in the ducal palace, and Lanzi mentions a group of most beautiful boys playing amidst luxuriant festoons of flowers, painted in chiaro-scuro on a golden ground, in the frieze surrounding the gallery of the court. This work also is in the style of the Campi, and is probably from the hand of Viani. It is said that he was employed by the Duke in the capacity of an architect, but none of his edifices are mentioned. After the Duke's death Viani was employed by his three successors. He was living in 1582.

VIANI, GIOVANNI MARIA, an eminent painter, born at Bologna in 1637. He was a fellow student with Pasinelli in the school of Flaminio Torre. Lanzi says, "he was a learned painter, not inferior in design to any cotemporary of the Bolognese school, and added to his powers by assiduous drawing from the living model in the Academy, and the study of anatomy as long as he lived. To such knowledge, he united elegance of forms, softness of coloring, engaging attitudes, lightness of drapery, studying much from nature, and giving it an air of grace, in the manner of Torre, or of Guido. That exquisite picture of St. John di Dio, at the hospital of the Buonfratelli, is such a specimen of his art. In the Portico of the Servi, he represented, in a Lunette, St. Filippo Benizi borne up to Heaven by two angels; a figure which, both in countenance and action, breathes an expression of beatitude, conspicuous, even at the side of another history by Cignani. In other Lunettes of the same portico, he does not excite equal admiration, and gives us an idea of an artist able to compete with the best masters, though obliged to work with a larger share of study." Viani executed many works for the churches and public edifices of Bologna. He opened a school opposite to that of Cignani, and instructed several pupils. He also executed several spirited etchings from his own designs, and after the Caracci. He died in 1700.

VIANI, DOMENICO MARIA, was the son of the preceding, born at Bologna in 1668. After receiving a thorough education in the art from his father, he went to Venice, where he diligently studied the works of the great Venetian masters. Guidalotti, who wrote his life, prefers him to his father. Lanzi says, "few will subscribe to this opinion, he not having attained to that exactness, much less that dignity of design exhibited by his father. He was also inferior to him in the nature, truth, and clearness of his coloring. Still, he possessed a grand character in his outline, a stronger execution, like Guercino's, and more splendid ornaments, like the Venetians. His St. Antony in the church of S. Spirito at Bergamo, in the act of convincing a skeptic by a miracle, is a surprising picture, extolled by Rotari and Tiepolo." He succeeded his father in the school which he had established at Bologna, and instructed several pupils. He executed many works for the churches at Bologna, and the adjacent cities, particularly Bergamo and Pistoia. The principal at Bologna are a series representing the Prophets and Evangelists in the church of the Nativity; and a legendary story of Christ healing a pilgrim, in the church of the Servi. Bartsch describes a single etching by him, of St. Joseph with the infant Saviour. He died at Pistoia in 1711. Some place his birth in 1670, and his death in 1716, but Lanzi and the best authorities, give the dates as above.

VICARO, FRANCESCO, an engraver to whom a set of etchings of landscapes are attributed. He is the same as Francesco Vaccaro, which see.

VICENTE, BARTOLOME, a Spanish painter, born at Saragossa in 1640. He studied under Juan Carreno at Madrid. He was a reputable painter both in oil and fresco, and executed some works for the churches and convents of his native city. He is said to have chiefly employed himself in painting landscapes of a small size, and teaching mathematics, a proof that he did not acquire any great reputation, notwithstanding the high commendations of Bermudez. He died at Saragossa in 1700.

VICENTINI, ANTONIO, a Venetian painter, who excelled in painting perspective, architectural pieces, and views in Venice, in the style of Canaletto. He was born in 1688, and died in 1782, at the great age of 94 years. Lanzi says his views are frequently ornamented with the figures of Zuccarelli and Tiepolo.

VICENTINO, ANDREA, a painter born at Venice in 1539, and died in 1614. He was a scholar of the elder Palma, whose style he followed. Lanzi says, that though not excelling in point of taste, he was very skillful in handling his colors, and showed great power of invention. He was a great plagiarist, and seldom painted a picture without borrowing in his perspective, architecture, or figures, or some ideas from others, though he had the judgment to select those of the best masters. He was one of the most popular artists of his time, and found abundant employment in painting for the churches and public edifices of Venice and other cities in the state, and even beyond the bounds of the Republic. He was also employed to paint several histories of the Republic, which still adorn the halls of the Palazzo Grande. Lanzi says, "he bestowed upon his plagiarisms a beauty of composition and a grand effect that does honor to his talents, applicable to every variety of subject. He could also use a very delicate, tasteful, and effective pencil whenever he chose. In his grounds he was less successful, many of his pictures being already defaced. In collections, always more favorable to the duration, than in public places, we find them in good preservation, and deserving of much commendation, as seen in his Solomon anointed King of Israel, in the Royal gallery at Florence."

VICENTINO, MARCO, was the son and scholar of the preceding, born at Venice, where he practiced, according to Zanetti, with considerable reputation. He executed many works for the churches and for the collections. Lanzi says he acquired some celebrity by his imitations, but more by his father's name.

VICENTINO, BATTISTA, an Italian engraver, born at Vicenza, who flourished at Venice about 1540. In conjunction with Gio. Battista del Moro, he engraved a set of fifty plates of landscapes, with ruins and architecture, which are executed in a bold, spirited style. He marked his prints Battista P. V. F. He is probably the same as Gio. Battista Pittoni, which see.

VICENTINO, FRANCESCO, a Milanese painter, highly commended by Lomazzo for the excellence of his landscape, in which "he imitated nature so accurately as to show the dust blown about by the wind." Lanzi conjectures that he was a disciple of Bernazzano, and says that he was also a good figure painter, several specimens of which may be seen at the Grazie, and in other churches at Milan. He flourished about 1550.

VICENTINO, FRANCESCO MAFFEI, a painter born at Vicenza about 1600. He studied under Santo Peranda at Venice, and afterwards improved himself by studying the works of Paul Veronese. He settled at Padua, where he executed many works for the churches and public edifices. He died there in 1660.

VICENTINO, GIOVANNI NICCOLO, called ROSSIGLIANI, an Italian painter and engraver, born at Vicenza about 1510. Little is known of him as a painter, but he executed some wooden cuts after Raffaello, Caravaggio, and other masters, in chiaroscuro, in which he made use of three blocks.—Bartsch says he variously signed his prints Joseph Nicolaus Vicentini, and Nic. S. Vicentino, I.; for the names of Giovanni and Rossigliani, he thinks there is no good foundation. He is also called Gioseffo Scolari Vicentino, which is evidently an error, as the signature simply means, Joseph, the scholar of Vicentino. It would seem that there were two or more engravers of Vicenza, who signed their prints Vicentino. Niccolo Boldrini flourished about the same time, and was called Vicentino. See Boldrini.

VICI, ANDREA DEL, architect to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, was born at Arcevia, in the Marca d'Ancona, in 1744. Having gone through the usual course of education at Perugia, he was sent to Rome to study painting and architecture, the first under Stefano Pozzi, the other under Carlo Murena, and it was the second of these arts that he decided on following as a profession. It would appear that he gave promise of more than ordinary talent, from the circumstance of Vanvitelli engaging him as his assistant, when he was about to commence the palace at Caserta; yet the latter part of this statement is evidently incorrect, because Vici could not have been more than eight or nine years old at that time. It is certain, however, that he was connected for some time with Vanvitelli, for he was commissioned by him to attend to matters of business connected with the Moia di Pontano; in consequence of which he became known at Rome as a skillful engineer. In 1780, the court of Tuscany appointed him hydraulic architect and engineer for the Val di Chiana, and in 1787, he was employed in a similar capacity by the papal government, in the work of draining the Pontine marshes, and preventing the inundations of the Teppia. In 1810 he erected the embankment to support the left bank of the Anio. His architectural works are considerable in number and importance; among them are the Palazzo Lapri at Bevagna; the church and monastery delle Salesiane at Offagna; the seminary at Osimo; the church of S. Francesco at Foligno; the Capella Gozzoli at Terni; the villa and casini at Monte Gallo; and the superb cathedral at Camarino. Vici died Sept. 10, 1817.

VICINELLI, ONOARDO, a painter born at Rome in 1684. According to Pascoli, he studied under Gio. Maria Morandi, and was his ablest scholar. He does not hesitate to assert that he conferred more honor on his master, than any other of his scholars, and that Pietro Nelli alone could dispute precedence with him. He died in 1755.

VICINO, an old painter in mosaic, who was a native of Pisa, and flourished about 1321. Vasari says that he finished a mosaic commenced by Turrita, in which he was assisted by Taffi and Gaddi, and adds that he was also a painter.

VICO, VIGHI, or VICUS, ENEA, an eminent engraver and medalist, was born at Parma, according to Bartsch and Zani, about 1520. He studied under Giulio Romano, and afterwards visited Rome, where he entered the school of Marc' Antonio Raimondi. He made rapid progress, and was invited by the Grand Duke Cosmo I. to Florence, where he engraved several plates after Michael Angelo, also the portraits of Henry II. of France, Giovanni de' Medici and his son, Bembo, Ariosto, &c. From Florence, Vico went to Venice and Ferrara. On returning to Parma in 1554, he engraved and published the medals of gold, silver, and bronze, of the Twelve Cæsars, with explanations. In 1555, he published at Venice his Discorsi sopra le Medaglie, which was reprinted at Venice in 1558, at Paris in 1619, at Parma in 1691. Vico is esteemed as the first who wrote in Italy upon the science of Numismatics, or at least the first who attempted to reduce it to rules. His last work, Imagine delle donne Auguste, appeared at Venice in 1557; and a work in folio by him was published at Rome without a date, containing a number of plates after ancient gems. Vico was of a very ardent disposition, and although perfectly acquainted with design, his plates do not equal those of Raimondi, either in correctness of outline or beauty of finish. They are, however, held in considerable estimation. He is said to have executed some wooden cuts, among which is mentioned one of Charles V., Emperor of Germany, which evinces great ability, both in design and execution; but Bartsch and Zani are decidedly of opinion that he never engraved on wood. Bartsch describes about 500 prints by Vico, generally marked with his name in full, or with the initials Æ. V., sometimes upon a tablet, and sometimes without it. Among them are the following. He probably died about 1570.

PORTRAITS.

VICOLUNGO, DI VERCELLI, a painter born at Vercelli, who flourished there in the first part of the 17th century. He was an imitator of Bernardino Lanini. There are some of his works in his native city, which, according to Lanzi, have little to recommend them except the coloring.

VICTOR, or FICTOOR, JAN, a Dutch painter, supposed to have been born about 1600, and died about 1670. All that is known of him is that he painted subjects taken from the Old Testament, so much in the style of Rembrandt, that they have frequently been mistaken for the works of that master. Stanley says that there are pictures in the rich collections of England, considered the genuine productions of Rembrandt, which really owe their paternity to Jan Victor. His name is variously written, Victor, and Fictoor, and one of his pictures in the Louvre, is signed Jan Fictoor, 1650. Some say he was a pupil of Rubens, and others of Rembrandt. There were several other artists of this name who flourished about the middle, or last half of the 17th century, probably the sons of Jan Fictoor. F. Fictoor, is said to have painted familiar subjects; Jacob, animals, and Lodovick, still-life. There are a variety of subjects signed with their names, such as village sports, rural occupations, travelers refreshing at inns, fish-markets, fruit-stalls, dead poultry and game, landscapes and animals, with objects of still-life, &c.

VICTORIA, VICENTE, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1658. He went young to Rome, where he entered the school of Carlo Maratti, and distinguished himself so much that he was taken into the service of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who placed his portrait in the Florentine gallery. He is said to have painted some works for the churches and convents of his native city, which were doubtless executed in Italy, as he appears to have passed most of his life in that country. In his style, he emulated Maratti. He was also an engraver, and executed a great many etchings and engravings in a neat style. He died at Rome in 1712.

VIDAL, DIEGO, called the ELDER, a Spanish painter, born at Valmaseda in 1583. According to Bermudez, he studied at Rome, and was a reputable artist. He commends two of his pictures in the cathedral of Seville, of which he was a prebendary, representing a naked Christ, and the Virgin with the Infant in her arms. Pacheco also speaks of his drawings in terms of eulogy. He died at Seville in 1615.

VIDAL DE LIENDO, DIEGO, called the YOUNGER, was the nephew of the preceding, born at Valmaseda in 1602. Like him, he studied theology and painting at Rome, and was a canon of the cathedral of Seville. There are some of his works in the sacristy of the cathedral of Valencia, which evince considerable skill. He died at Seville in 1648.

VIDAL, DIONISIO, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia about 1670. He studied under Antonio Palomino, and assisted him in some of his works in different cities. On his return to Valencia, he was employed to paint the ceiling of the church of St. Nicolas, from the designs of Palomino. He also executed some works of his own composition in fresco, for various churches, some of which, according to Bermudez, have perished, and others are of little account. He died at Tortosa, while painting the chapel of the Virgin of the Girdle, at what time is not recorded.

VIDAL, GERALD, a French engraver, born at Toulouse in 1742. He settled at Paris, where he engraved a variety of plates after the modern French masters, among which are Jupiter and Io, Venus and Adonis, Jupiter and Antiope, Rinaldo and Armida, after Ch. Monnet; and Paris and Helen, after David.

VIDAL, JOSÉ, a Spanish painter of battle-pieces and familiar subjects, who flourished at Valencia about the middle of the 17th century. He was a disciple of Esteban March, whose free, vigorous and effective style he successfully followed. He had a son also named José, whom he instructed in the art, but he did not equal his father.

VIDAL, L., a Dutch painter, of whom nothing is known except by his works. He painted fruit, flowers, dead birds, and other objects of still life. His manner of composition resembles that of the Elder van Os, though he appears to have been an earlier painter. His drawing is very accurate, his penciling delicate, and his pictures are highly finished, though his tone of coloring is sometimes too low for effect. The dew-drops on his leaves are as transparent as those of van Huysum, and his bird's nests with eggs almost equal him.

VIEHL, PIERRE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1755. He studied under B. L. Prevost, and executed some plates after the French and Dutch masters, in the clear, neat, finished style of his master; among them are a pair of landscapes, after Ruysdael, the Judgment of Paris, after Rotterdammer, and the Bath of Diana, after Mettai.

VIÉLL, PIERRE LE, an eminent French painter on glass, born at Paris in 1708. He was the son and scholar of Guillaume le V., a reputable artist in this branch. In 1734 he executed several excellent works for the church of S. Etienne du Mont, at Paris; and afterwards restored the glass paintings in the Cathedral of Notre Dame. Among his other productions are the paintings in the church of S. Victor. Le Vieil employed fifteen years in collecting materials for a work relative to the history and practice of glass painting, entitled, Traité historique et pratique de la peinture sur verre. He also wrote several other works of a similar nature, and a treatise on the art of Mosaic, entitled, Essai sur la peinture en mosaïque. Paris, 1768. He died in 1772.

VIEIRA, FRANCISCO, a Portuguese painter, born at Lisbon in 1699. When a boy he went to Rome, in the suite of the Marquis of Abrantes, where he entered the school of Trevisani, and improved himself by copying the works of Annibale Caracci in the Farnesian Gallery. After a residence of seven years at Rome, and gaining the first prize in the Academy of St. Luke, he returned to Lisbon, when only 16 years old, where, according to Count Raczynski, he astonished the people, by several youthful performances, the most remarkable of which was an elopement with a beautiful young lady of rank, whose heart he had won, but whose cruel parents had forbidden the bans. The lovers first fled to Spain, and thence to Italy, where they passed several years, during which time Vieira greatly improved himself by the constant exercise of his pencil. At length he was invited back to Portugal by the king, and during a residence of forty years at Lisbon, he executed a great many admirable works for the royal palace, the churches and convents of that city. In 1744 he entered the religious order of San Santiago; in 1755, on the death of his wife, he relinquished the pencil and retired to spend the rest of his days in pious meditation. It is said that many of his best works were destroyed in the great earthquake at Lisbon in 1755; no great loss, if any opinion of his merits can be formed from the bombastic account of his biographer. He died in 1783.

VIEIRA, FRANCISCO, the YOUNGER, was the son of the preceding, born at Lisbon. He probably was instructed by his father; he went to Italy, and thence proceeded to England, where he exhibited in the Royal Academy, in the years 1798 and 1799. During his residence in England, he lived with Bartolozzi, who is said to have instructed him in engraving. He married and returned to Lisbon, where he died in 1805.

VIEL, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, a French architect, was born at Paris in 1745. After completing his studies at the College of Beauvais, he entered the school of Chalgrin, to acquire a knowledge of architecture. The first work that brought his name before the public, was a project for a monument, reviving in a superb colonnade the pomp of Greek and Roman architecture, to be erected to Natural History. During a long career, he erected many works, among which were the Bicêtre; the grand amphitheatre of the Hotel Dieu; and the Mont de Piété, with an imposing façade of beautiful proportions. Viel held the office of architect to the hospitals of Paris, for a period of forty years, and also wrote various estimable dissertations on the art. He died in 1819.

VIEN, JOSEPH MARIE, one of the most eminent French painters of the 18th century, and the regenerator of art in France, was born at Montpellier, June 18, 1716. Being very sickly in youth, his parents endeavored to lead him to other pursuits, but his enthusiastic devotion to art overcame all obstacles, and he studied painting under several masters, among whom were A. Rivalz of Toulouse, and finally C. Natoire at Paris, whither he repaired in 1740. In 1743 he competed successfully for the grand prize of the Royal Academy, by his picture of the Plague of the Israelites in the time of David. In 1744 he departed for Rome, and passed several years in designing from the antique and the best masters of the Roman school. Besides numerous studies, he painted there many excellent pictures, including several altar-pieces of great merit, as the Slaughter of the Innocents, and the only two pictures by him now in the Louvre, a Sleeping Hermit, and St. Germain and St. Vincent receiving the Crown of Glory from the hands of an Angel.

Vien returned to Paris in 1750, and was chosen a member of the Academy in 1754, when he presented a picture of Dædalus attaching his wings. He painted a large number of works at Paris, many of them compositions of great excellence, and indicating a decided revival in the French school of painting, from the insipid and puerile state to which it had been reduced by Vanloo and Boucher. It was his object to restore the study of the antique, and of nature as represented in the works of the best Italian masters, and he succeeded to a considerable extent in both respects. His preference for the antique was carried to the extreme by his pupils Vincent and David. His pictures approach the style and artistic excellence of the scholars of the Caracci, although for some time they were much maligned by the scholars of Boucher and Vanloo, among whom was his former instructor Natoire. They pronounced Vien's picture of St. Denis preaching to the Gauls, (one of his best works,) inferior to Doyen's picture representing the tradition of St. Genevieve arresting the Conflagration of Paris; both of which are now placed in the church of St. Roch. A few years after, however, Vien was justified by his cotemporaries, and his reputation rose to a great height. His works are very numerous, considering that many of them are of large proportions. In 1775, after the completion of his picture of St. Denis, which was exhibited at the Louvre the previous year, he was decorated with the order of St. Michael, and was appointed director of the French Academy at Rome, where he resided from that time until 1781, and was meanwhile elected a member of the Academy of St. Luke. After returning to Paris, he was chosen one of the rectors and director of the Royal Academy, and was finally appointed principal painter to the king in 1789. At the Revolution, he of course lost this last post, but at the organization of the French Institute, he was chosen one of the original members. Napoleon also created him a member of the Senate, a count of the Empire, and a commander of the Legion of Honor. He died at Paris, March 27th, 1809, having nearly completed his ninety-third year; and was buried in the Pantheon.

Vien's subjects are chiefly taken from the Scriptures, from ancient and modern history, and from Greek mythology. Among the most celebrated are, Julius Cæsar contemplating the Statue of Alexander at Cadiz, and regretting that he was still unknown at an age when Alexander was already crowned with glory; the Consecration of the Equestrian Statue of Louis XV.; Marcus Aurelius causing Provisions to be distributed among the People; St. Louis vesting the Regency of the Kingdom in his Queen, Blanche of Navarre; St. Jerome; the Embarkation of St. Martha; Christ breaking Bread; the Resurrection of Lazarus; the Virgin attended by Angels; St. Gregory; Briseis in the Tent of Achilles; the Parting of Hector and Andromache; Hector exhorting Paris to go out to Battle; Venus wounded by Diomed; Æneas pursuing Helen during the burning of Troy; Andromache showing the Arms of Hector to her Son; Mars forcing himself from the Arms of Venus; Cupid and Psyche; Sappho playing on her Lyre; Proserpine adoring the Statue of Ceres; Cupid flying from Slavery; and a Young Greek Girl comparing her Bosom with a Rose-bud. There are also many drawings by Vien, some in series, as the Sports of Nymphs and Cupids, in 20 pieces; and the Union of Cupid and Hymen, in 36 pieces. He executed a few etchings, among which are a set from a series of de Troy's designs of the Adventures of Lot and his Daughters; the same after his own designs; five Bacchanalian subjects; and 32 pieces representing a Fête or Masquerade given by Vien and other students of the French Academy at Rome, to the Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, in 1748. It is entitled, "Caravane du Sultan à la Mecque, Mascarade Turque donnée à Rome par Messieurs les Pensionnaires de l'Academie de France et leurs Amis, au Carnaval de l'Année 1748." Jos. Vien, inv. et. sc.

VIEN, MADAME, was the wife and pupil of the preceding artist. Her maiden name was Marie Reoul. She painted flowers, birds, and still-life, with distinguished reputation, and was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. She died in 1805, aged 77.

VIEN, JOSEPH MARIE, the son of the preceding artists, was born at Paris in 1761. He was a distinguished portrait painter, but practiced only as an amateur. He exhibited several pictures at the Louvre until within a few years.

VIENOT, NICOLAS, a French engraver, who flourished about 1630. He was probably a pupil of Paul Pontius, and he imitated his style with considerable success, and copied some of his portraits after Rubens, on a small scale. He also engraved some landscapes after John Both, Pellerin, and other masters. There was another engraver of this name, who flourished about 1680.

VIEUX, RENAUD LE, a French historical painter, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He visited Rome for improvement, and on returning to France, produced several pictures of considerable merit. His works are distinguished for correctness of design, and truth and brilliancy of coloring, particularly in the carnations. He painted several pictures for the church des Penitents at Avignon, of subjects from the history of St. John the Baptist; two of which were taken to Paris in 1793; two are in the Gallery at Nismes; and the rest are at Avignon.

VIGÉE, MARIE LOUISE ELIZABETH. See LEBRUN.

VIGHI. See VICO.

VIGNALI, JACOPO, a painter born at Florence in 1592. He was a disciple of Matteo Rosselli. Lanzi says, "his style has some resemblance to that of Guercino, but less in the forms than in the dark shadows and the grounds. He is among those scholars of Rosselli, who are seldom mentioned, though he painted more than any of the rest for the Prince and the state; he is often weak, especially in attitudes; often, however, he appears praiseworthy, as in his two pictures at S. Simone, and in the S. Liborio. He is most conspicuous in his frescos, as seen in the chapel of the Buonarroti. He painted good historical pictures in the palaces of many of the nobility, and he even boasts noble pupils, none of whom did so much honor to his memory as Carlo Dolci." He died at Florence in 1664.

VIGNERIO, JACOPO, a Sicilian painter, who, according to Hackert, flourished at Messina about the middle of the 16th century. He studied under Polidoro da Caravaggio, whose style he followed. There is an excellent picture by him of Christ bearing his Cross in S. Maria della Scala, dated 1552.

VIGNOLA, GIROLAMO DA, a painter of Modena, who flourished in the first half of the 16th century. Lanzi conjectures that he was a pupil of Pellegrino da Modena; at all events, he was a professed follower of the style of Raffaele. Some of his frescos still remain in the church S. Piero, in his native city.

VIGNOLA, GIACOMO. See BAROZZI.

VIGNON, CLAUDE, a French painter and engraver, was born at Tours in 1590, and died in 1670. He visited Italy for improvement, and studied there several years, following the style of Caravaggio with considerable success, although equally ignoble in the selection of his forms and lacking his excellence of coloring. Dunesnil mentions twenty-seven spirited and masterly etchings by him, among which are, St. John in the Desert; thirteen plates from the life of Christ; the Martyrdom of St. Andrew; Philip baptizing the Eunuch; and the Coronation of the Virgin.

VIGNON, PHILIPPE, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1634, and died in 1701. He was instructed in the art by his father, and painted history with reputation.

VIGNON, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, was the second son of Claude V., born at Paris in 1635, and died in 1703. He was also instructed by his father and confined himself to history with considerable success.

VIGRI, CATERINA. a paintress born at Bologna in 1413, and died in 1463. Her father was a painter of little note and a native of Ferrara, and probably instructed her in the art. She was principally employed in illuminating missals and in painting miniatures. She was a nun, and from the sanctity of her life was called Santa Caterina da Bologna. She is also sometimes called Beata Caterina Vigri.

VILA, SENEN, a Spanish painter, born, according to Palomino, at Valencia, and a disciple of Esteban March. He resided chiefly at Murcia, where he executed many works for the churches, convents, and public edifices, which are more remarkable for correctness of design and great expression in the heads, than for beauty of coloring. He died in 1708.

VILA, LORENZO, was the son and scholar of the preceding: born at Murcia in 1682. He painted history in the style of his father, and gained considerable reputation by several works which he executed for the churches, when he became an ecclesiastic. He died in 1713.

VILADOMAT, DON ANTONIO, a Spanish painter, born at Barcelona in 1678, and died in 1755. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but at the age of twenty-one he had made such progress that he was employed to paint a series of pictures from the life of St. Bruno, for the monastery of the Carthusians, at Monte Allegri. He afterwards painted a similar set from the life of St. Francis for the monastery of the Franciscans, at Barcelona. He painted many other works for the churches and public edifices of Barcelona. He also painted landscapes, battle-pieces, and portraits with equal success. Mengs regarded Viladomat as the principal Spanish painter of his day, and his works are commended by several excellent critics.

VILADOMAT, DON JOSÉ, was the son and scholar of the preceding. He was a reputable painter, though far inferior to his father. There are some of his works in the churches and convents at Barcelona.

VILLACIS, DON NICOLAS DE, a Spanish painter, born of a noble family of Murcia. After receiving some instruction in design, in his native city, he was sent to Madrid, and placed under the instruction of Don Diego Velasquez. He afterwards went to Italy for improvement, and on his return to Murcia, executed some considerable works for the churches and convents, which are highly commended by Palomino. The chief of these are a series of pictures of the life of San Blas in the convent of la Santissima Trinidad de Calzados, and the Martyrdom of St. Lorenzo in the church of the Dominicans. Being a nobleman and rich, he painted only for amusement; his works are therefore very rare. His correspondence with Velasquez is said to be still preserved. He died in 1690.

VILLAFRANCA, MALAGON, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter and engraver, whose prints date from about 1640 to 1676. He was born at Alcolea in La Mancha, and studied at Madrid under Vincenzio Carducci. Little is known of him as a painter, except that he was employed to execute some pictures for the church of San Felipe el Real, at Madrid. He chiefly devoted himself to engraving, and executed a great number of vignettes, title-pages, portraits, and other book-plates. He engraved the illustrative plates for the Books of Official Rules of the Orders of Santiago, Calatrava, and Alcantara, which are embellished with portraits of Philip IV. He was appointed engraver in ordinary to the King, with a pension of 100 ducats. His last print is a portrait of Calderon, dated 1676.

VILLAIN, GERARD RENARD, a French engraver, who flourished about 1760, and executed a few portraits.

VILLAMENA, FRANCESCO, an eminent Italian designer and engraver, born at Assisi, about 1566.

According to Baglioni, he went to Rome in the Pontificate of Sixtus V., where he applied himself to designing from the antique, and the works of the great masters, with great assiduity. He is supposed to have been a fellow-student with Agostino Caracci, under Cornelius Cort, whose style he emulated. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, in a bold, open and masterly style, and he handled the burin with uncommon facility. The effect of his prints is more clear than powerful, from the lights being too equally diffused over the whole subject. This defect, however, discernible in most of the productions of his time, is compensated in a great measure, by the correctness of the drawing and the admirable expression of the heads. His prints are numerous, and are sometimes marked with the above monogram, sometimes with his initials, F. V. F., and occasionally with his name in full. He died about 1626. The following are his principal works.

VILLAVICENCIO, DON PEDRO NUNEZ. See NUNEZ.

VILLEGAS MARMOLEJO, PEDRO DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1520. It is not known under whom he studied, but it is supposed that he received his education in Italy. There is much discrepancy as to his merits among the Spanish writers. He executed a few works for the churches and public edifices of Seville, which, according to Bermudez, partake of the manner of Pedro Campana, and his best works are equal to the finest productions of that master. His Visitation of the Virgin Mary to St. Elizabeth, in the cathedral, has often been attributed to Campana. Others however, do not speak of him in terms of such high commendation. He died in 1597.

VILLEGUAIN, ETIENNE, a French painter, born at Ferrière in 1599, and died at Paris in 1668. Little is known of him. He is said to have painted history and portraits with considerable reputation. His name is also written Villeguin and Villequin.

VILLEREY, ANTOINE CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1768. He studied under Antoine Louis Romanet. He engraved part of the plates for the Musée Filhol; twenty-six plates for the Galerie de St. Bruno, after le Sueur; a great part of the vignettes for the edition of Voltaire published by Renouard, and some single plates after the French masters. His plates are executed with the graver in a neat, finished style. He was living in 1831.

VILLOLDO, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, who, according to Bermudez, practiced his profession with great credit at Toledo, in the first part of the 16th century. In 1508, he was employed by the chapter of the cathedral, to paint several pictures for the Muzarabic chapel, which, with the assistance of Juan de Borgona and Amberes, he finished in 1510. Nothing more is heard of him till 1547, when he was employed by the bishop of Plasencia to adorn a chapel which he had rebuilt in the parish of St. Andrew at Madrid, with a series of forty-five pictures of sacred history, from the fall of Adam to the death of Christ. These works are commended by Bermudez for correctness of design, and for "purity in the antique style." He finished the chapel in 1548, "a proof of the fecundity of his imagination, and the extraordinary rapidity of his pencil." He is supposed to have died about 1551.

VIMERCATI, CARLO, a painter born at Milan in 1660. Some say his family name was Donelli; by others he is called Il Vimercati. He studied under Ercole Procaccini; but Lanzi says, "he owed his success to the most pertinacious study of the works of Daniello Crespi at the Certosa; he exhibited few of his pictures in public at Milan; he painted more at Codogno, and in his best manner, as well as others in a new one, in which he was greatly inferior." He died in 1715.

VINCENT, HUBERT, a French engraver who went to Rome, where he flourished about 1690. He engraved some plates after Correggio, Paul Veronese, and other masters, which are indifferently executed.

VINCI, GAUDENZIO. This painter, according to a MS. cited by Lanzi, was a native of Novara, in Piedmont. There is an altar-piece by him at Arona, executed entirely in the manner of Lionardo da Vinci, signed Gaudenzio Vinci, 1511, which Lanzi says is pronounced by all an astonishing performance. This is all that is known of him with any certainty, though some say he was a pupil of Pietro Perugino, and several works partaking of the style of that master, are attributed to him. It seems very probable that he is the same as Gaudenzio Ferrari, which see.

VINCI, LIONARDO DA. This illustrious artist, denominated by Lanzi, "the Father of Modern Painting," was also an eminent sculptor, architect, and engineer, the natural son of Pietro da Vinci, notary to the Florentine Republic. Vasari and his annotators, place his birth in 1445; but Durazzini, in his Panegyrics on Illustrious Tuscans, satisfactorily proves that he was born in Lower Valdarno, at the castle of Vinci, in 1452. At an early age he evinced remarkably quick abilities for everything he turned his attention to, but more particularly for arithmetic, music and drawing. His drawings appeared something wonderful to his father, who showed them to Andrea Verocchio, and that celebrated artist, greatly surprised at seeing productions of such merit from an uninstructed hand, willingly took Lionardo as a pupil. He was soon much more astonished when he perceived the rapid progress his pupil made; he felt his own inferiority, and when Lionardo painted an angel in a picture of the Baptism of Christ, in S. Salvi at Vallombrosa, so much superior to the other figures that it rendered the inferiority of Verocchio apparent to all, he immediately relinquished the pencil for ever. This picture is now in the Academy at Florence. The first original work by Lionardo, mentioned by Vasari, was the so-called Rotella del Fico, a round board of a fig-tree, upon which his father requested him to paint something for one of his tenants. Lionardo, wishing to astonish his father, determined to execute something extraordinary, that should produce the effect of the head of Medusa; and having prepared the rotella and covered it with plaster, he collected almost every kind of reptile, and composed from them a monster of most horrible appearance; it seemed alive, its eyes flashed fire, and it appeared to breathe destruction from its open mouth. The picture produced the desired effect upon his father, who thought it so wonderful that he carried it immediately to a picture-dealer in Florence, sold it for a hundred ducats, and purchased for a trifle an ordinary piece for his tenant. The talents of Lionardo soon attracted public attention at Florence. He was endowed by nature with a genius uncommonly elevated and penetrating, eager after discovery, and diligent in the pursuit, not only in what related to sculpture and architecture, but in mathematics, mechanics, hydrostatics, music, poetry, botany, astronomy, and also in the accomplishments of horsemanship, fencing, and dancing. Unlike most men of versatile talent, he was so perfect in all these, that when he performed any one, the beholders were ready to imagine that it must have been his sole study. To such vigor of intellect he joined an elegance of features and of manners, that graced the virtues of his mind; he was affable with strangers, with citizens, with private individuals, and with princes. This extraordinary combination of qualities in a single man, soon spread his fame over all Italy.

Lanzi divides Lionardo's life into four periods, the first of which includes the time he remained at Florence, until 1494. He says, "Lionardo retained traces of his early education through his whole life. Like Verocchio, he designed more readily than he painted; he assiduously cultivated mathematics; in his design and in his countenances he prized elegance and vivacity of expression, more than dignity and fulness of contour; he was very careful in drawing his horses, and in representing the skirmishes of soldiers; and was more solicitous to improve the art than to multiply his pictures. By his knowledge of sculpture, he gave that perfect relief and roundness, in which painting was then wanting; he imparted to it symmetry, grace, and spirit, and these and his other merits, gave him the title of the Father of Modern Painting, though some of his works participate in the meanness of the old school. He had two styles, the one abounding in shadow, which gives admirable brilliancy to the contrasting lights; the other more quiet, and managed by means of middle tints. In each style, the grace of his design, the expression of the affections, and the delicacy of his pencil, are unrivalled. Everything is lively, the foreground, the landscape, the adventitious ornaments of necklaces, flowers, and architecture; but this gaiety is more apparent in the heads. In this he apparently repeats the same idea, and gives them a smile which delights the mind of a spectator. To this first period of Lionardo's life may be referred the Medusa, and the few pictures mentioned by Vasari; others also, less powerful in the shadows, and less diversified in the folds of the drapery, present heads more delicate than select, apparently derived from the school of Verocchio. Such is the Magdalen in the Florentine Gallery, and that of the Aldobrandini palace at Rome; some Madonnas and Holy Families in the Giustiniani and Borghese Galleries; and some heads of the Redeemer and the Baptist in various places, although the multitude of his imitators must render all decision on their originality ambiguous. Of a different class, and without a doubt by his hand, is the picture of a Child playing on an ornamented bed, richly dressed and adorned with necklaces, which is in the apartment of the Gonfalonière at Bologna." Lionardo also executed several excellent works in sculpture, among which are the statue of St. Tommaso, in Or San Michele at Florence, the Horse, in the church of Sts. Giovanni and Paolo, at Venice, and the superior models for the three statues cast in bronze by Rustici, for S. Giovanni at Florence.

The second period of Lionardo's life commences with his residence at Milan. About 1490, he presented a memorial to the duke Lodovico Sforza, in which he set forth at considerable length his abilities in painting, sculpture, architecture, and engineering. Accordingly, in 1494, the Duke invited him to Milan, and appointed him director of the Academy of Painting and Architecture, which he had recently revived with additional splendor and encouragement. During his residence there, he painted but little, with the exception of his celebrated picture of the Last Supper, a description of which will be found in the latter part of this article. As director of the Academy, he banished all the dry, Gothic principles established by his predecessor, Michelino, and introduced the beautiful simplicity and purity of the Grecian and Roman style. Lanzi says that in this capacity, "he left a degree of refinement at Milan, so productive of illustrious pupils that this period may be reckoned as the most glorious era of his life." The Duke engaged Lionardo in the stupendous project of conducting the waters of the Adda, from Mortesana, through the Valteline, and the valley of the Chiavenna, to the walls of Milan, a distance of nearly two hundred miles. Sensible of the greatness of this undertaking, Lionardo applied himself more closely to those branches of philosophy and mathematics which are most adapted to mechanics, and he finally accomplished this immense work, greatly to the astonishment and admiration of all Italy. He executed the model for a colossal bronze equestrian statue of the Duke's father, Francesco Sforza, and would have completed it, but the Duke's affairs were becoming greatly embarrassed, so that the necessary metal, (200,000 lbs.), was not furnished. In 1500, Lodovico Sforza was overthrown in battle by the French, made prisoner, and conducted to France, where he soon after died in the castle of Loches. The Academy was suppressed, the professors dispersed, and Lionardo, after losing all, was obliged to quit the city and take refuge in Florence.

The third period of Lionardo's life commences at the time of his return to Florence, about 1500. He was well received by Pietro Soderini the Gonfalonière, who had him enrolled among the artists employed by government, and settled upon him a pension. In 1502, Cesare Borgia, captain-general of the Pope's army, appointed him his chief architect and engineer, and Lionardo visited many parts of the Roman states in his official capacity. In 1503, however, after the death of Pope Alexander VI., he was again at Florence, and was employed by Soderini to paint one side of the Council-hall of the Palazzo Vecchio, while Michael Angelo, then in his twenty-ninth year, and already rising into eminence, was fixed upon as the artist to paint the other side. Lionardo selected the battle in which the Milanese general, Niccolo Piccinino, was defeated by the Florentines at Anghiari, near Borgo San Sepolcro. This composition, of which he only made the cartoon of a part, was called the Battle of the Standard; it represents a group of horsemen contending for a standard, with various accessories. Vasari praises the beauty and anatomical correctness of the horses, and the costumes of the soldiers. Lanzi says it was never executed, after his failing in an attempt to paint it in a new method upon the wall, but Lucini afterwards represented it in a painting which is in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, esteemed one of the finest works in that collection. The fame of this contest between the two great artists, caused great excitement, and induced Raffaello, who had recently quitted the school of Perugino, to visit Florence. The grace and delicacy of Lionardo's style, compared with the dry and Gothic manner of Perugino, excited the admiration of the young painter, and inspired him with a more modern taste. In 1507, Lionardo again visited Milan, and painted in that year, in an apartment of the palace of the Melzi at Vaprio, a large Madonna and Child, which in part is still extant.

During this period of Lionardo's life, having attained his highest skill, and mostly unoccupied with other pursuits, he painted in his best manner. "Such," says Lanzi, "is the specimen that was preserved at Mantua, but which was stolen, and after many vicissitudes, was sold for a high price to the court of Russia; the subject is a Holy Family, and in the background is a woman of beautiful and majestic countenance, in an upright position. It bears the cipher of Lionardo, consisting of a D interlaced with an L and a V. His own portrait, in the Ducal gallery at Florence, surpasses every other in that room for energy of expression; also another head in a different cabinet, called a portrait of Raffaele; the half-length figure of a young nun, so much commended by Bottari, and which he points out as one of the greatest treasures in the splendid mansion of Marchese Niccolini. In the same rank we may include the much admired specimens in the possession of some of the noble families of Rome; as the picture of Christ disputing in the Temple, and the supposed portrait of Queen Giovanna, ornamented with fine architecture, in the Doria Palace; the Vanity and Modesty in the Barberini Palace, the tints of which no pencil has been able to imitate; the Madonna of the Albani Palace, that appears to be requesting the lily which the infant Jesus holds in his hand, drawing back as if unwilling to part with it—a picture of exquisite grace, and preferred by Mengs to every other painting contained in that fine collection.” Lionardo’s cartoon of St. Anna, for the church of the Servi at Florence, is also esteemed among his most remarkable productions; and also his celebrated portrait of Mona Lisa, the wife of Francesco Giocondo, which occupied him four years. It was purchased by Francis I. for 4000 gold crowns, and is now in the Louvre at Paris. Lionardo visited Milan about 1512, and painted two portraits of the young duke Maximilian, the son of Lodovico, his former patron. In 1514 he quitted it again with several of his companions, and returned to Florence. The patronage extended to the arts by Pope Leo X., then recently elevated to the papal throne, inclined him to visit Rome, and accordingly he went thither in that year, in the train of the Duke Giuliano de Medici, by whom he was introduced to the Pope, who soon after signified his intention of employing Lionardo’s pencil. Upon this, the painter began to distil his oils and prepare his varnishes, which the Pope seeing, he exclaimed with surprise, that “nothing could be expected of a painter who thought of finishing his works before he had begun them.” This want of courtesy in the Pope offended Lionardo, and according to Vasari, was the reason why he immediately quitted Rome in disgust. It is probable, however, that the talents and fame of Buonarrotti and Raffaele had more to do with producing the dissatisfaction of this great painter, who was then declining into the vale of years.

Lionardo’s final departure from Rome marks his relinquishment of the art of painting, and the commencement of the fourth period of his life. He set out for Pavia at the invitation of Francis I. of France, who received him with the greatest kindness, and took him into his service, with a salary of 700 crowns annually. Lionardo accompanied him to Bologna, where he went to meet Leo X., and afterwards, in the beginning of 1516, he accompanied him to Florence. The health of this great painter was so much enfeebled after leaving Italy, that he executed little or nothing more. The king could not prevail upon him even to color his cartoon of St. Anna, which he had brought with him; nor did he seem disposed to commence any new work which would require the exertion of his energies. During an indisposition of five years, he continued to receive marks of that monarch’s esteem. His health gradually grew worse, and he finally expired at Fontainebleau on the 2d of May, 1519, aged sixty-seven. Vasari relates that he died in the arms of Francis I., who happened to be visiting him at his chamber.

This great artist is esteemed the most eminent Italian of the 15th century. Says Hallam, “the discoveries which made Galileo and Kepler, Maestlin, Maurolicus, Castelli, and other names illustrious, the system of Copernicus, the very theories of recent geologists, are anticipated by Lionardo da Vinci, within the compass of a very few pages, not perhaps in the most precise language, or on the most conclusive reasoning, but so as to strike us with something like the awe of preternatural knowledge. In an age of so much dogmatism, he first laid down the grand principle of Bacon, that experiment and observation must be the guides to just theory in the investigation of nature.” His scientific knowledge proved the means of conferring incalculable benefits upon the art of painting, one of the most important of which was the invention of the chiaro-scuro. His intimate acquaintance with mathematical studies enabled him to develop greatly the knowledge of optics, and no one was better acquainted with the nature of aerial perspective, which became a distinctive and hereditary characteristic of his school. Lanzi says, “being extremely well versed in poetry and history, it was through him that the Milanese school became one of the most accurate and observing in regard to antiquity and to costume. Mengs has noticed that no artist could surpass Vinci in the grand effect of his chiaro-scuro. He instructed his pupils to make as cautious a use of light as of a gem, not lavishing it too freely, but reserving it always for the best place. And hence we find in his, and in the best of his disciples’ paintings, that fine relief, owing to which the pictures, and in particular the countenances, seem as if starting from the canvass.”

“For a long period before the time of Lionardo da Vinci, the art had become gradually more refined, and considered its objects more minutely; in which Botticelli, Mantegna, and others had acquired great reputation. As minuteness, however, is opposed to sublimity, it ill accorded with that elevation in which the supreme merit of the art would seem to consist. In my opinion, Lionardo succeeded in uniting these two opposite qualities, before any other artist. In subjects which he undertook fully to complete, he was not satisfied with only perfecting the heads, counterfeiting the shining of the eyes, the pores of the skin, the roots of the hair, and even the beating of the arteries; he likewise portrayed each separate garment and every accessory with minuteness.—Thus, in his landscapes also, there was not a single herb, or leaf of a tree, which he had not taken like a portrait, from the select face of nature; and to his very leaves he gave a peculiar air, and fold, and position, best adapted to represent them rustling in the wind. While he bestowed his attention in this manner on the minutiae, he at the same time, as is observed by Mengs, led the way to a more enlarged and dignified style; entered into the most abstruse inquiries as to the source and nature of expression, the most philosophical and elevated branch of the art; and smoothed the way, if I may be permitted to say so, for the appearance of Raffaele. No one could be more curious in his researches, more intent upon observing, or more prompt in catching the motions of the passions, as exhibited either in the features or the actions. He frequented places of public assembly, and all places in which man gave free play to his active powers; and there, in a small book always ready at hand, he drew the attitudes which he selected; and these designs he preserved that he might apply them, with expressions more or less powerful, according to the occasion, and the degree of expression he wished to introduce. For it was his custom, in the same manner as he gradually strengthened his shadows until he reached the highest degree, so also in the composition of his figures, to proceed in heightening them until he attained the perfection of passion and of motion. The same kind of gradation he observed in regard to elegance, of which he was perhaps the earliest admirer; since previous artists appeared unable to distinguish grace from beauty, and still more so to adapt it to pleasing subjects in such a way as to rise from the less to the more attractive points, as was practiced by Lionardo. He even adhered to the same rule in his burlesques, always throwing an air of greater ridicule over one than another, insomuch that he was heard to say, that they ought to be carried to such a height, if possible, as even to make a dead man laugh. The characteristic, therefore, of this incomparable artist, consists of a refinement of taste, of which no equal example, either preceding or following him, is to be found; if indeed we may not admit that of Protogenes, who wrought seven years upon the picture of Jalysus and his Dog. It is prudent counsel that teaches us to aspire to the best, but to rest satisfied with attaining what is good. Vinci was never pleased with his labors if he did not execute them as perfectly as he had conceived them; and being unable to reach the high point proposed with a mortal hand, he sometimes only designed his work, or conducted it only to a certain degree of perfection. But as there was no limit to the discovery of fresh beauties in the work of Protogenes, so, in the opinion of Lomazzo, it happens with the perfections of Vinci's paintings, including even those which Vasari and others allude to as left imperfect. In regard to the reported imperfection of many of his works, it is certain that he left a number only half finished, but the report is most generally grounded upon his having left some portions of his pieces less perfectly finished than others; a deficiency, nevertheless, that cannot always be detected, even by the best judges. The portrait of Mona Lisa, upon which he wrought four years, and then, according to Vasari, left it imperfect, was examined by Mariette, in the collection of the King of France, and was decided to be carried to so high a degree of finish that it was impossible to surpass it. Lomazzo has remarked that, excepting three or four, he left all the rest of his heads imperfect. But imperfections and faults like his would have been accounted distinguishing qualities in almost any other artist."

"Even his grand Supper has been stated in history as an imperfect production, although at the same time all history is agreed in celebrating it as one of the most beautiful paintings that ever proceeded from the hand of man. It was painted for the Refectory of the Dominican fathers at Milan, and may be pronounced a compendium, not only of all that Lionardo taught in his books, but also of what he embraced in his studies. He here gave expression to the exact point of time best adapted to animate his history, which is the moment when the Redeemer addresses his disciples, saying, 'One of you will betray me.' Then each of his innocent followers is seen to start as if struck with a thunderbolt; those at a distance seem to interrogate their companions, as if they think they must have mistaken what he had said; others, according to their natural disposition, appear variously affected; one of them swoons away, one stands lost in astonishment, a third rises in indignation, while the very simplicity and candor depicted upon the countenance of a fourth, seem to place him beyond the reach of suspicion. But Judas instantly draws in his countenance, and while he appears as it were, attempting to give it an air of innocence, the eye rests upon him in a moment, as the undoubted traitor. Vinci himself used to observe, that for the space of a whole year he employed his time in meditating how he could best give expression to the features of so bad a heart; and that being accustomed to frequent a place where the worst characters were known to assemble, he there met with a physiognomy to his purpose; to which he also added the features of many others. In his figures of the two saints James, presenting fine forms, most appropriate to the characters, he availed himself of the same plan, and being unable with his utmost diligence to invest that of Christ with a superior air to the rest, he left the head in an unfinished state, as we learn from Vasari, though Armenini pronounced it exquisitely complete. The rest of the picture, the table-cloth with its folds, the whole of the utensils, the table, the architecture, the distribution of the lights, the perspective of the ceiling, (which, in the tapestry of S. Pietro at Rome, is changed almost into a hanging garden), all was conducted with the most exquisite care; all was worthy of the finest pencil in the world. Had Lionardo desired to follow the practice of his age in painting in fresco, the art at this time would have been in possession of this treasure. But being always fond of attempting new methods, he painted this master-piece upon a peculiar ground, formed of distilled oils, which was the reason that it gradually detached itself from the wall. About half a century subsequent to the execution of this wonderful work, when Armenini saw it, it was already half decayed: and Scanelli, who examined it in 1642, declared that it 'was with difficulty he could discern the history as it had been.' Nothing now remains except the heads of three apostles, which may be said to be rather sketched than painted."

This great loss is in some measure compensated by several excellent copies, some of which are by Lionardo's most eminent disciples; the best are, that by Marco Uggione, at the Carthusians of Pavia; another in the Refectory of the Franciscans at Lugano, by Bernardino Luini; and one in La Pace at Milan, by Gio. Paolo Lomazzo. Fuseli, lecturing on the copy by Marco Uggione, says, "the face of the Saviour is an abyss of thought, and broods over the immense revolution in the economy of mankind, which throngs inwardly on his absorbed eye—as the Spirit creative in the beginning over the water's darksome wave—undisturbed and quiet. It could not be lost in the copy before us; how could its sublime expression escape those who saw the original? It has survived the hand of time in the study which Lionardo made in crayons, exhibited with most of the attendant heads in the British Gallery, and even in the fecble transcripts of Pietro Testa. I am not afraid of being under the necessity of retracting what I am going to advance, that neither during the splendid period immediately subsequent to Lionardo, nor in those which succeeded to our own time, has a face of the Redeemer been produced, which, I will not say equalled, but approached Lionardo's conception, and in quiet and simple features of humanity, embodied divine, or what is the same, incomprehensible and infinite powers." In 1825, Prof. Phillips examined the remains of this picture, and says, "Of the heads, there is not one untouched, and many are totally ruined. Fortunately, that of the Saviour is the most pure, being but faintly retouched; and it presents, even yet, a most perfect image of that Divine character.— Whence arose the story of its not having been finished it is now difficult to conceive, and the history itself varies among the writers who have mentioned it. But perhaps a man so scrupulous as Lionardo da Vinci, in the refinement of character and expression, and so ardent in his pursuit of them, might have expressed himself unsatisfied, where all others could only see perfection."

Lionardo wrote several works on various subjects, the principal of which is a Treatise upon Painting, published in folio at Paris in 1651, entitled, Trattato della Pittura di Lionardo da Vinci. Novamente dato in Luce; con la vita dell' istesso autore, scritta da Raffaello du Fresne, &c., Parigi, 1651, with figures designed by Nicholas Poussin. It was translated into English, and published by John Senex, London, 1721; there are also several other later editions of this work, which Count Algarotti held in such high esteem, that he thought it the only one necessary to be placed in the hands of a student of art. Besides this, Lionardo wrote five Treatises, on Hydraulics, Anatomy, Perspective, Light and Shadow, and the Anatomy of the Horse.

Lionardo left the whole of his designs, instruments, books, and manuscripts, to his friend and disciple, Francesco Melzi, who accompanied him on his last visit to France. His designs and writings were collected into thirteen volumes, which have been dispersed in various royal and noble collections. Several volumes of his MSS. are preserved in the Ambrosian Library, and Lanzi remarks that, as long as they exist, "the world must admit that he was one of the chief revivers, not only of painting, but of statics, hydrostatics, optics, and anatomy." The extracts upon which Hallam grounds the eulogium above cited, were published at Paris in 1797, by Venturi, in an essay entitled, Essai sur les ouvrages Physico-Mathematiques de Leonard da Vinci, avec des Fragmens tirés de ses Manuscrits apportés de l'Italie. The original MSS. were subsequently restored to the Ambrosian Library. One volume of his drawings has found its way into the English Royal collection, and contains a variety of heads, portraits, caricatures, single figures, horses, and animals; botany, optics, perspective, mechanics, and anatomical subjects.

It has been attempted to prove that Lionardo engraved a few prints on copper; in the British Museum are three prints attributed to him, the Bust of a young and beautiful Female, a study of the Heads of three Horses, and a Lady in a rich dress. The first two are much in the style of his drawings, and Ottley is quite confident that the former was designed and engraved by him. A print representing a species of ornament, is also mentioned, formerly in Sir Mark Sykes' collection, inscribed in Roman capitals, ACCADEMIA DI LEONARDO VINCI.

VINCK, J., a Dutch portrait and landscape painter, of whom nothing is known except by his works. His landscapes are in a mixed manner, partaking of the styles of Paul Brill and John Breughel. His portraits are only known by engravings that bear his name. He flourished in the first part of the 17th century.

D B VINCKENBOOMS, DAVID, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin in 1578. He was the son of Philip V., an obscure painter in distemper, who instructed him in the art. He painted landscapes of a small size, in the style of Roland Savery and John Breughel. These he decorated with subjects taken from the Bible, with fairs, merrymakings, rural festivals, conversations, &c., which are ingeniously composed, and designed with tolerable correctness, though his touch is dry and hard. One of his most considerable works is a picture in the hospital of the Old Men at Amsterdam, representing a crowd of people attending the drawing of a lottery by torch-light. He occasionally painted historical subjects, in which the landscape serves as the background. Such is his picture of Christ bearing his Cross, in the collection of the Elector Palatine, and another at Frankfurt, representing Christ restoring blind Bartimeus to sight. Some of his pictures are decorated with the figures of Rottenhammer. He excelled in making drawings with the pen, washed with India ink, several of which are in the British Museum, representing the story of the Prodigal Son. Some of his landscapes were engraved by N. de Bruyn and others. He also engraved some plates of landscapes from his own designs, which he usually marked with the above monogram. His name is sometimes written Viukoboon. He died at Amsterdam in 1629.

VINKELES, RENIER, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1741. He studied under J. Punt, and engraved some portraits and other subjects after the works of the Dutch masters.

VINNE, JOHN VANDER, a Dutch engraver who flourished at Haerlem about 1730. He engraved a set of twelve plates of views in the environs of Haerlem, executed in a very neat style, after Peter Bout. There was also an Isaac Vinne, who was an engraver and publisher, and flourished at Haerlem about the same time. He engraved some plates after T. Wyck.

VINNE, VINCENT LAWRENCE VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1629. He showed an early inclination for art, and had made considerable progress without any other assistance than his own genius, when he was placed under the instruction of Francis Hals, one of the ablest artists of his time. On leaving his master, he traveled through Germany, Switzerland, and France. In 1657, he returned to his native city, where he settled for life, and found abundant employment. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, and drolls, in the style of his instructor, and in each of these branches, he discovered a lively imagination, a fruitful invention, an admirable tone of coloring, a faithful imitation of nature, and an uncommon fa cility of hand. His best performances are his portraits, and some of these are accounted little inferior to those of Hals. Towards the latter part of his life, he neglected his fame, in his eagerness for gain, and accepted every commission offered him, which he dispatched with negligence and haste. He died in 1702.

VINNE, LAWRENCE VANDER, was the son of the preceding, born at Haerlem in 1658, and died in 1724; though Immerzeel says in 1729. He studied with his father, whose precepts he followed, but never rose above mediocrity. His chief merit consisted in painting flowers and plants, and he was much employed by the botanists of his time. He had two brothers, John and Isaac, who practiced the art, but they did not acquire any distinction. John studied under John van Hugtenburg, and painted landscapes and hunting-pieces. He went to England, where he resided some time. He died at Haerlem in 1721, and Isaac in 1740. There was also a John vander Vinne, an engraver, who flourished at Haerlem about 1730.

VINNE, VINCENT VANDER, was the son of John vander Vinne (probably the engraver), born at Haerlem in 1736, and died there in 1811. He first painted fruit and flower pieces, and afterwards landscapes and cattle, with considerable success.

VINI, SEBASTIANO, a painter of Verona, who settled at Pistoja in the first part of the 16th century. Lanzi says, "his reputation and his pictures did honor to the country that adopted him. He left many works both in oil and fresco, but his most extraordinary production was in the suppressed church of St. Desiderio. The façade over the great altar was storied with the Crucifixion of the Ten Thousand Martyrs, a work abounding with figures and invention."

VINSAC, CLAUDE DOMINICK, a French engraver, born at Toulouse in 1749. He engraved a few portraits, and a set of plates of ornaments for goldsmiths, neatly executed in the dotted manner.

VIOLA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Bologna, according to Lanzi and the best authorities, in 1576, though some say in 1572. He studied several years with Annibale Caracci, whose admirable manner of painting landscapes he successfully adopted. He accompanied his fellow pupil Albano to Rome, where, in conjunction with him, he was much employed in decorating the palaces of the nobility with landscape-frescos, in which Albano painted the figures. One of the works which first brought him into repute was a large landscape painted for the villa of Cardinal Montalto, in competition with Paul Brill, whose pictures were then highly esteemed. The grandeur both of style and subject of Viola's landscape, greatly excelled that of the Fleming, and gained him great reputation. Some of his finest works are in the Villa Pia, and the Villa Aldobrandini. Fresnoy, who was an able judge, considered the pictures of Viola "wonderfully fine and well colored." Lanzi says that he painted mostly in fresco, and that his portable works are rarely to be met with at Rome; "his landscapes however, were frequently introduced into the pictures of Albano, and may be recognized in that city by judges, as those of Viola, like Mola's in other pieces of Albano at Bologna." He died at Rome in 1622.

VIOLA, GIO. BATTISTA, a painter of Bergamo, of little note, who flourished in the first part of the 17th century, and should be distinguished from the preceding.

VIOLA, DOMENICO, a Neapolitan painter, who, according to Dominici, died old, in or about 1696. He was a disciple and imitator of the Cav. Mattia Preti (Calabrese). He executed some works for the churches and collections, but did not pass the bounds of mediocrity.

VIRLOYS, CHARLES FRANÇOIS ROLAND LE, a French architect and writer on the art, was born at Paris in 1716. During the period of youth, he applied himself to the study of philosophy and jurisprudence; after which he studied architecture, and made rapid progress. He successfully competed for the erection of the theatre of Metz, and constructed that edifice in 1751. His reputation extended into foreign countries, and he was appointed architect to the King of Prussia, and subsequently to the Empress Maria Theresa; but no mention is made whether he accepted either of these honors. The principal production from the pen of Virloys, is his Dictionnaire d'architecture, civile, militaire et navale, ancienne et moderne, &c., Paris, 1770, 3 vols. grand quarto, with 101 plates. The Biographie Universelle commends it as superior to the work of Aviler, but adds, that it leaves much to be desired.

VISACCI, ANTONIO, called also, IL VISACCI, a painter of Urbino, who, according to Lazzari, was a pupil of Federigo Baroccio, and flourished about 1600. His real name was Antonio Cimatori. In conjunction with the younger Viviani, Mazzi, and Urbani, he was employed to paint the arches, pictures, and other decorations, in honor of Giulia de' Medici, married to the Duke of Urbino. Lanzi says, "his forte lay in pen-drawing and in chiaro-scuro, as may be seen in his prophets, designed in a grand style, which were transferred from the cathedral to the Apostolic Palace. He did not leave many works in his native place, but among them is his fine picture of St. Monica at S. Agostino. His copies from Baroccio are to be found in various places, particularly at the cathedral of Cagli. He resided and practiced a long time at Pesaro, where he instructed several pupils."

VISCH, MATTHIAS DE, a Flemish painter, born at the village of Reningen in 1702. He studied under Joseph vander Kerkhove at Bruges; he also entered the Academy there and obtained the first prize in 1721. He went to Paris in 1723; and thence to Italy, where he resided nine years, and diligently studied the antique and the works of the great masters. On his return to Bruges, he executed several works for the churches, and opened a school of design. He distinguished himself more by his love of the art, the zeal he took in its advancement, and the instruction of youth, than by any superior talents he showed in its practice. He was a correct and able designer, and was appointed director of the Academy at Bruges. He collected materials for a history of painting in Belgium, which he gave to Descamps, who made use of them in his Lives of the Flemish Painters. He died in 1765.

VISCHER, PETER, a celebrated old German sculptor and founder, was probably born about 1460. He studied in Italy, and resided there several years. On returning to his native country, he first distinguished himself by his monument to the Archduke Ernest of Magdeburg, erected in the cathedral of that place in 1497. Vischer ultimately settled at Nuremberg, and lived in the same house with his five sons, Peter, Hermann, Hans, Paul, and Jacob, with their wives and children. His master-piece is the tomb of St. Sebald, in the church of that saint at Nuremberg, which is esteemed worthy of any time or nation. It is beautifully designed and richly ornamented: among other figures are twelve small statues, eighteen inches high, of the apostles, remarkably well drawn, and conspicuous for their fine expression. In one part of it, Vischer introduced his own portrait in his working dress. Notwithstanding he was employed with his sons upon this monument from 1506 to 1519, he received only 2402 florins for the whole work. He executed some other excellent works at Nuremberg, and died, according to Doppelmayer, in 1530.

His son Hermann Vischer studied likewise in Italy, and was scarcely inferior to his father. According to Sandrart, no prince or gentleman that visited Nuremberg, left the place without having seen and conversed with Vischer. During these visits, he received many orders, and executed numerous works, which were sent to Bohemia, Poland, and other neighboring countries. He was killed by a sledge, while going home at night with a friend, in 1540.

VISENTINI. See VICENTINI.

VISINO, IL, a Florentine painter, who, according to Lanzi, was the best scholar of Mariotto Albertinelli. Little is known of his works, as he went to Hungary, where he was much employed. He died there in the prime of life about 1512.

VISO, FRAY CRISTOBAL DEL, a Spanish painter, who died at Madrid about 1700. He resided there at that time, and held the office of commissary-general of the Indies. He was a monk of the order of San Francisco, and painted all the Saints of his order for the chapter house of the convent of S. Francisco at Cordova, which are said to display considerable ability.

VISPRE, FRANÇOIS SAVERIO, a French painter and engraver of little note, born at Paris about 1730. He engraved a few portraits in mezzotinto. He went to London about 1765, where he resided some time.

VISSCHER, CORNELIUS, a celebrated designer and engraver, born at Haerlem about 1610. He studied under Peter Soutman, but he did not follow the style of that master; he adopted one of his own, formed by a combination of the point with the graver, in which he has hardly been equalled. His drawing is correct, and his execution is clear, delicate, and admirably harmonized. His works are very numerous, and those from his own designs are the most esteemed. Basan remarks that no master can be studied by young engravers with more advantage. His plates of the portrait of Gellius Bouma, the Pancake-woman, the Rat-catcher and the Bohemian Woman, may be cited as models of perfection in his style of engraving. He was less successful in his plates of historical subjects after the Italian and Spanish masters; those in particular which he engraved after Rubens, are inferior to the productions of Bolswert, Vostermans, and Pontius. There were two portrait painters of this name, who flourished at an earlier date. One of them was drowned about 1550, in his passage from Hamburg to Amsterdam. There are no particulars recorded of the other. Cornelius Visscher, the engraver, died in 1670. The following is an ample list of his best works. For a complete catalogue, the reader is referred to Bartsch and Nagler.

The best impressions of this plate are before the name of Clement de Jonghe, and without the title. The Bohemian Woman, with three children, one of which she is suckling. In the first impressions the name of Visscher is upon the margin, at the bottom of the print. It was afterwards effaced to make room for the inscription, and placed upon the upper part of the plate. VISSCHER, JOHN, was the younger brother of Cornelius V., born at Amsterdam in 1636. He was probably instructed by his brother, whose style he followed, though his plates are more forward with the point, and his style of etching is uncommonly picturesque and effective. Although he did not possess the extensive talents of Cornelius in design and in historical engraving, he equalled him in landscape, and some indeed prefer him before his brother in this branch; his landscapes after Berghem, Ostade, and Wouwerman, are among the happiest productions of the art, and rank him among the most eminent engravers of his country. He also engraved some portraits, which show that he handled the graver with ability and facility. Of his numerous prints, the following are the most deserving of notice :

PORTRAITS.

Several landscapes, &c. ; after Ph. Wouwerman. A set of twelve Landscapes and Views ; after P. van Goyen. A set of twelve Landscapes and Sea-ports ; after Herm. Swanevelt.

VISSCHER, LAMBERT. According to Huber, this artist was a brother of the preceding, and flourished about 1664. He went to Italy, and resided some years at Rome and Florence. In conjunction with Cornelius Bloemaert and Francis Spierre, he engraved several plates from the paintings of Pietro da Cortona, in the Florentine Gallery. He also engraved a few portraits, among which is one of Maria Theresa of Austria, Queen of France, after Vanloo.

 VISSCHER, NICHOLAS JOHN, was of the same family as the preceding, and flourished at Amsterdam about 1600. He engraved some portraits and other subjects after the Dutch masters. We have by him also a variety of etchings of small landscapes and views, with figures and animals, which are executed in a spirited manner. He usually marked his prints with the above monogram, composed of the initials C. I. V., the first letter signifying Class, an abbreviation of Nicholas.

VISSCHER, THEODORE, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1650. He studied under Nicholas Berghem, whose style he imitated. He went to Italy, where he resided some years, and was called by his countrymen, from his dissipated habits, Slempop. His best pictures are painted in a superior manner, and much resemble the admirable works of Berghem ; others appear to be the productions of inebriety and negligence. His death is variously placed in 1699 and 1707.

VISSELLET, M., an engraver who flourished about 1600. Dumesnil describes forty-three wooden cuts by him of subjects taken from the New Testament. They are executed in a coarse manner, resembling the wood cuts of J. Stella, from which they seem to have been copied. Some of them are marked MV. F., and one is signed M. Vissellet, F.

VITALBA, GIOVANNI, an Italian engraver, who studied under Joseph Wagner at Venice. He went to England in 1765, where he was employed by Boydell to engrave several plates, among which are Cupid with two Satyrs, after Agostino Caracci ; a pair, Spring and Summer, after Filippo Lauri ; Herodias with the Head of St. John, after L. Pasinelli. He was living in 1790.

VITALI, ALESSANDRO, a painter born at Urbino in 1580, and died in 1630. He was the scholar and imitator of Federigo Baroccio. Lanzi says he copied the Annunciation of Loreto by Baroccio in such a manner that it might be easily mistaken for the original picture. "Baroccio was pleased with his talents, and willingly retouched some of his pictures, and probably favored him in this way in his St. Agnes in the cathedral, and St. Augustine, in the church of the Eremitani, at Urbino, in which he may be said to have surpassed himself."

VITALI, CANDIDO, a painter born at Bologna in 1680. He was brought up in the school of Carlo Cignani, and by the advice of his instructor, who was always attentive to the particular genius of his disciples, he devoted himself to painting animals, birds, flowers, and fruit. His pictures of these subjects were greatly admired at Bologna, and throughout all Italy, for his tasteful composition, beauty of coloring, and delicacy of penciling. He died in 1753.

VITALI, GIUSEPPE, a painter of Bologna, who flourished about 1700. He studied under Giovanni Gioseffo dal Sole, and painted history with some reputation. He executed some works for the churches of Bologna, the principal of which are, the Annunciation, in S. Antonio ; St. Petronio, in S.S. Sebastiano e Rocco ; and the Martyrdom of St. Cecilia, in the church dedicated to that saint. He was living in 1720.

VITE, ANTONIO, a painter of Pistoja, who flourished in 1463. He executed some works for the churches of his native city, and of Pisa, in the dry style of the time.

VITE, TIMOTEO, called also TIMOTEO DELLA VITE DI URBINO, a painter born at Urbino, according to Vasari, in 1470, and died in 1524. Lanzi says. "Timoteo della Vite of Urbino, after some years spent in studying under Francesco Francia at Bologna, (he remained there till he was twenty-six years old), returned to his native city, and thence repaired to the Academy, which his countryman and relative Raffaello had opened in the Vatican. He assisted Raffaello at the Pace, in the fresco of the sibyls, of which he retained the cartoons ; and after some time, for some cause or other, he returned to Urbino, and there passed the rest of his days. He brought with him to Rome a method of painting which partook much of the manner of the early masters, as seen in some of his Madonnas at the Palace Bonaventura, and the Chapter of Urbino ; and the Discovery of the Cross in the church of the Conventuali at Pesaro. He improved his style under Raffaello, and acquired from him much of his grace, attitudes and colors, although he always remained a limited inventor, with a certain timidity of touch, more correct than vigorous. His best works are the Conception at the Osservanti, at Urbino ; and the Noli me Tangere, in the church of S. Angelo at Cagli." He died in 1524. His name is sometimes written Viti and Vita.

VITE, PIETRO DELLA, is supposed to have been the brother of the preceding, in whose style he painted, though in a very inferior manner. Lanzi conjectures that he is the same as Il Prete di Urbino, mentioned by Baldinucci, as a relative, and one of the heirs of Raffaele.

VITE, GIOVANNI DELLA. See MIEL.

VITERBO, FRA MARIOTTO DA, an old painter, born at Viterbo, of whom little is known. According to Della Valle, he was employed in the cathedral at Orvieto in 1444. Little now remains from his hand.

VITERBO, TARQUINIO DA, a painter of Viterbo, who, according to Baglioni, flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Pope Paul V. He excelled in landscapes, which were decorated with figures by his friend Giovanni Zanna, a Roman. They wrought in conjunction, and their works were held in considerable estimation.

VITO, NICCOLA DI, an old Neapolitan painter, who studied under Antonio Solario, called Zingaro. Lanzi says he may be called the Buffalmacco of his school, from his singular humor and eccentric invention, though otherwise an artist deserving little commendation. He flourished about 1440.

VITTORIA, ALESSANDRO, a distinguished Italian sculptor and architect, was born at Trento in 1525. He studied at Venice under Sansovino, and afterwards practiced for many years in the Venetian states. In statuary and modelling, Milizia says he attained such excellence as yielded only to that of Michael Angelo. In Venice he executed many works both in public and private, especially the statues and ornaments on the staircase of the Library of St. Mark, in the Ducal Palace, the Council Hall, and different churches. Vittoria also executed many busts, and various sculptures in other cities, among which is the monument of General Contarini, in the church del Santo at Padua. As an architect, he completed the church of S. Giuliano at Venice, the chapel of S. Fantino, and other works of Sansovino; also the chapel and altar of the Rosario, in S. Giovanni e Paolo; the monument of Priuli in S. Salvatore; the Oratory of S. Girolamo, with superb statues in bronze and in marbles; and the magnificent Palazzo Balbi, near the grand canal. He died in 1608.

VITRINGA, WIGERUS, generally called William, a Dutch painter, of whom little is known, except that he painted marines in the manner of Backhuysen, who is supposed to have been his instructor. Some of his storm pieces are excellent. He also excelled in drawings in India ink, washed with bistre; some of these are signed with his name and dated about 1652. The accounts as to the time of his birth and death are very contradictory. Immerzeel and Balkema, say he was born at Leeuwarde in 1657, the latter that he died in 1721; others say he was living in 1744.

VITRUVIUS. See POLLIO.

VITRULIO, a Venetian painter, of whom nothing is known except by his works, which are highly commended by Lanzi, who says that "several of his works bearing his signature, are the ornament of Monte Novissimo at Venice. He must be referred to the age of Titian, and seems to have lived in the time of Bonifazio, and to have been his competitor." Some of his pictures are mentioned in the Guida di Venezia.

VITUS, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, of whom little is known. He is said to have been born about 1536, and to have become a religious of the monastery of Vallombrosa, in the Appenines, in the prime of life. He engraved some plates, in which he imitated Agostino de Musis, called Veneziano, from which circumstance he is supposed to have studied with that master. This however is an error, as Veneziano died about 1536. His prints possess considerable merit. Among others are the following:

St. Bartholomew; inscribed, Dom. Vitus ordinis Valisumbrosæ Monachus excidit Romæ. 1576. St. Joachim holding a Censer; after A. del. Sarto. Jupiter and Calisto; inscribed, Dominicus V. F. A River God; after the antique. A set of small plates, representing the Passion of our Saviour, with borders, ornamented with birds, beasts, &c. A set of plates from the Antique Statues; Dom. Vitus, fec.

VIVARES, FRANCIS, a French engraver, born at Montpellier about 1712. After studying in his own country he went to London, where he became the pupil of J. B. Chatelain. Being a man of genius, he improved upon the style of his instructor, and became one of the most eminent landscape engravers of his time. He was particularly successful in his plates after Claude Lorraine, in which he preserved much of the air and picturesque beauty which distinguish the productions of that great painter. He died in London in 1782. His prints amount to about 150; among them are the following:

A set of four Views of Ruins; after J. Smith. Eight Views in Derbyshire; after Thos Smith of Derby. A Landscape, called the Hop-gatherers; after Geo. Smith. A Landscape; after Gainsborough. A View in Holland, by moonlight; after vander Neer. A Land-storm; after Gaspar Poussin. A Tempest, with the history of Jonas; do. A Landscape, Morning; after Claude Lorraine. The Companion, Evening; do. The Enchanted Castle; do. A View in the Environs of Naples; do.

VIVARINI, DA MURANO. There was a family of artists of this name who flourished at Murano, about whom there is considerable discrepancy among writers. We shall, therefore, condense Lanzi's account. "The first among the Vivarini mentioned by historians is Luigi, by whom a painting is cited in the church of S. Giovanni e Paolo, at Murano, representing our Redeemer bearing his Cross, dated 1414.

"Next to this artist, according to Ridolfi and Zanetti, are Giovanni and Antonio Vivarini, who flourished about 1440. The authority they adduce for this is another piece in S. Pantaleone, inscribed, Zuane e Antonio da Muran pense 1444. But this Giovanni, if I mistake not, is the same who signs on another picture at Venice, Joannes de Alemania, et Antonius de Muriano, pinxit, or as it is written on another at Padua, Antonio de Muran e Zohan Alamanus pinxit. This Giovanni, therefore, was a German by birth, and the companion of Antonio, and traces of a foreign style are perceptible in his paintings. The reason for his omitting to insert his country in the picture in S. Pantaleone, arose, I suspect, from the fact, that his name and acquaintance with Antonio, were too well known to admit of doubt.

"After the year 1447 there is no more mention made of Giovanni, but only of Antonio, sometimes alone, and sometimes together with some other of the Vivarini. Thus, his name is subscribed alone in the church of S. Antonio Abate at Pesaro, upon an altar-piece of the Titular Saint, surrounded by the figures of three young martyrs, with some smaller paintings attached, the production of a very animated colorist and displaying forms inferior to none in the school of Murano. I have seen two other specimens, in which he is mentioned together with a second Vivarini. The least excellent of these is in the church of S. Francesco Grande at Padua, consisting of a Madonna with some saints in several compartments, inscribed Anno 1451, Antonius et Bartholomeus fratres de Murano pinxerunt hoc opus. Similar to this, the two brothers had produced another in the preceding year in the Certosa at Bologna, where it is still in a high state of preservation, beyond any other specimen I have seen belonging to the family. There is much in each figure in the whole piece, which is worthy of commendation; features dignified and devout, appropriate dresses, care in the disposition of the hair and beards, united to a warm and brilliant coloring.

"It would appear that Bartolomeo was held in less account than Antonio, until the discovery of oil painting; on its being introduced into Venice, he was one of the first to profit by it, and towards the period when the two Bellini appeared, was held in pretty high repute. The first specimen by him in oil, exists at the church of S. Giovanni e Paolo, and exhibits among other saints, P. San Agostino, with the date 1473. From that period he continued to distinguish himself, producing a great number of pieces, both in oil and in water colors, sometimes with more, and at others with less care, but always in the ancient taste for subdividing the altar-piece into several compartments, in each of which he represented separate heads or entire figures. These he often signed VIVARINO, with the date, and occasionally added a finch or linnet in allusion to his name. In his last work, representing Christ risen from the dead, in the church of S. Giovanni, at Bragora, the date 1498, which Boschini read, is no longer apparent, but it is a piece which vies in every part with the best Venetian artists of that period.

"Cotemporary with Bartolomeo was Luigi (the younger.) Vivarini, one of whose productions was seen by Zanetti, in a collection of paintings dated 1490, and appeared to him strongly approaching, in point of taste, to the best style of the former. There is a half-length figure of the Saviour in the R. Pinacoteca, at Milan, a work finished with such care that it may challenge comparison with the productions of the cotemporary painters; it is inscribed Alovisius Vivarinus de Muriano pinxit, 1498. To Luigi, also, must undoubtedly be ascribed the altar-piece bearing his name in the church of S. Francesco, at Trevigi. There is also another at the Battuti, in Belluno, representing Sts. Piero, Girolamo and others, which cost that school 100 ducats, besides the expenses of the artist who attached his name to it. But superior to every other of his existing specimens, is that fine picture in the school of San Girolamo, at Venice, in which he represented a history of the Titular Saint, in emulation with Giovanni Bellini, whom he here equalled, and of Carpaccio, whom he surpassed."

VIVIANI, IL. See CODAGORA.

VIVIANI, ANTONIO, called IL SORDO, a painter born at Urbino or Ancona, (for writers disagree,) who, according to Baglioni, was a scholar and imitator of Federigo Baroccio, and flourished at Rome in the pontificate of Paul V. There are also notices of him at Genoa, but there is considerable contradiction and uncertainty about him.

VIVIANI, LODOVICO, a painter of Urbino, who, according to the Guida di Urbino, flourished in 1650. Lanzi says, there is a tradition at Urbino, that he was a brother or cousin of Antonio V.; and that he sometimes imitates Baroccio, as in his St. Girolamo, in the Cathedral, and sometimes approaches the Venetian style, as in his Epiphany at the monastery della Torre, at Urbino.

VIVIANI, OTTAVIO, a painter born at Brescia in 1599, and died in 1674, though there is some discrepancy on this point, and some uncertainty whether these dates should apply to him, or to Viviano Codagora, with whom he is very generally confounded. They both painted perspective and architectural pieces and landscapes, enriched with superb ruins and architecture, but Codagora studied in the Roman school, and was far superior to Viviani, who was educated in the Venetian. His instructor in architecture and perspective was Tommaso Sandrini, at Brescia, and in landscape, Agostino Tassi at Genoa. His pictures usually represent the remains of ancient edifices, selected and arranged for picturesque effect in a pleasing landscape, and generally show judgment and taste, though the composition is sometimes too much crowded, and perhaps overloaded with ornament. He was excellent in figures, and used them to great advantage in showing the relative size and height of his buildings and objects. There is a great variety in his coloring, too much for harmony, but producing a striking effect; and such pictures being intended for decoration, the richness does not offend. He had an excellent knowledge of perspective and chiaro-scuro, which he exhibited on all occasions, but time has darkened his shadows and given too solemn a gloom to his temples and arcades.

VIVIEN, JOSEPH, an eminent French painter, born at Lyons in 1657. He studied under Charles le Brun, and for some time painted portraits in oil with considerable success; but he afterwards adopted the method of painting in crayons, which he carried to a perfection unknown before his time. He not only obtained an excellent likeness, but his heads exhibited uncommon life, nature, and truthfulness of expression; his carnations were fresh and pure, his touch vigorous and spirited, the general tone of his pictures tender and harmonious, and he gave his figures an extraordinary relief. He particularly excelled in female portraits, to which he gave great grace and elegance in the airs of the heads and attitudes and an exquisite velvety softness in his tints. He frequently painted his portraits in the historical style, and the back-grounds decorated with agreeable vistas, or embellished with fabulous or mythological figures. He acquired great reputation, and was called by his countrymen, the French Vandyck. In 1701 he was chosen a member of the French Academy of Painting. He passed the latter part of his life in the service of the Elector of Bavaria, for whom he painted some of his choicest works. His portrait by himself is placed in the Florentine Gallery. His famous portrait of Fenelon is in the Louvre. He died in 1735.

VIVIER, JEAN DU, a French medalist, who flourished at Paris in the first half of the 18th century. In 1718 he was chosen a member of the Academy, and was appointed medalist to Louis XV. in 1735.

VIVIER, G. DU, a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1666. Little is known of him except by a few prints bearing his signature, of which the following are described by Dumesnil in Le Peintre Graveur, tom. iii.

1. Christ in the Sepulchre; Anton. van Heuvel invent. ; G. de Vivier, fecit. Four verses in Dutch, beginning, "Hier is het leven soet."
2. The Four Evangelists, in one piece, no mark.
3. The Temptation of St. Anthony; Anton. van Heuvel invent. ; G. de Vivier fecit.
4. Thetis and Chiron; the Centaur holding the infant Achilles in his arms; no mark.
5. A Flemish Kitchen; Ant. V. Heuvel pinxit ; G. du Vivier fecit.
6. The Flageolet Player; no mark.
7. The Tippler; in the manner of Rembrandt; no mark.
8. A Landscape outside of a fortified city; a winter scene. Many figures are skating, and otherwise amusing themselves on the ice; persons of condition, in coaches and on foot, dressed in the costume of the time of Louis XIII., or the minority of Louis XIV., are looking on; no mark.

VIVIO, JACOPO. This Italian artist flourished in the latter half of the 16th century, and distinguished himself by his models in colored wax. Fiorillo records a model by him in that style, of the Last Judgment, by Michael Angelo.

VLENGHEL, PHILIP, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp, in 1620. Little is known of him. He is said to have painted history with reputation. He went to Paris, where he died in 1694.

VLERICK, PETER, a Flemish painter, born at Courtray in 1539. He was the son of a lawyer, who, perceiving in him a genius for painting, placed him under the instruction of William Snellaert, a painter in distemper. He afterwards became the disciple of Charles d'Ypres, a historical painter of some note who had studied in Italy, with whom he continued two years, but whose capricious disposition constrained him to quit his studio sooner than he intended. He had, however, made such progress that he was able to live on the proceeds of his talents. He traveled through France and met with such encouragement during a short residence at Paris, that he was enabled to proceed to Italy. At Venice he had the good fortune to secure the friendship and instruction of Tintoretto. After a residence of four years in that city, he went to Rome, where he designed after the antique and the works of the great masters, and sketched the beautiful scenery and views on the banks of the Tyber, and proceeding to Naples he designed the prospects about that city and Puteoli. During his residence in those cities, he executed some historical pictures both in oil and distemper, which gained him considerable reputation. In 1568 he returned to Flanders and settled at Tournay, where he resided the remainder of his life. He distinguished himself by many excellent works, the principal of which, according to Van Mander, were the Brazen Serpent, Judith with the head of Holofernes, the Four Evangelists, and the Crucifixion. In all his works the manner of Tintoretto is observable. He was skilled in perspective and architecture, with which he enriched his backgrounds. His design is correct, his coloring rich and harmonious, and his execution prompt and vigorous. He died in 1581.

VLIET, SIMON DE, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam about 1612. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he acquired considerable reputation in his time as a painter of marine subjects and landscapes. He was the instructor of the younger Vande Velde, and though his fame was eclipsed by the brilliant talents of his disciple, his works possess great merit, and are found in the choicest collections. He executed some spirited and masterly etchings from his own designs, a description of twenty of which may be found in Bartsch (Peintre Graveur, tom. i.), representing views in Holland, rivers, canals, and animals; some of them approach the style of Waterloo. He died in or about 1670.

VLIET, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1584, and died there in 1642. Little is known of him, but he is said to have painted history and portraits with considerable reputation. His touch was firm and facile, and his coloring excellent.

VLIET, HENRY VAN, was the nephew of the preceding, born at Delft in or about 1608. He learned the principles of the art from his uncle, but afterwards studied with Mirevelt, the eminent portrait painter. For some time he practiced portraiture, in the style of that master, but he gradually abandoned it for another branch, in which he distinguished himself. He painted perspective views of the interiors of churches and temples, in the style of Emanuel de Wit, and his best pieces in this line are accounted little inferior to the admirable productions of that master. He frequently represented these subjects by torch-light, producing a picturesque and pleasing effect. He decorated his pictures with a great number of small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. He also painted moonlight scenes in a very agreeable manner. The times of his birth and death are not certainly known. Some say he died in 1646.

VLIET, JOHN GEORGE VAN, a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Delft, in 1610. He was one of the numerous disciples of Rembrandt. Of his works as a painter, little is known, but there are about ninety prints by him, mostly from his own designs, and after Rembrandt, with a few after J. Lievens. They are executed in the manner of his instructor, and produce a surprising effect; the lights are broad and clear, and the shadows dark. His drawing, however, is very incorrect, and his draperies clumsy and mannered, but notwithstanding these defects, his prints are held in considerable estimation. He sometimes signed them with his name, at others marked them with the above monogram of his initials, J. G. V. The following are his best prints; for a complete list, the reader is referred to Bartsch and Nagler:

PORTRAITS AND HEADS; AFTER REMBRANDT.

VOEIRIOT. See WOEIRIOT.

VOERST. ROBERT VANDER, a Dutch engraver, born at Arnheim, about 1596, though Zani places his birth in 1610, and his death in 1669. The first of Zani's statements is evidently erroneous, as he resided in England several years, where he executed quite a number of plates of portraits, mostly after Vandyck, the latest date found on which is 1635. He acquired so much reputation in that country that he was appointed engraver to the king. His plates are executed with the graver, in a clear, neat style, resembling that of Giles Sadelier, with whom he probably studied. The following are the principal plates he engraved in England:

Charles I. and his Queen; on one plate; after Vandyck. Prince Rupert. James Stewart, Duke of Lennox; after Geldorp. Robert, Earl of Lindsey; after Mirevelt.—Philip, Earl of Pembroke; after Vandyck. Ernest, Count Mansfeld; do. Simon Vouet, Painter; do. His own Portrait; do. Edward, Lord Littleton. James, Marquis of Hamilton. Henry Rich, Earl of Holland. William Fielding, Earl of Denbigh. Sir Kenelm Digby; after Vandyck. Inigo Jones; very fine; do. Christian, Duke of Brunswick; do. Sir George Carew; do. Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia; after Gerard Honthorst.

VOET, ALEXANDER, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp in 1613. He executed quite a number of plates after the Flemish masters, in which he emulated the style of Paul Pontius; hence he is supposed to have been the disciple of that master. Though he handled the graver with ease and facility, his drawing is incorrect, and the general effect of his prints is far inferior to that of his model. The following are some of his best prints:

Judith with the Head of Holofernes; after Rubens. The Holy Family returning from Egypt; do. The Virgin and Infant, to whom Angels are presenting Fruit; do. The Martyrdom of St. Andrew; do. Seneca in the Bath; do. The Entombing of Christ; after Vandyck. Folly, holding a Cat; after Jordaens. The Card-players; after De Vos.

VOET, CHARLES BOSCHAERT, a Dutch painter, born at Zwolle in 1670. He was instructed in the rudiments of the arts by his elder brother, who was a Burgomaster of the city, and though not a professional artist, had learned drawing, and painting in water-colors, to assist in his studies of botany and natural history, and was a correct designer of flowers, plants, birds, and insects. Charles greatly improved himself by an attentive study of nature, and became one of the ablest artists of his time in painting flowers, fruit, plants, birds, and objects of still-life. His pictures are ingeniously composed, and exquisitely finished; his coloring is extremely natural, and his pencil delicate; some of his birds are esteemed scarcely inferior to those of Hondekoeter. He studied everything from nature, and cultivated in his garden the most beautiful flowers and exotics for models. Descamps asserts that he had made such proficiency, and acquired so high a reputation, at the age of nineteen, that the Earl of Portland, the favorite of William III., took him under his protection to England, where he was much employed by that nobleman, and patronized by the king. Bryan, however, doubts the truth of this story, as his name is not mentioned in Lord Orford's Anecdotes. It is certain, however, that he was much employed by William III. in decorating his palace at Loo. He died at the Hague in 1745.

VOGEL, BERNARD, a German engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1683, and is said to have died in 1737. He resided chiefly at Augsburg, and executed a number of plates, with the graver and in mezzotinto, among which is the portrait of John Kupetzky, dated 1737; and that of Christopher Weigel, after Kupetzky, dated 1735.

VOGHTER, HENRY, a German engraver on wood, who, according to Professor Christ, was born at Strasburg about 1507. Zani says he was born in 1497, and died in 1537. He is said to have imitated the style of Albert Durer with considerable success. He executed the cuts for a Drawing Book, entitled, "A book of the extraordinary and marvellous Art, very useful to all painters, sculptors, and goldsmiths," &c., printed at Strasburg in 1540. He marked his prints with the above monogram. Some say there was a Henry Voghter the Younger, who was born at Strasburg in 1513, and operated in 1545. There does not seem any good ground for such a supposition.

VOGLAR, CARLO, a Dutch painter, born, according to Pascoli, at Maestricht in 1653, and died at Rome in 1695. He excelled in painting flowers, fruit, and dead game, particularly the latter, and his works were greatly admired. He is sometimes called Carlo da' Fiori, from the beauty of his flowers. He is not mentioned by the Dutch writers, as he passed his artistic life in Italy.

VOISARD, ETIENNE CLAUDE, a French engraver, born at Paris in 1746. He engraved some plates after the French masters, which are executed with the graver, in a neat and pleasing style.

VOLANT, ANTOINE, a French artist, mentioned by Papillon as an engraver on wood, who operated in 1564. He does not specify any of his works. There was also a George Volant, a wood engraver, who was living in 1600.

VOLCKAERT, NICHOLAS, an old Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1450, and died there in 1519. He excelled in distemper, and designed in the dry, Gothic style of his time and country. It is said that he was much employed in making designs for painters on glass. Little or nothing remains from his hand. Some say he had a son named Klaas, who flourished from about 1480 to 1500; doubtless an error, Klaas, Klaus, and Class being merely contractions of Nicholas.

VOLIGNY, DE TONNERES, a French engraver, of whom little is known, except that he died in 1699. Florent le Comte mentions an engraver named Voligny, but whose principal talent, he says, was in drawing portraits with a pen, which he afterwards washed with India ink in a soft and delicate manner, that was greatly admired—probably the same artist.

VOLLERDT, or VOLLAERT, JOHN CHRISTIAN, or CHRISTOPHER, a German painter, born at Leipsic in 1708, and died in 1769. He was a pupil of Alexander Thiele, and painted small landscapes, and views on the Rhine and in Switzerland, in a pleasing style.

VOLLEVENS, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Gertruydenberg in 1649. He first studied under Nicholas Maas, and afterwards with John de Baan, one of the most eminent portrait painters of his time, with whom he continued eight years, and whom he nearly equaled. On the death of that master, he succeeded to most of his practice. The prince of Courland was his first patron, and procured him the advantage of painting all the officers of his regiment. The Prince of Nassau next employed him to paint a full-length portrait of himself, as large as life, which he executed in such an admirable manner as to effectually establish his reputation, and he soon became one of the most popular and most employed artists of his time. He gave to his portraits a striking resemblance, and life-like air and expression; his coloring was clear and chaste, and his touch bold and free. He died at the Hague in 1728. He had a son of the same name, whom he instructed in the art, and who was a good portrait painter, but there are no particulars recorded of him, except that he is supposed to have passed some time in England.

VOLPATI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Bassano, in 1633, and died there in 1706. According to Lanzi, he executed many works for his native state, in a style closely resembling that of Giulio Carpioni. He also left several MS. treatises on the pictorial art, which are preserved in the rich and select library of Count Giuseppe Remondini, and prove him an able theorist.

VOLPATO, GIOVANNI, a distinguished modern Italian designer and engraver, was born at Bassano, in 1738. Having learned from his mother the mode of tapestry embroidery, he at first practiced that art; but at the same time he occasionally occupied himself with engraving, without any regular instruction, and published some prints under the assumed name of Renard. The success of these attempts determined him to adopt engraving as a profession; he accordingly settled at Venice, and entered the school of Bartolozzi. According to Huber, he engraved many good prints, after Piazzetta, Maiotto, Amiconi, M. Ricci, Zuccarelli, and others. He afterwards visited Rome, and was employed as its principal engraver by a society of Dilettanti, who undertook to re-engage all the works of Raffaele in the Vatican. Volpato engraved, on a large scale, seven of the great works of Raffaele in the stanze of the Vatican; an eighth, the Mass of Bolsena, was engraved by his son-in-law and pupil, Raphael Morghen. The prints were published colored, as well as plain; they are a very splendid and valuable set of engravings. Skilful in designing, and expert in the use of the graver and dry point, he gave to his prints great precision and powerful effect. He and Morghen were the best engravers in Italy, at the end of the 18th century. Volpato was employed by Gavin Hamilton, upon his Scuola Pitture d' Italia, and also published many prints after the celebrated Italian masters, among which are the Farnese Gallery, after Annibale Caracci; two Prophets and two Sibyls, after the paintings by Michael Angelo in the Sistine chapel. He also published many colored landscape etchings of Roman views, &c., in partnership with P. du Cros; and a set of fourteen views of the galleries of the Museo Clementino, with all its works of art. Volpato died at Rome in 1803. Huber, who wrote before his death, enumerates, as his principal works, 166 engravings. Among others, are the following:

PLATES ENGRAVED FOR THE COLLECTION OF G. HAMILTON.

The four Sibyls; from the paintings by Raffaele, in the church of S. Maria della Pace. The Marriage of Alexander and Roxana; after Raffaele. Modesty and Vanity; after L. da Vinci. Perseus and Andromeda; after Polidoro da Caravaggio. Christ praying on the Mount; after Correggio. Mary Magdalene at the feet of Christ, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; after P. Veronese. The Marriage of Cana; after Tintoretto. The Gamesters; after M. Angelo Caravaggio.

SUBJECTS AFTER GAVIN HAMILTON.

The Death of Lucretia. Innocence. Juno. Hebe. Melancholy. Gaiety.

ILLUMINATED PRINTS AFTER THE PAINTINGS BY RAFFAELLE.

The School of Athens. The Dispute on the Sacrament. Heliodorus driven from the Temple of Jerusalem. Attila stopped by the appearance of St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Peter delivered from Prison. Mount Parnassus. The Burning of the Borgo Vecchio. The Miracle of the Mass at Bolsena. This plate was engraved by his disciple Raphael Morghen.

VOLPI, STEFANO, a painter of Siena, who flourished there in the first part of the 17th century. Lanzi supposes that he was a scholar of Cristofano Casolani, as he executed some frescos from the designs of that master, for the churches in his native city.

VOLTERRA, FRANCESCO DI. This architect, according to Milizia, was originally a carver in wood, but devoted himself to architecture, and erected, among other edifices, the church of S. Giacomo degli Incurabili, at Rome; the Lancillotti palace; and the nave of the church della Scala, which has a stately appearance, but a number of defects in the details, such as the projecting of entablatures, and the carving of pilasters. He died in 1588.

VOLTERRA, DANIELE DI. See RICCIARELLI.

VOLTERRANO, IL. See FRANCESCHINI.

VOLTRI, NICCOLO DA, an old painter, born at Voltri in the Genoese territory, who flourished in 1401. He was a follower of Giotto, and an artist of distinction in his time; but Lanzi says there is no known surviving work by him.

VOLVINO, a Milanese artist of the 10th century, who produced the celebrated Palliotto d' Oro, or gold pallium or mantle. Lanzi says, "he produced the very celebrated altar-piece, wrought in gold, in the church of S. Ambrogio, at Milan; a work which may be pronounced, in point of style, equal to the finest specimens of the dittici, or small ivory altar-pieces, that the museums of sacred art can afford."

VONCK, or VONK, C., a Dutch painter, who flourished in the last half of the 17th century. Nothing is known of him, except by his works. He painted birds, animals, and objects of still-life, in the manner of Melchior Hondekoeter and Francis Snyders, which are said to possess extraordinary merit, and are found in the choicest collections. There was another painter of this name, of less merit, who resided at Middleburg about 1750. He painted the same subjects, in the manner of Artus Schouman, of whom he was probably a pupil. He was living in 1778.

VOOGD, HENDRICK, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam about 1766. He studied under Juri-aan Andriessen, with whom he made such progress that M. D. Versteeg took him under his protection, and furnished him the means of visiting Italy. He designed the beautiful scenery in the environs of Rome with great assiduity. He sent one of his pictures to the "Société des Sciences," at Haerlem, which procured him a pension of fifty ducats per annum, for three years. Thus encouraged, he prosecuted his studies with ardor, and acquired so much distinction for his beautiful landscapes of Italian scenery, which he enriched with ruins, and ancient temples and edifices, and peopled with appropriate figures from ancient history or mythology, that he was called the Dutch Claude. He frequently sent his pictures to the exhibitions in his native city, where they were admired greatly, but whether he ever revisited his own country is not mentioned. He died at Rome, in 1839.

VOORHOUT, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1647. He first studied six years under Constantine Verhout, or Verbout (probably Voorhout, and his uncle), of Gouda, a painter of conversations and gallant assemblies. He next became the disciple of John van Noort, at Amsterdam, a reputable painter of history and portraits, with whom he continued five years more. He had already begun to distinguish himself, when the French army entered Holland, in 1672, and he sought refuge at Hamburg, where he met with the most flattering encouragement. On the restoration of peace, he returned to Amsterdam, where he found abundant employment till his death. He painted both history and portraits, and is ranked by Descamps among the ablest artists of his country. His historical subjects are usually selected from the Greek or Roman history, and he treated them with propriety and judgment. His works are highly esteemed, and are to be found in the choicest collections. He died at Amsterdam in 1710. The Dutch writers mention another John Voorhout, who painted similar subjects, and died in 1749—probably his son.

VOORT, CORNELIUS VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1580, and died there in 1632, though some say he was a native of Antwerp. He excelled in portraits, which were admired for skillful arrangement, excellent likeness, and a fresh and natural tone of coloring.

VORONIKHIN, ANDREI NIKOPHOROVITCH, a Russian architect, was born in 1760, among the peasantry of Count Alexander Stroganov. That nobleman, having heard of his talents in drawing, sent him to Moscow in 1777, in order to be properly educated as an artist; and he there received some instruction from Bazhenov and Kasakov, two eminent architects. He was then sent to travel with his patron's son, Count Paul Stroganov, and after visiting the southern provinces of Russia, Germany, and Switzerland, resided some time at Paris, laboring diligently to profit by this opportunity of pursuing his architectural studies. In 1790, he returned to St. Petersburg, and the protection of Stroganov soon brought him into notice and employment. In 1800, the Emperor Paul conceived the idea of building a magnificent Cathedral in the "Nevskii Prospect," to be dedicated to Our Lady of Kazan; and Voronikhin, who was then Professor in the Academy of Arts, was appointed architect. In the following year the first stone was laid by the Emperor Alexander; the edifice was completed and consecrated in 1815, and forms one of the finest architectural monuments in the city of the Czars. Voronikhin also erected many other edifices, public and private, among which were several villas at Gatchina and Pavlovsky. He died in 1814.

VORSTERMANS, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Bommel in 1643. He was the son of a portrait painter, who instructed him in the rudiments of art, but having a genius for landscape, he studied under Hermann Zachtleven at Utrecht, and became one of the most admired landscape painters of his time. But great as his merit was, it fell short of his vanity. He went to Paris, where he assumed the title of Baron, and for a short time kept up the establishment of a person of rank. This extravagant course, however, could not last long, and his necessities soon compelled him to return to Holland. In 1672, on the approach of the French army, he removed to Nimeguen, where his talents recommended him to the patronage of the Marquis of Bethune, who employed him to collect some of the best works of art that could be obtained in Holland, and to paint several landscapes and views on the Rhine. Soon after the Restoration, he went to England, where he was employed by the king to paint a view of Windsor, and several other pieces, for which he demanded such an exorbitant price that he not only lost his patron, but the king's commissioners refused to allow him a moiety of what he demanded. Unable to support his extravagance, he was at length arrested for debt, and thrown into prison, where he remained till he was released by a contribution of some of his countrymen. On the accession of James II., Sir William Soames, being appointed ambassador to the Ottoman court, took Vorstermans in his train, with a view to employ him in painting the most remarkable scenes in the East, but that minister dying on the voyage, put an end to the project. Nothing more is known of Vorstermans, though he is supposed to have gone to Poland, whither he had been invited by his former patron, the Marquis of Bethune, before he left England.

Had Vorstermans been a prudent man, and his industry equal to his genius, he would have become one of the most famous painters of his country. He surpassed, by many degrees, all the landscape painters of his time, in neatness of touch and delicacy of finishing. His taste was Flemish; but he worked up his pictures in an exquisite manner, and enriched them with small figures, correctly designed, and touched with great neatness and spirit. His scenery is always well chosen, frequently taken from the borders of the Rhine, in which he constantly represents a large extent of country, diversified with hills, lawns, groves, and lovely windings of the river. His coloring is chaste and agreeable, and he was a perfect master of aerial perspective. The time of his death is not certainly known; some place it in 1699. His name is often written Vosterman and Vostermans.

V. or L. VORSTERMANS, LUCAS, called the Elder, an eminent Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about 1580. He first studied painting in the great school of Rubens, but by the advice of that master (who was quick to perceive the particular genius of his pupils, and careful to give it the right direction), he afterwards devoted himself entirely to engraving. No painter ever had the satisfaction of seeing so great a number of his best works engraved in so admirable a manner, as Rubens. He was surrounded by engravers of the greatest abilities, who worked immediately under his eye, and who had the advantage of his assistance and advice, which contributed in no small degree to the beauty and excellence of their prints. Of these, no one was more successful than Vorstermans. His drawing is correct, and his heads are full of expression. His plates are executed entirely with the graver, which he handled with great facility, though he was always more attentive to the general effect, than to neatness and regularity of execution; in his best prints he has transcribed, with surprising fidelity, the life and spirit of the original paintings. His plate of the Adoration of the Magi, after Rubens, is regarded as one of the finest productions of the art. He visited England in the reign of Charles I., where he resided eight years, from 1623 to 1631, and was employed by that monarch and the Earl of Arundel. The time of his death is not known. He usually signed his plates with his name in full, but he sometimes marked them with the above monogram of his initials, L. V. His prints are very numerous, of which the following is an ample list of the most esteemed. A full catalogue may be found in Bartsch :

The following are considered his best prints :

VOS, PETER DE, a Flemish painter, who flourished at Antwerp in the first part of the 16th century. He painted history and portraits with reputation, and was elected a member of the Academy at Antwerp in 1519. He had two sons, whom he instructed in the art—Peter and Martin. Peter did not rise above mediocrity; Martin is the subject of the following article.

VOS, MARTIN DE, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp, according to the best authorities, in 1520, and died in 1604, aged eighty-four years; though some say he was born in 1531, and died in 1603. After receiving instruction from his father, he frequented the school of Francis Floris till he was twenty-three years old, when he went to Italy, and spent seven years at Rome, where he greatly improved his design by attentively studying the works of Raffaello, and other great masters of the Roman school. He next went to Venice, to improve his coloring, where he had the good fortune to obtain the esteem and friendship of Tintoretto, who is said to have disclosed to him all the secrets relative to coloring, which he had either derived from Titian, or acquired by his own skill and experience, and to have explained to him the rules and principles on which he had founded his own practice. He also employed de Vos to paint the landscape in some of his works. Under the direction of his able instructor, de Vos soon became an excellent colorist, and he gained so much reputation, that he was employed by the illustrious family of the Medici, to paint several portraits. He also executed several historical works, which added to his reputation. After an absence of about eight years, he returned to his own country, whither the fame he had acquired in Italy had preceded him. He was received into the Academy at Antwerp in 1559, and executed several works for the churches, which established his reputation as one of the ablest artists of his time. He also excelled in portraits, in which branch he was much employed. He also received commissions for pictures to adorn the churches of other cities in the Netherlands. His principal works at Antwerp are the Marriage at Cana; the Incredulity of St. Thomas; the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes; the Temptation of St. Anthony, in the Cathedral; and a fine picture of the Last Supper, in the church of St. James. He had a fruitful invention, composed with readiness, and wrought with facility; his manner resembled that of Tintoretto, but his composition had less variety, fire, and energy. His figures are often forced and exaggerated in their attitudes. Notwithstanding his long residence in Italy, he could never entirely divest himself of the peculiar characteristics of his native school. His works, both in portraiture and history, were numerous, and exerted considerable influence on the art in his time. In portraiture, he was the precursor of Rubens and Vandyck, who perhaps owe more to him than their admirers are willing to allow.

VOS, WILLIAM DE, was the nephew and scholar of Martin de Vos, whose style he followed, both in history and portraits, with distinction. His portrait was painted by Vandyck, among the eminent artists of his country, which he also etched, and it was finished with the graver by Bolswert. The times of his birth and death are not known.

VOS, PAUL DE, a Flemish painter, born at Aelst, about 1600. He is supposed to have been a disciple of Francis Snyders, as he painted battles, and huntings of the wild boar and other animals of the chase, in the style of that master; and his best works are esteemed little inferior to the admirable productions of that eminent artist. He traveled through Italy and Spain, and his works were everywhere admired, and he found abundant patronage. He was much employed by the King of Spain, and the Emperor of Germany; there are several of his finest works in the royal collection at Madrid, and in the palace of Bueno Retiro, which are deservedly held in the highest estimation. His animals, especially his dogs, are drawn with uncommon correctness and spirit, and his coloring is clear and harmonious. As he usually painted in a large size, his pictures were mostly the ornaments of magnificent halls, in the palaces of great personages. He died in 1654. He had a son named Paul de Vos, whom he instructed in the art, and who flourished at Aelst, in the latter part of the 17th century. He did not acquire much distinction.

VOS, CORNELIUS DE, was the son of Paul de Vos, born at Aelst in 1690, and died there in 1751. After being instructed in the art, he went to Italy, where he resided some time. On his return to Aelst, he painted history and portraits with reputation. There was another Cornelius de Vos, who was a scholar and imitator of Vandyck.

VOS, SIMON DE, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1603. He studied in the school of Rubens, under whom he became an eminent painter of history and portraits. He painted so much in the manner of his instructor, that some of his works in the churches at Antwerp have frequently been mistaken for the works of Rubens. Such are his picture of the Resurrection, in the Cathedral; the Descent from the Cross, in the church of St. Andrew; and St. Norbert receiving the Sacrament, in the abbey of St. Michael. Sir Joshua Reynolds highly commends this last picture, and speaks of him as a portrait painter, in the following terms: "De Vos was particularly excellent in portraits. There is, at Antwerp, his own portrait painted by himself, in black, leaning on the back of a chair, with a scroll in his hand, so highly finished in the broad style of Correggio, that nothing can exceed it." Simon de Vos was very diligent, and occupied himself continually in studying everything that might promote his knowledge, and he was one of the few who took pains to make the deepest researches into the true principles of the art. He painted equally well in large and in small size; his pencil is free, his touch light and firm, and his coloring lively and agreeable, producing a good effect. His figures are correctly designed, though sometimes a little too much constrained in the attitudes; and he often wanted dignity and elegance in his ideas, as well as grace in the airs of his heads. He sometimes painted pictures of the chase, in which he showed extraordinary power and truth. There is a fine specimen of his skill in this branch, in the collection of the Elector Palatine. The time of his death is not known; he was living in 1662.

VOS, LAMBERT DE. Little is known of this painter, except that he visited Turkey in 1574, and made many excellent water-color drawings of Turkish costume. A volume of these drawings was formerly preserved in the Gymnasium Library at Bremen, and it is probably there still.

VOS, DE. There were several other painters of this name, of little note, apparently of the same family, which continues down to the present day.

VOSMEER, James WOUTERS, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1584, and died there in 1641. It is not known under whom he studied, but he visited Italy, and on his return to Flanders painted landscapes, and especially fruit and flowers, with considerable reputation.

VOSTERMANS. See VORSTERMANS.

VOU, I. DE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1700, and engraved some plates of views and edifices in that city, which are etched and finished with the graver in a neat, clear style.

VOUET, SIMON. This eminent painter, generally considered the founder of the French school, was born at Paris in 1582. He was the son of Laurent Vouet, an obscure painter; and without the aid of better instruction than he could derive from his father, he made rapid advances in the art. The Biographie Universelle states that at the age of fourteen he was commissioned to visit England for the purpose of painting the portrait of a French noble, then residing in London. This performance gained Vouet considerable patronage. Baron de Sancy, French Ambassador to the Porte, took him, several years after, in his suite to Constantinople. While there, he painted an excellent portrait of the Sultan, Achmet I., from memory, after seeing him at the ambassador's audience; which performance gained Vouet the munificent patronage of the Turkish nobles. From Constantinople he went to Venice, where he was attracted by the works of Paul Veronese; but he visited Rome in 1613, and adopted the style of Caravaggio. Some of his biographers assert that he chose Valentin as a model, but the latter was not born until 1600. The talents of Vouet gained him the patronage of Pope Urban VIII., and his nephew, the Cardinal, by whom he was employed to paint several pictures for St. Peter's and the Palazzo Barberini, which are among his best works, and are termed by Lanzi "charming productions." Louis XIII. hearing of his talents, allowed him a pension of 400 francs. He was also patronized by Prince Doria of Genoa, whither he went, and painted the portraits of the royal family. On returning to Rome he was chosen president of the Academy of St. Luke, in 1624.

In 1627, after a residence of fourteen years at Rome, Vouet returned to Paris, by invitation of the king, and was appointed his principal painter, with apartments in the Louvre. He was employed in decorating the palaces of the Louvre, the Luxembourg, and St. Germain's; also in many other commissions, so numerous that he was obliged to entrust nearly the entire execution of many of them to his scholars. He painted ceilings, galleries, altar-pieces, small religious subjects and other easel pictures, as well as portraits in oil and crayons. The multiplicity of his engagements induced Vouet to abandon the careful and vigorous style which he followed while in Italy, and during the first years after returning to France; after which he adopted a manner distinguished by surprising facility, and gay but inharmonious coloring. He was mannered likewise in his drawing, especially in the hands and the heads; his genius was unequal to grand compositions, he was also deficient in invention and expression. Had Vouet followed his Italian style, his reputation would have been much greater; but he nevertheless greatly improved the French school, and he is allowed by the French historians to have done as much for painting in France as Corneille did for the drama. The improved taste which he introduced, was still further exalted by his numerous disciples, among whom were le Brun, le Sueur, Mignard, du Fresnoy, Testelin, and others. Among his principal works in the churches of Paris, are the Assumption of the Virgin in S. Nicolas des Champs; and the Martyrdom of St. Agnes, in S. Eustache. He died in 1641. Dumesnil mentions an etching by Vouet, of the Holy Family, dated 1633. Aubin Vouet, the brother of Simon, painted in his style with tolerable success.

VOUILLEMONT, SEBASTIAN, a French engraver, born at Bar-sur-Aube, about 1620. He studied under Daniel Rabel, at Paris, on leaving whom he went to Rome, where he resided several years. He engraved quite a number of plates after the Italian and French masters, as well as others from his own designs. His simple etchings are the best; when he attempted to finish them with the graver, he was less successful. He sometimes signed his plates with his name, and sometimes marked them with the above monogram. The following are among his best prints.

The Murder of the Innocents; after Raffaele. 1641. Christ with his Disciples at Emmaus; do. Mount Parnassus; do. The Holy Family; after N. Poussin. The Virgin and Infant Christ; after Parmiggiano. The Marriage of St. Catherine; after Albano. A young Man presenting Money to a Fortuneteller.

VOYEZ, NICHOLAS JOSEPH, a French engraver, born at Abbeville in 1742. He went to Paris when very young, and became the pupil of Beauvarlet, his fellow-citizen. He engraved some portraits and other subjects, mostly after the French masters, in the neat style of his instructor. He had a brother named François, born at Abbeville in 1746, who was also an engraver.

VOYS, ARY DE, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden in 1641. He first studied under Nicholas Knufer, at Utrecht, with whom he continued two years, when he returned to Leyden and became the disciple of Abraham vander Tempel; but he did not adopt the manner of either of his instructors. He formed an intimacy with Peter van Slingelandt, whose highly finished style he followed with the greatest success. Although he occasionally painted small cabinet pictures of history, his best and most numerous works are portraits, conversations, and domestic subjects, which are accounted little inferior to the productions of Metzger or Micris. His pictures are exquisitely finished, his drawing is correct, his coloring is clear and transparent, and his conduct of the chiaro-scuro admirable. He acquired a high reputation, and his pictures were so much sought after that he could not supply the demand. It is said that he was naturally indolent, and that having married a lady of considerable fortune, he passed several years of his life in idleness and dissipation. His works are rare, and only to be found in the choicest collections. He died at Leyden in 1698.

VREE, or VREEM, NICHOLAS DE, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1650, and died at Alkmaer in 1702. He was a good painter of landscapes, and excelled in flower-pieces, which were admired for the freedom and lightness of his pencil, and the fresh and natural tone of his coloring.

VRIES, JOHN FREDERICK DE, a painter born at Leeuwarden, in East Friesland, in 1527. He was sent to Amsterdam when young, and placed under the instruction of Renier Gueritsen, with whom he continued five years. He afterwards studied perspective and architecture under another master, whose name is not mentioned. In 1549, he went to Antwerp, where, in conjunction with other artists, he was employed in painting the triumphal arches and other decorations for the celebration of the Entry of the Emperor Charles V. and his son Philip into that city, on which occasion he displayed so much ability, as to give him considerable employment in decorating the mansions of some of the principal nobility with perspective views, which he designed and painted with such truth and effect, as to produce complete illusion. He traveled through Germany and Italy, and everywhere met with abundant employment. He afterwards returned to Antwerp, where he settled, and continued to practice his profession till his death. His works are dispersed through Germany and the Low Countries, and some of them are in the English collections. They are frequently enriched with the figures of other celebrated painters of his time, which adds to their value. He was much employed in making designs of architectural and other subjects for the printsellers, particularly for Jerome Cock, who published a great variety of prints from his designs. He published a treatise on perspective, which was afterwards enlarged by Samuel Marolois. It is said that he was also an architect and engraver, and the same as John Vredeman Frisius, which see. This is very probable, as the date of their births is the same. There have been published twenty-six books of prints by Vries, illustrating various styles of architecture, with views of buildings, villas, &c.

VRIES, PAUL DE, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1554, and died in 1598. He was instructed by his father, and followed his style with success. It is also said that he visited Prague, in Germany, and executed some extensive works in that city.

VRIES, SOLOMON DE, was also the son and scholar of John F. de Vries, born at Antwerp in 1556, and died at the Hague in 1604. He painted landscapes and ruins much in the style of his father, except that his coloring is too dark.

VRIES, ADRIAN DE, is supposed to have been a son or relative of John F. de V. Little is known of him, except that there is a set of large etchings of theatrical decorations by him, executed in a coarse, hasty style. He is said also to have been a painter of perspective and architecture.

VRIES, PETER DE, was the son of Solomon de V., born at the Hague in 1587, and died in 1642. He painted the same subjects as his father, and followed his style completely.

VRIES, JOHN RENIER DE, a landscape painter, who is supposed to have been a scholar of Jacob Ruysdael, whose style he followed. He painted a great number of small pictures on panel, generally woodland scenery, into which he generally introduced a cottage or a mill. His manner of handling resembles that of Ruysdael, but his coloring has the sombre hues of Decker. His pictures are usually signed with a monogram, bearing so strong a resemblance to that of Ruysdael, that many have been deceived by it. He flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. There were several other painters of this name of less note.

VROMANS, or VROOMANS, NICHOLAS, a Dutch painter, born in 1660. He painted serpents, toads, lizards, and other disgusting reptiles, with such truth that he was called "the painter of serpents."

VROOM, HENRY CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1566. He was the son of a sculptor, who dying when he was young, his mother afterwards married Cornelius Henricksen, a painter on china, who instructed him in the first principles of art. He visited Spain, Italy, and various other countries, and painted marines with considerable reputation. He executed the designs for tapestry illustrating the defeat of the Spanish Armada, for the Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral of England. His works are now held in little estimation. His name is often written Vroom. He died in 1619.

VRYE, THIERRY DE, a Dutch painter, born at Gouda in 1530. He went to Paris, where he painted portraits and history with considerable reputation, and died there in 1582.

VUEZ, ARNOLD. This painter was born at Oppenois, near St. Omer, in 1642. He was the son of a turner in metals, who, when obliged by poverty to enlist as a soldier, placed him under a Jewish painter of St. Omer. Young Vuez here manifested so much ability that his instructor recommended him to visit Paris, and gave him a letter to an artist named Frère Luc, in whose school he remained three years, and then went to Italy. On arriving at Venice, he sought out his uncle, a canon of St. Mark, who advanced him the means necessary to visit Rome. He studied the grand works of art in that city, and carried off the first prize at the Academy. A copy of Raffaele's School of Athens, which he took to Venice, gained him new favors from his generous relative, and on returning to Rome, he recommenced his studies with new ardor. The Prince Pamfili took him under his protection, and procured him many commissions; but this success awakened envy among other artists, and various plots were formed for his destruction. At length, in a personal encounter, Vuez killed his intended assassin in self-defence. About this time, he received an invitation from le Brun to visit Paris, which he accepted, and was received by that painter with the greatest kindness. The King gave him a pension, and he executed many good works. He was patronized by the Duchess of Bouillon, and also by Louvois, who commissioned him to visit Lille to paint a picture of the Presentation in the Temple, for the church of the Hospital in that city. During his sojourn at Lille, Vuez received so many commissions, that he concluded to remain there permanently; and during the rest of his life, he executed numerous works for the churches of Lille, Cambrai, and Douay. The pictures of Vuez evince great fertility of invention; and although the coloring is quite defective, they are correctly designed, and embellished with rich architecture. He drew his figures before draping them; his groups are admirably distributed, and he made nature his model. Among his principal works are mentioned the Resurrection; the Martyrdom of St. Andrew; the Judgment of Solomon; Daniel in the Den of Lions; the Discovery of the Promised Land, and the Descent from the Cross. Vuez was chosen an alderman of the city of Lille. He died in 1724, aged 82.

VUIBERT, REMI, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris in 1607. He is supposed to have studied under Vouet. He went to Italy, and passed many years at Rome, and probably died there. He executed quite a number of plates after Raffaele, Domenichino, Poussin, Pietro da Cortona, Duquesnoy, and others from his own designs; which are dated from 1635 to 1663. His name is sometimes written Wibert, but he signed his prints Remigius Vuibert Gallus. Little is known of his works as a painter. Bartsch describes twenty-nine prints by him.

VYL, J. DEN. There are some etchings of cows, oxen, bulls, sheep, and dogs, variously signed, J. or J. den Vyl, Uil, or Uyl, probably the work of one artist.

VYTH, or VEYTH, JOHN MARTIN, a Swiss painter, born at Schaffhausen in 1650. After learning the rudiments of art in his native city, he went to Italy, and passed several years at Rome and Venice, and attached himself to the grand style of Michael Angelo, which is discernible in all his works. On his return to his native country, he acquired a high reputation as a painter of history, and executed many works for the collections of Berne, Basle and Schaffhausen, which are held in high esteem. Though his works prove him to have been one of the ablest artists of his country, his merits were not appreciated in his day, and he lived in poverty. He died in 1717.

W.

WAAL. See WÆL.

WAARD, or WAERD, ANTHONY DE, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1689. He first studied under Simon vander Does, and afterwards at Paris. He is said to have painted history, portraits, landscapes, and animals, with considerable reputation. His works are little known out of his own country, where they are esteemed. He died about 1752.

WAAS, or WAES, AART VAN, a Dutch painter, a native of Gouda, was a scholar of Wouter Crabeth. He went to Italy, where he resided some time. On his return to his native city, he painted conversations and familiar subjects with considerable reputation. He died at Gouda, according to Balkema, in 1646, and to Immerzeel, in 1650. There are nine etchings of grotesque subjects attributed to him in Hazzard's Catalogue of Prints.

WACH, KARL WILHELM, a Prussian painter, was born at Berlin in 1790, of highly respectable parentage. He commenced studying under Kretschmer, and executed a number of pictures which, compared with the average productions of that period, displayed superior talent. His studies were interrupted by the events of 1813, which occasioned him to serve as an officer in the Prussian militia. Even then, he did not entirely relinquish the pencil, and after the general peace he remained some time at Paris, studying the works of art then collected in that capital, and next visited Italy, where he allied himself with Overbeck, Schadow, and others who have since become famous in German art. On returning to Berlin in 1819, Wach immediately rose into high credit and favor with the public, more especially as a portrait painter, in which character he stood preëminent among his countrymen and cotemporaries. He also became highly distinguished in historical painting, and was one of those reformers who have contributed to establish the present German school. This eminent artist was chosen Professor of the Academy at Berlin, and discharged the duties of that office until his death, in November, 1845. His labors and researches in respect to the important subject of the chemical preparation of colors and varnishes, are said to have been attended by some valuable results.

WACHSMUTH, JEROME, a German engraver, who flourished at Vienna about 1730. He engraved several prints, among which are the Elements, and the Seasons, from his own designs, evincing an humble imitation of the style of Bernard Picart.

WÆGMAN, HENRY, a Swiss painter, born at Zurich, according to Füessli, in 1536. He is little known as a painter, but he executed many drawings, in a vigorous and spirited style, resembling that of Paolo Farinato, which possess great merit. He was also an engraver.

WÆL, or WAAL, JOHN DE, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1557. He was a disciple of the elder Frank, in whose style he painted history with considerable reputation, as is evident from two circumstances, namely, that he was elected a member of the Academy in his native city, and that Vandyck painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country. His works are said to be very rare. He died, according to the best authorities, in 1602, in the prime of life; though Zani and Füessli say he died in 1633, aged 75 years. Bartsch says that John de Wael the Old, went to Paris in company with John de Mayer, where he acquired a fortune, and died in 1633. It is very probable that there were two artists of this name. (See John Baptist de Wael.) His name is variously written Wael, Waal, and Weel, but he wrote it Wael.

WÆL, or WAAL, LUCAS DE, was the son of the preceding, born at Antwerp in 1591. He received his first instruction from his father, but his genius leading him to landscape, he was placed under the tuition of John Breughel, with whom he made rapid progress, and adopted his style with great success. On leaving this master, he went to Italy, where he resided several years, and distinguished himself by some admirable works, both in oil and fresco, particularly at Genoa, where his works were highly esteemed, and he met with very flattering encouragement. Although he sometimes painted battle-pieces and attacks of cavalry, well composed, correctly designed, and touched with great spirit and animation, yet his most esteemed works are his mountainous landscapes, representing a great variety of precipices, craggy rocks, torrents, waterfalls, and other picturesque scenery, extremely pleasing; his coloring is chaste and natural, and his pencil neat and spirited. He died in 1676.

WÆL, or WAAL, CORNELIUS DE, was the younger brother of Lucas de Wael, born at Antwerp in 1594. He studied with his father, and accompanied Lucas to Italy, where he distinguished himself as a painter of battles, skirmishes of cavalry, marches, processions, and landscapes. He appeared most eminent in his battles and sea-fights, in which the fury of the combatants, the joy and exultation of the victors, the dejection and terror of the vanquished, and the sufferings of the wounded, are depicted with great force. His landscapes were also admired for the agreeable choice of his scenery, pleasing degradation of his distances, and for excellent keeping. His compositions are ingenious and abundant, his figures and horses are correctly designed, his coloring chaste and natural, his pencil free and masterly, and his touch peculiarly adapted to his subject. Though his taste was entirely Flemish in the forms, habits, character, countenances and airs of his heads, in his figures, as well as in his horses and cattle, he nevertheless acquired a high reputation in Italy, and was much patronized by princes and the nobility. The Duke d'Arshot (probably a Spaniard), appointed him his principal painter, for whom he executed many of his choicest works. He was also much patronized by Philip III., king of Spain, who held his works in the highest estimation; but whether he ever visited the Spanish court is not mentioned. The particulars of his life are too briefly recorded. It would seem that both Cornelius and Lucas passed most of their artistic lives in Italy. Cornelius is said by most writers to have died in 1662, but where, is not stated. Soprani and Lanzi say that he was living at Genoa in 1665. He executed some spirited etchings from his own designs.

WÆL, or WAAL, JOHN BAPTIST DE. This artist, according to Huber, was the nephew of Cornelius de Wael, but he does not say whether he was the son of Lucas, or of another brother. He executed some slight etchings from the designs of his uncle, among which are a set of eight prints, representing the History of the Prodigal Son. Bartsch, on the contrary, is of opinion that there were two artists of this name. He says, (Peintre Graveur, tom. v.) "We have a series of five prints, representing the life of the Prodigal Son, which are engraved after the designs of Cornelius de Wael. Three of these plates are anonymous; the other two are by John Baptist de Wael, who has marked them with his name, and the date 1658. This artist, cotemporary with Cornelius de Wael, or perhaps his son, is absolutely unknown. In comparing the two signed prints, with the fourteen pieces of which we have given the description, and which also bear the name of John Baptist de Wael, it becomes evident that these latter cannot be the work of the John of 1658, so much difference is there in the composition, drawing, and point. There is, therefore, no doubt that the author of them is John Baptist de Wael, who, according to Descamps, was the father of Cornelius." Bartsch then goes on to give an account of John de Wael, whom he designates the Old, as above related, in the life of that artist. Be this as it may, there is no account of John de Wael ever having been in Italy, and the title page of the fourteen prints in question, clearly shows that they were engraved and published in Rome.

WAESBERGE, ISAAC, a Dutch engraver, whose prints date from about 1650 to 1660. He engraved some portraits, among which is one of Admiral de Ruyter, after H. Berckmans, executed in a style resembling that of Cornelius Visscher.

HE W or JEW WAGNER, HANS ERHARD, a German engraver, who was a native of Strasburg, according to Professor Christ, and flourished about 1690. He engraved a considerable number of plates of various subjects, which he marked with a monogram of his initials, as above.

WAGNER, JAMES, a German engraver, probably of the same family as the preceding. According to Prof. Christ, he engraved some prints, which he usually marked J. Wa. fec.

WAGNER, JOHN GEORGE, a German painter, born at Dresden in 1732. He was a disciple of the celebrated Dietrich, whose manner and subjects he imitated with such success, that his works frequently pass for the genuine productions of his master, especially in foreign countries. Stanley says his pictures have frequently been sold in England as the works of Dietrich. His drawings in water-colors are highly esteemed. He is sometimes called the Younger, to distinguish him from another artist of the same name, who painted portraits and history with some reputation, and flourished in the previous century. He died in 1767.

WAGNER, JOSEPH, a Swiss engraver, born at Thalendorf, on Lake Constance, in 1706. He first studied painting at Venice, under Jacopo Amiconi, who, perceiving that he had a better genius for engraving than for painting, advised him to devote himself to that art. He accordingly accompanied his preceptor to Paris, where he studied some time under Lawrence Cars. He also went with Amiconi to London in 1733, where he resided some time, and engraved several plates, among which were three of the princesses Anne, Amelia, and Caroline, daughters of George II. He afterwards returned to Venice, and established himself as an engraver, also carrying on a considerable commerce in prints. He instructed several pupils, who distinguished themselves; among them were Bartolozzi, Flipart, and Berardi. His plates are numerous, and possess considerable merit. The following are the most esteemed. He died at Venice in 1780.

WAILLY, CHARLES DE, a distinguished French architect, was born at Paris in 1729. He early manifested a strong inclination for art, and studied successively under Blondel and Lejay; after which he completed his course under Servandoni, and gained the grand academical prize in architecture in 1752. This entitled him to three years' residence in Italy, at the expense of government, but he generously desired and obtained permission to divide this advantage with Moreau, one of his competitors, who drew the second prize. While residing in Italy, he attained sufficient reputation to be chosen a member of the Institute at Bologna. After his return to Paris, he was admitted to the Academy of Architecture in 1767, and in 1771 to the Academy of Painting, on which occasion he presented a perspective design of the staircase to the new theatre then projected, afterwards called the Odeon. Wailly was much employed in the distribution and ornamenting of the interiors of edifices, and he executed many elegant designs of this description, among which were the interiors of the Hotel d'Argenson at Paris, the chateau des Ormes, the Odeon Theatre, and the Palazzo Spinola at Genoa. The Landgrave of Hesse Cassel invited him to his court, and the magnificent plans which he made for the embellishment of the Capital and the State of that prince, are preserved in two folio volumes, in the Library at Cassel. He was an indefatigable designer, and gained such high reputation, that the Prince of Nassau invited him to his court, and the Empress Catherine offered him the presidency of the Academy of Architecture at St. Petersburg. After the conquest of the Low Countries, he was sent to select the finest works of art by the Dutch and Flemish masters, which were placed in the Louvre; and he was one of the original members of the Institute. Wailly died at Paris in 1798.

W ♀ WALCH, JACOB, an old German engraver, who flourished about 1480, and is thought by some to have been the master of Michael Wolgemut—a supposition that is extremely questionable. Walch engraved on copper, whereas the greater part of the works of Wolgemut are wooden cuts, and his few copper plates are very unlike those by Walch, whose style bears a great resemblance to that of Israel von Mecheln. Besides, Wolgemut was probably the oldest, as he was born in 1434. The prints attributed to Walch are characterized by all the stiffness and formality of the primitive productions of the German school. They are usually marked with a W. and a kind of Gothic cross, as above. There are a few prints marked with a similar cross alone, which some attribute to him, but they are very rudely engraved, and resemble the more bold and determined style of Martin Schoen, of whom the artist was probably a cotemporary.

WALCH, GEORGE, a German engraver, who flourished from about 1650 to 1678. There are some portraits by him, executed with the graver in a very indifferent style, and also several in mezzotinto. He appears to have resided chiefly at Nuremberg.

WALCH, SEBASTIAN, a Swiss engraver in mezzotinto, who executed a series of portraits of the burgomasters of Zurich, from 1336 to 1740, from the designs of J. C. Fuessli. He was living in 1756.

WALDIE, JANE. See WATTS.

WALE, SAMUEL, an English artist, born in London, who served an apprenticeship with an engraver on plate. He afterwards studied design in the Academy in St. Martin's Lane, and was chiefly employed in designing for the booksellers. He also practiced decorative painting, in which he imitated the manner of Francis Hayman. He was one of the first forty members of the Royal Academy, was appointed professor of perspective, and on the death of Wilson, was also made Librarian, both which situations he held till his death, in 1786. He etched a few vignettes from his own designs.

WALES, JAMES, a Scotch artist, probably an amateur, born at Peterhead in 1748. He was educated in the University College, at Aberdeen. In 1791, he went to the East Indies, in what capacity is not mentioned, and died there in 1796. He designed twenty-four views of the Mountains of Ellora and the Hindoo Excavations, which were afterwards published in T. and W. Daniell's "Oriental Scenery." He is also said to have painted many portraits in India, some of them of Indian princes.

WALKER, ROBERT, an English portrait painter, who flourished in the time of the Protectorate, and died at London in 1660. He painted the portrait of Cromwell four times, and was much employed by the chiefs of the Republican party. He imitated Vandyck.

WALKER, ANTHONY, an English engraver, who flourished about 1760. He was chiefly employed in engraving vignettes, frontispieces, and other plates for the booksellers, some of which are from his own designs. He also engraved some plates for Alderman Boydell, among which are Curius Dentatus refusing the Presents of the Samnites, after P. da Cortona; the Village Lawyer and his Clients, after Holbein; and the Angel departing from the house of Tobit, after Rembrandt.

WALKER, WILLIAM, was the brother of the preceding. He was much employed in engraving for the collection of Boydell, after the Italian, Dutch, and Flemish masters. Some of his prints possess considerable merit.

WALL, WILLIAM RUTGAART VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1756, and died there in 1813. He painted landscapes with considerable reputation. His figures and animals are correctly designed, and touched with neatness and spirit.

WALLINT, FRANCESCO, a Flemish painter, who appears to have passed his artistic life in Italy, and flourished at Rome in the first part of the 18th century, perhaps as late as 1750. Lanzi says, "Francesco Wallint, called Monsieur Studio, lived at Rome at the same time as Francis van Bloemen. He painted small landscapes and sea-views, ornamented with beautiful figures, in which he imitated Claude. He was, however, devoid of that sentiment which is the gift of nature, and that delicacy which charms in the Italian school." He had a son called Francesco Wallint the Younger, who attached himself to the same manner, with success, but he did not equal his father. See Henry van Lint.

WALMSLEY, JOHN, an English landscape painter, born in 1763, and died at Bath in 1805. He was the son of Major Walmsley, who was stationed in Ireland with his regiment. Having a serious dispute with his friends, he went to London, where he was employed as scene painter, first at the King's Theatre, and afterwards at Covent Garden. He resided at Bath the last ten years of his life, where he painted landscapes of a small size, which Cunningham says are "truly excellent."

WALRAVEN, ISAAC, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1686, and died there in 1765. He first studied under Gerard Rademaker, and afterwards went to Dusseldorf, where he improved himself by copying the best works in the Gallery. He painted history and fancy pieces with considerable reputation. His pictures are well composed and colored, and he had a good knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, but his drawing is incorrect, and his pencil lacks precision and firmness. His pictures, however, are said to have brought good prices; two small pieces of Children sporting, brought, at the sale of his effects after his death, 800 florins each, and another, an historical subject, 1500. He also etched some small plates from his own designs, in which he appears to have imitated Stefano Della Bella.

WALSCAPELLE, JACOB, a Dutch painter of flowers, of whom little is known. He is supposed to have been a cotemporary, and perhaps a scholar of John David de Heem, whose style he imitated. His pictures are found in the best collections of his country, where they are held in high estimation. He particularly excelled in representing groups of flowers in glass bottles. His pictures are tastefully arranged, his coloring is fresh and transparent, his foliage and flowers sparkle with dew-drops, and the butterflies, moths, and other insects give them additional interest. His name is sometimes written Waltskapelle.

WALTER, HENRY, an English painter of the present century. His subjects were chiefly land scapes and cattle. He exhibited occasionally at the Royal Academy, and the British Institution. He left quite a number of drawings, which are deserving of credit. He died in 1849.

WANDELAAR, JOHN, a Dutch designer and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1692. He studied under the elder Folkema, and became eminent in the art. He engraved some portraits, besides a variety of vignettes and other subjects, for the booksellers: but his best productions are a set of thirty-four plates for the great anatomical work of Albinus, entitled, Tabulae sceleti et musculorum corporis humani, which he designed from the subjects, under the direction of the great anatomist himself. They are drawn with the greatest accuracy, and executed in a spirited and masterly manner. There is an English translation of this capital work, in which the plates were copied, of the same size as the originals, by Grignon, Ravenet, Scotin, and others. Wandelaar is also said to have painted portraits, some of which are said to have been engraved by Houbraken. He died at Leyden in 1759.

WANS, or WAMPS, a Flemish painter, who flourished in the first half of the 17th century. He was accounted a good landscape painter. He also copied some of the works of Vandyek.

WARD, WILLIAM, an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished in the latter part of the 18th, and the first part of the present century. He was the brother-in-law of George Morland, and engraved many plates from his pictures, which had an extensive sale. He also executed many portraits after Reynolds, and other English painters, which display considerable talent. He was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy. He had a brother named James, who excelled in painting animals. There was also a Captain Ward, who held a commission in the service of the East India Company. He painted some landscapes and views in the East Indies, several of which were exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1772 and 1773.

WARD, WILLIAM JAMES, was the son of William Ward, born at London in 1801. He was instructed by his father, and engraved quite a number of portraits and other subjects, after Reynolds and other English painters. His prints were admired for their depth and richness of color, and artistic effect. He died in 1840.

WARNIR, JOHN, a German engraver, who flourished about 1636, and is supposed to have died very young. He copied some prints after the old German masters, which, though neatly executed, have all the appearance of servile imitation. He copied the print of Albert Durer, representing St. Jerome seated before a crucifix, with a city in the background, which is inscribed Jh. Warnir, Æ. 16, 1636; also the Twelve Apostles, after the same master, in the following year, when he was seventeen, Jh. W. Æ. 17.

WARREN, CHARLES, an English engraver, who died in 1823. He engraved a great number of small plates, neatly executed, after Stothard, Westall, Smirke, and others, to illustrate the various editions of the British poets and novelists, published by Harrison, Bell, Cadell, and other enterprising booksellers of his day.

WASSEMBERG, JOHN ABEL, a Dutch painter, born at Groningen in 1689. He was the son of a lawyer, who intended him for the same profession, and gave him a classical education, but his passion for painting induced the father to place him under the instruction of John van Dieren, a painter of little note. After remaining with the latter till the age of twenty-three, he went to Rotterdam, and became the disciple of Adrian vander Werf, who aided him with friendly counsel, and took particular pains to instruct him in his method of coloring and penciling. On returning to his native city, Wassemberg soon gave proof of his abilities, and received many commissions to decorate the saloons and ceilings of the principal inhabitants. He was also much employed in portraiture, in which he excelled. His talents recommended him to the patronage of the Prince of Orange, who employed him to paint the portraits of himself and family, and the principal personages of his court. He was not less celebrated for his cabinet pictures from sacred and profane history, in which he imitated the polished style of vander Werf with such success, that his works of this class were accounted little inferior to the admirable productions of that master. It is not a little remarkable, that an artist who was accustomed to large works, both in oil and fresco, which must be viewed at a distance, to produce the desired effect on the eye, could adapt his touch, tints, and handling to such small pieces as required the nearest view, and even the use of the glass, to perceive their beauties. He died in 1750.

WASSEMBERG, ELIZABETH GERTRUDE, was the daughter and pupil of the preceding. She painted cabinet pictures, similar to those of her father, finished in such an exquisite manner, that some of them are said to closely approach the productions of Gerard Douw. She died in 1782.

WASSER, ANNA, an eminent Swiss paintress, born at Zurich in 1679. She early discovered a lively genius, so that before the age of twelve, she could speak and write the Latin and French languages correctly, and had made considerable progress in the Belles Lettres. She showed such a taste for painting, and had made such progress in design at thirteen years of age, that her father, who was a man of some distinction, and a member of the Common Council of the city, was induced to place her under the instruction of Joseph Werner of Berne, one of the most eminent artists of Switzerland, with whom she made surprising progress. At first she painted some pictures in oil, but manifesting peculiar talents for miniature, she applied herself entirely to that branch, and soon arrived at such perfection as almost rivalled Werner himself. Her fame spread throughout all Germany, and there was scarcely a court in Europe from which she did not receive commissions. The Duke of Wurtemberg and the Margrave of Baden-Durlach, were among her most distinguished patrons. Her talents were not confined to portraits, though she was mostly employed in this branch; she excelled in painting pastoral and rural subjects, composed with great ingenuity, and finished with uncommon delicacy. She died unmarried in 1713.

WATELET, CLAUDE HENRY, an eminent French amateur engraver and writer on art, born at Paris in 1718. His father was receiver-general of the finances, to which post he succeeded after his death. After receiving a liberal education, he traveled through Germany to Italy, and passed some time at Rome, where he made the acquaintance of M. Pierre, an eminent French painter, with whom he contemplated the most remarkable works of art in that metropolis. On returning to Paris, he devoted much of his time to an assiduous cultivation of the fine arts. He executed upwards of a hundred etchings after the Italian, French, and Flemish masters, some of which possess uncommon merit. In 1761 he published his poem on the Art of Painting, embellished with plates from the designs of M. Pierre, etched by himself, and finished with the graver by Lempereur. He was the principal author of a very laborious work published in 1792, four years after his death, with additions by M. Levesque, entitled Dictionnaire des Arts de Peinture, Sculpture, et Gravure. He died in 1788.

AXA or AEF or AV

WATERLOO, ANTHONY, an eminent Dutch painter and engraver, of whose early history nothing is known, and whose birth is variously placed at Amsterdam and Utrecht, about 1618. This much is certain, that he passed his artistic life in the latter city, and the scenery of his pictures is generally taken from its environs. His landscapes are characterized by the most interesting simplicity, sometimes representing the entrance into a forest; a broken road, with a few trunks of trees; a solitary cottage, or a water-mill; all evidently the transcripts of simple nature, as he saw it, without any attempt at improvement. Yet he treated these subjects in such an admirable manner as to entitle him to rank among the best landscape painters of his country. His skies are light and floating, his coloring chaste and natural, the foliage of his plants and trees is touched with great spirit, as well as with a marked attention to their different species, so that they can be readily distinguished, and the reflection of his objects in the water is wonderfully transparent and natural. He did not design the human figure correctly; therefore he frequently employed Weenix and other eminent artists of his time to insert the figures and cattle in his pictures, which are sometimes found without these accessories. His pictures are exceedingly rare, as he devoted much of his time to engraving, and he is said also to have led a dissipated life. It is reported that he never signed his pictures with his name.

As an engraver, the works of Waterloo have long been the admiration of artists and connoisseurs. They are etched with great spirit and facility, in a very masterly style, and usually retouched with the graver, to harmonize the lights and invigorate the shadows. They consist of landscapes from his own designs, frequently embellished with figures from sacred and profane history, and mythology. He etched the whole design with equal strength, but slightly, and then finished in a bold manner those parts which he desired to be most effective. Therefore as the plates were worked off, the etching grew imperceptibly fainter, while that part executed with the graver, suffered little change; which accounts for the numerous poor impressions. Bartsch regards his prints of so much interest and importance, that he minutely describes one hundred and thirty-six, which he believes to be a complete catalogue.

For further information on this subject, the reader must be referred to Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. ii., and Weigel's Supplement to Bartsch. He usually marked his prints with one of the above monograms, but sometimes with the initials A. W. f.; and Stanley mentions one in the British Museum signed A. Waterlo fec. Some writers say that he died in the prime of life from dissipation, but Houbraken and Weyermans assert that he died in the hospital of St. Job at Utrecht, in 1679, which is doubtless correct.

HW WATMAN, HENRY, a Dutch or German engraver, of whom little is known. According to Professor Christ, he engraved some landscapes, which are marked with the above monogram.

WATSON, CAROLINE, an English lady, born at London in 1760, who distinguished herself as an engraver in the dotted manner, and in mezzotinto. She was instructed by her father, and executed quite a number of plates which possess great merit. Among others are the following by her:

WATSON, THOMAS, an eminent English engraver in mezzotinto, born at London in 1750. He was probably of the same family as the preceding. Though he died at comparatively an early age, he is regarded as one of the ablest English artists in his particular branch. He died in 1781. The following are his most esteemed prints:

WATSON, JAMES. This artist was of the same family as the preceding. He greatly distinguished himself as an engraver in mezzotinto. His plates are very numerous, and are held in high estimation, particularly those after Reynolds. The following are the principal:

WATSON, MUSGROVE SOUTHWAITE, an English sculptor, born near Carlisle, in 1804. When quite young he went to London, and was advised by Flaxman to visit Italy. After remaining in that country about three years, studying and copying the sculptures of the best masters, he returned to London, where he was employed by Chantrey as a modeller. His merit now began to be known, and after a few years of persevering endeavors, he was commissioned to execute the magnificent group of Lords Eldon and Stowell, which gained him great reputation. He soon had plenty of employment, and executed a number of fine works, among which may be mentioned the colossal statue of the Earl of Lonsdale, the statue of Queen Elizabeth in the Royal Exchange, also two bas-reliefs of the Battle of St. Vincent, and Dante and Beatrice. The two latter works have been very much admired. He modelled and cast in plaster his beautiful Flaxman monument, but it was not completed till after his death. He exhibited at the Royal Academy a bas-relief monument to the memory of Allan Cunningham, entitled "Literature;" also another, "Death and Sleep bearing off the Body of Sarpedon;" and a bas-relief monument of Dr. Cameron. The three latter works have been highly praised by the critics. Watson died in 1847, at the age of 43.

WATTEAU, ANTHONY, an eminent French painter, born at Valenciennes, in 1684. He early discovered a passion for painting, but his parents being very poor, were unable to give him an education suitable to his genius. They however procured him the instruction of an obscure artist in his native city, with whom he continued until the latter could render him no further assistance. In 1702, he connected himself with a scene painter, and went to Paris, where they obtained employment for a short time, but Watteau soon found himself solitary and destitute in that great city, and he was compelled to work for the shops, for a scanty maintenance. While in this situation, he became accidentally acquainted with Claude Gillot, a painter and engraver of grotesque and fabulous subjects, who conceived such a friendship for Watteau that he took him into his house, communicated to him all the information he possessed, the observations he had made, and the precepts by which he had formed his own style. It was not long before Watteau surpassed his friendly instructor. Shortly after this, he was employed by Audran to make some designs from the pictures in the Luxembourg Gallery, where he was so strongly impressed by the splendid works of Rubens, that he was fired with the ambition to become an historical painter, and he studied them with great assiduity, by which means he acquired an admirable system of coloring, and a good knowledge of chiaro-scuro. He also entered the Academy, designed from the living model, and drew the first prize for a historical piece. Fortunately for his fame, he discovered that history was not his forte, and he struck out into a new and original style, in which he acquired a lasting reputation, and which gave rise to a host of imitators, without ever producing a rival. His subjects are usually comic conversations, musical parties, balls, masquerades, gallant and pastoral subjects, which he designed correctly, and with admirable finesse, ease, and natural grace. His coloring is fresh and splendid, and he is equally admired in the tenderness of his carnations, the brilliancy of his habiliments, and the verdure of his landscapes. His pencil is free and flowing, his touch neat and spirited, and his pictures are carefully finished in every part. The figures which he introduces into his compositions, in whatever character he designs them, have a peculiar naïveté and grace in the airs of the heads, in the attitudes and actions. The national taste of his country, however, prevails in all his productions. Watteau also painted the marchings, halts, and encampments of armies, with great success. Lord Orford makes the following admirable criticism upon his works. "Watteau painted imaginary nymphs and swains, and described a kind of impossible pastoral, a rural life, led by those opposites of rural simplicity, people of rank and fashion. His shepherdesses, nay, his very sheep are coquettes; yet he avoided the glare and clinquant of his countrymen; and, though he fell short of the dignified grace of the Italians, there is an easy air in his figures, and that more familiar species of the graceful which we call genteel. His nymphs are as much below the forbidding majesty of goddesses, as they are above the hoyden awkwardness of country girls. In his halts and marches of cavalry, the careless slouch of the soldiers still retain the air of a nation that aspires to be agreeable, as well as victorious."

Watteau found abundant employment, and was indefatigable in the exercise of his pencil. His works, though numerous, are rarely to be met with out of the collections of his own country, where they are held in great estimation. His reputation abroad has been injured by a multitude of imitations, many of which have been sold for his genuine works. He executed a few spirited etchings, from his own designs. He also left behind him a great number of drawings, in red and black chalk. Having injured his health by his intense professional application, he went to England, to consult the celebrated Dr. Meade, and resided there about one year. He died shortly after his return to France, in 1721.

WATTS, JANE. This highly gifted lady was the daughter of George Waldie, of Hendersyde Park, Scotland, where she was born in 1789. Almost in her infancy, she exhibited a passion for drawing. She painted landscapes in oil, which were greatly admired, and many of them were exhibited at the Royal Academy and the British Institution, with universal applause. She was also accomplished in literature, in which she displayed equal talent. She died in 1826.

WATTS, WILLIAM, an English engraver, was born in 1752. His father was a master silk-weaver in the neighborhood of Moorfields, and placed him under the tuition of Paul Sandby and Thomas Rooker. While with the latter, Watts assisted in some of Woollett's plates; and after his instructor's death, he continued the publication of a periodical work commenced by Rooker, entitled, "The Copperplate Magazine," being the first English magazine ever embellished with copper plates. In 1779, he commenced a work entitled "Views of Gentlemen's Seats," published by subscription during the succeeding years, until completed in 1786. He then sold the plates to Boydell, and visited Naples in the same year, where he received much kindness from Sir Wm. Hamilton and his lady. After spending nine months in Italy, he returned to England, and published, about 1791, his twelve Views of the city of Bath, which are esteemed beautiful specimens of line engraving. For several years he relinquished the art, but having invested the greater portion of his property in French funds, he was compelled to return to it, in consequence of an act confiscating the property of British subjects. Between 1801 and 1805, he published his last work, containing sixty views in Turkey and Palestine, from drawings made by Luigi Mayer during the Embassy of Sir Robert Ainslie to the Sublime Porte. In 1814, he purchased a small property at Cobham, in Surrey, and at the peace of 1815 recovered about half of his investment in the French funds. He died at his residence, in 1851, aged about 100 years. Watts was formerly intimate with Bartolozzi, Middiman, Milton, and other eminent engravers of his day. His plates are esteemed for their beautiful selection, truth, simplicity, and fine artistic execution.

WAUMANS, CONRAD. This Flemish engraver flourished at Antwerp, his native place, about 1642. He studied under Peter Bailliu, and executed a number of plates of portraits and historical subjects after the painters of his country, which are little inferior to those of his instructor.—Among them are the following:

PORTRAITS.

SUBJECTS AFTER VARIOUS MASTERS.

The Descent from the Cross; after Rubens. The Assumption of the Virgin; do. The Virgin and infant Jesus; after Vandyck. Mars and Venus; do.

WEBB, WESTFIELD, an English painter, who died at London in 1772. He usually painted portraits, and sometimes flower-pieces; but he never rose above mediocrity.

WEBBER, JOHN, an English painter, designer, and engraver, born in London in 1752. His father, a Swiss sculptor of Berne, sent him to Paris while young, where he received a part of his artistic education, and, on returning to London, he frequented the Royal Academy. Having acquired considerable reputation as a designer, he was appointed draughtsman to the last expedition made by Captain Cook round the world. On his return in 1780, he was employed by the Lords of the Admiralty to superintend the engraving of the prints made from his designs by Bartolozzi, and other eminent artists. When this work was completed, he published on his own account a set of views of the principal places he had visited, which he etched and aquatinted, and afterwards colored, producing a very pleasing effect. He afterwards devoted himself to landscape painting, usually representing scenes in the South Sea Islands, which, though gaudily colored, are well finished, and produce a pleasing effect. He was elected an Associate in 1785, and a Royal Academician in 1791. He died in 1793.

WEBBERS, J., a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1656, in which year he published a set of indifferently executed views of the churches and public edifices in that city, engraved by himself, with descriptions in Dutch and French.—There was a painter named Zachariah Webber, who flourished at Amsterdam, and died in 1697.

WEELING, ANSELM, a Dutch painter, born at Bois-le-Duc in 1675. He was the son of an officer in the service of the States General, and was intended for the profession of arms; but discovering a passion for painting, he was placed under the instruction of one Delang, an obscure painter in his native city, with whom he continued till he had the satisfaction of being acknowledged his superior. He then went to Middleburg, to commence business for himself, where he became acquainted with Jacob Bart, an eminent picture dealer, who had a fine collection of the works of the most eminent masters of the Dutch school. The sight of these fine works made Weeling perceive his own inferiority, and in a fit of despondency, he resolved to go to the East Indies; but encouraged by Bart, who received him into his own house, he devoted two years, with great assiduity, in studying and copying the fine collection. His improvement equalled his industry; some of his pictures were highly commended, and sold for high prices. He was particularly attached to the productions of Godfrey Schalcken and Adrian vander Werf, whose styles he followed with great success. His most esteemed pictures are his candle-light scenes, in which he imitated Schalcken so closely that some of his works have been mistaken for the productions of that master. In his best works, his design is tolerably correct, his color is warm and glowing, and he evinced an excellent knowledge of the effects of light and shadow. In the latter part of his life, he became a slave to intemperance and debauchery, which destroyed his powers, and reduced him to poverty and wretchedness, so that his later performances are greatly inferior to his earlier ones. He died in 1749.

WEENIX, or WEENINX, JOHN BAPTIST, called the Elder, an eminent Dutch painter born at Amsterdam in 1621. He was the son of John Weenix, an architect of considerable note, who intended him for the same profession; but the latter dying while he was young, his mother allowed him to follow the bent of his genius. He first studied with John Micker, a painter of little note, and next with Abraham Bloemaert, under whose able instruction he made surprising progress, and in a short time surpassed his instructor, by the facility and precision with which he designed the principal buildings, castles, and ruins about Amsterdam. He drew with equal spirit and accuracy all kinds of animals, as well as the human figure. On leaving the school of Bloemaert, he studied two years under Nicholas Moyaert, till he could imitate his style so closely that it was almost impossible to distinguish the works of the master from those of his pupil. At the age of eighteen, he went to Italy, and on his arrival at Rome, he was struck with the sublime edifices and ruins of ancient grandeur, and he applied himself to designing them with his wonted assiduity. His great talents recommended him to the patronage of the Cardinal Pamfili, who not only favored him with many commissions, and liberal remunerations, but also settled upon him a considerable pension, that he might pursue his studies without interruption. This prelate was very desirous to retain Weenix at Rome, and offered to engage him in the service of the Pope, but the solicitations of his family, and his love of country, induced him to forego the brilliant prospects before him, and he returned to Holland, after an absence of four years. He soon found abundant employment, and acquired the reputation of one of the ablest artists of his country.

Weenix possessed extraordinary and varied talents. He painted history, portraits, landscapes, sea-ports, animals, and dead game, in all which branches he showed uncommon ability; but his greatest excellence was in painting Italian sea-ports, of large size, enriched with noble edifices, and decorated with figures representing embarkations, and all the activity of commercial industry. In these subjects he has scarcely been surpassed, except by his pupil, Nicholas Berghem. His figures and objects are correctly designed, his coloring clear and harmonious, his pencil free and flowing, his touch bold and animated, and though he wrought with wonderful facility, he did not neglect to finish his pieces well. His portraits are vigorously executed, and he obtained excellent likenesses. Houbraken mentions several instances of his admirable facility of hand. He frequently painted a large landscape, and inserted the figures in a single day, and on one occasion, he commenced and completed three portraits on canvass, of three-quarters size, with heads as large as life, from sunrise to sunset, in a summer's day. He executed a few spirited etchings from his own designs; Bartsch describes two, to which Weigel has added five more, and doubtless there are others. The signatures on these are Batta. Weenix; J. B. Weenix, the J. and B. interlaced; Gio. Batta. Weenin; and J. Weenix; the one with the last signature was doubtless executed by his son. He died in 1660, aged 39 years.

WEENIX, or WEENINX, JOHN, called the Younger, was the son of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1644. He studied with his father until the age of sixteen, when his instructor died; yet he had made such progress that he was able to prosecute his studies, by the attentive study of nature, without any further assistance. Though of less universal talent than his father, he painted with great ability, landscapes, huntings, animals, dead game, flowers, and fruit. He particularly excelled in the representations of huntings and dead game, in which he may be said to have surpassed every artist of his country. His talents in this branch recommended him to the patronage of the Elector Palatine, who invited him to his court, appointed him his painter with a liberal pension, and employed him to decorate his palace at Bernsberg with many of his choicest works. Weenix

Painted in one gallery a series of pictures representing the hunting of the Stag, and in another the Chase of the Wild Boar, which gained him the greatest applause. There are also many of his best works in the Dusseldorf Gallery. He was equally successful in representing every species of animal, whether alive or dead. He painted all kinds of birds and fowls in an inimitable manner; the soft down of the duck, the glossy plumage of the pigeon, the splendor of the peacock, the magnificent spread of an inanimate swan, producing a flood of light, and serving as a contrast to all around it, are so attractive that it is impossible to contemplate one of his pictures of these objects without feeling admiration and delight at the painter's skill in rivaling nature. His living hounds and other dogs, as well as his dead game, are not less true, and his objects of still-life, such as sporting instruments, vessels, fruit, flowers, and other accessories with which he embellishes his principal subject, are all depicted with the same fidelity and beauty. It has been said that he did not equal his father in landscape, but it should be recollected that his landscape is always accessory to the principal subject with which it accords, and no more was required. In his large pictures, his compositions are ingenious, abundant, and picturesque, his touch is bold and animated, his coloring clear and brilliant, and he always exhibits a perfect intelligence of the chiaro-scuro. His works of a cabinet size are exquisitely finished, without impoverishing the spirit of his touch, or diminishing the breadth of his light and shadow. His works are numerous, and deservedly held in the highest estimation; and they are only to be found in the choicest collections. He continued to practice his profession to the last year of his life, without any apparent diminution of his powers. One of his finest pictures, in the collection of the king of Holland, is dated the year before his death. It is signed J. Weenix, f., 1718. He died in 1719.

WEERDT, ADRIAN DE, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1510. He first studied under Christian Queburgh, at Antwerp, a landscape painter of little note; but he afterwards went to Italy, and made the works of Parmiggiano the particular objects of his study. On his return to Brussels, he painted history in the graceful style of that master with considerable success, till the troubles in the Low Countries compelled him to take refuge at Cologne; where he died, in or about 1566. There is considerable discrepancy among writers as to his name, and the time and place of his death. He is variously called Adrian, Andrea, and Abraham de Weerdt, and some say his family name was Hoste.

WEERT, J. DE, an engraver, supposed to have been a native of Flanders, who flourished at Paris about 1605. He engraved some frontispieces, vignettes, and other book plates, in a neat, though tasteless style; also a set of plates from his own designs, representing the Life and Passion of Christ.

WEESOP. This painter, who was probably a native of the Low Countries, visited England, according to Walpole, in 1641, shortly before the death of Vandyck, whose style he imitated with such success, that several of his pictures have passed for the productions of that master. He quitted England in 1649.

WEIGEL, HANS or JOHN, a German designer and engraver on wood, who is said to have operated in 1535, and to have died at Nuremberg in or about 1590. He was also a printer. He engraved some ornamental book plates and a book of costumes, which are indifferently executed. He marked his cuts with his initials, H. W. His name is written on his book titles, Hans Weygel.

WEIGEL, CHRISTOPHER, a German engraver, born at Redwitz, in Bohemia, in 1654. After visiting various cities in Germany, he settled at Nuremberg, where he died in 1725. He engraved a set of Bible plates, from his own designs, entitled Sacra Scriptura loquens in imaginibus, &c., published at Nuremberg in 1690. They are executed with the graver, and each plate contains four prints; the plates amount to one hundred from the Old Testament, and one hundred and ten from the New. According to M. Heineken, he also engraved in mezzotinto. There is a portrait of Charles V. in mezzotinto, signed C. Weigel, f. et ex., 1688. He is said to have carried on an extensive commerce in prints.

WEINBRENNER, FRIEDRICH, an eminent German architect, was born at Carlsruhe in 1766. He was the son of a carpenter and builder, who died before the destination of Friedrich was fixed; and his studies thereafter were rather irregular, but having obtained from his elder brother sufficient insight into the practical routine of the art, he started on a tour for improvement in the spring of 1788. Arriving at Zurich, he was employed there a considerable time, in superintending some timber constructions; but though his stay in that city was rendered very agreeable by the society of several artists and literary men,—among the latter Lavater,—he hastened as soon as engagements would permit to Vienna, and after examining the architectural monuments in that capital, he proceeded to Dresden and Berlin. This he had proposed to himself as the extent of his travels, but in Berlin he became acquainted with the brothers Genelli, architects of considerable repute and talent, who urged him to visit Italy. This advice was so strongly seconded by Weinbrenner's inclination, that he resolved to adopt it, and accordingly set out for Rome in June 1792, in company with Carstens, and another young artist named Cabot.

Soon after arriving at Rome, when he had viewed with delight the great monuments of art, Weinbrenner felt, if not disheartened, most anxiously conscious that the study he had imposed upon himself required system and perseverance, and also more historical and antiquarian knowledge than he then possessed. The time that was not occupied in examining and drawing buildings, was devoted to books and literary research; yet not entirely, as the state of his finances obliged him to give instruction in architecture. For some time, numerous strangers of distinction took lessons of him, but the commotions of 1793 drove many strangers and artists from the city. Nevertheless, Weinbrenner remained there until 1797, with the exception of a considerable interval spent by him at Naples. On returning to Carlsruhe, he was appointed Inspector of Buildings, and soon after had the opportunity of displaying his ability in the erection of the new synagogue, and one or two private mansions. Notwithstanding this favorable commencement, he relinquished his office two years after, and went to settle at Strasburg, where the relations of his wife (Margaretha Arnold, whom he had shortly before married) resided, and were many of them artists. The change proved imprudent: Strasburg became menaced by hostilities, and Weinbrenner found himself without other occupation or resource than teaching a few pupils. At this juncture, he was invited by the Hanoverian government, through the recommendation of Prince Augustus, to inspect and improve the prisons of that country; but his wife and her family dissuaded him from accepting the proposal, and on receiving the offer of his former appointment at Carlsruhe, he accepted it, and returned to that city.

From this time, Weinbrenner was continually employed on various improvements and embellishments in the capital of Baden, and other parts of its territory. His numerous works exhibit various degrees of merit, according to the respective opportunities afforded him; but taken collectively, they manifest a great improvement in style, with individuality of character, and fresh and masterly combinations, instead of the mere routine of design. He applied himself to his art with higher views of it than were entertained by the generality of his countrymen, and diffused a similar feeling for it through the next generation of the profession, having instructed a great number of the eminent living architects of Germany. Weinbrenner deserves to rank among the most eminent modern architects of his country, not only on account of the numerous edifices erected and professional works published by him, but for his extensive influence in founding a better school of the art. Among his principal edifices are many at Carlsruhe, among others the Catholic church, the Lutheran church, Theatre, Ettlinger gate, Standeshaus, Museum, Mint, and the Hochberg palace. At Baden he erected the Conversation-haus or Assembly Rooms, baths, and Antiquitäten-halle or Museum, &c., besides the Leopold summer palace, and various private houses and smaller buildings. There are also a very considerable number of churches, mansions, villas, &c., erected or designed by him in other places within the territory of Baden; and not a few in various other parts of Germany, Leipsic, Strasburg, Dusseldorf, and Gottingen. Notwithstanding his numerous engagements, Weinbrenner published treatises on different branches of architectural study, viz., two on the orders of architecture, Zeichnungslehre, 1810; Optik, 1811; Perspectivlehre, 1817-24; Ueber Form und Schönheit, 1819; Ueber Architektonische Verzierungen, 1820; besides a work on theatres, and a variety of papers on architectural and artistic topics in the Morgenblatt, and other literary journals. Weinbrenner continued his professional pursuits and studies almost to the last, and died March 1st, 1826.

HW WEINHER, HANS or JOHN, a German painter and engraver who flourished in the first part of the 17th century. Little is known of him, but he is said to have been employed during boyhood in the service of the Duchess Maximilienne of Bavaria, in the capacity of valet de chambre. He learned engraving of Frédéric Sustis, and executed some plates which are marked with the above monogram.

WEINIER, PETER, a German designer and engraver, was also the assayer of the mint of the Duke of Bavaria, and lived at Munich in 1580. Bartsch describes only twelve prints by him, but Brulliot mentions many more. They are usually marked with his name, to which he sometimes adds Monachij and the date.

WEIROTTER, FRANCIS EDMUND, an eminent designer and engraver, born at Inspruck in 1730. After learning the rudiments of design, he went to Paris, and became the pupil of J. G. Wille. He traveled to Italy, where he resided some time, and returned to Paris with a large collection of designs, of the most beautiful and picturesque scenery and views in that delightful country. In 1767, he was invited to the court of Vienna, where he was appointed professor of the Academy of Design. We have by him a great number of charming etchings from his own designs, executed in a free, spirited and masterly style, and consisting of landscapes, views of ruins, bridges, edifices, cottages, &c., which are admired for their correctness of design and harmonious distribution of light and shadow. He usually published them in sets of twelve. He died at Vienna in 1773. The following are among the most esteemed of his numerous prints :

A set of twelve Views in Normandy, with a Dedication. Twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Prince of Kaunitz. A set of twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Prince of Staremberg. Twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Duke Albert of Saxe-Teschen. A set of twelve Views in Italy; dedicated to the Archduchess of Austria.

WEISBROD, CHARLES, a German engraver, born at Hamburg in 1754. He went to Paris, and became the disciple of J. G. Wille. He engraved a great number of landscapes, in the neat, clear style of his instructor, after Ruysdael, Pynacker, Adrian vande Velde, Poullain, Choiseul, Praslin, and others.

WEISHUN, SAMUEL, a German engraver, who flourished at Dresden from 1630 to 1650. He engraved a considerable number of portraits, which are executed with the graver, in a neat, but stiff and formal style. According to Professor Christ, he engraved a set of portraits of the princes of Saxony, some of which are marked with his initials S. W. Zani says he was a goldsmith, as well as a designer and engraver.

WEISSE, GOTTHELF WILLIAM, a German engraver, born at Dresden about 1750. He studied under Giuseppe Canale, and executed quite a number of plates of portraits, historical subjects, and landscapes, which display considerable ability.—He was invited to the court of Hesse Cassel, where the Landgrave appointed him his principal engraver. He engraved the portraits of the Landgrave and Landgravine.

WELBRONNER, NICHOLAS, a German engraver, who flourished, according to Professor Christ, about 1536. He engraved some plates of ornamental foliage and small figures in the manner of Hans Sebald Beham, which he marked with a monogram of his initials. Bartsch describes eighteen etchings supposed to be by him, and Brulliot says he is acquainted with fourteen more by the same artist, one of which is signed Nicolas Wilborn, 1536, his real name. Brulliot remarks that Professor Christ has not only misnamed this artist, but erroneously explained the monogram, as signifying Nicolas Manuel Deutsch.

WELL, ARNOLD VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1772, and died in 1818. He studied under Andrew Vermeulen, in whose manner he painted landscapes by moonlight, and winter scenes, with figures skating and amusing themselves on the frozen rivers and canals of Holland, with considerable success. His pictures are admitted into good collections.

WENCESLAUS, OF OLMUTZ, an old German engraver, of whom nothing is known except by some prints attributed to him. There is a great deal of contradiction and uncertainty about him, which we cannot discuss further than to say, that some writers maintain the opinion that Wenceslaus d'Olmutz, and Michael Wolgemut, are one and the same artist; but that eminent critic, Bartsch, is of a contrary opinion. He describes fifty-six prints which he attributes to him, and one more which he considers doubtful. Some of these are copies from the prints of Martin Schoen and Israel von Mecheln, and others from his own designs. His print of the Death of the Virgin from that of Schoen, is signed WENCESLAUS DE OLMUTZ IBIDEM, 1481. Others are marked with a gothic W., and some have no mark at all. Those who wish to examine into the merits of the controversy, are referred to Bartsch, Peintre Graveur, tom. vi.; Zani's Enciclopedia Metodica delle belle Arti, parte prima, letters O. and W., vols. xiv. and xix.; and Ottley's Enquiry into the History of early Engraving. See Wolgemut.

WENG, J. G., an engraver, and probably a painter, who flourished about 1630. There is an etching by him of Minerva visiting the Muses, neatly executed, in the manner of de Hooghe.

WERDMULLER, RUDOLF, a Swiss painter, born at Zurich in 1639. He studied under Conrad Meyer, and had given promise of uncommon ability, both in history and portraits, when he was unfortunately drowned in 1668. The Biographie Universelle states that he also manifested considerable talents in sculpture, and modelled two busts of Apollo and Minerva, besides a figure of Milo of Crotona.

WERENFELS, RUDOLF, a Swiss painter, born at Basle in 1629. According to Füssli, he studied first at Amsterdam, and afterwards in Italy. He excelled in portraits, and was much employed at several of the courts of Germany. He died in 1673.

WERF, ADRIAN VANDER, an eminent Dutch painter, born at Kralinger-Ambacht, near Rotterdam, in 1659. He early showed a genius for painting, and first studied for two years under Cornelius Picolett, a painter of portraits and conversations; he afterwards became the scholar of Eglon vander Neer, with whom he continued four years. He had made great progress under this master, when a picture by Francis Mieris being brought to vander Neer to copy, he entrusted it to his pupil, who executed the task so admirably, as to deceive the best judges. At the age of eighteen, he commenced his professional career at Rotterdam, and met with the most flattering encouragement. He formed an intimacy with M. Flink, who possessed an extensive collection of drawings by the best Italian masters, to which he had access at all times, and by a diligent study of these treasures and designing after the best casts of the antique he greatly improved himself, and formed a correct and elevated taste of design.

Vander Werf had already acquired a distinguished reputation, when the Elector Palatine, visiting Holland, and passing through Rotterdam, was captivated with his works, invited him to his court, and commissioned him to paint a picture of the Judgment of Solomon, and his own portrait, which last he intended to send to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, to be placed in the Florentine Gallery. Having finished his pictures, he went to Dusseldorf the following year, where he was received in the most flattering manner, and his pieces greatly admired. The Elector conferred on him the honor of knighthood, presented him with a gold medal and chain, and his portrait set with diamonds. That prince was desirous of retaining him in his service at Dusseldorf, but vander Werf excused himself, urging other engagements, and the necessity of his returning to his family and friends; but he engaged to devote six months in the year in painting for him, for which he received a liberal pension, besides liberal payment for his works. The same prince, on being presented with a picture of Diana and Callisto by the wife of vander Werf, gave her a magnificent toilet of silver, and presented her husband with six thousand florins. He continued to be employed by the Elector till the death of that prince in 1717, for whom he painted many of his most capital works.

Few painters have carried finishing to so high a pitch as vander Werf, yet his pictures produce a less pleasing effect than those of Gerard Douw and Francis Mieris. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in his Journey to Flanders and Holland, gives the following admirable critique upon the works of this eminent artist in the Dusseldorf Gallery. "The most distinguished pictures in this room are the vander Werfs, which are twenty-four in number, three of these are as large as life; a Magdalen, whole-length, and two portraits. The Magdalen was painted as a companion to the St. John of Raffaele, but it was not thought, even by his friends and admirers, that he had succeeded: however, he has certainly spared no pains; it is as smooth and as highly finished as his small pictures; but his defects are here magnified and consequently more apparent. His pictures, whether great or small, certainly afford but little pleasure. Of their want of effect, it is worth a painter's while to inquire the cause. One of the principal causes appears to me, his having entertained an opinion that the light of a picture ought to be thrown solely on the figures, and little or none on the ground or sky. This gives great coldness to the effect, and is so contrary to nature and the practice of those painters with whose works he was surrounded, that we cannot help wondering how he fell into the mistake.

"His naked figures appear to be of a much harder substance than flesh, though his outline is far from cutting, or the light not united with the shade, which are the most common causes of hardness; but it appears to me that in the present instance, the hardness of the manner proceeds from the softness and union being too general; the light being everywhere equally lost in the ground or its shadow.

"In describing vander Werf's manner, were I to say that all the parts everywhere melt into each other, it might naturally be supposed that the effect would be a high degree of softness; but it is notoriously the contrary, and I think for the reason that has been given; his flesh has the appearance of ivory or plaster, or some other hard substance. What likewise contributes to this hardness is a want of transparency in his coloring, from his admitting little or no reflections of light. He had also the defect which is frequently found in Rembrandt, that of making his light only a single spot. However, to do him justice, his figures and his heads are generally well drawn, and his drapery is excellent; perhaps there are in his pictures as perfect examples of drapery as are to be found in any other painter's works whatever."

Vander Werf bestowed so much labor on his pictures, that they are exceedingly rare, and are consequently purchased at high prices, though they do not seem to excite the admiration they did in his lifetime. Smith, in his Catalogue raisonné, of the works of the Dutch and Flenish masters, vol. iv. and Supplement, gives a descriptive account of about 150 pictures by this master. He died in 1722.

WERF, PETER VANDER, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Kralinger-Ambacht, near Rotterdam, in 1665. He was instructed by his brother, whose works he copied for some time, in the same tone of coloring and delicate manner of penciling. He afterwards painted small portraits and conversations, and occasionally history, from his own designs, in which he imitated his brother so closely, that his pictures have sometimes passed for Adrian's works, though they are inferior to them. One of his best works is in the Hall of the Dutch East India Company at Rotterdam, representing the portraits of the Directors at that time. He died in 1718.

WERNER, JOSEPH, an eminent Swiss painter, born at Berne in 1637. He was the son of a painter of little note, who instructed him in the rudiments of art, and afterwards sent him to Frankfort, where he became the disciple of Matthew Merian the Younger, under whom he made such progress, and showed such talents, that his instructor advised him to complete his education in Italy, and procured for him the protection of M. Muller, an amateur of fortune, who took him with him to Rome. During his residence in that city, Werner was indefatigable in designing from the antique, and the works of the great masters, and made an incredible number of designs. He painted both in oil and fresco, but having a predilection for high finishing, he afterwards devoted himself to miniature painting, which he carried to such a height of perfection, as has seldom been surpassed or equalled. His historical works are ingeniously composed and correctly designed, his coloring is clear and forcible, his heads have a fine expression, and the whole has great harmony, neatness, and elegance. His chief excellence lay in portraits, which he finished in an exquisite manner; and obtained a correct likeness. In returning from Italy, he passed through France, where his talents recommended him to the patronage of Louis XIV., who invited him to Versailles. He painted the portrait of the King, and those of the principal personages of his court; he was also much employed in painting historical and emblematical subjects, which were so much admired, that the most flattering proposals were offered to induce him to establish himself in France, but he had already accepted an invitation from the court of Inspruck, whither he proceeded. He painted the portrait of the Archduchess, for which he was liberally rewarded, and honored with a gold medal and chain. He resided some time at Augsburg, where he was incessantly employed by the princes and nobility of Germany. In 1696, Frederick, Elector of Brandenburg, and the first King of Prussia, invited him to Berlin, and appointed him director of the Academy there, with a liberal pension. He died at Berlin in 1710.

WESEL, TELMAN VAN, a German engraver of whom little is known. It appears from an inscription on one of his plates that he was a goldsmith, as well as an engraver. His prints are chiefly copied from the works of Albert Durer and other German masters; they are indifferently executed, and sometimes signed with his name, and at others T. W., or T. M. W.

WEST, BENJAMIN. This preëminent American painter was born at Springfield, in Pennsylvania, Oct. 10, 1738, and was the tenth child of John and Sarah West. His life is so full of interest and instruction, not only to the young artist, but to the public generally, that a more extended notice of it will be given, than the limits of this work will admit in most instances. Cunningham says, "John West, the father of Benjamin, was of that family settled at Long-Crendon, in Buckinghamshire, which produced Colonel James West, the friend and companion in arms of John Hampden. Upon one occasion, in the course of a conversation in Buckingham palace, respecting his picture of the Institution of the Garter, West happened to make some allusion to his English descent, when the Marquis of Buckingham, to the manifest pleasure of the king, declared that the Wests of Long-Crendon were undoubted descendants of the Lord Delaware, renowned in the wars of Edward the Third and the Black Prince, and that the artist's likeness had therefore a right to a place amongst those of the nobles and warriors, in his historical picture." The warlike propensities of this branch of the family, however, had long been extinguished; in 1669 they embraced the peaceful tenets of the Quakers, and emigrated to America. John West only remained behind till his education was completed, in the Quakers' Seminary at Uxbridge, when he followed his family to Philadelphia. He there married Sarah Pierson, whose grand-father was the confidential friend of William Penn, and aided him in founding the State of Pennsylvania. They settled at Springfield, where he carried on the mercantile business. One part of the marriage portion of his wife was a negro slave, an affectionate and faithful creature; but John West, in his intercourse as a merchant with the West Indies, witnessing the cruelties to which the unhappy Africans were frequently subjected, liberated his bondsman, and retained him as a hired servant. His example was followed by others, and the charitable feeling spread far and wide, till it came to be established as one of the tenets of the Quakers, that no person could remain a member of their Society, who held a human being in slavery. Benjamin's birth was brought on prematurely by a vehement sermon, preached in the fields, by Edward Peckover, on the corrupt state of the Old World, which he prophesied was about to be visited with the tempest of God's judgments, the wicked to be swallowed up, and the terrified remnant compelled to seek refuge in happy America. Mrs. West was so affected that she swooned away, was carried home severely ill, and the pains of labor came upon her; she was, however, safely delivered, and the preacher consoled the parents by predicting that "a child sent into the world under such remarkable circumstances, would assuredly prove a wonderful man," and admonished them to watch over their son with more than ordinary care. The first remarkable incident recorded of the infant prodigy occurred in his seventh year, when being placed to watch the sleeping infant of his eldest sister, he drew a sort of likeness of the child, with a pen, in red and black ink. His mother returned, and snatching the paper which he sought to conceal, exclaimed to her daughter, "I declare, he has made a likeness of little Sally!" She took him in her arms, and kissed him fondly. This feat appeared so wonderful in the eyes of his parents, that they recalled to mind the prediction of Peckover. When he was about eight years old, a party of Indians, who were always kindly treated by the followers of George Fox, paid their summer visit to Springfield, and being struck with the rude sketches which the boy had made of birds, fruit, and flowers, they taught him to prepare the red and yellow colors with which they stained their weapons and ornamented their skins; his mother added indigo, and thus he was possessed of three primary colors. The Indians also instructed him in archery. The wants of the child increased with his knowledge; he could draw, and had colors, but how to lay them on skillfully he could not conceive; a pen would not answer, and he tried feathers without any better success; a neighbor informed him that it was done with a camel's hair pencil, but as such a thing was not to be had, he bethought himself of the cat, and supplied himself from her back and tail. The cat was a favorite, and the altered condition of her fur was attributed to disease, till the boy's confession explained the cause, much to the amusement of his parents and friends. His cat's tail pencils enabled him to make more satisfactory efforts than he had before done. Soon after this, when he was only eight years old, a merchant of Philadelphia named Pennington, and a cousin of the Wests, was so much pleased with the sketches of little Benjamin, that he sent him a box of paints and pencils, with canvass prepared for the easel, and six engravings by Gribelin. The child was perfectly enraptured with his treasure; he carried the box about in his arms, and took it to his bedside, but could not sleep. He rose with the dawn, carried his canvass and colors to the garret, hung up the engravings, prepared a palette, and commenced work. So completely was he under this species of enchantment, that he absented himself from school, labored secretly and incessantly, and without interruption, for several days, when the anxious inquiries of his schoolmaster introduced his mother into his studio, with no pleasure in her looks. He had avoided copyism, and made a picture, composed from two of the engravings, telling a new story, and colored with a skill and effect which, to her eyes, appeared wonderful. Galt, who wrote West's life, and had the story from the artist's lips, says, "She kissed him with transports of affection, and assured him that she would not only intercede with his father to pardon him for having absented himself from school, but would go herself to the master, and beg that he might not be punished. Sixty-seven years afterwards, the writer of these memoirs had the gratification to see this piece, in the same room with the sublime painting of Christ Rejected (West's brother had sent it to him from Springfield), on which occasion the painter declared to him that there were inventive touches of art in his first and juvenile essay, which, with all his subsequent knowledge and experience, he had not been able to surpass." A similar story is told of Canova, who visited his native place towards the close of his brilliant career, and looking earnestly at his youthful performances, sorrowfully said, "I have been walking, but not climbing." In the ninth year of his age, he accompanied his relative Pennington to Philadelphia, and executed a view of the banks of the river, which so much pleased a painter named Williams, that he took him to his studio, and showed him all his pictures, at the sight of which he was so affected that he burst into tears. The artist, surprised, declared like Peckover that Benjamin would be a remarkable man; he gave him two books, Du Fresnoy, and Richardson on Painting, and invited him to call whenever he pleased, to see his pictures. From this time, Benjamin resolved to become a painter, and returned home with the love of painting too firmly implanted to be eradicated. His parents also, though the art was not approved by the Friends, now openly encouraged him, being strongly impressed with the opinion that he was predestinated to become a great artist. His notions of a painter at this time were also very grand, as the following characteristic anecdote will show. One of his school-fellows allured him, on a half holiday from school, to take a ride with him to a neighboring plantation. "Here is the horse, bridled and saddled," said the boy, "so come, get up behind me." "Behind you!" said Benjamin; "I will ride behind nobody." "Oh, very well," replied the other; "I will ride behind you, so mount." He mounted accordingly, and away they rode. "This is the last ride I shall have for some time," said his companion; "to-morrow I am to be apprenticed to a tailor." "A tailor," exclaimed West; "you will surely never be a tailor?" "Indeed but I shall," replied the other; "it is a good trade. What do you intend to be, Benjamin?" "A painter." "A painter! what sort of a trade is a painter? I never heard of it before." "A painter," said West, "is the companion of kings and emperors." "You are surely mad," said the embryo tailor; "there are neither kings nor emperors in America." "Aye, but there are plenty in other parts of the world. And do you really intend to be a tailor?" "Indeed I do; there is nothing surer." "Then you may ride alone," said the future companion of kings and emperors, leaping down; "I will not ride with one who is willing to be a tailor!"

West's first patron was Mr. Wayne, the father of General Anthony Wayne, who gave him a dollar a piece for two small pictures he had made on poplar boards, which a carpenter had given him. Another patron was Mr. Flower, a justice of Chester, who took young West to his house for a short time, where he was made acquainted with a young

English lady, governess to Mr. Flower's daughters, who had a good knowledge of art, and told him stories of Greek and Roman history, fit for a painter's pencil. He had never before heard of the heroes, philosophers, poets, painters, and historians of Greece and Rome, and he listened while the lady spoke of them, with an enthusiasm which he loved to live over again in his old age. His first painting which attracted much notice was a portrait of Mrs. Ross, a very beautiful lady, the wife of a lawyer of Lancaster. The picture was regarded as a wonderful performance, and gained him so much reputation, says Galt, "that the citizens came in such crowds to sit to the boy for portraits, that he had some trouble in meeting the demands." At the same time, a gunsmith, named Henry, who had a classic turn, commissioned him to paint a picture of the Death of Socrates. West forthwith made a sketch, which his employer thought excellent, but he now began to see his difficulties, and feel his deficiencies. "I have hitherto painted faces," said he, "and people clothed. What am I to do with the slave who presents the poison? He ought, I think, to be painted naked." Henry went to his shop, and returned with one of his workmen, a handsome young negro man, half naked, saying, "There is your model." He accordingly introduced him into his picture, which excited great attention. West was now fifteen years old. Dr. Smith, Provost of the College at Philadelphia, happened to see him at Lancaster, and perceiving his wonderful talents, and that his education was being neglected, generously proposed to his father to take him with him to Philadelphia, where he proposed to direct his studies, and to instruct him in all the learning most important for a painter to know. The art of painting being regarded by the Quakers as not only useless, but pernicious, "in preserving voluptuous images, and adding to the sensual gratifications of man," Mr. West determined to submit the matter to the wisdom of the Society, before giving a positive answer. He accordingly sent for his son to attend the solemn assembly. The Friends met, and the spirit of speech first descended on John Williamson, who, according to Galt, thus spake: "To John West and Sarah Pearson, a man-child hath been born, on whom God hath conferred some remarkable gifts of mind; and you have all heard that, by something amounting to inspiration, the youth has been induced to study the art of painting. It is true that our tenets refuse to own the utility of that art to mankind, but it seemeth to me that we have considered the matter too nicely. God hath bestowed on this youth a genius for art—shall we question his wisdom? Can we believe that he gives such rare gifts but for a wise and good purpose? I see the Divine hand in this; we shall do well to sanction the art, and encourage this youth." The Quakers gave their unanimous consent, and summoned the youth before them. He came, and took his station in the middle of the room, his father on his right hand, his mother on his left, while around him gathered the whole assembly. One of the women first spake, but the words of Williamson, says Galt, are alone remembered. "Painting," said he, "has hitherto been employed to embellish life, to preserve voluptuous images, and add to the sensual gratifications of men. For this we classed it among vain and merely ornamental things, and excluded it from amongst us. But this is not the principle but the mis-employment of painting. In wise and pure hands, it rises in the scale of moral excellence, and displays a loftiness of sentiment, and a devout dignity, worthy of the contemplation of Christians. I think genius is given by God for some high purpose. What the purpose is, let us not inquire—it will be manifest in His own good time and way. He hath in this remote wilderness endowed with rich gifts of a superior spirit this youth, who has now our consent to cultivate his talents for art; may it be demonstrated in his life and works, that the gifts of God have not been bestowed in vain, nor the motives of the beneficent inspiration, which induces us to suspend the strict operations of our tenets, prove barren of religious and moral effect!" At the conclusion of this address, says Galt, the women rose and kissed the young artist, and the men, one by one, laid their hands on his head. The scene made so strong an impression on the mind of West, that he looked upon himself as expressly dedicated to art, and considered this release from the strict tenets of his sect, as enjoining on his part a covenant to employ his powers on subjects pure and holy. The grave simplicity of the Quaker continued to the last in his looks, manners, and deportment; and the moral rectitude and internal purity of the man were diffused through all his productions.

West now proceeded to Philadelphia, where he studied till he was eighteen, except a short time, when he accompanied Major Sir Peter Halkert, as a volunteer to search for the remains, and bury the bones of the army which had been lost under General Braddock. He returned home from this expedition just in time to receive the welcome of the eyes and the mute blessing of his dying mother, whom he tenderly loved and honored; even when he was old and gray, he loved to recall her looks, and to dwell on her expressions of fondness and of hope, with a sadness which he wished neither to subdue nor conceal.

After this bereavement, he again proceeded to Philadelphia, where he commenced his profession. His extreme youth, the peculiar circumstances of his history, and his undoubted merit, brought him many sitters. His prices were very humble—$12.50 for a head, and $25 for a full-length; all the money he thus laboriously earned, he carefully treasured, to secure, at some future period, the means of travel and study; for his sagacious mind perceived that travel not only influenced public opinion, but was absolutely necessary for him if he wished to excel, especially in historical painting. There were no galleries in America; he knew that the masterpieces of art were in Italy, and he had already set his heart on visiting that delightful country. He made a copy of a picture of St. Ignatius, by Murillo, which had been captured in a Spanish vessel, and belonged to Governor Hamilton; he also painted a large picture for Mr. Cox, from the history of Susanna, the Elders, and Daniel, in which he introduced no less than forty figures. This work gained him great reputation, and West always considered it the masterpiece of his youth; it was afterwards unfortunately destroyed by fire. After having painted the portraits of all who desired it in Philadelphia, he proceeded to New York, where he opened a studio, and Dunlap says for eleven months he had all the portraits he could execute, at double the prices he had charged in Philadelphia. An opportunity now presented itself, which enabled him to gratify his long cherished desire of going to Italy. The harvest had partially failed in that country, and Mr. Allen, a merchant of Philadelphia, was loading a ship with wheat and flour for Leghorn. He had resolved to send his son as supercargo, to give him the benefit of travel, and West's invaluable friend, Provost Smith, made arrangements for the young painter to accompany the young merchant. It happened that a New York merchant, of the name of Kelly, was sitting for his portrait when this good news arrived, and West with joy spoke to him of the great advantage he expected to derive from a residence of two or three years in Italy. The portrait being finished, Mr. Kelly paid him ten guineas, and gave him a letter to his agent in Philadelphia, which, on being presented, proved to be an order from the generous merchant to pay him fifty guineas, as "a present to aid in his equipment for Italy."

West arrived at Rome on the 10th of July, 1760, in the 22d year of his age. Cunningham thus describes his reception: "When it was known that a young American had come to study Raffaele and Michael Angelo, some curiosity was excited among the Roman virtuosi. The first fortunate exhibitor of this lion from the western wilderness was Lord Grantham, the English ambassador, to whom West had letters. He invited West to dinner, and afterwards took him to an evening party, where he found almost all those persons to whom he had brought letters of introduction. Among the rest was Cardinal Albani, who, though old and blind, had such delicacy of touch that he was considered supreme in all matters of judgment regarding medals and intaglios. 'I have the honor,' said Lord Grantham, 'to present a young American, who has a letter for your Eminence, and who has come to Italy for the purpose of studying the Fine Arts.' The Cardinal knew so little of the New World, that he conceived an American must needs be a savage. 'Is he black or white?' said the aged virtuoso, holding out both hands, that he might have the satisfaction of touching, at least, this new wonder. Lord Grantham smiled and said, 'He is fair—very fair.' 'What! as fair as I am?' exclaimed the prelate. Now the complexion of the churchman was a deep olive—that of West more than commonly fair; and as they stood together, the company smiled. 'As fair as the Cardinal,' became for a while proverbial. Others, who had the use of their eyes, seemed to consider the young American as at most a better kind of savage, and accordingly were curious to watch him. They wished to try what effect the Apollo, the Venus, and the works of Raffaele would have upon him, and thirty of the most magnificent equipages in the capital, filled with some of the most erudite characters in Europe, says Galt, conducted the young Quaker to view the masterpieces of art. It was agreed that the Apollo should be first submitted to his view; the statue was enclosed in a case, and when the keeper threw open the doors, West unconsciously exclaimed, 'My God! a young Mohawk warrior!' The Italians were surprised and mortified with the comparison of their noblest statue to a wild savage; and West, perceiving the unfavorable impression, proceeded to remove it. He described the Mohawks, the natural elegance and admirable symmetry of their persons, the elasticity of their limbs, and their motions free and unconstrained. 'I have seen them often,' he continued, standing in the attitude of this Apollo, and pursuing with an intense eye the arrow which they had just discharged from the bow.' The Italians cleared their moody brows, and allowed that a better criticism had rarely been made. West was no longer a barbarian.

"West, however, soon attracted other attention than mere curiosity. He had shown his drawings to Mengs and Hamilton, but they were, as he confessed, destitute of original merit; nor could they be commended for neatness or accuracy. He therefore waited on Lord Grantham, and said, 'I cannot produce a finished sketch, like the other students, because I have never been instructed in drawing; but I can paint a little, and if you will do me the honor to sit for your portrait, that I may show it to Mengs, you will do me a great kindness.' His lordship consented, and the name of the artist being kept secret, the picture was placed in the Gallery of Crespigni, where artists and connoisseurs were invited to see it. 'It was known,' says Cunningham, 'that Lord Grantham was sitting to Mengs, and to him some ascribed the portrait, though they thought the coloring surpassed his other compositions.' Dance, an Englishman of sense and acuteness, looked at it closely; 'the coloring surpasses that of Mengs,' he observed, 'but the drawing is not so good.' The company eagerly engaged in the discussion; Crespigni seized the proper moment, and said, 'It is not painted by Mengs.' 'By whom, then?' they exclaimed, 'for there is no other painter in Rome capable of doing any thing so good.' 'By that young gentleman,' said the other, turning to West, who sat uneasy and agitated. The English held out their hands; the Italians ran and embraced him."

Mengs himself was surprised at the excellence of this performance, complimented the young artist highly, and advised him to "examine everything at Rome worthy of attention, making drawings of some half dozen of the best statues; then go to Florence and study the galleries; from there to Bologna, and study the works of the Caracci, and then proceed to Venice, and view the productions of Tintoretto, Titian, and Paul Veronese. When all this is accomplished, return to Rome, paint a historical picture, exhibit it publicly, and then the opinion which will be expressed of your talents, will determine the line of art which you ought to follow." West had previously entered the Academy, and he immediately proceeded to follow this common but sensible advice. The excitement to which he was subjected, and his anxiety to distinguish himself, brought on a fever, and for a time interrupted his studies; by the advice of his physicians, he returned to Leghorn, where, after a lingering sickness of eleven months, he was completely cured. But he found his funds almost exhausted, and he began to despair of being able to prosecute his studies according to the proposed plan. He called on his agents, to take up the last ten pounds he had in the world, when to his astonishment and joy, he was handed a letter of unlimited credit from his old friends in Philadelphia, Mr. Allen and Governor Hamilton; they had heard of his glorious reception at Rome, and his success with the portrait of Lord Grantham. At a dinner, one day, with Governor Hamilton, Mr. Allen said, "I regard this young man as an honor to his country, and as he is the first that America has sent out to cultivate the Fine Arts, he shall not be frustrated in his studies, for I shall send him whatever money he may require." "I think with you, sir," replied Hamilton, "but you must not have all the honor to yourself; allow me to unite with you in the responsibility of the credit." Those who befriend genius when it is struggling for distinction, are public benefactors, and their names should be held in grateful remembrance. The names of Hamilton, Allen, Smith, Kelly, Jackson, Rutherford, and Lord Grantham, must be dear to all the admirers of West; they aided him in the infancy of his fame and fortune, cheered him when he was drooping and desponding; and watched over his person and purse with the vigilance of true friendship. West always expressed his deepest obligations to these generous men, and it was at his particular request that Galt recorded their names, and their deeds.

West now proceeded with redoubled alacrity, to execute the plan recommended by Mengs. He visited Florence, Bologna, Parma, and Venice, and diligently examined everything worth studying. He everywhere received marked attention, and was elected a member of the Academies of Florence, Bologna, and Parma. In the latter city, he painted and presented to the Academy, a copy of the famous St. Jerome by Correggio, "of such excellence," says Galt, "that the reigning prince desired to see the artist. He went to court, and to the utter astonishment of the attendants, appeared with his hat on. The Prince was familiar with the tenets of the Quakers, and was a lover of William Penn; he received the young artist with complacency, and dismissed him with many expressions of regard." West returned to Rome, where he painted two pictures which were highly commended, one of Cimon and Iphigenia, and the other of Angelica and Medora. At Venice, he particularly studied the works of Titian, and Cunningham says "he imagined he had discovered his principles of coloring." We can only record one more of the interesting incidents which occurred to him while in Italy. He was conversing one evening with Gavin Hamilton, in the British Coffee House, when an old man with a long and flowing beard, and a harp in his hand, entered and offered his services as an improvisatore bard. "Here is an American," said the wily Scot, "come to study the fine arts in Rome; take him for your theme, and it is a magnificent one." The minstrel casting a glance at West, who never in his life could perceive what a joke was, commenced his song. "I behold in this youth an instrument chosen by heaven to create in his native country a taste for those arts which have elevated the nature of man—an assurance that his land will be the refuge of science and knowledge, when in the old age of Europe they shall have forsaken her shores. All things of heavenly origin move westward, and Truth, and Art, have their periods of light and darkness. Rejoice, O Rome, for thy spirit immortal and undecayed now spreads towards a new world, where, like the soul of man in Paradise, it will be perfected more and more." The predictions of Peckover, the fond expressions of his beloved mother, and his solemn dedication to art, rushed upon West's memory, and he burst into tears; and even in his riper years, he was willing to consider the poor mendicant's song as another prophecy.

Having seen everything in Italy which he regarded as essential to his success, West set out for his native country, but resolved first to visit the land of his ancestors; he accordingly traveled through France in the company of Dr. Patoun, an eminent Scotch physician, whose acquaintance he had made in Italy, and who took a lively interest in his welfare. He arrived at London in August, 1763, where he was warmly received by several eminent artists and persons of distinction, to whom he had letters of introduction from Mengs and others; Dr. Patoun also spoke so highly of his works as to excite general curiosity among the admirers of the Fine Arts, to see his two pictures of Cimon and Iphigenia, and Angelica and Medora, which he had painted at Rome. Among others who visited him at this time was Mr. Reynolds, (afterwards Sir Joshua,) who, instead of looking upon him as a rival, at once acknowledged his merit, offered him his friendship, and urged him to exhibit his two pictures at the Society Rooms in Spring Gardens. They were accordingly exhibited there, and the praises which they elicited, far surpassed the most sanguine expectations of the artist. He also had the good fortune to meet with three of his best friends—Dr. Smith, Governor Hamilton, and Mr. Allen—who then happened to be in London, and who strongly recommended him to set up his easel. He now abandoned the idea of returning to America, at least for the present, although there was a powerful attraction to draw him thither. While he resided in Philadelphia, he had formed an acquaintance with Miss Elizabeth Shewell, the daughter of a merchant of that city. The intimacy had ripened into one of deep affection, but the intended marriage had hitherto been delayed by prudential motives. The sacred engagement was, however, never forgotten on either side; and no sooner had West formed the resolution of settling in England, and felt assured of success, than he wrote to his father, requesting him to accompany the young lady to London, that their union might take place. Miss Shewell accordingly sailed from Philadelphia with Mr. West, senior, and soon after their arrival, the nuptials were solemnized.

The paintings which West exhibited at Spring Gardens, and his love of serious and solemn subjects, attracted the notice of some of the dignitaries of the church, and other persons of distinction. He painted for Dr. Newton the Parting of Hector and Andromache; and for the Bishop of Worcester, the Return of the Prodigal Son. His reputation rose so much with these productions, that Lord Rockingham offered him a permanent engagement, with a salary of £700 a year, to embellish with historical paintings his palace in Yorkshire. West consulted with his friends, who advised him to confide in the public, and he followed for a time this salutary counsel. In 1765, the Society of Artists was incorporated by royal charter, and West became both a member and a director. The same year he exhibited two pictures, one of Jupiter and Europa, and the other of Venus and Cupid. The following year he had four pictures, viz.: the Continnence of Scipio, Pylades and Orestes, Cimon and Iphigenia, and Diana and Endymion. The merit of West now became more extensively known, by the patronage and friendship of Dr. Drummond, Archbishop of York, a great admirer of painting, who invited him to his house, and commissioned him to paint a picture of Agrippina landing with the ashes of Germanicus. That liberal prelate was so much pleased with the performance, that he made an effort to procure the painter an annuity by subscription, so as to enable him to desist from portraiture, and confine himself to historical subjects. He proposed to raise £3,000; himself and friends subscribed £1,500, but the public coldly refused to cooperate, and the scheme was abandoned. The Archbishop, however, regarding the failure of his plan as a stigma on the country, sought and obtained an audience of the king, then a young man, and a lover of the fine arts; he informed him that "a devout American, and a Quaker, had painted, at his request, such a noble picture, that he was desirous to secure his talents for the throne of his country." The king was so much pleased with the story, that he desired he would send the young painter with his picture to him. West was well received by the king, who presented him to his Queen, and commissioned him to paint a picture of the Departure of Regulus from Rome. The king treated West, on this occasion, with extraordinary condescension; he took from the shelf a copy of Livy, and read to him that part of the history which describes the departure of Regulus. The talents, simplicity, candor, and dignity of the artist completely won his heart, and this was the commencement of a remarkable intimacy of nearly forty years' duration. The palace doors now seemed to open to him of their own accord, and the domestics attended with an obedient start to the wishes of him whom the king delighted to honor.

There are other minor matters, says Cunningham, which help a man on to fame and fortune. West was a skillful skater, and in America had formed an acquaintance on the ice with Colonel Howe. One day, the painter having tied on his skates at the Serpentine, was astonishing the timid practitioners of London by the rapidity of his motions, and the graceful figure which he cut. Some one shouted "West! West!" It was Colonel Howe. "I am glad to see you," said he, "and not less so that you came in good time to vindicate my praises of American skating." He called to him Lord Spencer Hamilton, and some of the Cavendishes, to whom he introduced West as one of the Philadelphia prodigies of skating, and requested him to show them what was called "the Salute." He performed this feat so much to their satisfaction that they spread the praises of the American skater all over London. West was exceedingly fond of this invigorating amusement, and used frequently to gratify large crowds by cutting the Philadelphia Salute. Cunningham says, "Many to the praise of his skating, added panegyrics on his professional skill, and not a few to vindicate their applause, followed him to his easel, and sat for their portraits."

While West was painting the Departure of Regulus, the Royal Academy was planned, and he was one of the principal founders. The Society of Artists had grown rich by the yearly exhibitions, and how to lay out this money, became the subject of vehement contention. The architects were for an edifice, the sculptors for statues, and the painters for a gallery of historical works. West, who was one of the directors, approved of none of these notions, and with Reynolds withdrew from the association. The newspapers denounced these indecent bickerings, and the king learning the cause from the lips of West, declared that he was ready to patronize any association formed on principles calculated to advance the interests of art. A plan was accordingly drawn up by some of the dissenters, and submitted to the King, who corrected it, and drew up some additional articles with his own hand. The Royal Academy was accordingly founded in 1768, and in the first exhibition appeared the Departure of Regulus.

A change was now to be effected in the character of British art. Hitherto, historical painting had appeared in a masking habit; the actions of Englishmen, says Cunningham, had all been performed, if costume were to be believed, by Greeks or Romans. West dismissed at once this pedantry, and restored nature and propriety in his noble work of "the Death of Wolfe." The multitude acknowledged its excellence at once, on its being exhibited at the Royal Academy; but the lovers of old art, or of the compositions called classical, complained of the barbarism of boots, buttons, and blunderbusses, and cried out for naked warriors, with bows, bucklers, and battering rams. Lord Grosvenor was so pleased with the picture, that, disregarding the frowns of amateurs, and the cold approbation of the Academy, he purchased it. Galt says that the king questioned West concerning this picture, and put him on his defense of this new heresy in art. "When it was understood," said the artist, "that I intended to paint the characters as they had actually appeared on the scene, the Archbishop of York called on Reynolds, and asked his opinion; they both came to my house to dissuade me from running so great a risk. Reynolds began a very ingenious and elegant dissertation on the state of the public taste in this country, and the danger which every innovator incurred of contempt and ridicule, and concluded by urging me earnestly to adopt the costume of antiquity, as more becoming the greatness of my subject than the modern garb of European warriors. I answered that the event to be commemorated happened in the year 1758, in a region of the world unknown to the Greeks and Romans, and at a period of time when no warriors who wore such costume existed. The subject I have to represent is a great battle fought and won, and the same truth which gives law to the historian, should rule the painter. If instead of the facts of the action, I introduce fiction, how shall I be understood by posterity? The classic dress is certainly picturesque, but by using it, I shall lose in sentiment what I gain in external grace. I want to mark the place, the time, and the people, and to do this, I must abide by truth. They went away, and returned again when I had finished the painting. Reynolds seated himself before the picture, examined it with deep and minute attention for half an hour; then rising, said to Drummond, 'West has conquered; he has treated his subject as it ought to be treated; I retract my objections. I foresee that this picture will not only become one of the most popular, but will occasion a revolution in art.'" "I wish," said the king, "that I had known all this before, for the objection has been the means of Lord Grosvenor's getting the picture; but you shall make a copy for me."

West had now obtained the personal confidence of the King, and the favor of the public—his commissions were numerous, but of course the works for the palace had the precedence. The King employed him to paint the Death of Epaminondas, as a companion to the Death of Wolfe, which he copied; the Death of the Chevalier Bayard; Cyrus liberating the Family of the King of Armenia; and Segestus and his Daughter brought before Germanicus; all of which gave great satisfaction to the monarch. The success of West, and the royal favors bestowed upon him, not only began to excite the envy of artists generally, but even of Reynolds himself, who, says Cunningham, thought a few rays of the royal sunshine, at least, should have fallen upon him. "The President was not fool enough to complain—but his friends did so for him, while West, too prudent to carry himself loftily, because of his good fortune, enjoyed his success in secret, and continued in the outward man submissive and thankful. To Reynolds had fallen the whole portrait department, of church and state, which lay without the gates of the Palace; while within, West reigned triumphant." The King now commissioned West to paint a series of eight pictures to decorate St. George's Hall in Windsor Castle; all the subjects except one, were taken from the victorious reign of Edward III., as follows: 1. Edward the Third, embracing the Black Prince after the Battle of Cressy. 2. The Instalment of the Order of the Garter. 3. The Black Prince receiving the King of France and his Son prisoners at Poitiers. 4. St. George vanquishing the Dragon. 5. Queen Philippa defeating David of Scotland in the Battle of Neville's Cross. 6. Queen Philippa interceding with Edward for the Burgesses of Calais. 7. King Edward forcing the passage of the Somme. 8. King Edward crowning Sir Eustace de Ribeaumont at Calais. These works are of very large size.—They were the fruit of long study and much labor, and are among his best and most carefully preserved works. Cunningham says their lustre is fresh and unfaded, the coloring natural and harmonious, and they present a lively image of the times and the people.

After the completion of these works, West proposed to the King to paint a great series upon the Progress of Revealed Religion, to decorate the Royal chapel at Windsor; but the King, before consenting to the proposal, summoned some of the dignitaries of the church to consider the propriety of introducing paintings into a place of worship. "When I reflect that the Reformation condemned religious paintings in churches, and that the Parliament, in the unhappy days of Charles the First did the same, I am fearful of introducing anything which my people might think popish. Will you give me your opinion on the subject?" After some deliberation, bishop Hurd delivered, in the name of his brethren and himself, the unanimous opinion, that "the introduction of religious paintings into your Majesty's chapel, will in no respect whatever violate the laws or the usages of the Church of England. We have examined, too, thirty-five subjects, which the painter proposes for your choice, and we feel that there is not one of them that may not be treated in a way, that even a Quaker might contemplate with edification." The King conceiving this to be an impertinent and ironical allusion to West, replied, "the Quakers are a body of Christians, for whom I have a high respect. I love their peaceful tenets and their benevolence to one another and the world, and but for the obligations of birth, I would be a Quaker." The bishop bowed submissively and retired.

To the thirty-five subjects approved by the bishops, West subsequently added another, making thirty-six in all. He divided the series into four departments—the Antediluvian, the Patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the Prophetic. Half of the subjects were from the Old Testament, and half from the New. They were all sketched, and twenty-eight of them executed, for which the artist received £21,705. He painted, in the meantime, nine pictures of portraits of the Royal Family, for which he received 2000 guineas.

The war which broke out between Great Britain and her colonies, says Galt, was a sore trial to the feelings of West; his early friends and his present patrons, were involved in the bloody controversy. He was not, according to his own account, silent; he was too much in the palace, and alone with the King, to evade some allusion to the subject. After the death of Reynolds in 1792, West was unanimously elected President of the Royal Academy, on which occasion, the King sent his brother, the Duke of Gloucester to him, to enquire whether the honor of knighthood would be acceptable to him; he declined in so respectful and dignified a manner, that the Duke took him warmly by the hand and said, "you have justified the opinion the King had of you; he will be delighted with your answer."

In 1801, during the illness of George III., West met with a severe reverse. Mr. Wyatt, the royal architect, called upon him and told him, without any further explanation, that he was directed to inform him, that the pictures painting for the chapel at Windsor, must be suspended until further orders. "This extraordinary proceeding," says Galt, "rendered the studies of the best part of the artist's life useless, and deprived him of that honorable provision, the fruit of his talents and industry, on which he had counted for the repose of his declining years. For some time, it affected him deeply, and he was at a loss what steps to take. At last, however, upon reflecting on the marked friendship and favor which the King had always shown him, he addressed to his Majesty a letter, on the 26th of September." This letter was carried to the court by Wyatt, but he received no answer to it. When the King recovered, West sought and obtained a private audience, and he found that the King did not know of the order to suspend the paintings, and that he had not received any letter from him; he spoke very kindly to the troubled artist, and said "go on with your work, West; go on with the pictures, and I will take care of you." This was West's last interview with the King. "But he contrived," says Galt, "to execute the pictures, and in the usual quarterly payments, received his salary of £1000 per annum, till his Majesty's final superannuation; when, without any intimation whatever, on calling to receive it, he was told it had been stopped, and that the paintings for the chapel had been suspended! He submitted in silence—he neither remonstrated nor complained." The story of his dismissal from court was spread abroad with many exaggerations, and the malevolent enemies, whom his success had created—for there are always such reptiles—circulated papers stating that the fortunate painter had received from the King the enormous sum of £34,187; so that the public imagined that he must have amassed a fortune. This notion was dispelled by an accurate statement from the painter, by which it appeared that he had toiled incessantly during thirty-three years of the prime of his life in the service of the King, for this sum, giving an accurate list of the works executed, and the prices paid, by which it appeared that he had received but a poor compensation, and that his income was much less than would satisfy any successful portrait painter of the day.

After the peace of Amiens, West visited Paris, for the purpose of viewing the world's gems of art, which Bonaparte had collected together in the Louvre. He was received in that capital with the most marked respect, not only by distinguished artists, connoisseurs, and literary men, but by the officials of the government. Cunningham, who, while he takes his favorites by the beard, as if to kiss them, seldom fails to jerk them under the ribs, attributes all this courtesy and hospitality to the cunning of "the wily politicians who surrounded the future Emperor. In a series of entertainments, in which wine and flattery were poured out abundantly, the enemies of his country succeeded in persuading the simple Benjamin, that they were the most philanthropic of all nations, and their master the kindest and worthiest of men." The truth is, West was too liberal in his sentiments to please the court under the Prince Regent; hence his rude dismissal from court. That he was highly gratified with the tributes of respect which the French know so well how to bestow upon a man of genius, cannot be doubted. West had already conceived a project for establishing in England a national institution, for the encouragement of art, similar to that of the Louvre, and he took occasion one day, while strolling about the Louvre in company with Mr. Fox and Sir Francis Baring, to point out to them the advantages of such an institution, not only in promoting the Fine Arts, by furnishing models of study for artists, but he showed the propriety even in a mercantile point of view, of encouraging to a seven-fold extent, the higher department of art in England. Fox was so forcibly struck with his remarks, that he said, "I have been rocked in the cradle of politics, but never before was so much struck with the advantages, even in a political bearing, of the Fine Arts, to the prosperity, as well as the renown of a kingdom; and I do assure you, Mr. West, if ever I have it in my power to influence our government to promote the Arts, the conversation which we have had to-day shall not be forgotten." Sir Francis Baring also promised his hearty coöperation. Cunningham also sagely attributes this to his opinion that the "wily politicians," had wheedled the "simple Benjamin," into the belief that the "views of Napoleon were sublime and benevolent, and that he only conquered kingdoms out of love of liberty, and collected pictures in the towns which he stormed, to furnish models of study for the artists of all nations." He forgets that the Royal British Institution was mainly established through the influence and energy of West; that he battled for years against coldly calculating politicians for its accomplishment; and that at length his plan was adopted, with scarcely an alteration. These things are mentioned here, because Cunningham, perhaps unwittingly, has detracted from the great renown of West, more than any other writer. His criticisms too, not only on West, but on all the artists whose biography he has written, are frequently more poetical than just, more flippant than erudite.

Soon after West's return to England, he resigned the President's chair in the Academy, owing to stormy opposition among its members; he also fancied that the government looked coldly upon him for his admiration of Bonaparte. Wyatt, the royal architect, was put in his place, but the Academicians soon became wearied of the latter, and having displaced him in the following year, 1803, they restored West, almost unanimously. There was but one dissenting voice, supposed to be that of Fuseli, who voted for Mrs. Moser. When Fuseli was taxed by some of the members with having given this vote, says his biographer Knowles, he answered, "well, suppose I did; she is eligible to the office—and is not one old woman as good as another?" The impatient extravagance of Fuseli accorded little with the dignity and diligence of West.

West was sixty-four years old when he lost the patronage of the court, having in a great measure thrown away thirty-three years of the prime of his life, for a paltry pittance, when his talents are taken into estimation; for while Reynolds, in the inferior branch of portraiture, realized some £12,000 a year, the first historical painter of the 18th century, was toiling incessantly for £1000. His blameless and temperate life had preserved his strength unimpaired, and he had still the same composed and determined mind, by which he was distinguished in youth. He therefore commenced a series of great religious works, on a larger scale than any he had previously painted. The first was Christ healing the Sick, a picture painted for the Pennsylvania Hospital, an institution founded by the Quakers, who had solicited his assistance, and as he was far from being rich, he had promised them a picture. When this picture was exhibited in London, it was so highly commended, that the British Institution offered him 3000 guineas for it, which he accepted, on condition that he should be allowed to make a copy, with some alterations. He did so, and when the copy was exhibited in the United States, the profits ($20,000,) enabled the committee of the hospital to enlarge the building and receive more patients. It has since continued to add to their resources about $500 per annum. "The success of this picture," says Cunningham, "impressed West with the belief that his genius appeared to most advantage in pictures of large dimensions, and that royal commissions had interposed between him and fortune.*

* Who can doubt it? Three of his most capital works are, Christ healing the Sick, Christ rejected by the Jews, and Death on the Pale Horse. The exhibition of either of these pictures would have brought him more money annually than his royal salary. There was very little encouragement for historical painters at that time in England, as the following extract from the Percy Anecdotes will show. Speaking of West and the excitement which his superb picture of Pylades and Orestes produced among the higher circles of London, the writer says, "But the most wonderful part of the story is, that notwithstanding all this vast bustle and commendation bestowed upon that justly admired picture, by which West's servant gained upwards of thirty pounds for showing it (it was exhibited gratuitously at West's house), no mortal ever asked the price of the work, or so much as offered to give him a commission to paint any other subject."

His mind, from long contemplation, was familiar with subjects of gigantic proportions, and he had soon sketched out several and finished some; but the sunny and comfortable houses of England could not contain this colossal progeny; the doors of our churches are generally opened to art with reluctance; our palaces had already admitted more of the President's works than perhaps were welcome; and the owners of our galleries were unwilling to make room for such enormous pieces of scripture subjects. There was no market for the manufacture." The next picture he painted was the Crucifixion, sixteen by twenty-eight feet; followed by the Descent of the Holy Ghost on Christ at the Jordan, Christ rejected by the Jews, the Ascension, and the Inspiration of St. Peter, all of very large dimensions. In 1817, he exhibited his sublime picture of Death on the Pale Horse, painted when he was seventy-nine years old! On the 6th of December of the same year, he lost his beloved wife; they had tenderly loved each other some sixty years, and had seen their children's children; the world had no consolation to offer, and he began to sink; though still to be found at his easel, his mind had lost its wonted alacrity, and it was evident that all this was to cease soon; that he was suffering a slow, general, and easy decay. The venerable old man sat in his study among his favorite pictures, a breathing image of piety and contentment, calmly awaiting the hour of his dissolution. Without any fixed complaint, his mental faculties unimpaired, his cheerfulness undisturbed, and with looks serene and benevolent, he expired on the 11th of March, 1820, in the eighty-second year of his age. He was buried with great pomp in St. Paul's cathedral, beside Reynolds, Opie, and Barry.

As West's life was long and laborious, his productions are very numerous. He painted and sketched upwards of 400 pictures in oil, mostly taken from sacred and profane history; he also left more than 200 original drawings in his portfolio. The following is Cunningham's critique. "His works were supposed by himself, and for a time by others, to be in the true spirit of the great masters, and he composed them with the serious ambition and hope of illustrating scripture, and rendering gospel truth more impressive. No subject seemed to him too lofty for his pencil; he considered himself worthy to follow the sublimest flights of the prophets, and dared to limn the effulgence of God's glory, and the terrors of the Day of Judgment. (Have not many great masters attempted the same?) The mere list of his works makes us shudder at human presumption—Moses receiving the Law on Sinai; the Descent of the Holy Ghost on the Saviour in the Jordan; the Opening of the Seventh Seal; St. Michael and his Angels casting out the Great Dragon; the Mighty Angel with one foot on the Sea and the other on the Earth; the Resurrection; and there are many others of the same class. With such magnificence and sublimity, who but a Michael Angelo could cope?

"In all his works, the human form was exhibited in conformity to academic precepts—his figures were arranged with skill; the coloring was varied, and often harmonious; the eye rested pleased on the performance, and the artist seemed, to the ordinary spectator, to have done his task like one of the highest of the sons of genius. But below all this splendor, there was little of the true vitality;—there was a monotony too, of human character,—the groupings were unlike the happy and careless combinations of nature, and the figures frequently seemed distributed over the canvass by line and measure, like trees in a plantation. He wanted fire and imagination to be the true restorer of that grand style, which bewildered Barry, and was talked of by Reynolds. Some of his works—cold, formal, bloodless, and passionless.—may remind the spectator of the sublime vision of the valley of dry bones, when the flesh and the skin had come upon the skeletons, and before the breath of God had infused them with life and feeling.

“Though such is the general impression which the works of West make, it cannot be denied that many are distinguished by great excellence. In his Death on the Pale Horse, and more particularly in the sketch of that picture, he has more than approached the masters and princes of the calling. It is indeed, irresistibly fearful, to see the triumphant march of the terrific Phantom, and the dissolution of all that earth is proud of beneath his tread. War and Peace, Sorrow and Joy, Youth and Age, all who love and all who hate, seem planet-struck. The Death of Wolfe, too, is natural and noble, and the Indian Chief, like the Oneyda warrior of Campbell,

A stoic of the woods, a man without a tear, was a happy thought. The Battle of La Hogue, I have heard praised as the best historic picture of the British school, by one not likely to be mistaken, and who would not say what he did not feel. Many of his single figures also are of a high order. There is a natural grace in the looks of some of his women that few painters have ever excelled.”

West emulated the great head of the Roman school, or the combined excellencies of the antique and modern schools. In his Journal kept in Italy, he says, “Michael Angelo has not succeeded in giving a probable character to any of his works. The Moses, perhaps, excepted. The works of Raffaele grow daily more interesting, natural, and noble.” It is allowed that he drew correctly, that many of his works are finely composed, and that he has frequently shown great power of invention; but it is said that he was deficient in coloring, lacked expression in his heads, was monotonous in his features and countenances, and that his pictures want effect. In his grand historic pictures he doubtless considered, like Raffaele and Poussin, that splendid coloring would detract from the dignity of his subject; since in some of his pictures, when the subject allowed it, and particularly in his female forms, his tints are clear, and very beautiful. This is illustrated in his Death on the Pale Horse, and Christ healing the Sick, in which less attention is paid to coloring than to expression. He always avoided having recourse to any meretricious tricks to catch the eye and raise admiration. It is a well known fact, that the great works of Raffaele are not striking, but they grow, with contemplation. There has not yet appeared a learned, just, and academic critique upon the works of West, but there can be no doubt that such an one would pronounce him the greatest historical painter of the 18th century.

Benjamin West in person was above the middle size, of very fair complexion, and firmly and compactly built; his lofty brow beamed with goodness and benevolence. He was polished, but simple and unostentatious in his manners, and affable to all. Intercourse with courts and the world, which changes so many, made no change in him. His kindness to young artists was great, and he aided them as freely with his advice and his purse, as though they were his own children; so generous was he, that his liberality seriously impaired his income. He had no secrets in his profession, whatever he knew in art, he readily imparted, and was happy to think that art was advancing; and no mean jealousy of other men's good fortune ever invaded his repose. He was so regular and simple in his habits, and careful to improve his time, that to describe one day of his life, is to describe years. He rose early, studied before breakfast, wrought upon one of his large pictures from ten to four, dressed and saw visitors, and having dined, recommenced his studies. For further information of this distinguished artist, the reader must be referred to Galt's “Life and Studies of Benjamin West,” London, 1816 and 1820; Cunningham's “Lives of eminent British Painters,” and to Dunlap's “History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States,” 2 vols., New-York, 1834.

WESTALL, RICHARD, an excellent English historical painter, and an eminent designer, was born in 1765, probably at London. At the age of fourteen, he was apprenticed to an engraver of heraldry on silver, named Thompson; but excelling his fellows in this humble department of the arts, he aspired to a higher order of distinction. By working an additional time in the mornings, he obtained the permission of his employer to draw at the Royal Academy in the evenings. He commenced his career as an artist in 1786, and first attracted public attention by a number of highly finished historical paintings in water colors, which manifested a brilliancy and vigor before unknown. In company with his friend Mr. Lawrence (afterwards Sir Thomas), he took a house in Soho Square, which they occupied for several years, until their success justified their forming separate establishments. Westall's book illustrations were very popular, and he was much employed by the publishers, particularly Alderman Boydell, for whom he executed the designs in the superb edition of Milton. He also designed the illustrations for Moore's Loves of the Angels, Crabbe's Poems, and many other works. His earlier works display considerable intelligence of chiaro-scuro, and elegance of coloring, but from the great facility with which his ready talent enabled him to produce book designs, he was led into a greater degree of mannerism than any of his cotemporaries, which detracted not a little from his reputation; but many of his works evince, notwithstanding, the possession of very uncommon taste and judgment.

As a painter of history, Westall deserves much higher commendation than seems to be generally accorded to him. He produced many excellent historical subjects, some of them to fulfil the commissions of Boydell, for his great work of the Illustrations of Shakspeare. Among these, his picture of Cardinal Wolsey entering Leicester Abbey, is perhaps deserving of the highest praise. This picture is finely composed, the light and shadow are admirably managed, the horses are full of fire and spirit, which, with the expression of childish wonder and compassion in the face of the little page at viewing the stricken Wolsey, are sufficient proofs of Westall's ability in this branch. This performance has been preserved to the world by the admirable plate of Thew, esteemed the masterpiece of Boydell's collection. His Lady Macbeth, and the Ghost of Cæsar appearing to Brutus in his tent, both portraits, are noble pictures, full of dignity and expression. In 1794, Westall was elected a member of the Royal Academy, at the same time as Lawrence and Stothard. In 1808, he published a volume of poems of considerable merit, entitled "A Day in Spring, and other Poems, embellished with four plates engraved by James Heath, A. E. R. A., and Charles Heath, from designs by R. Westall." By his professional exertions, Westall attained a handsome competence, but he became involved in an unsuccessful speculation in foreign pictures, and some improvident partnership engagements. During the latter part of his life, he was aided by the assistance which the Royal Academy assigns to its reduced members. His last occupation was in giving lessons in drawing and painting to the present Queen, while Princess Victoria. He died in 1837.

WESTALL, WILLIAM, an English painter in water-colors, and an engraver in aquatinta, born in 1781. In 1801, through the influence of West, he was appointed draughtsman to the voyage of discovery to Australia, made by Capt. Flinders in H. M. S. Investigator. He also visited China, and made many drawings of landscapes, particularly a View of the Canton River, representing an incident he had witnessed, of which he afterwards painted a large picture, exhibited in 1814, at the Royal Academy. He also resided for about a year in the island of Madeira, whither he went during the delay of the expedition at the island of Mauritius; and he executed a number of landscapes, with views of the planters' villas, which realized a handsome return. In 1810, he was employed to prepare many designs for the engravers, for the publication of the discoveries of the expedition; and also in painting pictures, by order of the Admiralty, of several important incidents which occurred during the voyage. In 1812 he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy. In 1816 he engraved, in aquatinta, a work descriptive of the noted caves in Yorkshire; and for many years subsequently, he produced a number of similar works, among which was one of the Isle of Wight; and he also executed several large paintings, among which was the Commencement of the Deluge, exhibited in 1848. He died in 1850.

WESTERHOUT, ARNOLD VAN, a Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp, in 1666. After having studied in his native city, he went to Italy, and established himself at Rome. He engraved quite a number of plates after the Italian masters, and from his own designs, executed with the graver, in a neat, clear style, resembling that of his countryman, Robert van Audenarde. He also engraved some portraits in mezzotinto. He died about 1725.

WESTMACOTT, RICHARD, a distinguished English sculptor, the eldest son of an artist in the same branch, was born at London about 1774. After completing his preliminary studies, he visited Italy for improvement, in 1792, and studied the antique, and the works of the great masters. The first work of importance which he was engaged upon after returning to England, was a statue of Addison, which was placed in Westminster Abbey about 1806. In 1809, he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy, at which time he completed and erected in St. Paul's cathedral, the monument of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, and subsequently that of Lord Collingwood, in the same church. On his engagement to execute the bronze statue of the Duke of Bedford, in Russell Square, he personally attended to the whole management of the casting, and thereby acquired so much skill that, after erecting the statue of Lord Nelson at Birmingham, and of Mr. Fox in Bloomsbury Square, he was able to accomplish the immense bronze colossal statue of Achilles, erected in Hyde Park. In 1811 he was elected a Royal Academician, and subsequently a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and a member of the Dilettanti Society. In 1814, he completed his national monument to William Pitt, in Westminster Abbey, which is a work of great talent. Among the other works of Westmacott, are the beautiful statue of a Peasant Girl, exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1819; which is part of a monument erected to Lord Penrhyn; the Hindoo Girl, for a work to be erected at Calcutta, in memory of Alexander Colvin; and the statue of King George III. at Liverpool. The author has not been able to procure further information concerning Westmacott, since the year 1832, when his bronze colossal statue of Canning was erected in Palace Yard.

WET, GERARD DE, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1616, and died there in 1679. He was a disciple of Rembrandt, whose style he followed with some success; he also painted landscapes, and was accounted a good colorist. The Dutch writers mention a Jacob de Wet or Weth, who painted cabinet pictures of sacred subjects in the manner of Rembrandt; probably they are the same artist. There was also a John de Wet, who flourished at Haerlem, and was more noted as a dealer in old pictures than as a painter.

WET, P. F., a Dutch engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He etched a set of plates of ornamental foliage for goldsmiths and jewelers, executed in a slight style.

WEYDE, ROGER VANDER, a Flemish painter, born at Brussels, according to Van Mander and Descamps, about 1480; and died there in 1529. His instructor is not mentioned, but he was one of the first painters of the country who improved the national taste, by divesting it of the dry, gothic manner, and introducing a more graceful style of design, and a better expression in the heads. Among his principal works were four pictures in the Town House at Brussels, representing subjects connected with the administration of justice. He painted a picture of the Descent from the Cross, for the church of St. Gertrude at Louvain, which was greatly admired. It was afterwards sent to the King of Spain, and a copy of it, by Michael Coxcis, substituted in its place.

There has been much disquisition among writers as to whether Roger vander Weyde and Roger of Bruges were the same or different artists. The dispute is of little consequence, as there is not a single well authenticated work by the former, and little remains by the latter, and that little of no importance. Roger of Bruges was certainly a scholar of the Van Eycks; his birth is variously placed in or about 1366, and 1390, the latter having the best authorities; and his death in 1418 and 1464. It is known that he was employed by the Town House of Brussels, and that he visited Italy. Now, in the Archives of the city of Brussels, the name of Meester Rogieren vander Weyden occurs in two or more instances; once in 1436, and again in 1449. In 1450, the year of Jubilee, he went to Italy, where he practiced some years, and was called Ruggiero da Bruggia or da Bruxelles. He died at Brussels, June 16th, 1464, and was buried in the church of St. Gudule; his name appears in the church register Magister Rogerus vander Wyden, excellens pictor cum uxore. &c. From these dates, it is contended that Roger of Bruges and Roger vander Weyde are but one artist. If this supposition be correct, then Van Mander and Descamps have made an error of about one hundred years in the dates. The discussion, at best, is "stale, flat, and unprofitable." See Roger of Bruges.

WEYDEMANS, FREDERICK WILLIAM, a Dutch portrait painter of some distinction, born in 1668, and died in 1750. There was also a Charles Emilius Weydemans, born in 1685, and died in 1735. He painted portraits, and is said to have been a cousin or nephew of the former. Besides these, there was also a N. Weydemans, an engraver, of whom nothing is known, except by a few indifferent prints.

 WEYER, GABRIEL, a German painter and engraver, who flourished at Nuremberg from about 1610 to 1640, when he died. He is said to have painted some pictures, of which nothing is known; but he executed a great number of wooden cuts from his own designs, which are marked with one of the above monograms of his initials. It is disputed whether he engraved all the cuts, or merely furnished the designs and employed others to engrave them; a question of no importance, which applies to nearly all the old German designers and wood engravers.

WEYER, HANS, or JOHN, a German painter and engraver, who was a native of Cobourg, according to Professor Christ, and flourished about 1610. He engraved some plates in an excellent style, admirably designed, and marked with the initials H. E. W. There is some question whether he really engraved all the plates attributed to him.

WEYER, NICHOLAS, an engraver to whom Professor Christ attributes some prints marked with his initials, and the date, thus, N. 1567 W. He gives no particulars of the artist, nor does he specify any of his subjects.

WEYERMAN, JOHN, a Dutch painter of fruit and flower pieces, was born in 1636, and died in 1681. There are no particulars recorded of him, except that, after studying in his own country, he went to Italy.

WEYERMANS, JACOB CAMPO, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam, in 1679. He studied under Ferdinand van Kessell, and painted fruit, flowers, and still-life, but his productions are not above mediocrity. He published the Lives of the Dutch painters, in three volumes, poorly compiled and abridged, from Houbraken. He died in 1747.

WEYNEERS, JOHANSEN, a German engraver, who flourished about 1611. According to Prof. Christ, he engraved some plates after the designs of Christopher Schwartz, which he marked with a bunch of grapes, in allusion to his name. He is the same as Hans Weinher, which see.

WHEATLEY, FRANCIS, an English painter, born at London in 1747. He received his first instruction in Shipley's Drawing School; he evinced much talent, and while young, drew several premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c. Having afterwards improved himself by diligent study, and by associating with artists of distinction, he acquired considerable reputation as a historical painter. After practicing some time in London, he went to Dublin, where he painted a large picture, representing the Irish House of Commons, in which he introduced the portraits of the most distinguished political characters of the day. This work increased his reputation, and gained him considerable employment. On his return to London, he was employed by Alderman Boydell to paint several pictures for the Shakspeare Gallery. There being little encouragement for historical painting at that time in England, he chiefly devoted himself to rural and domestic subjects, for which he had a happy talent: and his productions of that description are highly esteemed. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and died in 1801.

WHITE, ROBERT, an English designer and engraver, born at London in 1645, and died in 1704. He was a pupil of David Loggan, for whom he designed and engraved several architectural views. He engraved an immense number of portraits of distinguished personages, from his own designs, and after Kneller, Vandyck, and other eminent painters. Most of his plates are executed with the graver, in a neat, clear style. They are chiefly valued for their subjects and their excellent likeness.— He also engraved a few heads in mezzotinto, but they are far inferior to his other prints. He excelled in drawing portraits with black lead upon vellum, in which he was much employed. White was busily employed for about forty years, and amassed about £5,000, according to Walpole; but from some cause he died indigent. At his death, a printseller purchased his plates, and realized a fortune from them. The following are his most esteemed prints:

James I.; after C. Jansen. George, Earl of Cumberland, habited for a tournament; fine. Charles I.; after Vandyck. Another of Charles I.; after van Vorst. Prince Rupert; after Kneller. Charles II.; do. 1679. Another of Charles II., whole length, in the robes of the Garter. James II. under a canopy, with Archbishop Sancroft and the Chancellor Jefferies. James II. when Duke of York, in the robes of the Garter. Maria Beatrix of Este, his consort; after Kneller. 1686. Henry, Duke of Gloucester. Lady Mary Joliffe; scarce. Hencage, Earl of Nottingham. Thomas, Duke of Leeds. Sir Edward Ward, Chief Baron. 1702. Sir George Treby, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. 1694. Samuel Pepys, Secretary to the Admiralty; after Kneller. George, Earl of Melvil; after Sir John Medina. James, Earl of Perth; after Kneller. Another Portrait of the same; after Riley; fine. Bishop Burnet; after Mrs. Beale. Sir Alexander Temple. Lady Susanna Temple. Lady Anne Clifford. Thomas Flatman; after Hayls. Sir John Fenwick; after Wising. The Seven Bishops; seven small ovals; in one plate. The Seven Bishops who suffered Martyrdom; five ovals in one plate. Duke of Norfolk, Mezzotinto; after Kneller. John, Earl of Randor; do.; do.

WHITE, GEORGE, was the son of the preceding, who instructed him in art. After the death of his father, he finished the plates left imperfect by him; he also engraved some portraits in the same style; but his best prints are in mezzotinto, in which he frequently etched the outline before the ground was laid upon the plate, which sometimes adds to the firmness of the effect. He also painted portraits, both in oil and miniature. His prints are dated from about 1700 to 1732, when he is supposed to have died. The following are his best prints:

PORTRAITS IN MEZZOTINTO.

Sir Richard Blackmore, M. D.; after J. vander Bank. Sylvester Petyt, Principal of Bernard's Inn; fine. Nicholas Sanderson, Professor of Mathematics, of Cambridge. John Baptist Monnoyer, Painter; after Kneller. John Dryden; do. Alexander Pope; do. Thomas Bradbury; after Gibson. George Hooper, Bishop of St. Asaph; after Hill. Colonel Blood, who stole the Crown. William Dobson, Painter: from a picture by himself. A Man playing on the Violin; after Frank Hals. 1732. Henry Purcell; after Frank Hals? 1732.

PORTRAITS IN THE STYLE OF HIS FATHER.

James Gardiner, Bishop of Lincoln; after Dahl. Charles II. King of Spain; begun by Robert White, and finished by George White, whose name is affixed. The Duke of Ormond. Lord Clarendon.

WHITE, CHARLES, an English engraver, born at London in 1751. He studied with Pranker, on leaving whom he quitted stroke engraving, and wrought chiefly in the chalk style. He was chiefly employed by the booksellers, and died young in 1785.

WHITE, THOMAS, an English engraver, who died at London about 1776. He was much employed by Ryland, to assist him in his plates. He afterwards engraved the greater part of the architectural plates for the continuation of the "Vitruvius Britannicus," by Wolf and Gandon.

WIBERT. See VUIBERT.

WICHMAN, J., a German engraver, and probably a painter, who flourished about 1683. There is a large print by him, etched in a slight, coarse style, representing the Besieging and Taking of Stadtwien by the Emperor of Germany. At the bottom of the print are represented the portraits of the Emperor of Germany, and the Grand Sultan; at the top, those of the generals of the German and Turkish armies.

WICKENBERG, M. This Swedish painter was born in 1812. After acquiring a knowledge of art in his own country, he visited Paris in 1837, where he obtained considerable success. His pictures consist chiefly of winter scenes, delineated with great truthfulness to nature; one of his best performances is in the Luxembourg Gallery. He exhibited annually at the Louvre, until 1846, when he died of consumption, on the 19th of December.

WIDEMAN, ELIAS, a German designer and engraver, who flourished at Augsburg about 1648. He engraved a great number of portraits, title-pages, vignettes, and other plates for the booksellers, executed with the graver, in a stiff, formal style. His chief work is a set of plates of illustrious personages, published at Augsburg in 1648, entitled, Comitium Glorie centum qua Sanguine qua Virtute illustrium Heroum Iconibus instructum. &c. E. Wideman, del. et sculp.

WIDITZ, a German engraver on wood, who flourished at Strasburg, according to Professor Christ, about 1570. There are no reliable particulars recorded of him.

WIEBEKING, CHEVALIER CARL FRIEDRICH. This eminent German engineer, and writer on hydraulic and civil architecture, was born at Wollin in Pomerania, in 1762. He attained very great eminence as a practical engineer, and was employed many years by the Prussian, Austrian, and Bavarian governments, until 1818, when he retired from the service of the latter, with a pension. He is chiefly mentioned here on account of his large work on a general course of Civil Architecture and its History, entitled Theoretisch-practische Burgerliche Baukunde, 4 vols. 4to., with a very large folio atlas of plates, 1821-6. This is esteemed a very valuable contribution to architectural study, particularly on account of the fund of fresh information it supplies relative to the architecture of Germany, Holland, Poland, Russia, and some other parts of Europe. The Chevalier von Wiebeking, as he was usually called, (being knight of several German and foreign orders,) was also a member of nearly all the academies and learned societies in Europe. He died at Munich in 1842. There is by him a work entitled, Analyse Historique et Raisonné des Monumens de l'Antiquité, des Edifices les plus remarquables du Moyen Age, &c., published in 1840, and dedicated to Queen Victoria, of England.

WIEDEMANN, LUDWIG, a German sculptor and founder, was born at Nordlingen in 1690. His principal work mentioned in the Biographie Universelle, is the equestrian statue of Augustus II. of Poland, placed in 1735 near the river Elbe at Dresden. The king is represented in Roman costume, and the likeness is good; but the horse is better executed than any other part of the composition. In 1738, Wiedemann was invited to London by the Duke of Cumberland, to take charge of a foundry. He made an improvement in the manufacture of muskets, and afterwards went to Vienna, in 1750, where he was made a colonel of artillery. His last work in sculpture was the statue of the king of Denmark, executed at Copenhagen. He died in 1754.

WIELANT, or WILLANT, an engraver who is said to have executed several portraits. The name is probably a corruption of Vaillant, which see.

WIELING, NICHOLAS, a historical and portrait painter, supposed to have been a native of Holland. Little is known of his history, except that he was invited to the court of Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg, who appointed him his court painter in 1671. He died at Berlin in 1689. His style is said to resemble that of Vandyck. He had a son of the same name, whom he instructed in the art, but there are no particulars recorded of him.

WIENBROUCK, M. V. The name of this artist is affixed to a few slight etchings, executed in a painter-like style, among which is one representing an Old Man seated, to whom a Youth is relating a Message.

WIERENGEN, CORNELIUS NICHOLAS VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Haarlem about 1600. He excelled in painting sea-pieces and storms, which he represented with great truth and effect. He was also a good painter of landscapes, fourteen of which were engraved by Nicholas John Visscher. He etched many plates of sea-pieces and landscapes from his own designs, in a neat and spirited style. He died at Haerlem, according to Balkema, in 1658.

WIERINGA, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born at Groningen, probably about 1770. After learning the rudiments of the art from his father John W., an ornamental painter of little note, he went to Dusseldorf, to study the pictures in the Gallery there. In 1790 he returned to his native place, where he painted landscapes, sunsets, and winter-pieces, with considerable success. For one of his pictures, he obtained the gold medal from the Academy at Leyden. He died in 1817.

WIERIX, JOHN, an eminent Dutch designer and engraver, born at Amsterdam in 1550. His name is variously written Wierix, Wierx, and Wierinx, but he wrote it Wierix. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but he appears to have formed his style by an attentive study of the works of Albert Durer, as he copied several of the prints of that master with great precision. His plates are executed with the graver, in a neat and highly finished, though somewhat stiff and formal style, and his drawing is generally correct. His prints are very numerous, and are held in considerable estimation by the curious collector; some of them are from his own designs, but those after other masters are the best. He rarely signed his plates with his name, but usually marked them with the initials, I. W. F., and sometimes I. H. W. F., with the date. He was living in 1601. The following are among his most esteemed works:

PORTRAITS.

He sometimes signed his prints HIERONIMUS WIERIX, but usually with one of the above monograms, or simply with his initials, III. W., or III. W. F., or J. HIERONIMUS W. FE. The following are among his best prints:

WIERIX, ANTHONY, was the brother of the two preceding artists, and the youngest of the family, born at Amsterdam in 1554. His small plates are executed in the neat, finished style of his brothers, but his larger prints exhibit more freedom and facility. He engraved similar subjects, and frequently wrought in conjunction with them. The works of the Wierixes are exceedingly numerous; M. de Marolles had in his collection upwards of 1200 pieces by them. Anthony generally signed his prints with his name in full. The following are among his best prints:

PORTRAITS.

Pope Clement VII.; Ant. Wierix. Philip Emanuel of Lorraine, Duke de Merceur. Isabella of Austria, Daughter of Philip II. of Spain. Margaret, Queen of Philip III. of Spain. Cardinal Bellarmine. Albert of Austria, Archbishop of Toledo, Governor of the Low Countries.

WIGMANA, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born at Workum in Friesland, in 1673. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but after learning the rudiments of the art in his own country, he went to Italy, where he is said to have studied the works of Titian, Raffaello, and Giulio Romano. On his return to his own country, he painted a great many cabinet pictures of subjects taken from sacred, Grecian, Roman, and fabulous histories, which are as remarkable for patient and laborious finishing and brilliant coloring, as for the vulgarity of the

HW or HEW WIERIX, JEROME, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Amsterdam in 1552. He is supposed to have learned the art of engraving from John W., whose style he followed so closely that it would be difficult to distinguish their works, were it not that they are differently marked. His prints are more numerous than those of his brother, and characters and the incorrectness of the design. His studies in Italy, instead of improving his taste and elevating his style, appear to have only served to render his affectation of the sublime more clumsy and preposterous. His pictures are sometimes tolerably well composed, his coloring is remarkably transparent and brilliant, and his pencil neat and delicate; but his figures are badly grouped, the expression of his heads very indifferent, his drawing incorrect, and he was an outrageous violator of costume. Yet, with all these imperfections, his vanity was unbounded; he styled himself the Raffaele of Friesland, and asked such enormous prices for his pictures that he could not sell them. He demanded 300 pounds for his picture of the Death of Alexander, which in consequence was not sold till after his death. Not meeting with much success in his own country, he went to England, where he resided some time without receiving much encouragement. He returned to his own country, disappointed, and died at Amsterdam in 1741.

WILBORN, NICHOLAS. See WELBRONNER.

WILDE, FRANCIS DE, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1705. He etched some small plates of views and historical subjects, with great neatness and spirit, apparently from his own designs, among which are the Angel appearing to Abraham, Venus rising from the Sea, and a View of the city of Chalons. He signed his plates Fr. de Wilde, fec., with the date.

WILDE, MARIA DE. This lady was probably a relative of the preceding artist. She engraved a set of fifty plates of antique gems, which were published at Amsterdam in 1703.

WILDENS, JOHN, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1584. It is not known by whom he was instructed, but it is generally supposed that he was more indebted to his own genius, and a diligent study of nature, than to the precepts of a master. He was constantly in the fields and forests, carefully designing after nature every object which pleased his fancy, or appeared picturesque or remarkable. His skies, trees, grounds, and water, are all true imitations of what he had observed in his walks through the country. He had already acquired a distinguished reputation as a landscape painter, when his talents recommended him to Rubens, who employed him to assist in his numerous commissions, by painting the landscapes in the backgrounds of his pictures, which he did so much to the satisfaction of that great master, that he highly commended him for his skill, not only in imitating nature, but in adapting the freedom of his touch and the harmony of his coloring to the rest of the design, so that the whole appeared to be the work of one master. He had a good genius, an excellent choice of scenery, a pleasing and natural tone of coloring, and a free and spirited pencil. He also designed the human figure correctly. There are several grand landscapes by Wildens in the public edifices at Antwerp, several of which are embellished with figures by some of the ablest of his contemporaries; two of the most capital are in the chapel of St. Joseph, representing the Holy Family and the Repose in Egypt, with figures by John Bronckhorst. Vandyck painted his portrait among the eminent artists of his country.

Brulliot and Zani say that Wildens was an engraver, as well as a landscape painter, and Brulliot attributes to him the following views of chateaux in Holland; Teylingen, Egmont op de Hoef, T'Clooster tot Rynsburch, Thuys te Cleef by Haerlem. Werdemburch and Rossum. They are signed J. W. fecit. Robbertus de baudous excudit Amstelodami, 1616. The same letters, J. W., with inv., are found on prints engraved after his designs by Peter Nolpe, consisting of six allegorical subjects relating to the House of Orange, and its connection with Great Britain by marriage. The name Joan. Wild., and J. Wild. inv., are found on two prints of a series of twelve subjects, representing the Months of the Year, engraved by Andrew Stock, and J. Matham. Wildens died in 1644.

WILHELM, VON COELN, called MEISTER WILHELM, a painter of Cologne, of whom little is known with certainty. He is thus noticed in the annals of the Dominican monks of Frankfort. "In that time (1380), there was at Cologne a most excellent painter, to whom there was not the like in his art; his name was Wilhelm, and he made pictures of men which almost appeared to be alive." The German writers have made profound researches concerning him, without eliciting anything beyond conjecture. There are several pictures in the Cathedral and churches of Cologne, painted, as is supposed, in the latter part of the 14th and first part of the 15th centuries, which are attributed to Wilhelm, and to Meister Stephan, his pupil; but they are of very doubtful authenticity, and possess little interest out of Germany.

WILKIE, SIR DAVID, a British historical painter, and a very eminent delineator of scenes from common life, was born at the Manse of the parish of Cults, on the banks of Eden-water, in Fifeshire, Scotland, the 18th of November, 1785. He was the third son of David Wilkie, minister of Cults, and Isabella Lister, his third wife. During early childhood he manifested a strong love for art, and was afterwards heard to say that he could draw before he could read, and paint before he could spell. When seven years of age he was sent to the grammar school of Pitlessie, near his father's house, but he there learned little or nothing. From Pitlessie he was removed in his twelfth year to the grammar school of Kettle, but he there paid little attention to anything but drawing, and it became evident to his father that David would be nothing but a painter, greatly to his regret, for he did not see how a livelihood could be obtained by such a course. Accordingly, in 1799, at the age of fourteen, he was sent to the Trustees' Academy of Edinburg for the Encouragement of Manufactures, with a letter of introduction from the Earl of Leven to the Secretary, Mr. Thompson. The latter examined some of the young artist's drawings, and not being satisfied refused to admit him, but he afterwards did so at the particular request of the Earl of Leven. At this time John Graham was master of the Academy, and John Burnet, Alexander Fraser, and Sir William Allan, were among Wilkie's fellow pupils. The latter says of him, "The progress Wilkie made at this time, was marvellous. Everything he attempted showed a knowledge beyond his years; and he soon took up that position in art which he maintained to the last." In that description of drawings which requires academic taste and knowledge, he made little attainment compared with many others; his grand forte then, as ever after, was the delineation of character in scenes of humble life; he frequented trystes, fairs, and market-places, in order to observe the diversified specimens of humanity; and his works were distinguished for admirable truth and simplicity. He invariably painted slowly, and required models on all occasions. In 1803, he won the premium of ten guineas awarded to the painting of Callisto in the Bath of Diana, and in the same year made the sketch of his celebrated picture of the Village Politicians. In 1804, in his 19th year, he left the Academy, and returned home, where he painted for Kinnear of Kinloch, a picture of Pitlessie Fair, in which he inserted about 140 figures, many of them sketched while at church, as he had no other means of procuring them. For this picture he received only £25. At this time he painted many portraits in small and in miniature, and the picture called the Village Recruit.

About this time, Wilkie went to London, and entered the Royal Academy as a student. His first patron was Stodart, a piano-forte maker, who had married a lady named Wilkie. He sat for his portrait, and commissioned Wilkie to paint two pictures for him, introduced him to a valuable connexion, and procured him several sitters. The Earl of Mansfield, whose acquaintance he made through Stodart, commissioned him to paint a picture from his sketch of the Village Politicians, which was exhibited at the Academy in 1806, and excited universal admiration. This work indicated a branch of the art quite new to the painters of that day, and various comments were made upon it by the Academicians. Northcote termed it the "pauper style," and Fuseli, when he met Wilkie after he had seen it, said, "Young man, that is a dangerous work. That picture will either prove the most happy or the most unfortunate work of your life." It apparently proved the most fortunate; and although Wilkie was only twenty-one when he painted it, as a painting he never surpassed it afterwards, although in subject he produced several happier pictures. From this time commissions were abundant, and instead of returning to Scotland, as he had always intended, he found it necessary to establish himself in London. He received commissions from Mr. Whitbread, Lord Mulgrave, and Sir George Beaumont, who until his death proved a most valuable and sincere friend to Wilkie. His next works were the Blind Fiddler, for Sir George Beaumont, Alfred in the Neat-herd's Cottage, for Mr. Davidson; the Card Players, for the Duke of Gloucester; and the Rent-Day, for the Earl of Mulgrave, painted in 1807 and 1808. After these came the sketch of the Reading of the Will, the Wardrobe Ransacked, the Game-keeper, and the Ale-house door, afterwards called the Village Festival, painted for Mr. Angerstein for 800 guineas, and now in the National Gallery; all in the three succeeding years. In 1809 he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy, and a member in 1811.

Wilkie's incessant application to his profession obliged him about this time to suspend all exertion, being naturally of a weak constitution; and he made a short visit to his native place in Scotland. In 1812, he opened an exhibition of his own pictures in London, which extended his reputation, but was not very profitable. In December of the same year he lost his father, and invited his mother and sister to come and live with him in London, where he engaged a commodious house in Kensington for their reception. In 1813, he exhibited his picture of Blindman's Buff, painted for the Prince Regent. In 1814 he visited Paris, in company with his friend Mr. Haydon, where he studied the great collection of the gems of European art then gathered in the Louvre, particularly the pictures of the Flemish school. Some idea of the character of his taste may perhaps be gathered from the following remark in his journal. "I was especially struck with the pictures of Ostade and Terburg, the latter of whom has risen greatly in my estimation from what I have seen here. He possessed a most perfect style of coloring, and represents his objects with a manner of handling the most beautiful and least artificial of any I ever saw. I observed, to-day, that a number of pictures which did not strike at first, begin to gain upon me exceedingly. The Ostades and the Rembrandts improve greatly; the Tenierses and others in that style rather lose. The picture of the Marriage at Cana, which struck me so much at first, now begins to look common, and does not bear to be dwelt upon like the other pictures painted with more care and thinking." After his return to London, he painted the Distraining for Rent, purchased by the proprietors of the British Institution for 600 guineas. In the summer of 1816, he visited Belgium, in company with Raimbach the engraver; and on his return continued to produce various works, a catalogue of which would be too long for insertion. In 1820, he finished the Reading of the Will, for the king of Bavaria, which is now in the gallery at Schleissheim, and in point of character and composition is one of Wilkie's masterpieces, though inferior to many of his works in execution. His Chelsea Pensioners, painted for the Duke of Wellington for 1200 guineas, is esteemed Wilkie's masterpiece. The character, composition, and execution are exquisite, the drawing good, and the coloring sober and true; it is said to be the finest work of its class in England, and gives Wilkie rank among the celebrated artists of the Dutch school.

After this time, Wilkie changed his subjects, and his style of execution, but it is generally allowed that he did not add anything to his reputation. In his own peculiar style he was without a rival, but in historical painting he had many. One of the worst and earliest of these new productions was the Entrance of George IV. into Holyrood. At the death of Sir Henry Raeburn, in 1823, he was appointed limner to the king in Scotland. Two years after he started for the Continent, on account of ill-health, and passed eight months in Italy; after which he made the tour of Germany, and at Vienna had the honor of dining en famille with Prince Metternich. Returning to Italy, a public dinner was given him at Rome, by the Scotch artists and amateurs, at which the Duke of Hamilton presided. During his second visit to Italy, his health began to revive, and he painted three pictures at Rome. Passing through the south of France, he entered Spain in October, 1827, and painted his Defence of Saragossa, with the portrait of Gen. Palafox inserted, the defender of the place. He returned to England in the following year, and exhibited seven pictures painted while abroad, five of which were purchased by George IV. Some of these pictures were much admired by his friends, but less so by the public. The principal characteristics are effect of color, and of light and shade; which, with breadth and facility, he seems to have considered the proper objects of what is termed "high Art," and an advance on the truth, simplicity, and character of his earlier works; thus voluntarily enrolling himself among those who allowed themselves to be engrossed by technicalities, and, to use his own words, "seem to have painted more for the artist and connoisseur, than for the untutored apprehensions of ordinary men."

After the death of Lawrence in 1830, Wilkie was appointed in his place, painter in ordinary to his Majesty. Two years after, he exhibited his picture of John Knox preaching the Reformation in St. Andrew's, painted for Sir Robert Peel for 1200 guineas, which is a work of very high class, though a less glowing color and more careful style of execution are necessary to constitute it a work of first-rate excellence; it has been well engraved by Mr. Doo. In 1836, Wilkie received the honor of knighthood from King William IV. Various other works came from his pencil during the succeeding years, among them, Columbus submitting to the Spanish authorities the Chart of his Voyage for the Discovery of the New World, is a work of much fine character, and very richly colored. His greatest historical effort, however, is the picture of Sir David Baird discovering the body of the Sultan Tippoo Saib, after storming Seringapatam, painted for Lady Baird for 1500 guineas. In 1840, Wilkie started for the East, in company with his friend Mr. Woodburn, on account of some reason, which probably is not certainly known, although various rumors were circulated at the time. He went by Holland and the Rhine to the south of Germany, and thence to Constantinople, where he painted a portrait of the young Sultan, said to have been done at the suggestion of Queen Victoria. After visiting the Holy Land, he went to Alexandria and painted the portrait of Mehemet Ali. Wilkie's health had never been vigorous, and he had felt unwell for three months before arriving at Alexandria. On the 21st of May, 1841, he embarked on board the Oriental for England; on the 26th he arrived off Malta, where he indulged imprudently in fruit and iced lemonade; and he finally expired off Gibraltar, on the 1st of June.

Sir David Wilkie was tall and of sandy complexion, with sharp eyes; was polite and mild in his manners, and a staunch lover of everything Scotch. His works are well known to the world through the excellent engravings of Raimbach, Burnet, Cousins, Doo, and C. Fox. At the sale of his effects, which realized several thousand pounds, there were many unfinished works, which sold at high prices. In August, 1841, a public meeting of his friends was held in London, at which Sir Robert Peel presided. The result of this meeting was, that a subscription was started for the purpose of erecting a suitable monument to his memory: £2,000 were collected, and it was agreed that a statue of Sir David Wilkie, by the sculptor Joseph, should be placed in the National Gallery. The statue is now in the inner hall of that institution.

WILKINS, WILLIAM, a distinguished English architect, was born at Cambridge in 1778. He was the son of a builder, and received an academic education in the university of that place. In 1801, he obtained a traveling bachelorship, and visited Italy and Greece. On returning to England, he published his Antiquities of Magna Grecia, folio, 1807, which, containing little of particular interest to professional students, was rather coldly received by architects; but it was well calculated to recommend the author to scholars, and obtain the patronage of the University. Accordingly, in the same year of its publication, Wilkins was appointed architect of Downing College, and the buildings were begun forthwith. In this work, instead of adopting the Grecian style as far as it could be used, and adding for the occasion what the style would not admit of, he merely applied it just as he found it; and the result is quite unsatisfactory, both in the exterior architecture, and the interior accommodations.

Wilkins was afterwards appointed architect to the East India Company, at the resignation of Mr. Cockerell, and erected the East India College at Haileyburg, Herts, also in the pure Grecian style. He subsequently succeeded better in the additions and alterations which he executed for the three colleges of Trinity (1823), Corpus (1823), and King's (1828), at Cambridge. In these works he was obliged to use the Gothic style, and he had moreover seen the necessity of treating the Grecian with freedom, as is evident from the façade which he subsequently erected to University College, Gower-street, originally called the University of London, exhibiting a dome in combination with a Grecian portico, the latter being elevated upon a substructure the height of the basement floor, and forming a most picturesque arrangement of flights of steps. This is esteemed Wilkins' best performance, and has gained for him the most praise, both from critics and professional architects. His next work was the National Gallery, which has been criticised perhaps more than any of his edifices. He was made a member of the Royal Academy in 1834, and at the death of Sir John Soane in 1837, he was chosen to succeed him as Professor of Architecture. His talents would doubtless have conferred honor upon that institution, but he died in 1839, before the term (two years) allowed to a new professor to prepare lectures had expired. Besides the above mentioned edifices, he erected among others, the Nelson Pillar, in Dublin, 1808; and St. George's Hospital, Hyde Park Corner, which is pleasingly remarkable for the tetrastyle portico of square columns in its east front.

WILLAERTS, ADAM, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1577. He distinguished himself as a painter of marines, coast scenes, and sea-ports, with a variety of shipping and boats. His pictures are generally embellished with groups of numerous small figures, correctly drawn, and touched with neatness and spirit. He also painted conflagrations, representing villages and ships on fire; his works of this description are well colored, and produce a striking effect. He obtained considerable reputation in his day, but his works are not so much esteemed as they were formerly; for, though his coloring is clear and transparent, his manner is somewhat dry and hard, and his figures are deficient in elegance. In 1600 he left Antwerp, and settled at Utrecht, where he died, according to the best authorities, in 1640. Balkema, differing from all other writers, says he was Regent of the Hospital of St. Job, in that city, from 1639 to 1660, but doubtless he has confounded him with the following artist.

WILLAERTS, ABRAHAM, was the son of the preceding, born at Utrecht in 1613. After receiving instruction from his father, he studied some time with John Bylert, and afterwards went to Paris, where he became the pupil of Simon Vouet. On returning to his own country, he acquired considerable reputation as a painter of history and portraits. He was taken into the service of Prince Maurice of Nassau at Brussels, in whose employment he continued some years. He afterwards went to Africa, and made numerous sketches of the scenery of that country, as well as the manners and costumes of the inhabitants. He died at Utrecht in 1671.

WILLE, JOHN GEORGE, an eminent German engraver, born at Koningsberg in 1717. After learning the rudiments of design in his native city, he went to Paris at the age of nineteen, where he applied himself to stroke engraving, which he afterwards carried to such a high state of perfection that few engravers have equalled him in the clearness and beauty of his execution. He particularly excelled in representing the brilliancy and softness of silk and satin draperies, and the delicacy of his burin was admirably adapted to express the polished finishing of the most celebrated Dutch painters. He engraved several charming plates from the pictures of Douw, Mieris, Metz, Schalcken, Netscher, and other eminent painters, which give a very perfect idea of the style of the original paintings. He also executed some admirable portraits after the French masters. He acquired great distinction, and was elected a member of the academies of Paris, Rouen, Augsburg, Vienna, Berlin, and Dresden; was appointed engraver to the king of France, the Emperor of Germany, and the King of Denmark. Several sovereigns sent pupils to him to be instructed in the art; he also had many other scholars, some of whom followed his style with considerable success. Among the most distinguished may be named Schultze, Schmutzer, J. G. Müller, Bervic, Chevillet, the brothers Guttenberg, Halm, and Dannel. Charles le Blanc, in his valuable work entitled "Le Graveur en Taille Douce," gives a detailed account of one hundred and seventy-five engravings, with all their variations, by Wille. Very full lists may also be found in Nagler's Kunstler Lexicon, and Bartsch's Peintre Graveur. He died in 1807. The following are among his most esteemed prints:

WILLE, PETER ALEXANDER, was the son of the preceding, born at Paris in 1748. His father intended him for his own profession, and instructed him in the rudiments of art, but the son manifesting a genius for painting, was permitted to study that branch. He accordingly frequented the Academy, and afterwards studied with Vien and Greuze. He distinguished himself as a painter of domestic and familiar subjects, conversations, &c., and was elected a member of the Academy. A good idea may be formed of his abilities, from the prints engraved after his pictures by his father. He also etched a few plates from his own designs, and after other masters.

WILLEBORTS. See BOSCHAERT.

WILLEMANS, or WILLMAN, MICHAEL, an eminent German painter, born at Lubec in 1630. Desirous of procuring better instruction than he could obtain in his native city, he went to Amsterdam, and first studied with Jacob Backer; but he afterwards became the disciple of Rembrandt, with whom he continued several years. On returning to Germany, he acquired distinction as an historical painter, and found abundant employment. He was much patronized by the Elector of Brandenburg, for whom he executed several considerable works, particularly a large picture of Vulcan forging the Arms of Mars, which is highly commended. He was also employed at several other courts of Germany, where his works are highly esteemed; and many of the churches and the palaces of the nobility in Germany, are adorned with his productions. He died in 1697.

WILLEMS, MARK, a Flemish painter, born at Mechlin about 1527. He studied with Michael Coxcis, and became a very eminent painter of history in his time. He painted with great facility; his pictures are well composed, and agreeably colored; his figures are correctly designed. When Philip, king of Spain, made his public entry into Mechlin, Willems, then but twenty-two years of age, was employed to paint the triumphal arch, which gained him great credit. There is a fine picture by him, representing the Decollation of St. John, in the cathedral at Mechlin. He died in 1561.

WILLIAMS, ROBERT, an English engraver born in Wales, who flourished at London about 1715. He distinguished himself as an engraver in mezzotinto, and executed a great number of portraits of distinguished personages, after Wissing, Vandyck, Kneller, and others, which are interesting as illustrations of English history. Some of them are finely executed, and are accounted excellent likenesses. Among others are the following:

Charles I.; after Vandyck. Edward, Lord Littleton, Lord Keeper; do. Charles II.; two plates; after Lely and Kneller. James II., when Duke of York; after Cooper. Mary Beatrix, his Queen; after Wissing. William III., when Prince of Orange; do. Mary, Princess of Orange; do. Henry Somerset, Duke of Beaufort; do. William Russell, Duke of Bedford; do. James Fitzroy, Duke of Monmouth. WILLIAMS, JOHN, an English portrait painter, who flourished about 1775. He is supposed to have been a scholar of Richardson. He was an excellent artist, and his portraits are deservedly admired.

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who was probably an amateur. His name is affixed to two slight etchings of views of the town of Halifax.

WILLIAMSON, P., an English engraver and printseller, who flourished at London about 1667. He engraved a few portraits, and some small plates illustrating the Concealment of Charles II., dated in that year.

WILLINGEN, PETER VANDER, a Dutch painter, born at Bergen-op-Zoom in 1607. He painted subjects of still-life—vases of gold and silver, books, and musical instruments, ingeniously composed, agreeably colored, and very highly finished, producing a very natural and pleasing effect. He died in 1665. There was another artist of this name, who flourished about the same time, and painted interiors of churches and other edifices. Nothing is known of him except by his pictures.

WILS, or WILTS, JOHN, a Dutch landscape painter, who flourished at Haerlem about 1650. Little is known of him, except that Nicholas Berghem married his daughter, and is said to have frequently embellished his landscapes with cattle and figures. Such are now attributed entirely to the latter.

WILSON, RICHARD, R. A., an eminent English landscape painter, was born of a respectable family at Pinegas, in Montgomeryshire, in 1714. He was the third son of seven children; at the time of his birth, his father was a clergyman in Montgomeryshire, but he was shortly afterwards collated to the living of Mold, in Flintshire. Young Wilson early manifested a taste for drawing, and gave such promise that his relative, Sir George Wynne, took him to London, and placed him under an obscure portrait painter, named Thomas Wright, who lived in Covent Garden. With this master he made great progress, but nothing is known of his earlier studies; he must, however, have attained some rank as a portrait painter, for in the year 1748 he painted a large picture of the Prince of Wales and his brother the Duke of York, for their tutor Dr. Hayter, bishop of Norwich.

After practicing for some time with success in London as a portrait painter, Wilson went to Italy in 1749, to study the great works of the Italian masters. He had as yet tried little, if anything, in landscape painting, and seems not to have known his abilities in that branch; but while stopping at Venice, he paid a visit to Zuccarelli, the landscape painter, who happened to be from home, and Wilson, to pass the time until he came, made a sketch in oils of the view from the painter's window. Zuccarelli thought so highly of this sketch, that he recommended Wilson to relinquish portrait, and take to landscape painting. Another occurrence which happened to him in Rome, induced him to follow this advice. Vernet, the celebrated French landscape painter, visited him in his studio at Rome, and was so much struck with a landscape by Wilson which he saw there, that he offered one of his best pictures in exchange for it; the proposal was readily accepted, and the picture delivered to Vernet, who placed it in his exhibition room, and often spoke highly of Wilson's talents. Years after, when established in Paris, Vernet would frequently tell his English patrons that they had no need of coming to him for pictures, while they possessed such a painter as Wilson.

From this time, Wilson devoted himself to landscape, and soon acquired so great a reputation that he had many scholars, even while in Rome; and Mengs painted his portrait, receiving a landscape in return from Wilson. He did not follow the example of many, in copying the works of celebrated masters; but he went immediately to the source of all art, and confined his studies to nature. After an absence of six years, Wilson returned to England in 1755. In 1760 he exhibited, in the great room at Spring Gardens, his celebrated picture of Niobe, which was purchased by William, Duke of Cumberland. This work established his reputation in England, as one of the first landscape painters of his time. In 1765, he exhibited in the same place a View of Rome from the Villa Madama, which was purchased by the then Marquis of Tavistock. He was one of the first members of the Royal Academy, founded in 1768; and at the death of Hayman in 1776, he was appointed librarian in his place. This appointment brings a very small emolument with it, yet small as it is, Wilson solicited the place; for although a few discriminating connoisseurs purchased some of his best pictures, he was neglected by the public, and was in a state of indigence compared with the majority of his fellow members of the Academy. Many of the Academicians had a personal dislike to him, among whom the president, Reynolds, was the foremost. The friends of the latter attribute this to Wilson's unprepossessing appearance, and uncouth manners, but these unfavorable circumstances do not account for the active and persevering animosity of the president. Wilson's uncouthness, however, was seemingly only external, according to the account of Northcote, who says that "his mind was as refined and intelligent as his person and manners were coarse and repulsive; and discernment and familiarity with him were necessary to discover the unpolished jewel beneath its ferruginous coat." Like many other talented artists, he received no adequate encouragement during his life-time; but the prophecy of Peter Pindar (Dr. Wolcott) has been abundantly verified, and the pictures for which Wilson received only a few pounds, have since been sold for as many hundreds. During the last two or three years of his life he lived in affluence, owing to some property which he inherited from a brother. He retired to the house of his relative, Mrs. C. Jones, called Colomondie, in Wales, where he died in 1782.

The style of Wilson is altogether original. Following nature as his guide, he adopted a varied and interesting manner, distinguished for its boldness and fidelity to nature, yet entirely classical. He avoided the acquisition of all adventitious beauties, and escaped the mannerism which generally arises from the too partial study of favorite masters. His views in Italy are selected with judgment and taste. In the words of a just criticism which appeared at London many years ago, in the "Sun" paper: "In many of these pictures Italy is realized, and at one glance we are enabled to enter into all the great and powerful feelings which are awakened by the recollection of what our earlier studies taught us respecting that land of heroes, that seat of stupendous empire which virtue raised and luxury withdrew, till it presented those melancholy scenes in the representation of which Wilson so preëminently excels. They are fine compositions, mingling the loveliest appearances of nature, where nature is most beautiful, with dreary and dark desolation, and every touching image which decaying grandeur in the noblest works of art could suggest to a classical imagination." It has also been observed, in a similar strain, that "in his pictures the waving line of mountains, which bound the distance in every point of view, the dreary and inhospitable plains, rendered solemnly interesting by the mouldering fragments of temples, tombs, and aqueducts, are all indicated in a masterly manner, exhibiting that local character which cannot but be considered as peculiarly grand and classical." In his representations of scenes from his native country, Wilson was frequently employed to paint particular views, which were less picturesque than he would have selected, and consequently partake of the formality of portraiture; but they are invariably treated with taste and ingenuity, and are distinguished for their fresh and dewy brightness of verdure.

In 1814, about seventy of Wilson's pictures were exhibited with some other works, at the British Institution. Among his principal works are, Niobe; Phaeton; a large View of Rome; Villa of Mæcenas at Tivoli; Hadrian's Villa; Temple of Bacchus, near Rome; View on the Tiber; Cicero at his Villa; Ceyx and Atalante; View from Wilton House; St. James's Park; Carnarvon Castle; and many others. Some of them he repeated several times with little variation, particularly the Villa of Mæcenas at Tivoli, which he repeated five times; and this circumstance has sometimes given rise to a suspicion of the originality of some of his works, which are really the productions of his pencil. Many of them have been engraved by Woollett, Byrne, Elliott, Hodges, Middiman, Earlom, and others; and many yet remain to be engraved.

WILSON, BENJAMIN, an English portrait painter, born at Leeds in Yorkshire. He went early to London, where Dr. Berdmore, Master of the Charter House, took him under his protection. He became a reputable painter of portraits, and was one of the first who endeavored to introduce into his pictures a better style of relief and of the chiaro-scuro. His heads are colored with more warmth and nature than those of the generality of his cotemporaries. He had considerable knowledge of natural philosophy, and was a member of the Royal Society. He executed a few etchings, among which are two or three in imitation of Rembrandt. He was appointed master-painter to the Board of Ordnance, and died in 1788.

WILSON, ANDREW, a distinguished Scottish landscape painter in water colors, was born at Edinburgh in 1780. After acquiring some knowledge of painting under Nasmyth, he went to London at the age of seventeen, and entered the Royal Academy. When he had completed his studies there, he went to Rome about 1799, and studied the great works of art in that city, besides designing the finest views in the vicinity, and making close investigations into the ancient modes of painting at Pompeii and the Neapolitan Museum. After returning to London, he was induced to revisit Italy in 1803, for the purchase of works by the old masters; and while in Genoa he purchased fifty-four, among which was Rubens' picture of the Brazen Serpent, now in the National Gallery. He was also elected a member of the Ligurian Academy.

In 1806, Wilson returned to England, and exhibited several admired pictures at the Royal Academy. In 1808 he married, and subsequently accepted one of the Professorships in the Royal Military College at Sandhurst; he resigned his appointment after a time, and returning to Scotland, became master of the Trustees' Academy, a post which he held for some years, during which time he was the instructor and warm friend of a number of young men who have since done honor to Scottish Art. Guided by Wilson's knowledge and taste, the Board of Manufacturers extended their collection of casts, which is now one of the finest in the kingdom. As Manager of the Royal Institution, he was employed to purchase the collection of engravings now preserved in their galleries; and his opinion was consulted on all matters relating to the collection of works of art and the promotion of taste. During this period he painted many fine pictures, which found a ready sale. His morning and evening scenes were greatly admired for their truth and beauty; his pictures were distinguished for their classic forms and arrangement, correct and elegant drawing, and vigorous touch.

Aided by a small accession of fortune, Wilson determined to revisit Italy in 1826; and during the succeeding twenty years he lived alternately at Rome, Florence, and Genoa, painting many pictures, some of which were purchased for the royal and noble collections. He also purchased many fine works of art for the English private galleries, and formed the collection in Edinburgh which was subsequently intended to occupy the National Gallery of Scotland, and is probably located there at the present time. In 1847, Wilson returned to England, and died at Edinburgh in the following year.

WILSON, W., an English mezzotinto engraver of little note, who executed a few portraits, among which is one of the Countess of Newburg; after Dahl.

WILSON, WILLIAM, an English engraver, who executed with the graver, in a neat, clear style, several landscapes after Claude Lorraine, Poussin, and other masters.

WILT, THOMAS VANDER, a Dutch painter and engraver, born, according to Brulliot, at Piershil in 1659. He studied under John Verkolie, and settled at Delft, where he painted portraits and familiar subjects. He also executed a few portraits in mezzotinto, marked with the above monogram. There is some discrepancy about him; Laborde quotes Brulliot, saying that his name was F. vander Wilt; Zani calls him Ferdinand; but the monogram would indicate Thomas. He was living in 1729.

WILTON, JOSEPH, R. A., an eminent English sculptor, was born at London, according to Allan Cunningham, in 1722. His father, though a common plasterer, acquired a fair fortune by manufacturing ornaments for ceilings and furniture, and as Wilton manifested a strong inclination for sculpture, he sent him over the channel to Brabant, and placed him under Laurent Delvaux. At the age of 22, Wilton proceeded to Paris, where he entered the school of Pigalle, learned the art of working marble, and drew the silver medal at the Academy. In 1747 he removed to Rome, where he distinguished himself so much to the satisfaction of the Academy of St. Luke, that in 1750, Pope Benedict XIV. presented him with the Jubilee Gold Medal. During a residence of eight years in Italy, Wilton was chiefly occupied in copying the antique statues. He returned to London in company with Cipriani the painter, Chambers the architect, and a skillful modeller named Capizzoldi.

About this time the Duke of Richmond formed a gallery in Spring Gardens for students in art, offering premiums to the most meritorious, and appointed Wilton and Cipriani directors. Before the termination of Wilton's engagement he was appointed State Coach Carver to the King, and he made the coronation coach for George III. According to Cunningham, the English sculptors before this time were employed by the architects, and Wilton was the first who had passed through a regular course of instruction and travel. His father having left him a considerable fortune, he was enabled to follow his own inclinations, and he succeeded at length in elevating British sculpture to its proper footing as an independent art. The first public work of importance from his chisel was the monument to Gen. Wolfe, in Westminster Abbey; after which he executed many other works, among which were the monuments to Admiral Holmes, the Earl and countess Montrath, and Stephen Hales. He also executed a large number of busts, particularly those of Swift, Wolfe, Chesterfield, Chatham, Cromwell, Bacon, and Newton. His design was tolerably good, he was intimately acquainted with anatomy, and notwithstanding the defects in his composition, which was frequently ill-conceived, too crowded, and too minute in accessories, his execution was excellent, and all his productions were admirably worked in the marble. Wilton acquired a large fortune, and lived in great style. He had a very beautiful daughter, who was married to Sir Robert Chambers. He was one of the founders of the Royal Academy, and when he retired from his profession, accepted the office of Keeper of that institution.

He died in 1803. There is a bust of him in the Royal Academy, executed by Roubilliac, and presented by his daughter, Lady Chambers.

WINCKEL, THERESA EMILIA HENRIETTA, a German paintress, was born at Dresden in 1784. She studied in the gallery of her native city, and attained great excellence in copying after the old masters. In 1806 she visited Paris in company with her mother, and remained there about two years and a half. Her talents were highly esteemed by David, who said that no artist could equal her in copying Correggio. Her mother having lost her fortune, the daughter employed her talents in music and painting for their common support. Several of her paintings have been used as altar-pieces. The time of her death is not recorded.

WINDHAM, JOSEPH, an English artist, antiquary, and writer on art, was born at Twickenham in 1739. After his educational course at Eton, and Christ's College, Cambridge, he visited the Continent, and traveled through France, Italy, Istria, and Switzerland, in 1769. While residing at Rome, he studied and measured the remains of ancient architecture there, particularly the baths; and his numerous plans and sections of them were engraved in Mr. Cameron's great work on the Roman Baths. To this he also furnished a considerable and valuable portion of the letter-press; he also drew up the greater part of the letter-press of the second volume of the Ionian Antiquities, published by the Society of Dilettanti; and Mr. Stuart received material assistance from him in the second volume of his Athens. For many years Windham was a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies; and in the latter was for many years one of the council. He died in 1810.

WINDTER, J. W., an engraver, who died at Nuremberg in 1765. There is much contradiction about his name, but he signed his prints J. W. Windter del. et sculps., or J. W. W. He engraved a few portraits and other subjects.

WINGANDORP, F., a German engraver, who flourished about 1672. He engraved some frontispieces and other book plates, indifferently executed with the graver.

WINGHEN, JODOCUS, or JOSSE VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Brussels in 1544. He went young to Italy, and studied four years at Rome. On returning to his native city, he was appointed painter to the prince of Parma. In 1584 he went to Frankfort, and painted history with considerable reputation till his death, which happened, according to Füessli and Brulliot, in 1603, and Zani, in 1613. His pictures are marked with one of the following monograms; he is sometimes called the Old, to distinguish him from his son Jeremiah, called the Young.

WINGHEN, JEREMIAH VAN, was the son of the preceding, born at Brussels in 1578. He showed an early genius for art, and after receiving instruction from his father, he went to Italy, where he painted history with great reputation, and his works obtained him great applause in every city that he visited. He afterwards returned to his own country, and settled at Frankfort, devoting himself chiefly to portraits, in which he was truly excellent. He obtained a striking likeness, his coloring was clear and natural, and his pictures were finished with diligence and care. He died in 1648.

WINSTANLEY, HENRY, an English architect of considerable distinction. He was the projector, designer, and builder of the first Eddy-stone lighthouse, and perished with his edifice in the great storm of 1704.

WINSTANLEY, HAMLET, an English painter, was the son of the preceding. After studying under Sir Godfrey Kneller, he went to Italy, where he resided some years. On returning to England, he abandoned painting and devoted himself entirely to engraving. He etched a set of twenty plates from pictures in the collection of the Earl of Derby by Titian, Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, Bassano, Guido, Castiglione, Spagnoletto, Carlo Maratti, Rubens, Vandyck, Rembrandt, and other eminent masters. He also engraved a set of plates from the paintings of Sir James Thornhill in the cupola of St. Paul's cathedral. He died about 1760.

WINTER, GILES DE, a Dutch painter, born at Leeuwarde in 1650. He studied under Renier Brakenburg, whose style he followed with considerable success. He painted similar subjects to those of his master, representing the amusements and recreations of the peasantry, Dutch boors regaling themselves, interiors of cabarets, &c.—His pictures are ingeniously composed, and his coloring is clear and brilliant, but his design is often very incorrect, as his imagination was so strong, that he never gave himself the trouble to study after nature, or make any preparatory designs, but composed and painted at once on his canvass, and wrought with the negligence and despatch of a mannerist. His pictures are little known out of his own country. He died at Amsterdam in 1720.

WINTER, or WINTNER, JOSEPH GEORGE, a German designer and engraver, who flourished about 1787. He engraved and published a large number of plates from his own designs, and after the works of Teniers, Berghem, Wouwerman, Melchior Roos, Peter de Laer, and other masters, fifty-three of which were in the Rigal collection. There were several other painters and engravers of little note, named Winter. Zani mentions a Gio. Guglielmo Winter, a painter of animals, and an engraver, who flourished in 1764.

WIRZ, JOHN, a Swiss painter and engraver, born at Zurich in 1640. He studied under Conrad Meyer, and painted portraits with considerable success; but he is chiefly known out of his own country by his engravings. He designed and etched a set of forty-two plates for a book written by himself, entitled Johannis Wirzii Romæ Animale Exemplum, &c., 1677. They are etched in a neat, spirited style, resembling that of John William Baur. He also etched a few plates of portraits, and other subjects, after Holbein, Meyer, and others. He died in 1710.

WISCHER, THEODORE. See VISSCHER.

WISSING, WILLIAM, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1656. He studied under William Doudyns, a painter of history at the Hague, but his genius leading him to portraiture, he adopted that branch of the art. On leaving his instructor, he went to Paris, and soon afterwards to England, where he was employed by Sir Peter Lely to assist him in his numerous works, and on the death of that master, he succeeded to much of his business. He imitated the style and coloring of Lely very successfully. He painted the portrait of the Duke of Monmouth several times, which ingratiated him with the King, and procured him the commission to paint all the members of the Royal Family, as well as the principal ladies and nobility of the court. Although he found a formidable rival in Sir Godfrey Kneller, he was still extensively employed, and at the death of Charles II., was appointed principal painter to his successor, James II., who sent him to the Hague to take the likeness of William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange. He died at Burleigh, the seat of the Earl of Exeter, in 1687.

WIT, or WITTE, PIETER DE, called by the Italians, PIETRO CANDIDO, a Flemish painter, sculptor, and architect, born at Bruges in 1548. After studying in his native city, under some unknown master, he went young to Italy, and formed an intimacy with Giorgio Vasari, who employed him to assist in his works in the Vatican. He painted equally well both in oil and fresco, and was afterwards employed to execute several considerable works for the palace of the Grand Duke of Tuscany; also some cartoons for tapestry. He was invited to Munich by the Elector of Bavaria, who appointed him his painter, and he remained there during the rest of his life. He was the intimate friend of John Sadeler, who engraved some of his principal works, among which are the Annunciation, the Last Supper, the Holy Women at the Tomb of the Saviour, and Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus. De Wit painted, under the arcade of the long gallery of the Hof-garten at Munich, a series of frescos, representing the deeds of Otto of Wittelsbach, and the Departure of the Emperor Ludwig I. from Rome, in 1327. The paintings are now defaced, but the designs are preserved in the tapestries worked from them, and in the prints engraved by Amling from the tapestries. These are thirteen in number, marked with the name of Pietro Candido, as the painter. He was a monk, and most of his works are of a religious character.

De Wit probably acquired the knowledge of sculpture and architecture under Vasari. He practiced those arts at Munich, where the Elector, Maximilian I., employed him in the great palace, entrusting to him the embellishment of the interior, and probably the principal part of the whole work. Milizia praises the staircase as a master-piece of architecture. As a sculptor, he executed, among other works, the mausoleum of the Emperor Ludwig, in the church of Our Lady at Munich, decorated at the four angles with four statues of soldiers, larger than life, with lances and various insignia. Milizia says this work is worthy of being placed in St. Peter's. There is some confusion in the different accounts of this painter, and that part of his history connected with the Elector of Bavaria, is attributed in the Biographie Universelle, to one Lievin Wit, an historical and glass painter, whose birth is placed at Ghent, about 1510; but this is most probably erroneous, as the artist of this name who visited Munich, was employed by the Elector Maximilian I. who succeeded to the government in 1596. His death is placed by some in 1599, but this probably refers to some other artist; as the works he executed for Maximilian would seem to have occupied at least ten or fifteen years, if not longer. Others place it after 1620, which is the most reliable account.

WIT, or WITTE, CORNELIUS DE, was a younger brother of the preceding, but the accounts of him are strangely confused. He is said to have been very eminent as a landscape painter.

WIT, or WITTE, GASPARD DE, a Flemish painter, born at Antwerp in 1621. After studying in his native city he went to Italy, and gained considerable reputation for his landscapes of small size, designed in the Italian manner, and enriched with ancient ruins and edifices, also with small figures, correctly designed. His pictures were exquisitely finished, in the Flemish style. After several years he returned to the Low Countries, and painted numerous pictures, many of them from designs he had made in Italy, which were much admired. He died at Amsterdam in 1673.

WIT, or WITTE, PETER DE, sometimes called JUNIOR, or the YOUNGER, to distinguish him from the elder Peter de Wit, was the brother of Gaspar de Wit. He was born at Antwerp in 1620, and died in or about 1669. He was a good landscape painter, and acquired considerable reputation.

WIT, or WITTE, EMANUEL DE, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Alkmaer in 1607. He studied under Evert van Aelst at Delft, a painter of still-life, but did not adopt the style of his instructor. He applied himself to portraits, and occasionally to history, for some time; but not meeting with much encouragement, he studied perspective and architecture, and became one of the most eminent artists of his country in this branch. His best pictures represent the interiors of churches, temples, and magnificent edifices, which he embellished with numerous figures, correctly drawn, and touched with great neatness and spirit. He frequently gave a striking and picturesque appearance to his pieces, by representing the sun shining through the windows on part of the building, which is finely contrasted with that which is in shadow, and produces a natural and pleasing effect. The different ornaments of the buildings are designed with the greatest precision, and every object is touched with a bold and masterly pencil. Wit resided most of his life at Amsterdam, and his pictures usually represent the interiors of churches in that city, with every object correctly delineated, as the organs, monuments, pulpits, clergymen, and seats crowded with the audience. His style of composition is so peculiar, that his pictures once seen, can be instantly recognized. His best works are highly esteemed, and are to be found in the choice collections of his country. He died in 1692, aged 85 years.

The fair fame of this talented artist has probably been grossly libeled, for some unaccountable reason. He is said to have been dissipated in his habits, of a sour and morose disposition, and too much inclined to depreciate the works of his brother artists, which procured him universal hatred and contempt, and reduced him to poverty. It is also related that he was found drowned in a canal at Haerlem, with a rope about his neck, in 1692. It is not very likely that a debauchee would live to the age of 85 years; and his style was so different from any of his cotemporaries, that he could have little fear of competition from them, or they from him. The following anecdote, however, would indicate that he was of a passionate temper. He had received a commission from the son of Admiral de Ruyter to paint a View of the choir of the new church at Amsterdam, where the monument of the famous Dutch commander was erected.—Young de Ruyter dying before the work was finished, the family refused to pay the stipulated price, but offered a moiety. As the artist had exerted all his energies to produce a capital work, he was so exasperated, that he destroyed the picture.

WIT, JACOB DE, a Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1695. He first studied with Albert van Spiers for three years, after which he went to Antwerp, to improve himself by studying the works of Rubens and Vandyck. While there, he studied some time with Jacob van Halen, a painter of little note; but he derived his principal improvement from a diligent study of the works of the great Flemish masters. In 1712 and 1713, he made designs from the famous paintings by Rubens, on the four ceilings in the church of the Jesuits in that city, in thirty-six compartments; and we are indebted to him for the preservation of those admirable compositions, as the originals were destroyed with the church by lightning, in 1718. The engravings by John Punt, were executed from the designs of de Wit. He was principally employed in painting ceilings, and decorating the mansions of the nobility with historical, emblematic, and allegorical subjects, which he composed with great ingenuity, designed correctly, and colored agreeably. He was particularly successful in designing children, and some of his pictures of Cherubs, or Cupids sporting, painted in chiaroscuro, are remarkably fine, and are held in the highest estimation. In 1736, he was employed by the magistrates of Amsterdam, to embellish the great Council Chamber with several subjects from the Old Testament, in which he discovers great inventive genius, and uncommon facility of execution. He also painted many works for the churches in Holland. He died in 1744.

WIT, or WITTE, DE. There were several other painters and engravers of this name, but they were of little note, and the accounts are so confused that little reliance can be placed upon them; such are Anthony, Francis, E. and B. de Wit.

WITDOECK, HANS or JOHN, an eminent Flemish engraver, born at Antwerp about 1600. His name is variously inscribed on his plates; generally Witdoeck, sometimes Withouck, and occasionally Witdouch. His talents recommended him to the notice of Rubens, and he engraved several plates from the pictures of that great painter under his immediate inspection. His plates, though less correct in drawing, and less admirable in the mechanical part of the execution than those of Vorsterman, Bolswert, and Pontius, are still estimable for their powerful effect, and they are in several instances the only prints existing of the capital pictures from which they were engraved. He also executed some plates from the works of Cornelius Schut, and other masters. The following are his most esteemed prints :

SUBJECTS AFTER RUBENS.

Melchisedeck presenting Bread and Wine to Abraham. The Nativity. This plate has undergone several alterations, chiefly to add to the effect. The first impressions are without the address of Corn. Coeberchs; the second are with that address. The plate afterwards came into the possession of S. Bolswert, who retouched it, by which it was greatly improved. He also effaced the name of Coeberchs, and inserted his own. The Adoration of the Magi; engraved in 1683. There are also different impressions of this plate. The Elevation of the Cross, in three sheets. His most capital print. Christ with the two Disciples at Emmaus. There are some impressions of this plate printed in chiaro-scuro, under the direction of Rubens, which are very scarce. The Assumption of the Virgin. The impressions of this plate with the address of Corn. van Merlen, are retouched. The Holy Family, with St. John. The first impressions of this plate are before the address of Moermans. Another Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth and St. John. The best impressions have the address of R. J. de Bert. St. Cecilia. This plate was retouched and improved by Bolswert.

WITHOOS, MATTHEW, a Dutch painter, born at Amersfort in 1627. After studying six years under Jacob van Campen, a painter of history and an architect, he went to Italy in company with Otho Marcellis. Observing that the works of the latter were eagerly sought after from their novelty, he abandoned history, and applied himself to the same branch, in which he greatly excelled. He painted fruit, flowers, curious plants, insects, serpents, lizards, toads, and other reptiles to the life. He drew everything from nature with wonderful precision, truthfulness, and beauty of penciling, that procured him many admirers. During a residence of two years at Rome, he was much employed by the Cardinal de' Medici to paint a great variety of subjects of that description, for which he was liberally rewarded. He returned to Holland in 1650, and found abundant employment, at high prices, his pictures bringing him five or six hundred florins each. On the approach of the French army in 1672, he retired to North Holland, and settled at Hoorn, where he died in 1703. See Otho Marcellis.

WITHOOS, JOHN, was the son of the preceding, born at Amersfort in 1648. After receiving instruction from his father, he went to Italy, and diligently studied nature; he made an immense collection of highly finished water-colored drawings of the beautiful scenery, and views in the environs of Rome, which were greatly admired, and readily sold at high prices. He also painted landscapes in oil, from these drawings, with equal success. Though he met with very flattering encouragement at Rome, he was induced after several years to return to Holland, at the solicitation of his friends. His works were not less admired in his own country, and he was invited to the court of the Duke of Saxe-Lawenburg, in whose service he continued till his death, in 1695.

P. W. WITHOOS, PETER, was the second son of Matthew W., born at Amersfort in 1654. He studied with his father, and painted similar subjects in water-colors on vellum. His works are very highly and delicately finished, correctly designed, and colored after nature; they are highly esteemed in Holland by the curious collector, still commanding considerable prices and admitted into choice collections. He died at Amsterdam in 1693.

WITHOOS, FRANCIS, was the youngest son of Matthew W., by whom he was instructed. He painted the same subjects as his brother, in water-colors, on vellum, but with much less ability. He made a voyage to Batavia, in the island of Java, where he executed a great many drawings of the plants, insects, and reptiles peculiar to that climate and country, but on returning to Holland, his performances were thought inferior to his earlier productions. He died at Hoorn in 1705.

WITSEN, NICHOLAS, an engraver, probably a native of Holland, who flourished about 1659.—He engraved a few landscapes after the Dutch masters.

WITTIG, BARTHOLOMEW, a German painter, born at Oels in Silesia, about 1620. He excelled in painting festivals and concerts of music. In the gallery of the Louvre is a fine picture by him, representing a sumptuous banquet. He died in 1684.

WIVELL, ABRAHAM, an English portrait painter, born at London in 1786. He devoted but little attention to the art until 1820, when he sketched a portrait of Queen Caroline, at the balcony where she appeared to receive the congratulations of the public. The sketch was much admired, and, on being shown to the Queen, she expressed a desire to have it completed, and sat for it accordingly. Soon after, Wivell was engaged by Kelly to draw the portraits of the principal personages on the trial of the Queen, to be engraved for a work then publishing. He gained admittance to the court, and sketched several portraits of the judges and other honorable members, which were handed around, and pleased the parties so well, that most of them gave him a sitting or two after the trial, to enable him to finish their portraits. Among these were the Attorney General, Mr. Brougham; the Solicitor General, Mr. Denman; Mr. Copley, the son of John Singleton C., now Lord Lyndhurst, and others. He now advanced rapidly in public favor, and was commissioned to execute the portraits of many of the nobility, among whom were the Duke of York, the Duke of Clarence, Lord John Russell, Lord Suffolk, Lord Holland, and others. He also painted portraits of about 200 members of the House of Commons, for a view of the interior of the House, published by Bowyer and Parkes. Most of his portraits have been engraved. He died in 1849.

 WOERLOT, or WOEIRIOT, PIERRE, a French designer and engraver, born at Bar-le-duc in Lorraine in 1532. He chiefly resided at Lyons, and is said to have followed the business of a goldsmith as well as that of an engraver; but from his numerous prints it is probable that he devoted his attention chiefly to engraving. Robert Dumesnil gives a descriptive account of four hundred and one pieces by him. His prints are chiefly from his own designs, and are executed in a neat style, though the drawing is not very correct, and there is little effect, from the lights being scattered, and a want of depth in the shadows. Woerlot engraved both on copper and wood, and usually marked his copper plates with the above monogram, composed of the initials P. W. D. B. His wooden cuts, which are executed with great neatness and delicacy, are marked with a double cross, called the Cross of Lorraine. The Biographie Universelle mentions a print by him in the Royal French Cabinet, marked P. Woeriotius Bozæus; from which it is supposed that he was a native of the town of Bozé, or Bouzy.

WOLFAERTS, ARTHUR, a Flemish painter, was born at Antwerp in 1625. His instructor is not mentioned, but he gained considerable reputation among the artists of his time as a painter of history. His compositions are grand and simple, evincing a thorough knowledge of the principles of design and coloring, and his backgrounds are decorated with rich architecture; his sacred subjects are distinguished for their elevated character, and appropriate landscapes, and he was scrupulously attentive to costume. Wolfarts also represented allegorical subjects, which evince that he was no stranger to literature, and he occasionally painted small compositions in the manner of Teniers, remarkable for their gayety and originality. He died at Antwerp in 1687.

WOLFGANG, GEORGE ANDREW, a German designer, engraver, and goldsmith, born at Chemnitz in Saxony, in 1631. He engraved a few portraits, historical and other subjects, which are executed with the graver, in a dry, stiff, and formal style, and possess little merit. He also scraped some mezzotints. He died in 1716.

WOLFGANG, ANDREW MATTHEW, was the son of the preceding, born at Augsburg in 1662, and died there in 1736. He was instructed by his father, and engraved some indifferent portraits of distinguished personages of Germany.

WOLFGANG, JOHN GEORGE, was the youngest son of George Andrew W., born at Augsburg in 1664. He was instructed in the art by his father, whom he greatly surpassed. He had acquired considerable reputation, when he was invited to the court of Berlin in 1704, and appointed engraver to the king. He engraved a considerable number of portraits of distinguished personages, executed with the graver, in a much neater style than those of his father and brother; besides a set of plates for a work in folio, published at Frankfort in 1707, entitled Notitia Universitatis Francofurtanæ. He died in 1743.

WOLFGANG, GUSTAVUS ANDREW, was the son of Andrew Matthew W., born at Augsburg in 1692, and died in 1774. He studied with his uncle John George, and engraved some portraits in the neat style of his instructor.

W or W WOLGEMUT, or WOLGEMUTH, MICHAEL, an old German painter and engraver, born at Nuremberg in 1434. He has been the subject of deep research and much disquisition, yet little has been elicited beyond conjecture. As a painter, many works executed in the dry, gothic style which characterized the German school previous to the time of Albert Durer, are attributed to him, most of which, if not all, are of very doubtful authenticity. Two pictures attributed to him, which connoisseurs generally consider authentic, are Christ brought before Pilate, now in the Louvre, and St. Jerome, in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna, painted in 1511, when the artist was a very old man; the latter is considered his masterpiece. There are five others at Munich, representing the Nativity, the Agony in the Garden, the Crucifixion, the Descent from the Cross, and the Resurrection, which are variously attributed to Wolgemut, to Hugo vander Goes, and to Justus of Ghent.

As an engraver, the accounts and opinions of Wolgemut are exceedingly contradictory. He flourished soon after the commencement of engraving in Germany, and is supposed to have been instructed by Jacob Walch. This supposition, however, is very improbable, as Walch was probably born many years after Wolgemut, and never engraved on wood. (See Walch.) Strutt says he engraved both on wood and copper, and attributes to him some cuts marked with a W, surmounted with a small o.; but Bartsch is decidedly of the opinion that he only engraved on wood, and that the copper plates marked with the letter W, belong rather to Wenceslaus d' Olmutz. Zani, on the other hand, expresses great surprise that Bartsch should deprive Wolgemut of the honor of engraving on copper, and stoutly affirms that he never engraved on wood. It is very generally considered that he designed and executed a part of the wooden cuts for the large folio work compiled by Hermann Schedel, usually known by the appellation of the Nuremberg Chronicle, published in 1493. Ottley attributes to him the invention of cross-hatching, but Jackson says that "Ottley is wrong in attributing this material improvement in the art to Michael Wolgemut," and goes on to say that Wolgemut "has too long been decked out with borrowed plumes"; also that "he considers it extremely questionable if either he or Albert Durer ever engraved a single block!"—This much appears certain, that he was a painter and a designer, and probably an engraver on wood; that Albert Durer studied with him for some time, and painted his portrait three years before his death, which happened in 1519, at the age of 85 years. His portrait is in the gallery at Munich. The reader who wishes to pursue this subject further, must be referred to Strutt's Dictionary of Engravers, Ottley's Notices of Engravers and their Works, Jackson's Treatise on Wood Engraving, Bartsch's Le Peintre Graveur, and Zani's Enciclopedia delle belle Arti. See also, Jacob Walch, Wenceslaus of Olmutz, Martin Schoen, and Albert Durer.

WOLKOW, F., a Russian architect of the last century, who studied in the Academy at St. Petersburg, and afterwards visited Paris for improvement. While in that city, he was employed by Duval in the construction of the Theatre Francaise. He subsequently returned to St. Petersburg, where he was employed in constructing numerous works, and in designing some plans for the Prince Potemkin. He died in 1803.

WOLTERS, HENRIETTA, a celebrated Dutch paintress, born at Amsterdam in 1692. She was the daughter of Theodore van Pee, a painter of little note, who, perceiving in her a genius for painting, instructed her in the rudiments of the art, and then placed her under the tuition of James Christopher le Blond, a miniature painter. It was not long before she surpassed her preceptor in delicacy of touch and beauty of coloring. She afterwards greatly improved herself by studying the works of Vandyck, which she copied on a small scale with surprising accuracy, preserving not only the likeness, but the suavity of coloring and freedom of touch, which characterize the originals. Her extraordinary talents soon attracted public admiration, and she was employed to paint the portraits in miniature of many of the first families of Amsterdam. When Peter the Great visited that city, he sat to her for his portrait, and invited her to his court, with the most flattering offers of protection and favor; but she declined. The King of Prussia also invited her to Berlin, with no better success. She resided in her native city, highly respected, until her death, in 1741.

WOOD, JOHN, an English architect, commonly spoken of as "Wood of Bath," who flourished during the second quarter of the eighteenth century, in the time of King George II. His taste and abilities were little if at all inferior to his contemporaries, although he has obtained less notice than some of them, and little is now known concerning him, except some incidental facts in his "Description of Bath." That city is indebted to him for its architectural fame, and he may be considered as having there introduced a style of street architecture till then quite unknown in England, by combining a number of private houses into one general design; and although this mode of producing continuous façades was afterwards adopted by the Adams, was followed by Nash, and has since become very general, yet Wood still continues to be nearly the first in point of merit, as he is of date.

About the year 1726, Wood began his erections at Bath, which he carried on uninterruptedly for about twenty years, within which time he entirely changed the architectural character of the place, and conferred upon it even a degree of magnificence, at least as is displayed in such parts as the Parades, the Circus, the Royal Crescent, Queen Square, and some of the public edifices. These works have several faults, but a part of them were injured by alteration of the original design, and Mitford says that notwithstanding the errors in parts of the Crescent at Bath, he "must reckon it among the finest modern buildings at this day (1809) existing in the world." Although Wood distinguished himself rather as the founder of a general system than as the author of any individual structures of importance, yet he produced some works of the latter class that alone would save his name from oblivion. Among them are the noble mansion at Prior Park; that of Buckland, for Sir John Throckmorton; and the Exchange at Bristol, first opened in September, 1743. The last is a very handsome structure, and the principal front presents a very tasteful specimen of the Palladian style. Wood wrote a philosophical treatise on his art, entitled The Origin of Building, or the Plagiarism of the Ancients, folio, 1741. He died in 1754.

WOOD, JOHN, an English engraver, who flourished at London about 1745. He engraved some plates of landscapes after Claude Lorraine, Gaspar Poussin, Salvator Rosa, Wilson, and other masters, which possess considerable merit.

WOODCOCK, ROBERT, an English marine painter, born in 1691. He first practiced the art merely for amusement, and held a place under the government, which he quitted, to devote himself entirely to art. He began to paint in oil in 1723, and in two years had copied above forty pictures by Vandervelde. The Duke of Chandos gave him thirty guineas for one of his pictures. He died in 1728. Woodcock possessed great natural abilities, and would have attained eminence, had he early received proper instruction.

WOOLLETT, WILLIAM, a preëminent English engraver, was born at Maidstone, in Kent, in 1735. He studied under John Tinney, an obscure engraver in London; but he soon adopted an original style, from the resources of his own genius. He early acquired a great reputation as a landscape engraver, and was appointed engraver to George III. Woollett stands at the head of the artists in that branch; by a skillful union of the etching needle and burin, he produced the most admirable effect of depth and vigor in his foregrounds, and of tenderness and delicacy in his distances. In the latter part of his life, he practiced historical engraving, and in this department he also produced some of the finest plates of which the English school of engraving can boast, particularly the Death of Gen. Wolfe, and the Battle of the Hogue, which are considered his best historical pieces. In figures, and especially in flesh, he was not so successful as in the varied departments of landscape. Woollett was the first who conceived and embodied in practice the great improvement of uniting in one plate the three methods of engraving—aquafortis, the burin, and the dry point—constituting a great advance in the art. Longhi remarks that he "exhibited so much artistic accuracy, so much vivacity and boldness of touch, so much force and harmony of chiaro-scuro, so much variety of tint, so much intelligence in aerial perspective, so much truth, in fact, and so much pictorial illusion, that he was, for all cotemporary engravers, and is for those of the present time, the marvel and the example."

The private character of Woollett is highly praised for its modesty and amiability. He never censured the works of others, or omitted pointing out their merit. The following anecdote, related by Benjamin West, evinces an extraordinary degree of patience and perseverance: Woollett, when he had finished his plate of the Battle of the Hogue, took a proof to West for his inspection: at first the president expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the plate, but upon a longer examination, he observed that in some parts alterations might be made, and in others additional color might be added, which would, in his opinion, improve the effect of the plate; and taking a port-crayon, with white and black chalk in it, showed in a few minutes the effect that he wished to be produced, remarking at the same time that it was of no great consequence, but it might improve the appearance of the plate. Woollett, however, immediately consented to make the alterations and additions pointed out. "But how long will it take you, Mr. Woollett?" said the President. "Oh, about three or four months," said the engraver. "And the patient creature," said Mr. West, in relating the circumstance, "actually went through the additional labor without a murmur." His admirable prints are rendered much more valuable by the careful supervision which he exercised over the printing, destroying all impressions that exhibited any imperfection. His plates after the landscapes of Richard Wilson are among his masterpieces, presenting the very mind and feeling of that classic painter; he also engraved after Claude, Zuccarelli, the Smiths of Chichester, and others; and he executed some plates after views drawn from nature by himself. He died in 1785. The following list comprises Woollett's best works :

WOOTTON, JOHN, a celebrated English painter of landscapes and animals, who flourished about 1720. He is said to have studied with John Wyck. He particularly excelled in painting horses and dogs, and distinguished himself in designing field and turf sports, in which he was much employed. His animals are correctly designed, and touched with uncommon spirit. Among his most esteemed works were seven pictures of fox-hunting, engraved by Canot. Wootton's talents were not confined to this branch; he painted portraits and landscapes with considerable success, in the latter sometimes imitating Claude Lorraine and Gaspar Poussin. He died in 1765.

WORLIDGE, THOMAS, an English painter and engraver, who flourished about 1760. He first practiced miniature painting, and afterwards attempted portraits in oil, but not meeting with much encouragement, he devoted himself entirely to engraving. He adopted a style resembling that of Rembrandt, and finished his plates with the point of the graver, or the scratchings of the dry point. His prints are very numerous, consisting chiefly of heads and portraits, in the manner of Rembrandt, which possess considerable merit.—He also engraved quite a number of antique gems, from which he struck some proofs on satin, and a complete set of these now command a high price. His drawings on vellum in India ink and black lead are highly esteemed. He died at Hammer-smith in 1766, or 1768, aged about 65.

W

or W

WORMS, ANTHONY VON, a German engraver, who flourished about 1530. He was a native of Worms, in the Palatinate of the Rhine, from which city he derived his name. Florent le Comte miscalls him Vuormace. He executed some wooden cuts, which, though in the old gothic style, possess considerable merit. Bartsch describes eleven prints by him, marked with the first monogram, except one, which is signed Coloniae. per Anthonium de Vormacia Pictorem.—Brulliot says he engraved both on wood and copper, and that some of his prints are marked with the second monogram.

WORSDALE, JAMES, an English painter of little note, who studied with Sir Godfrey Kneller, and married his wife's niece. His works are now unknown. He died in 1767, at an advanced age.

WORST, JOHN, a Dutch landscape painter, born in 1625, and died in 1680. After studying in his own country, he went to Italy, where he resided some time. After returning to Holland, he painted many pictures from his drawings made from Italian scenery, which gained him considerable employment.

WORTMAN, CHRISTIAN ALBERT, a German engraver, who was a native of Pomerania, according to Huber, and flourished about 1730. He studied with Wolfgang, and at the age of twenty-five, was invited to the court of Hesse-Cassel, and appointed engraver to the Landgrave. In 1727, he went to St. Petersburg, where he engraved some portraits of the Imperial Family, and the principal personages of the court.

WOUTERS, FRANCIS, an eminent Flemish painter, born at Liere, in Brabant, in 1614. After receiving some instruction in his native city, he went to Antwerp, and entered the school of Rubens. He devoted himself chiefly to landscape, and became one of the most eminent artists of his time in that branch. His pictures usually represent the most picturesque views in the Forest of Soignes, near Brussels, and woodland scenes with vistas, through which the eye was agreeably deluded to an immense distance. These subjects he embellished with figures taken from mythological or fabulous history, as Pan and Syrinx, Venus and Adonis, Venus attended by Cupids, Nymphs, Satyrs, &c., generally naked, correctly designed, delicately pencilled, and freely touched. His pencil is bold and free, his coloring clear and brilliant, and his style resembles that of his instructor. He sometimes painted history on a large scale, but in these subjects he was less successful, than in those of a smaller size. He was much patronized by the Emperor Ferdinand II., who appointed him his principal painter, and for whom he executed many of his choicest works. He accompanied the Imperial Ambassador to England, where he was well received by Charles I., and appointed principal painter to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. When the Royal Family fell into misfortune, he returned to Antwerp, where he passed the rest of his days, and was appointed director of the Academy. He was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun in 1659. There are some altar-pieces by Wouters in the churches in Flanders, the best of which are Christ giving the Keys to St. Peter, in the church of that saint at Louvain, and the Visitation of the Virgin, in the church of the Augustines at Antwerp. He also etched a few plates of landscapes, in a free and masterly style, among which is a set of four, dated 1649. His name is sometimes erroneously written Wauter.

WOUTERS, GOMAR, a Flemish historical and landscape painter, of whom little is known, except by some pictures bearing his name. He went to Italy, and is said to have passed much of his artistic life at Rome. He flourished towards the end of the 17th century. There are some large prints representing views in and near Rome, executed in a spirited and masterly style, resembling that of Callot, inscribed G. Wouwers, Cavalier, del. et sculp., doubtless by this artist.

WOUTERS, JAMES, called also Vosmeer, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1584. Little is known of him. He is said to have excelled in landscape; but he afterwards quitted that branch for fruit and flowers, in which he displayed great talents. He went to Italy, but returned to his native place, where he died in 1641.

W. W. WOUWERMAN, PHILIP, one of the most popular of the Dutch landscape painters, was born at Haerlem in 1620. He was the son of Paul Wouwerman, an obscure historical painter, from whom he received his first instruction in art; but his genius inclining to landscape, he studied under John Wynants, and made very rapid progress, manifesting great ability in figure painting, as well as in landscape, and frequently decorating the works of Wynants with his admirable figures and animals. On leaving his instructor, he applied himself to the study of nature with the greatest assiduity, and attained a very high degree of excellence, so that he may unquestionably be reckoned one of the most masterly painters that ever lived, unless mastery consists in something else than fully accomplishing the proposed end. It is reported that he never quitted Haerlem; but, although he probably never went to Italy, the mountainous character of many of his landscapes constitutes almost a certain refutation of this assertion. The pictures of Wouwerman are held in the highest estimation; they usually represent hunting and hawking parties, horse-fairs, encampments, halts of travelers, and other subjects into which he could introduce horses, which he designed with a correctness and spirit that has never been equalled. It is commonly reported that he never painted a picture without introducing a white or grey horse; but this is most probably incorrect. Some of his landscapes are simply composed, and others are enriched with architecture, fountains, or edifices of a beautiful construction. His invention was so abundant that none of his pictures have either the same grounds or distances, varying perpetually, with inexpressible skill. His figures are admirably drawn, and grouped with uncommon taste and ingenuity. He had the perfect command of his pencil, so that he instantly and effectually expressed every idea conceived in his mind, and gave to his pictures astonishing force, by broad masses of light and shadow, contrasted with excellent judgment. The pencil of Wouwerman is firm, yet delicate; his distances recede with true perspective beauty, and his skies, atmosphere, trees, and plants, are all exact and lovely imitations of nature. Although his pictures exhibit the appearance of the most precious finishing, he must have painted with extraordinary facility, as between seven and eight hundred pictures are ascribed to him in Smith's catalogue, part 1., and Supplement. In his latter time, his pictures had too much of the grayish and blue tint; but in his best days he was not inferior, either in correctness, coloring, or force, to any of the artists of Italy.

Very little is known with certainty concerning the events in the life of this eminent painter. Ac-ording to Nieuwenhuys, about fifty years after Wouwerman's death, Houbraken collected various anecdotes concerning him, derived, according to his own account, altogether from hearsay. Among other things, he states that Wouwerman destroyed all his drawings when near the close of his life, from the apprehension that his son, if left in possession of them, might be too indolent to study from nature; while others, (Houbraken's verbal informants), have reported that, not being on friendly terms with his brother Peter, he destroyed them lest the latter should derive any advantage from them; while there were yet other reports, stating that the drawings in question were not his own, but the work of other masters. D'Argenville, assuming the truth of the statement that the drawings were Wouwerman's own, draws the inference that the painter's talents were not appreciated during his life-time, that he died in indigence, and destroyed the drawings in order to prevent his son from entering a profession in which he had made so signal a failure! This gratuitous supposition has been adopted by various writers, and generally believed, notwithstanding Houbraken also states that, though his pictures rose immensely in value after his death, he was nevertheless a fortunate painter; and in corroboration of this, he says that Wouwerman gave his daughter 20,000 florins (about $8,000), upon her marriage with the painter of flowers and fruit, Hendrick de Fromantjou. The distinction he gained while in the school of Wynants, and the fact that he was employed by that master to insert the figures and animals in his pieces, would almost refute the assertion of D'Argenville; but when we consider that he flourished in the best era of Dutch painting, and produced so many admirable works, we are astonished that such a report should have been credited. Wouwerman produced many grand battle-pieces, and sporting pieces, almost all carefully finished, particularly when of large dimensions, and full of incident; which would never be expected from a necessitous artist. His finished drawings are indeed very rare; but it is probable, from his great facility, that he never bestowed much care upon them, and generally made only slight preparatory sketches of his works. The proof that he did not meet the encouragement which his merits deserved, amounts to very little, if indeed to anything at all, and there is every probability that this painter, one of the best that the world has produced, lived and died in affluence.

Wouwerman died in 1668. Bartsch mentions two etchings by him, one of which represents a horse tied by the bridle to the stump of a tree. It is executed in a masterly style, and has been copied; the original is very rare, marked W. fec. 1643, the letters being reversed.

WOUWERMAN, PETER, was the brother of the preceding, born at Haerlem about 1625. He was instructed in the rudiments of the art by his father, and next studied under Roland Rogman, but afterwards with his brother, whose style he followed with so much success, that some of his best works have frequently been mistaken for the earlier productions of Philip. He painted similar subjects to those of his brother, representing huntings, fairs, farriers' shops, &c. His figures are not so correctly drawn as those of Philip, his pencil is less spirited and delicate, and his coloring less clear and transparent. His works, however, possess considerable merit, and are admitted into choice collections. He died in 1683.

WOUWERMAN, JOHN, was the younger brother and scholar of Philip W., born at Haerlem in 1629. He painted landscapes, with figures and buildings, in a very pleasing style, with an agreeable tone of coloring, and a free and masterly pencil. His works are not numerous, as he died young in 1666.

WRAY, ROBT. BAUFEMAN, an eminent English engraver on gems, was born at Broadchalk, in Wiltshire, in 1715, and was allied to several of the best families in that county. His uncle, Edward Byng, was a good pupil and assistant of Kneller, who directed in his will that the portraits which his sitters had contracted for should be finished by Byng. During the years occupied in his education, Wray learned of his uncle to draw the human figure with grace and precision; and acquired such a taste for the fine arts, that when it became necessary for him to choose a profession, he selected seal engraving—an art which at that time was scarcely advanced beyond the delineation of heraldic figures, and was therefore open to great improvement. He was placed under a seal engraver named Gosset, residing in Berwick street, Soho, to learn the mechanical part of the business, where his rapid progress excited a degree of jealousy that led to a speedy dissolution of the connection. Although his first works were engraving the types of ancient heraldry, yet his choicer hours were devoted to the delineation of nature, and especially of the human figure, until he had succeeded in representing some of the most distinguished personages of English history, or remains of ancient sculpture, or the ideal designs of modern cotemporary artists. Before completing his twenty-fourth year, he had executed the front face and one of the profiles of Milton, and in another the second profile. Tassie, the inventor of a very perfect method of copying ancient engraved gems, was so much impressed with the merits of Wray's works of the same kind, that he sold copies of them together with those of his own collection. In this manner the reputation of Wray became more widely extended, and his original productions were sought after with avidity, even in Italy.

In 1759, after residing over thirty years in the metropolis, Wray removed to Salisbury, where he produced some of his best works, and those on which his reputation with posterity will chiefly depend. The difficulty of engraving figures on hard stones, in the manner of the ancient Greeks, is evinced by its rarity in modern times; and although it has been cultivated in Italy with great success, in England Wray scarcely had a rival. If some of the Italians have surpassed him in facility of execution, and in the number of their works, none have been his superiors in expressing the affections, and in female grace and beauty. That he never acquired more than a decent competence by his talents, is evident from the amount received for his best and most difficult work, the Head of the Dying Cleopatra, which was purchased by the Duke of Northumberland for £20. The following are the most remarkable of Wray's works, and they are here placed in the order in which they are supposed to rank by competent judges: Dying Cleopatra; Head of Medusa, a copy from the Strozzi Medusa; a Magdalen; Flora; the Ma-onna; three ideal Female Heads; Milton, front face; two of Milton, profiles; Cicero; Pope; Shakspeare; Zingara; Antinous.

WREN, SIR CHRISTOPHER. This eminent English architect, born at East Knoyle, Wilts, October 20th, 1632, was of good family, being the son of Dr. Christopher Wren, chaplain in ordinary to Charles I., and dean of Windsor; and nephew to Dr. Matthew Wren, successively bishop of Hereford, Norwich, and Ely. From the former he seems to have inherited a taste for scientific and literary studies, that of architecture included. Though in childhood of weak bodily constitution, Wren was of a most precocious mind, and early manifested a strong inclination for the paths of science and philosophy; at the age of thirteen he invented an astronomical instrument, a pneumatic engine, and another instrument of use in gnomonics. When fourteen years old, he was entered as a gentleman commoner at Wadham College, Oxford; and during the period of his collegiate course he associated with Hooke (whom he assisted in his Micrographia), and other scientific men, whose meetings laid the foundation of the Royal Society. In 1653, he was elected a fellow of All Souls' College; and by the age of twenty-four, he was known to the learned of Europe for his various theories, inventions, and improvements, a list of which would be too long for insertion. In 1657, he was appointed to the professor's chair of astronomy at Gresham College, London, and three years after to that of the Savilian professor at Oxford, when he resigned the Gresham chair. On the establishment of the Royal Society, soon after the Restoration, Wren contributed not a little to the reputation of that body.

Thus far, Wren had attained to high eminence among his cotemporaries, but it was such that he might have remained known only to a few; whereas at present his celebrity as an architect has swallowed up all his other titles to distinction. At that time his architectural genius had hardly dawned, and it was probably chiefly owing to his general reputation for scientific skill that he was appointed by Charles II., in 1661, assistant to Sir John Denham, the surveyor-general, and was commissioned, in 1663, to survey and report upon St. Paul's cathedral, with a view to its restoration, or rather the entire rebuilding of the fabric, so as to reconcile it with the Corinthian colonnade added by Jones. This scheme met with great opposition from the clergy and citizens; dissensions and protracted discussions followed, and nothing was decided upon for three or four years. In the meantime, however, Wren was employed upon the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, and the Library and Neville Court, at Trinity College, Cambridge; he also visited Paris in 1665, where the works of the Louvre were then in progress. On returning to London, he found matters no nearer adjustment in regard to the proposed Cathedral; but an event soon after happened, most calamitous in itself, which changed the face of affairs; the Great Fire not only decided that St. Paul's should be rebuilt as one consistent whole, entirely of Wren's own idea, but also opened an extensive field for his talents in various other metropolitan buildings. One immediate labor arising from the conflagration was to make a survey of the whole of the ruins, and a plan for laying out the devastated space in a regular and commodious manner, with wide streets and piazzas at intervals, which Wren laid before Parliament. Yet so far was this plan from being adopted, that the proprietors refused to yield any part of their ground, and the new streets arose in that dense and intricate maze of narrow lanes, which are even now but slowly disappearing before the modern improvements. Furthermore, instead of the line of spacious quays along the Thames, which Wren proposed, the river is entirely shut out from view by wharfs and warehouses, to such an extent as to render any adequate scheme for the improvement of its banks hardly practicable. London might have arisen from her ashes the finest city in the world, if Wren's plan had been followed.

Thus frustrated in his idea for planning an entire city, Wren was compelled to confine the exertion of his talents within narrower limits.—Among the earliest of his individual edifices were the Royal Exchange, Custom House (both since destroyed by fire and rebuilt), Temple Bar, the Monument, and several churches, including that of St. Stephen's, Walbrook; all of which were erected before St. Paul's was begun. Previous to that great event in his professional life, he received the honor of knighthood, in 1672; and in 1674, he married a daughter of Sir John Coghill, after whose decease he took for his second wife a daughter of Viscount Fitzwilliam, an Irish peer; and by both these ladies he had issue. During this time he had not been idle in regard to the proposed Cathedral, but had prepared various designs and models. That one, however, which he was solicitous to see adopted, was set aside for that now executed; the composition of his favorite plan was compact and simple, forming a single general octagonal mass, surmounted by a cupola, and extended on its west side by a portico, and a short nave or vestibule within; and there is also a great deal of play produced by the alternate curved sides of the main body of the edifice. The plan which was finally adopted, exhibits an almost opposite mode of treatment, both as to arrangement and proportions. While the first exhibits concentration and uniform spaciousness, the other is more extended as to length, but contracted in other respects, and the diagonal vistas that would have been obtained in the other case are altogether lost. The first stone of the present edifice was laid June 21, 1675; the choir was opened for divine service in December, 1697; and the whole was completed in thirty-five years, the last stone on the summit of the lantern being laid by the architect's son Christopher, in 1710. Taken altogether, the present St. Paul's is a truly glorious work, and its cupola is matchless in beauty; yet all noble as it is, the spirit of criticism, as usual, has not failed to detract from its merit, particularly for the coupling of the columns, and other departures from the general application of the orders. There are few churches, however, of the past or present day, that can vie with it in richness of design; and St. Peter's, with its single order and attic, appearing of much smaller dimensions than it really is, cannot be put in comparison with it. Some parts of the design are of exquisite beauty, particularly the two semicircular porticos of its transepts, worthy models for church façades.

As an architect, Sir Christopher Wren possessed an inexhaustible fertility of invention, combined with good natural taste, and profound knowledge of the principles of the art. His architecture is the perfection of that modern style, which, with forms and models essentially Gothic, adopts for the purpose of decoration, the orders and ornaments of classical antiquity. The west front of St. Paul's consists of a noble portico of two orders, the lower Corinthian, composed of twelve columns, and the upper Composite, consisting only of eight; all of which are coupled and fluted, and rest on a basement formed by a double flight of steps. The whole is surmounted by a spacious pediment, and along the other parts of the summit of this front are statues of St. Peter, St. James, and the Four Evangelists. On the north and south sides of the Cathedral, at each end of the principal transept, placed upon a flight of steps, is a large semicircular portico, formed by six Corinthian columns, each four feet in diameter, supporting half a dome. The east end, or choir, is terminated semicircularly, and is of beautiful proportions. The whole of the outer walls are decorated with two stories of coupled pilasters, Composite above, and Corinthian below. The intervals between the latter are occupied by large windows, which light the side aisles, and those between the Composite pilasters by ornamental niches; the entire summit is surrounded by a regular balustrade. The whole of this upper order is of no further use than to conceal the flying buttresses, which are constructed after the manner of a Gothic cathedral, for the purpose of counteracting the thrust of the vaulting of the roof. The most conspicuous feature of the building is the dome, which rises in great majesty at the junction of the cross. On a circular stylobate are placed thirty-two Corinthian columns, forming a circular peristyle, every fourth intercolumniation being closed with masonry, and ornamented with a niche. Above the entablature of this colonnade, but not resting upon it, rises an attic story, with pilasters and windows over the cornice, on which springs the exterior dome, covered with lead, and ribbed at regular intervals. Round the aperture, or summit, is another gallery; and from the centre rises the stone lantern, which is surrounded by Corinthian columns, and crowned by a majestic ball and cross. Few buildings can produce more grandeur of perspective than St. Paul's, particularly as entered from the western door. The nave and choirs have on each side three arches, the transept one, resting on piers, decorated towards the middle aisle with Corinthian pilasters. The nave is further lengthened by the morning and corresponding chapel at the end. The central area below the dome is octangular, formed by eight massive piers. The entire length of the edifice, including the porch, is 500 feet; breadth of the front, including the turrets, 110 feet; breadth of the three naves, 130 feet; outward diameter of the cupola, 145 feet; inward diameter of the same, 108 feet; outward diameter of the lantern, 18 feet; the diameter of the ball six feet; height from the ground without, to the top of the cross, 340 feet; that of the turrets 222 feet; the general depth of the foundations below the surface of the ground, is 22 feet, and in some places 35 feet.

The other churches erected by Wren are by no means equal to this, his grand performance; they are very numerous, but do not remind the beholder of the architect of St. Paul's. Even in his campanili, the far-famed steeples of St. Bride's and Bow church, there is little to admire except the general outline, for they are strange compounds of incongruous parts, oddly put together, and not particularly elegant in themselves. The church of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, has also been greatly overrated; for, allowing all the merit that is claimed for it in regard to the dome and columns, the effect that would else be produced by them is sadly marred by the poverty and tastelessness of the rest. Among the other edifices erected by Wren, were St. James's, Westminster; St. Clement's, Eastcheap; St. Martin's, Ludgate; Temple Bar; Christ Church, Newgate; Marlborough House, London; and Westminster Abbey, towers of west front; besides many more. One work which would probably have not a little augmented his fame, was a design for a magnificent mausoleum to the memory of Charles I.; yet, though parliament voted £70,000 for this purpose in 1678, the design was abandoned, and the money applied more conformably with the personal tastes of Charles II. Wren had been thwarted in his ideas for another monument, namely, the Column so-called, which he had conceived very differently and very characteristically, the shaft being adorned with gilt flames issuing from the loop-holes; but that design was set aside for the very commonplace affair which we see at present. He had resigned the office of Savilian professor in 1673; he accepted that of President of the Royal Society in 1680, and he also sat several times in Parliament; but his numerous and important professional engagements left him little leisure for other pursuits or duties. Enjoying the favor of successive princes, he was employed by Queen Mary to complete the buildings at Greenwich, to be appropriated as a Royal Naval Hospital; and Wren's additions to that noble pile are well worthy of the architect of St. Paul's, although less quoted as proofs of his genius than several of his inferior performances. In his additions to Hampton Court for William III., he was less successful; perhaps unfortunate in being controlled by the taste of the king. If not actually a blot upon his fame, like his work at Windsor Castle, Hampton Court adds nothing to it, whereas he might perhaps have produced a piece of palatial architecture at Windsor, had his plan for erecting a distinct pile of building on the south side of the Upper Ward been adopted.—Still, palaces do not appear to have been Wren's forte, if an opinion may be formed from the specimens he has left us at Marlborough House, and some portions of St. James's.

After the death of Anne, the last of his royal patrons, Wren was dispossessed of his office of surveyor-general (which he had held forty-nine years), very little to the credit of George I., and to the disgrace of "one Benson," the man who, by succeeding him in that capacity, has preserved a name from oblivion by perpetuating it for everlasting shame and contempt. To Wren himself, however, this discharge from office must have been rather a welcome release than otherwise; for, verging towards ninety, he could then have little further worldly ambition, even had he not already amply gratified it. The close of his life was not so much to be pitied as to be desired, for if he passed the last five years of his existence in retirement and comparative obscurity, he passed them in serenity of mind and placid content. The struggles of dissolution were spared him, for without any previous symptoms of approaching death he was found dead, reposing in his chair after dinner, February 25, 1723, in the 91st year of his age. He received the tardy honor of a splendid funeral in St. Paul's, where his remains were deposited in the crypt, with no other adornment to his tomb than the inscription on it, with the sublimely eloquent legend—"Si Monumentum quaeris, circumspice."

Christopher, the architect's son by his first marriage, composed the chief part of the "Parentalia, or Memoirs of the family of the Wrens"; it was completed by Stephen Wren, the grandson of Sir Christopher, and published in 1750. It forms a valuable and authentic record. In All Souls' Library, at Oxford, there is a collection of Wren's original drawings.

WRIGHT, INIGO, an English engraver in mezzotinto, who flourished about 1770. He executed a few plates of portraits and other subjects, among which are the Family of van Goyen, after J. van Goyen; and St. John preaching in the Wilderness, after F. Lauri.

WRIGHT, JOSEPH, an eminent English painter, born at Derby in 1734, and hence called Wright of Derby. He studied under Thomas Hudson in London, on leaving whom, he returned to his native place, and devoted himself chiefly to portraiture with great success. He also painted candle-lights and conflagrations, which were much admired. In 1773 he went to Italy, where he diligently studied two years. During his residence there he had an opportunity of seeing a very memorable eruption of Mount Vesuvius, and he depicted the sublime spectacle with extraordinary effect. He returned to Derby in 1775, and devoted himself to history and landscape, chiefly the latter, in which he greatly excelled, and his best works of this description are ranked with the productions of Wilson. Among his historical pictures are the Dead Soldier, the Destruction of the Floating Batteries at Gibraltar, Edwin at the Tomb of his Ancestor, Belshazzar's Feast, Hero and Leander, and the Storm Scene in the Winter's Tale, painted for the Shakspeare Gallery, a most spirited performance. His Eruption of Vesuvius and View of Ulswater, are powerful examples of skill in representing nature under totally different aspects. He was a very modest and retiring man, and never would leave his native place to settle in London, although frequently recommended and solicited to do so, that his talents might be brought more conspicuously before the public. His works, however, were appreciated even when he did not paint them by commission, for they were generally purchased as soon as finished. Many of his pictures were engraved by Middiman, James Heath, and other artists. He was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1782, but having taken offence at Mr. Garvey's being chosen Academician before him, he resigned his Associate's diploma in disgust. He was a man of estimable character, much beloved by his fellow citizens. He died in 1797, of a disease brought on, as is supposed, by excessive professional application.

WRIGHT, RICHARD, an English painter, born at Liverpool about 1735. He was originally a house painter, but devoting himself to marine subjects, acquired considerable distinction by the force of his talents, and an attentive study of nature. On two occasions, in 1764 and 1766, he gained the first premium of fifty guineas, for two marine subjects, from the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c.; the latter, called the Fishery, was engraved by Woollett, whose print was afterwards copied by a French engraver, and the name of Vernet substituted for that of Wright. He died in 1775. He had two daughters, whom he instructed in the art, and who painted fruit, landscapes, and still-life.

WRIGHT, THOMAS, an English painter and engraver of the present century. He attained some reputation in engraving by his portraits in a work published by Mrs. Jameson, entitled "The Beauties of the Court of Charles II." He afterwards went to St. Petersburg, where he was patronized by the Imperial family, many of whom sat to him for their likenesses, which he painted in water-colors, and in miniature. He was also employed by the eminent personages at that court, and engraved several of their portraits, after his own paintings. On returning to England he commenced a plate of Reynolds' Infant Hercules, but did not live to complete it. He died in 1850.

WULFHAGEN, FRANCIS, a German painter, born at Bremen in 1620, and died there in 1678. He was a scholar of Rembrandt, whose style and subjects he is said to have imitated with considerable success.

WULFRAET, or WULFRAAT, MATTHIAS, MATHYS, or MATTHEW, a Dutch painter, born at Arnheim in 1648. He was the son of an eminent physician, who intended him for that profession; but as he attended more to drawing than to his medical studies, his father yielded to his decided disposition for art, and placed him under the tuition of Abraham Diepraam, a painter of drolls and drunken frolics. The latter took great pains with him, but Wulfraet did not follow his style or subjects. On leaving Diepraam, he improved himself by a diligent study of nature, and painted history, portraits, and domestic subjects, which were held in great estimation throughout Germany and the Low Countries. He particularly excelled in painting portraits in small; also conversations and assemblies of persons above the common rank, composed with taste, and delicately finished. He chiefly resided at Amsterdam, and died there in 1727.

WURSCH, M., a Swiss painter, born at Stanz, in the canton of Underwalden, in 1718. He painted history with considerable reputation, and there are some of his works in the Abbey of Engelberg, which are much admired for fine expression and beautiful coloring. He was for many years professor of painting in the Academy of Besançon. Some time before his death he lost his eyesight, and retired to his native place, where he was killed by the French troops in 1798.

WUST, CHARLES LOUIS, a German engraver, who flourished about 1760. He executed some plates of historical subjects with the graver, in a neat, but labored style, and incorrectly drawn.

WYATT, R. J., an English sculptor, born in 1795. He studied under Charles Rossi, R. A., for seven years, during which time he gained two medals from the Royal Academy. When Canova visited England, Wyatt was introduced to him through the kindness of Lawrence, and by his advice and instruction, the young artist gained great improvement. In 1821, Wyatt visited Paris, and studied for some time under the celebrated Bozio; after which he went to Rome, and remained there the rest of his life, except in 1841, when he made a short visit to his native land. During Canova's life-time, the closest intimacy subsisted between him and Wyatt, as also between the latter and Gibson, who was at that time a pupil of Canova. Wyatt was singularly industrious, rising constantly at five in the morning, and sometimes continuing his work until midnight; consequently he produced a large number of works, which are distinguished for their exquisite purity of style. Among his best productions are a group of Ino and the Infant Bacchus; a statue of Glycera; a statue of Musidora; two statues of Nymphs; and an admirable statue of Penelope, ordered by Her Majesty, in 1841. Wyatt died in 1850.

WYATT, JAMES, a distinguished English architect, was born in 1746, at Burton Constable, in Staffordshire, where his father was both a farmer and a dealer in timber. Little is known concerning his early life, but he manifested sufficient talents in architecture at the age of fourteen to gain the patronage of Lord Bagot, who took him with him to Rome, on an embassy to the Pope. Wyatt spent three or four years in the metropolis of art, examining and measuring the principal monuments of ancient architecture, but, as it would seem, without imbibing any taste for its modern ones, since no traces of it are discoverable in his own works. On quitting Rome, he proceeded to Venice, where he studied for about two years more under Vicentini, an architect and painter, and then returned to England, after being absent altogether about six years. His first work in London was the Oxford-street Pantheon, finished and opened in 1772. This edifice was remarkably attractive, as being the resort of the gay world, and was esteemed a master-piece of architecture, although it is impossible to say how far it merited the encomiums it received, as it has since been destroyed by fire, and the original designs have never been published. The Pantheon, however, established the reputation of its architect, and commissions poured in upon Wyatt in great abundance, chiefly for private residences in the country, of which the majority hardly aspired to the character of mansions. These edifices exhibit more of clever mannerism and uniformly respectable mediocrity, than of style or artist-like treatment, as they are nearly all variations of the same design. He seems to have devoted his attention mostly to the useful department of the art, and England is greatly indebted to him and Adam for the superior accommodation and refinement of comfort which they introduced into domestic architecture. According to Lord Kames, this should be the chief consideration in country mansions; but, accustomed to this mode of proceeding, Wyatt could scarcely rise above it when necessary, as is evinced in his design for Downing College, Cambridge, which was not executed. Neither did Chiswick inspire him with a desire to execute anything really noble, for though the wings which he added to the house rendered it more commodious as a residence, they sadly marred its original grace as a finished specimen of Palladian architecture.

About the time of the death of James Essex (1784), the only architect of the period who had shown any knowledge of Gothic architecture in regard to its details, if not its principles, Wyatt began to turn his attention to that style. As there were then no drawings or publications upon this subject, he was obliged to study it from the original examples; and it is very greatly to his credit that, under such difficult circumstances, and engaged in many other avocations, he gained the insight into it which he did, attaining to correctness in his details and individual features. His first essay in that style was Lee Priory near Canterbury, in 1783, which gained for him great celebrity. Extolled by Horace Walpole, it served to bring thenceforward into vogue for modern residences, a style of Gothic comparatively pure for the time. Although Wyatt did not attain to a correct perception of the spirit and true character of the Gothic style, he certainly effected very much for its practical revival, and he is allowed to have been preëminent as the restorer of ancient architecture in England, standing as he did, singly, without equal or rival. He was also extensively employed in making alterations and restorations in the older edifices of that style, particularly in the Oxford Colleges, and the Cathedrals of Salisbury and Lichfield. In the latter, however, he was not very successful, and his splendid edifice of Fonthill Abbey is criticised as manifesting more magnificence than propriety of character.

While employed upon the last mentioned edifice, Wyatt succeeded Sir W. Chambers, in 1796, as surveyor-general; which led to his being employed at Woolwich and the House of Lords, and by George III., in making alterations at Windsor Castle, and in erecting a Gothic palace at Kew, which has since been demolished. In 1802, on West's retiring from the office of President of the Royal Academy, Wyatt became his successor; but in the following year, West was re-elected. After this time, scarcely any materials are recorded of his life. He died in 1813, in consequence of being overturned in a carriage, while travelling from Bath to London. He left a widow and four sons, one of whom, Benjamin, was the architect of Drury Lane Theatre.

WYATTVILLE, SIR JEFFRY, an eminent English architect, nephew of the preceding, and son of Joseph Wyatt, was born at Burton-upon-Trent, in Staffordshire, in 1766. During boyhood, he was bent upon going to sea, and made two attempts to do so, but was pursued and brought back on both of these occasions. At the age of seventeen, he was to have gone out with Admiral Kempenfeldt, in the Royal George; but being prevented from joining that vessel in time, he escaped the disaster at Spithead. Thus thwarted, he betook himself to the metropolis, in the hope of finding some opportunity of engaging in the naval service, but as the American war had terminated, no such opportunity offered. These disappointments finally threw him into that course which he followed with so much distinction; his uncle Samuel, a London architect and builder of some distinction, (who erected Tatton Hall; Trinity House, London; Heaton House, Lancashire, &c.,) took him into his office for seven years. During this period he became fully acquainted with the routine and business of his profession; and at its termination, he served a sort of second apprenticeship with his uncle, James Wyatt, from whom he doubtless imbibed his preference for the Gothic and old English styles. While with his uncle James, he was brought into contact with several persons of high rank and influence, among whom was his future royal patron, the Prince of Wales.

It would appear that no opportunities were at that time extended to him from the Prince, for in 1799, he accepted the proposal made him by an eminent builder, John Armstrong, who had extensive government contracts, to join in partnership with him. This line of business, though highly respectable and eminently lucrative, proved for about twenty years a bar to his being admitted to the Royal Academy, although he was very extensively employed as an architect by many noblemen and gentlemen in various parts of the country, either in improving and making additions to their mansions, or erecting new ones. Nearly all his works are of this class, excepting the new front of Sidney Sussex College, erected in 1833.

Early in 1824, parliament granted £300,000 for the improvement of Windsor Castle. Four architects were called upon for designs, Soane, Nash, Smirke, and Jeffry Wyatt. The first declined the affair altogether; the designs of the second and third were rejected; and it was probably unexpected to himself, when Wyatt was summoned to Windsor Castle by King George IV., and commissioned to remodel that celebrated edifice. This great work occupied him nearly all the rest of his life. The first stone was laid by the King himself, Aug. 12th, 1824, on which occasion the architect received the royal authority for altering his name to Wyattville; and when the King took possession of the private apartments, about four years after, he received the further distinction of knighthood. Until renovated and remodelled by Sir Jeffry, the exterior of Windsor Castle had very little of either architectural character or dignity, or even of picturesqueness, except that arising from situation; whereas it is now marked by many bold features and well-defined masses, presenting a series of parts all varied, yet more or less interesting. Though open to criticism in respect to details, and the intermixture in several parts of the earliest and latest styles of Gothic, it is still a noble specimen of architecture, and deserves very high praise. A long and detailed critique upon this edifice may be found in the Penny Cyclopædia, article WINDSOR CASTLE. Sir Jeffry beheld his great work brought to completion by himself, and intended to publish the designs, which he directed to be done by his executors. He died at Windsor in 1840, and was buried in St. George's chapel. The designs were published on a magnificent scale in two vols. large folio, in 1841. During the period of his work upon Windsor Castle, he made very extensive additions to the princely seat of Chatsworth; he was also employed at Longleat Castle, Wilts; Wollaton Hall, Notts; and completed Ashridge, Notts, the seat of the Earl of Bridgewater, commenced by James Wyatt.

WYCK, THOMAS, a Dutch painter, born at Haerlem in 1616. After studying in his native city, he went to Italy, where he resided some years, and on returning to Holland, he distinguished himself as one of the ablest artists of the time. He painted sea-ports, with a variety of shipping, which frequently represent the ports in the Mediterranean, particularly those from Leghorn to Naples. They are usually embellished with a great number of small figures, decked in the costumes of different nations, correctly designed, and touched with great spirit, in a style resembling that of Peter de Laer.

He also painted Italian markets, fairs, and mountebanks; he represented the interior of chemists' laboratories, with their furnaces and utensils, in an admirable manner. His pictures are well composed, his coloring is warm and transparent, his pencil bold and free, and he had an excellent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro, which enabled him to give his objects a fine relief; his distances show a charming truth of perspective, and the eye is agreeably deluded to a great distance. Wyck visited England about the time of the Restoration, where he found considerable employment. There are a few etchings of landscapes and views by him, executed with neatness and spirit, but they are now very scarce. He died in 1686. His name is often written Wycke.

WYCK, JOHN, was the son of the preceding, born at Haerlem about 1640. He was instructed by his father, and distinguished himself as a painter of battles, sieges, and huntings of deer and other animals, processions, and landscapes, in which he appears to have imitated the style of Philip Wouwerman, but on a larger scale. Though inferior to his model in the neatness and delicacy of his finishing, his animals and figures are correctly designed, and touched with great spirit and animation. His pictures are well composed, and his scenery very agreeably chosen. He sometimes painted pictures of a large size, as the Battle of the Boyne, and the Sieges of Naarden and Namur; but they are inferior to his smaller productions. He accompanied his father to England, where he found considerable employment, and passed the rest of his life. He also etched some spirited plates from his own designs, which are very scarce; Bartsch describes twenty-one, and says they are so extremely scarce that few collections contain a complete set of them. Weigel, in his Supplement to Bartsch, has added four more, and pointed out the variations which occur in the others. Wyck made the designs for a book on hunting and hawking. He died at Mortlake in Surrey, in 1702.

WYKEHAM, WILLIAM DE. This eminent English bishop, distinguished also for his knowledge of architecture, was born in the village of Wykeham, according to Lowth, in 1324. His parents were poor, but of creditable descent, and of reputable character. Although he studied in the school of Winchester, aided by Nicholas Uvedale, Lord of Wykeham, he did not obtain a scholastic education; but after leaving school he acted as secretary to his patron, and subsequently to the Bishop of Winchester; after which he was presented at court to King Edward III. His strength lay in his natural genius, in his knowledge of mankind and talents for business; and probably the only art or science he had much cultivated, was architecture. In the year 1356, he was successively appointed clerk of all the King's works in his manors of Henle and Yethampstead, and surveyor of the King's works in the castle and park of Windsor. Wykeham seems to have progressed rapidly in the royal favor, and at his instigation the king gave orders to demolish a great part of Windsor Castle, which he afterwards rebuilt. Queenborough castle, in the Isle of Sheppy, was also restored by him. He had probably taken orders at an early age, and being made an ecclesiastic, he was presented with a number of benefices. Many honors were successively heaped upon him, of which a long detail is given by Lowth; he became Secretary of State, Bishop of Winchester, and Lord High Chancellor of England. He held the two latter posts in the church and state at the same time, until 1371, when the Lords and Commons presented a petition to the king, complaining of the abuses which had resulted from this feature of state policy; whereupon Wykeham resigned the latter office. His first undertaking, after obtaining possession of the see, was to thoroughly repair the twelve castles or palaces furnished and maintained for the bishops of Winchester; he also proceeded to erect a preparatory college at Winchester, and purchased the ground at Oxford for the New College.

Wykeham's prosperity had not failed to excite jealousy, and during the last year of Edward's reign the parliament took possession of the superannuated and dying king; a series of false charges were instituted against Wykeham in 1376, and he was deprived of his bishopric; but the clergy immediately took up his cause with such zeal that it was speedily restored. The benevolent bishop then went on with his architectural and educational projects. The college at Oxford, still called New College, was completed in 1386, and that of Winchester in 1393. The chapel and hall of the latter edifice are beautiful specimens of Gothic architecture. As soon as these were erected, he entered upon another great work, which still remains a monument of his taste and magnificence. He rebuilt the Cathedral at Winchester in the greater part of its extent, commencing it in 1395, and completing the work just before his death, which occurred in 1404. This magnificent and interesting edifice is 545 feet long; from the west entrance to the choir is 356 feet; the length of the choir is 135 feet; and the Lady chapel at the east end is 54 feet, which makes the total length. As a distinct part, the nave is 250 feet long, 86 feet wide including the aisles, and 78 feet high. The length of the transepts is 186 feet. The square of the tower is 48 feet by 50, and the height is 138 1-2 feet, which is only about 26 feet above the roof. The tower, with part of the nave and transepts, was built in 1079 by Bishop Walkelyn; but the grandeur of the west front is due to William de Wykeham. Viewed from the exterior, this is by far the most imposing part of the building; the deeply recessed entrance doorway, with the ornamental gallery above it; the large and beautiful window, the rich effect of the mouldings, the buttresses, the pinnacled towers, and the gable termination surmounted by the canopied statue of Wykeham, cannot be looked upon without great admiration. On entering the building, the view from the west end to the east is magnificent; the vast length of the vista formed by the nave and choir, with the splendid ceiling, the columns and arches on each hand and overhead, and the eastern window casting its dim, softened light from behind the choir, produce a combined result of solemnity and beauty equalled by few cathedrals in Europe.

WYNANTS, JOHN, an eminent Dutch landscape painter, was born at Haerlem in 1600. His instructor is not mentioned, but he owed his excellence mostly to his own abilities and perseverance. By an attentive study of nature, he formed an original style, and painted many admirable works, which gained him great reputation. They represent views in Holland, generally flat and confined, but distinguished for such simplicity and truthfulness to nature, that they are very highly esteemed, and are placed in the choicest collections. The following remarks on the works of Wynants, are to be found in Smith's Catalogue, with a list of about two hundred of his pictures. "His early works generally represent the picturesque habitation of the peasant, or the ruins of some ancient mansion, an adjacent road, and the surrounding country.—These are always painted in a neat and careful manner, in a tone of color tending to brown or blackish hues. In his second period he becomes more excursive, breaks into an open country, and encounters a wide expanse of landscape, composed of hill and dale, woods and rivers, embellishing the lovely scene with a rich variety of objects, such as sandy banks, winding roads, withered trees, and wild plants. Occasionally his views are more confined, and the eye is entertained with a faithful picture composed of a clayey bank, a rugged road, an old tree, wild flowers, herbage, and a sedgy pool. Such, with few deviations, compose the views of the whole of his productions; but, notwithstanding the similarity of the scenes represented, there is great disparity in their quality, those of his middle time being clear and luminous in effect, and delightfully delicate in the execution. No artist furnished more luxuriantly the foregrounds of his pictures, or gave greater variety of form and tint to the soil in which the dock, the thistle, and the bramble appear to be indigenous. In the latter years of his life, his execution is frequently coarse, and his coloring brown and heavy; defects by no means compensated by the great practical knowledge and masterly handling which such pictures always exhibit."

Very little is known concerning the personal history of Wynants. He established an academy, which produced some of the ablest painters of the Dutch school, among whom were Adrian Vanderelde, Philip Wouwerman, and other eminent masters. His landscapes are often embellished with figures and animals from their pencils. Bryan places his death in 1670; but Dillis, in his Gemalde zu Schleissheim, states that there is a picture by him in the gallery at Schleissheim, dated 1673; his name also is written in the book of the Company of Painters at Haarlem, for the year 1677. It is said that Wynants was addicted to indulgence in debauchery, which carried him off long before age would have enfeebled his talents; but the facts above stated, show that he lived to the age of seventy-seven, and this piece of information may therefore be classed among the numerous apocryphal anecdotes of Dutch artists.

WYNGAERDE, FRANCIS VANDER, a Flemish designer and engraver, who flourished at Antwerp about 1640, where he also carried on the business of a printseller. He executed some spirited etchings, principally after Rubens, which possess great merit, though the drawing is frequently incorrect.

WYNTANCK, or WYNTRACK, a Dutch painter of whom little is known, except that he flourished in the time of Wynants, Ruysdael, and other eminent landscape painters, whose works he often enriched with wild ducks, and other aquatic birds, painted in an exquisite manner, and adding much to the beauty and value of their compositions. His own landscapes represent marshy grounds, with pools, backed by willows and alders, serving merely as the scene in which to display his skill in painting water-fowl. His birds are full of life and activity, correctly designed, and their plumage has all the softness, delicacy, and brilliancy of nature. Pictures entirely by Wyntranck are very rare, though he may be frequently recognized in the works of his cotemporaries.

WYON, WILLIAM, R. A., an eminent English medalist, was born at Birmingham in 1795. In 1809, he was apprenticed to his father, an engraver of some celebrity in his native place, under whom he evinced much taste and feeling, heightened considerably by his studies of the designs of Flaxman. In 1813 he received the gold medal of the Society of Arts for his die of the Head of Ceres, purchased by the Society, and used to strike the gold medal for the Agricultural prize; and he also received another gold medal from the same institution, for his group of Victory in a Marine Car, drawn by Tritons. In 1815, Wyon visited London, for the purpose of assisting his uncle Thomas W. in engraving the public seals; and in the following year, at the age of twenty, he was appointed second engraver at the Royal Mint, upon the judgment or recommendation of Sir Thomas Lawrence. In 1824, he entered upon the duties of chief engraver, though he did not receive his official appointment until four years after. During the remainder of his career, he executed many works, which numbered up to 1837, according to the memoir of Carlisle, about eighty coins, nearly one hundred medals, and twenty public seals. His medals include the war medals of the Peninsula, Trafalgar, Jelallabad and Cabul; the civic medals of the Royal Academy, the Royal Society, the Royal Institution, the Geological Society, the Geographical Society, the Bengal Asiatic Society, and indeed of almost every learned society of Great Britain. Some of these bear on the obverse, heads from the antique, from modern and from living personages. The Harrow School Medal given by Sir Robert Peel, bears a head of Cicero; the Royal Institution Medal, the head of Lord Bacon; the prize medal of the University of Glasgow, the head of Sir Isaac Newton; the Art Union Medal, the head of Sir Francis Chantrey. His medal of Sir Walter Scott bears a reverse after Stothard, and his coronation medal of William IV., a reverse of Queen Adelaide, after Chantrey.

The great merit of all Wyon's portrait medals is their truth, force, and delicate execution; and his designs for the rewards of honorary medals are always to the purpose, and conceived in a purely classic spirit. In 1831, he was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1836, Academician,—an honor never before conferred upon one in his particular department of art. Wyon's high reputation extended across the Channel; he was invited to Lisbon, to execute a medallion portrait of Queen Donna Maria; and other foreign governments also availed themselves of his services. Among his last works were the obverses of the exhibition medals, bearing the portraits of the Queen and Prince Albert. He died on the 29th of October, 1851.

WYTMAN, MATTHEW, a Dutch painter, born at Gorcum in 1650. He first studied under Henry Verschuring, and for some time painted landscapes in the style of that master; but he afterwards became the scholar of John Bylaert, and applied himself to painting conversations and domestic subjects, in which he imitated the style of Gaspar Netscher with considerable success, though he differs from that master by introducing very elegant landscapes in his backgrounds, highly finished, with a very agreeable tone of coloring. He also painted fruit and flowers in a style of excellence. He died in the prime of life, in 1689.

X.

XAVERY, JACOB, a Dutch painter, born at the Hague in 1736. He was the son of Jacob Xavery, the sculptor, and was instructed in painting by Jacob de Wit. Little is known of him, and the accounts of his life are contradictory. He is said to have painted history, portraits, landscapes, seaports, fruit, and flowers; in his landscapes he imitated Berghem, and painted bas-reliefs in chiaroscuro, in the manner of his master. There was a Gerard Joseph Xavery, probably his brother, who flourished about the same time, and is said to have painted the same kind of subjects.

XAVIN, PAUL and HUBERT, two French engravers on wood, born at Paris, according to Papillon, and flourished about 1540. He does not specify any of their works.

XENOPHILES, a Greek sculptor of uncertain age, by whom Pausanias cites a statue of Esculapius at Argos, which was esteemed the most remarkable representation of that deity. The figure of the god in white marble, was accompanied by a statue of the goddess Hygeia, and two figures seated, which were said to represent Xenophiles and Strato, the authors of the work; although M. Quatremère de Quincy supposes, and with considerable probability, that these figures were intended as statues of Machaon and Podalyrius, the famous sons of Esculapius, or some other mythological personages, and that the former tradition arose from the artists having sculptured several of their own features on the heads of the statues, to immortalize their own names. This was perhaps suggested by the contrivance of Phidias, who, when prevented from inscribing his name upon his great statue of Minerva, introduced his own portrait as an old man throwing a stone, upon the shield, in the Battle between the Athenians and Amazons.

XENOPHON, an Athenian sculptor, who flourished about B. C. 300. According to Pausanias, he executed, in concert with Cephisodotus, the throne of Jupiter at Megalopolis, where the god was represented seated, on his right hand an impersonification of the city of Megalopolis, and a statue of Diana on the left. It was wrought in pentelic marble. Another more celebrated work was the statue of Fortune at Thebes, bearing in her arms the infant Pluto, of which he executed the head and arms of the goddess; the rest was the work of Callistonicus, the Theban. There was another sculptor named Xenophon, a native of the island of Paros.

XIMENES, or ZIMENES, JUAN FERNANDEZ. See MUDO.

XIMENES ANGEL, JOSÉ, a Spanish painter, who studied under Antonio Rubio at Toledo, and succeeded Claudio Coello as painter to the Cathedral in that city, in 1695. He executed several works for the churches of Toledo, and a series of frescos representing incidents from the life of the Virgin, for the Hermitage of Fonseca.

XIMENES DE ILLESCAS, BERNABÉ, a Spanish amateur painter, born at Lucena in 1613. He was an officer in the Spanish army, and while serving several years in Italy, he studied the works of the great masters. On his return to Spain, he executed some works for various individuals. Count Raczynski mentions a picture by him, representing the Battle of Santiago, in the collection of Count di Taroca at Lisbon. Leonard de Castro and Miguel Parrilla were his scholars. He died at Andujar in 1671.

XIMENES DONOSO, JUAN, a Spanish painter and architect, born at Consuegra in 1628. He was the son of Antonio X., a painter of little note, and after receiving his instructions, he studied under Francisco Fernandez at Madrid. At the death of the latter he went to Rome, and studied there seven years, applying himself particularly to perspective and painting in fresco, and paying little attention to the antique, or the works of the great masters. On returning to Spain, he formed an intimacy with Claudio Coello, and executed some works in conjunction with him, for the Cathedral at Toledo; he also painted some works entirely by himself. Ximenes' chief merit lay in the excellence of his coloring. According to Bermudez, he was much employed as an architect, but he exhibited inferior taste in all his designs. He died in 1690.

XIMENES, DON FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Saragossa in 1598. After studying in his native city, he went to Rome, and resided there several years. After returning to Spain, he executed many works for the churches, which, according to Bermudez, are more remarkable for excellence of coloring than for correctness of design. He painted two large pictures for the Cathedral of Saragossa, and an Adoration of the Kings for the chapter of the Cathedral of Teruel, which is borrowed from the performance of Rubens in the palace at Madrid. The greater part of his works were executed in fresco or distemper, and have mostly perished. Ximenes, however, acquired considerable reputation in his time, and was much employed. He left his property to form a fund for the education of the orphan sons of painters, and for marriage portions to their daughters. He died at Saragossa in 1666.

XIMENO, JOSÉ, a Spanish designer and engraver, who flourished at Madrid in the latter part of the last century. He designed and engraved the plates to illustrate the magnificent edition of Solis' History of the Conquest of Mexico, published at Madrid in 1783, besides many vignettes and other plates for the booksellers. He was living in 1791.

XIMENO, MATIAS, a Spanish painter, of Old Castile, who flourished about the middle of the 17th century. He executed some works for the churches, among which are four lateral altar-pieces for the church of the Jeronimites of Sigüenza, representing the Incarnation, the Nativity, the Epiphany, and the Presentation.

Y.

YANES, HERNANDO, a Spanish painter, born at Almedina. Little is known of him or his works, but he is said to have visited Italy, and studied under Raffaele. On returning to Spain, he painted some altar-pieces for the churches at Cuenca, the principal of which are the Adoration of the Magi, and a Dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin.—These pictures, according to Bermudez, resemble the works of Lionardo da Vinci more than those of Raffaele; the same writer commends his works for the drawing, expression, coloring, and elaborate execution. He died about 1550.

YANUS, an engraver on wood, mentioned by Papillon. He does not specify any of his cuts, but commends them for their delicate execution.

YEATES, NICHOLAS, an English engraver, who flourished about 1680. He executed a few portraits in a very indifferent style.

YEPES, THOMAS DE, a Spanish painter, and a native of Valencia, who excelled in painting flowers, fruit, fish, and dead game. There are many of his works in the collections at Madrid, Seville, and Valencia, where they are highly esteemed. He died in 1674.

YOUNG, JOHN. This English engraver wrought in mezzotinto, but is better known by his outlines of various celebrated galleries in England, which he published with descriptions. He held the office of Keeper of the British Institution, and was an active promoter of the Artists' Benevolent Fund. He died in 1825.

YPRES, KAREL VAN, a Flemish historical painter, was born at Ypres in West Flanders in 1510. He acquired a knowledge of art in his own country; but after practicing there for a number of years, he went to Italy for improvement, and studied particularly the works of Tintoretto. On returning to his own country, he gained considerable reputation for his subjects of history, in the style of his model, among which are the Resurrection, in the city of Tournay; and the Last Judgment, in a church between Bruges and Ypres. He executed many designs with the pen, for the painters on glass, which are highly praised by van Mander for their excellence of composition and correctness of design. Van Ypres is said to have been of a melancholy temper, and he put an end to his own life in 1564.

YUSO, FRAY MATIAS ANTONIO TRALA, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia in 1680. He became a monk of the order of St. Francis, and was principally employed in painting pictures of the Virgin, and Holy Families, for the church of his monastery, which, according to Bernudez, possess considerable merit. He died in 1753.

YVER, PETER, a Dutch engraver, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1747. He executed a few portraits and other subjects.

YVRART, BAUDRIN, a French painter, born at Boulogne in Picardy in 1610, and died in 1690. Little is known of him, but he is said to have been a good painter of history.

Z.

ZAAGMOOLEN, MARTIN, a Dutch painter, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1670. He painted history with some reputation. Houbraken mentions a picture of the Last Judgment by him, with a great number of figures, incorrectly drawn and feebly colored. He was the instructor of John Luyken and Michael van Musscher.

ZAAL, J., a Flemish engraver, by whom there is a large etching of a Boar Hunt, after Snyder. It is executed in a bold, masterly style, and the masses are broad and powerful; but the drawing is not very correct.

ZABAGLIA, NICCOLO, an Italian architect and celebrated mechanic, was born at Rome in 1674, of obscure parentage. He was first employed as a common laborer on the works in the Vatican, but gained so much esteem by his talents, as to be finally appointed architect of St. Peter's. He invented some machines, and made various discoveries in mechanics, of such value that Caylus commends him as approaching the ancients in genius. It would also appear that he constructed a number of castles and bridges. In 1743, Giovanni Bottari published a work at Rome, in grand folio, containing fifty-four plates with explanations, of which thirty-six represented machines and instruments invented by Zabaglia. This work is highly esteemed by architects; it is entitled Castelli e ponti di Niccolo Zabaglia, con alcune ingegnose pratiche e con la descrizione del trasporto del obelisco Vaticano e di altri del Dom. Fontana. Zabaglia died in 1750.

ZABELLI, or ZABAGLIO, ANTONIO, an Italian engraver, born at Florence about 1740. He engraved some portraits for the collection published by Allegrini, at Florence; also several subjects after Guido, Guercino, Caracci, and other masters.

 ZABELLO, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, who was a native of Bergamo, according to Orlandi, and flourished about 1546. He engraved some plates after the Italian masters, marked with a die and the date.

ZACCAGNA, TURPINO, a painter born at Cortona, of a noble family, who was a pupil of Luca Signorelli, according to Bottari, and executed some works for the churches in his native city, and other places in the vicinity, with considerable reputation. He was living in 1537.

ZACCHIETTI, BERNARDINO, a painter born at Reggio, who flourished about 1523. Tiraboschi and others conjecture from his style that he was a scholar of Raffaele. Lanzi says, "his picture in the church of S. Prospero, designed and colored in the taste of Garofolo, and others which partake of the style of Raffaele, may probably have given rise to this opinion. But Italy then abounded with the disciples of that great master, who no longer instructed by his voice, but by his paintings and engravings. The works said to have been produced by him at Rome, and the assistance he afforded to Michael Angelo in the Sistine chapel, are assertions of Azzari, which remain unquestioned by any ancient writer."

ZACCHIA, PAOLO, called IL VECCHIO (the Elder), a painter of Lucca, who flourished about 1527. Lanzi supposes he was educated at Florence. He painted history with considerable reputation, and there are several altar-pieces and other works in the churches and public edifices at Lucca, which display much study and elegance in design, though his outline is somewhat harsh and cutting. His principal works are, the Marriage of the Virgin, the Assumption of the Virgin, in the church of S. Agostino, and the Ascension in S. Salvatore. Rosini has given an etching of the Marriage of the Virgin, which resembles the old Florentine school in simplicity of composition.

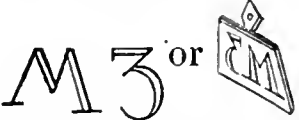

ZACCHIA, LORENZO, called IL GIOVANE (the Younger), was probably a relative of the preceding, and flourished at Lucca about 1550. Lanzi says he showed more softness of contour, and more strength of coloring, than the elder Z., but in every other respect, he was held in less estimation. He is sometimes called Lorenzo di Ferro Zacchia.

ZACCOLINI, PADRE MATTEO. This artist, according to the best authorities, was born at Cesena, in the Roman States, in 1590, and died at Rome in 1630. He was a reputable painter of history, but chiefly excelled in painting architecture and perspective, in which he is said to have instructed Domenichino and Niccolò Poussin. He became a monk of the order of the Theatines, and his principal works are in their church of S. Silvestro, on Monte Cavallo. Lanzi says he wrote some excellent treatises on perspective, the manuscripts of which are preserved in the Barberini Library.

ZACHITTLEVEN. See SAFTLEVEN.

ZAECH, BERNARD, a German engraver, of whom nothing is known except by a few prints, the chief of which are a Set of Ruins after Jonas Umbach. They are etched and finished with the graver in a very neat style. Brulliot mentions twelve pieces of designs for goldsmiths, consisting of vases and goblets, marked B. Z., 1581, which he conjectures to be from his hand, but erroneously, as Umbach, after whom he engraved, was born in 1624. There was a Daniel Zaech, a painter, goldsmith, and engraver of little note, who was living in 1613.

ZAGANELLI. See COTIGNOLA.

 ZAGEL, MATTHIAS, an old German artist, of whom little is known, and about whom there is a great deal of conjecture and discrepancy among writers. He is supposed to have been a painter, engraver, and goldsmith. There is a picture of the Crucifixion attributed to him in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. He is variously called Matthias and Martin Zagel, Zingler, Zasinger, Zatzinger, Zeyssinger, and Zinck. Bartsch describes about twenty prints by him, usually marked with one of the above monograms, and dated from about 1500 to 1505. As an engraver, he may be ranked with Martin Schoen and Michael Wolgemut, and from the style of his engraving, he is supposed to have been a goldsmith. Zagel's plates are executed with the graver in a neat, but stiff, formal, and Gothic style, and his composition and drawing are very indifferent.

 ZAGEL, or ZAGHEL, THEODORE, an engraver, who marked his plates with the above monogram. He is mentioned by Orlandi, who only specifies by him one print, representing an old Woman.

ZAGNANI, ANTONIO MARIA, a Bolognese painter, who excelled, according to Crespi, in painting fruit and flower pieces, which were so greatly admired, that "he received numerous commissions, even from princely foreigners." He was living in 1689.

ZAGO, SANTO, a Venetian painter, who flourished, according to Ridolfi, about 1550, and was educated in the school of Titian. He followed the style of that master with considerable success, and executed some works for the churches at Venice, which are highly commended, particularly an altar-piece, representing Tobit and the Angel, in S. Caterina. Lanzi also commends him as an able painter in fresco.

ZAIS, GIUSEPPE, a Venetian painter, who studied under Francesco Zuccarelli, during that artist's residence at Venice, and followed his style. Lanzi says, "in point of invention, he was more copious and varied than his master, but inferior to him in the mellowness of his tints. He had acquired from Simonini, who resided also a long time at Venice, the art of painting battle-pieces, in which he showed equal skill, but unfortunately he fell into dissipated habits, and died a common mendicant in the hospital of Trevigi." Others say that he died at an advanced age in 1784, and Lanzi himself, in his index, says he died old in 1784.

ZAIST, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Cremona in 1700, and died in 1757. He studied under Giuseppe Natali, an eminent architectural painter, whose style he followed. Lanzi commends him as an able artist. He wrote the Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects of Cremona, which was published after his death in 1774, by his pupil Antonio Maria Panni at Cremona, in two quarto volumes.

ZAMBONI, MATTEO, a Bolognese painter, who was educated, according to Crespi, in the school of Carlo Cignani. He imitated the style of his instructor with considerable success in two altar-pieces in the church of S. Niccolò at Rimini, representing a history from the Life of St. Pietro Celestino, and another from that of St. Benedetto. He also painted some pictures for the collections, but he died in the flower of his life.

ZAMBONO, MICHELE, a celebrated Venetian worker in mosaic, who flourished about 1505. According to Zanetti, he decorated the chapel of the Mascoli with histories of the Life of the Virgin, designed in the best style of the Vivarini, and executed with such extraordinary care, that Vasari observed with surprise, "that it would not be possible to effect more with colors."

ZAMBRANO, JUAN LUIS, a Spanish painter, born at Cordova, according to Palomino, in 1599. He was a pupil of Pablo de Cespedes, whose style he followed with great success. His principal works are in the Cathedral at Cordova, and in the church of the convent of Los Martyros; in the latter he painted the Stoning of Stephen, and the Martyrdom of St. Acisclo, and St. Victoria. In the College of Santa Catalina are two fine pictures of the Guardian Angel and St. Christopher, which Palomino says are designed by him, in the grand style of Michael Angelo. He passed the latter part of his life at Seville, where he painted three large pictures for the church of St. Basil, representing the history of that saint, which are highly commended. Zambrano also painted easel pictures, which are highly esteemed; his design was correct, his figures animated, and his coloring warm and harmonious. He died in 1639. It is agreed by the Spanish writers, that he was instructed by Cespedes, who died in 1608; therefore the date of his birth must be erroneous.

ZAMORA, DIEGO, a Spanish painter, who flourished at Seville, according to Bermudez, in the latter part of the 16th century, and executed some works in the cathedral of that city. There are no further particulars recorded of him.

ZAMORA, JUAN DE, a Spanish painter, born at Seville, who flourished from about 1650 to 1671. He distinguished himself as a painter of landscapes, embellished with subjects taken from sacred and profane history, in which he imitated the highly finished style of the Flemish masters. Some of his best works are in the Episcopal palace at Seville. He also painted some sacred subjects; but he was less successful in his large figure pieces, in which his landscape backgrounds were the best parts.

ZAMPEZZO, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter born at Cittadella, near Bassano, in 1620. He studied under Jacopo Apollonio, the grandson and imitator of Jacopo Bassano. Zampezzo possessed great talents, and adhered tenaciously to the precepts of his master. He copied and imitated the works of Bassano so closely that they now readily pass with the unlearned for the genuine productions of that master. Lanzi says, "he devoted himself to copying the works of Bassano. So well did he imitate his Santa Lucilla, baptized by Saint Valentine, in La Grazie at Bassano, that Scaligero pronounced it comparable to the original." There are some of his works in the churches at Bassano, which are esteemed little inferior to those of Apollonio. Though he lived to a great age, his works are scarce, being doubtless mostly attributed to Bassano, whose fame swallowed up all his imitators. He died at Bassano in 1700. See Bassano and Apollonio.

ZAMPIERI, DOMENICO. In the sketch of this great artist, given in this Dictionary, under the head of DOMENICHINO, it was omitted to mention his architectural distinction, excepting his appointment by Gregory XV., as architect to the pontifical palace. Besides his superintendence of that edifice, he executed various other works, particularly two designs for the church of S. Ignazio at Rome. Instead of his being allowed to execute one of them, according to the principles of justice and propriety, the designs were combined by the Jesuit Grassi, who produced from them that which was executed. Upon this, Zampieri, indignant at such unworthy treatment, refused to design the façade, and according to Milizia, the building was transferred to Algardi. It is said that if his original design had been carried into effect, Rome would have boasted of a temple which would have astonished succeeding generations. In S. Maria in Trastevere, he designed the rich and ingenious entablature, also the chapel, called della Madonna di Strada Cupa. Domenichino designed the greater part of the elegant Villa Belvidere at Frascati, and designed and erected the picturesque Villa Lodovisi at Rome, the gardens of which he laid out with a number of verdant walks, and divided the grove in exquisite taste. His family name was Zampieri, but he is almost universally called Domenichino, to which name the reader is referred for his character as a painter.

ZAN, BERNARD, an engraver mentioned by Orlandi in his Abbecedario, who flourished about 1571. He marked his plates with the initials B. Z., with the date, but his works are not specified.

ZANARDI, GENTILE, a Bolognese paintress, who flourished in the first part of the 18th century, and studied, according to Orlandi, with Cav. Marc' Antonio Franceschini. She possessed an extraordinary talent for copying the works of the principal Italian masters, with a softness of color and delicacy of outline, that surprised the best judges. She also painted historical subjects of her own composition.

ZANATA, GIOSEFFO, a Milanese painter who studied, according to Orlandi, under Carlo Francesco Nuvolone, called the Guido of Lombardy, and followed his style with great success, being "extremely well versed in the art." There are some of his works in the churches at Milan, and other cities of Lombardy. He was living in 1718.

ZANCARLI, POLIPHILOS, an Italian designer and engraver, who flourished at Venice in the first part of the 17th century. Among other works, he engraved a set of twelve plates of antique foliage for friezes. Many of his designs were engraved by Odoardo Fialetti, of which an account may be found among the prints of that artist, in Bartsch, P. G., tom. xvii. He is sometimes called Giancarli, Gian and Zan being synonymous in different dialects.

ZANCHI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Este, near Venice, in 1639. He was a scholar of Francesco Ruschi, and was more noted, according to Lanzi, for the number of his works than for their excellence. Lanzi says he belonged to the sect of naturalists called by the Italians Tenebrosi (dark colorists, or followers of Cortona and Caravaggio). "Such at least appears the cast of his genius; common in its forms, sombre in its colors; but nevertheless exciting surprise by a certain fullness and felicity of hand, by its picturesque spirit, by its effect of chiaro-scuro, and by a grand general result which imposes upon us by its power. If we examine more particularly into his manner, we shall not unfrequently discover an incorrectness of design, along with that kind of indecision, and indistinctness of outline, which is mostly the resource of weak, or at least very hasty artists. He chiefly attached himself to Tintoretto, some traces of whom may be found in his style. In the college of S. Rocco, where that great master rendered his name immortal, we behold one of the best specimens of Zanchi. The subject, admirably fitted to his manner, contributed greatly to his success. He has there given a bold exhibition of the great plague that afflicted Venice in 1630, a picture filled with a concourse of the sick, the dying, and the dead, bound to one universal grave." There are several of his works in the church of S. Girolamo, the best of which are the Good Samaritan and the Prodigal Son. He died in 1722.

ZANCHI, FILIPPO and FRANCESCO, two painters of Bergamo, brothers, of whom, according to Tassi, there are notices from 1544 to 1567. They were reputable artists, and executed some works for the churches. Filippo assisted Girolamo Colleoni in some of his works.

ZANELLA, FRANCESCO, a painter of Padua, who was living in 1717. It is not known under whom he studied, but Lanzi says that he "deserves to be recorded as an artist of spirit, though not very diligent, nor very learned in the art. He is esteemed almost the Giordano of this city, from the great number of his works, conducted in a short time; and he may be considered almost as the last of the school of Padua."

 ZANETTI, COUNT ANTONIO MARIA, a Venetian nobleman, who was celebrated not only as the possessor of a rich collection of rare works of art, but also as an engraver on wood and copper. He was born at Venice in 1680, and was taught drawing as an accomplishment; but his inclination for art soon became strongly manifested, and at the age of fourteen he designed and etched a set of twelve plates, representing studies of heads and figures. Assisted by his relative, Antonio Maria Zanetti, and others, he executed and published a great number of etchings and engravings on wood, in chiaro-scuro, from the drawings of Raffaello, Parmigiano, and other celebrated painters, many of which he had purchased at the sale of the Arundelian collection. They are divided into two sets, consisting in all of ninety-nine prints on copper and wood, with the portrait of the artist, engraved by Faldoni, from a painting by Rosalba, in the front of the work. Zanetti executed numerous other works, the principal of which are a set of twelve etchings of animals and figures, after B. Castiglione; a set of eighty prints of antique gems; and a collection of the statues in the palace of St. Mark, and other public places in Venice, which are highly commended. Lanzi says "he revived the art of taking prints from wooden blocks, with more than one color, which was invented by Ugo da Carpi, but afterwards lost." He usually marked his prints with a monogram composed of his initials, A. M. Z., as above. His death is generally placed at Venice, in 1757, but Lanzi says he was living at an advanced age, in 1765.

ZANETTI, ANTONIO MARIA, called the Younger, was the nephew of the preceding, born at Venice in 1716. Being well versed in literature, he was appointed to the office of Librarian of St. Mark, and was not less distinguished than his uncle for his zealous attachment to the art. In 1760 he published a set of eighty plates, designed and etched by himself, from the works of the Venetian painters, entitled, Varie Pitture a fresco de principali Maestri Veneziani, &c. Lanzi says he also displayed considerable skill as a painter. He is known as a learned and able writer on art by his Pittura Veneziana, a work highly commended by Lanzi, treating of Venetian painting and the public works of the principal Venetian masters, in five books, published at Venice in 1771, 8vo. He died in 1778.

ZANGRIUM, JOHN BAPTIST, a Flemish engraver, who resided at Louvain about 1602, in which year he published a book of dresses, entiled, Album Amicorum habitibus Mulierum Omnium nationum Europæ. By the side of each figure is an ornamental mantle, with a helmet, and a blank left for a coat of arms. They are neatly executed, but without much taste. In the beginning of the work, he introduced the portraits of the Duke of Brabant, Isabella Clara his duchess, and Justus Lipsius.

ZANI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian designer and engraver, who flourished, according to Bartsch, in 1660; Zani says he operated in 1640. He formed the design of making a collection of etchings from the works of the most distinguished Bolognese painters, and for this purpose had completed the drawings from those in the cloisters of S. Michele in Bosco, when he died young, before the etchings were finished. Bartsch describes only one print by him, a Glory, after L. Caracci.

ZANIMBERTI, FILIPPO, a painter born at Brescia in 1585. He was educated in the school of Santo Peranda, with whom he continued ten years. He distinguished himself as an historical painter, and executed many works for the churches of Brescia and Venice, besides being much employed in decorating the palaces of the nobility. He had a fertile genius, and a lively imagination; he designed correctly, and with facility; his heads have a fine expression, and his coloring is very natural. Lanzi says "he was never appreciated at Brescia; but at Venice, where he resided many years, and where he painted with real genius and skill for the churches, he is very highly esteemed. In Santa Maria Nuova, is to be seen his grand picture of the Manna, so much commended by Ridolfi, by Boschini, and by Zanetti; though he seems to have chiefly employed himself in ornamenting the palaces. He possessed a singular talent for drawing small figures, and composing histories and fables, which were eagerly sought after, insomuch that the poet of the Venetian paintings affirms that whoever possesses one of Zanimberti's pictures was sure of his money."

ZANNA, GIOVANNI, a painter who flourished at Rome, according to Baglioni, in the pontificate of Paul V. He painted history with reputation, and was an excellent figurist. He formed an intimacy with Tarquinio di Viterbo, and they both wrought in conjunction, Tarquinio painting the landscape and architectural pieces, and Zanna adorning them with figures.

ZANNICHELLI, PROSPERO, a painter born at Reggio in 1698, and died in 1772. According to Tiraboschi, he was an excellent painter of perspective, and was much employed in decorating theatres.

ZANOBRIO. See CARLEVARIIS.

ZANOTTI, GIOVANNI PIETRO. This artist was born at Paris, of Italian parents, who sent him while young to Bologna. He was educated in the school of Lorenzo Pasinelli, and became a correct designer, a good colorist, exhibiting also an excellent knowledge of the chiaro-scuro. He painted several altar-pieces for the churches at Bologna, the principal of which are the Incredulity of St. Thomas, in the church of that Saint; the Resurrection, in S. Pietro; and the Nativity, in La Purità. In the Palazzo Pubblico, is a large picture by him representing the Ambassadors of Rome swearing fidelity to the Bolognese. He resided a great part of his life at Cortona, where he distinguished himself by painting several pictures for the churches, particularly Christ appearing to Mary Magdalene, Christ bearing his Cross, and the Murder of the Innocents. Lanzi says he excelled in easel pictures of historical and mythological subjects, which are frequently to be met with in private houses, and are greatly admired. "They display much poetical imagination, this artist delighting in poetical compositions, very different from Lomazzo's and Boschini's, to an extreme old age."

Zanotti is also well known as a laborious and intelligent writer on art; of his numerous publications, the most considerable is his Storia dell'Accademia Clementina di Bologna, published in two volumes quarto in 1739. Lanzi says few have been more successful in wielding with equal excellence both pen and pencil. He died in 1765, at the great age of 91 years.

ZAPPI, LAVINIA, a name by which Lavinia Fontana is sometimes called, from a family of Imola, into which she married. See Fontana.

ZARATO. See Luzzo.

ZARINENA, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter, born at Valencia about 1550. According to Palomino, he went to Italy while young, and had the advantage of studying in the school of Titian. On returning to Spain, he executed some works for the churches and convents of his native city, the principal of which are in the monastery of San Miguel de los Reyes. "In composition and coloring, they are worthy of the school in which he was educated." Bermudez says he was a scholar of the elder Ribalta, and commends his works, but says nothing of his studying under Titian. He died at Valencia in 1624.

ZARINENA, CRISTOBAL and JUAN, were the sons and disciples of the preceding, in whose style they painted history with considerable reputation. There are some of their works in the public edifices at Valencia.

ZARLATTI, GIOSEFFO, an Italian designer and engraver, was born at Modena about 1635, and died very young. We have by him a few etchings of historical and fancy subjects, from his own designs, executed in so spirited and pleasing a style, and evincing so lively a genius, that his premature death is deeply regretted.

ZATZINGER. See ZAGEL.

ZAUNER, FRANCIS VON, a distinguished German sculptor, was born at Feldpatan in German Tyrol, in 1746. He early evinced a decided taste for sculpture, and went to Vienna in 1766, where he studied and wrought with great assiduity under Prof. Schletterer, for a period of five years. His talents were noticed by Prince Kaunitz, who ordered him to execute within fifteen days a model for a spring, representing the three largest rivers of Austria. The work was approved, and was afterwards executed on a large scale. The Empress Maria Theresa took Zauner into favor; and, in 1776, he received assistance from the government to go to Rome, where he studied four years. In 1781 he was appointed Professor of Sculpture in the Academy at Vienna. He improved the manner of studying this art in the Austrian capital, and executed a number of works; among others, the colossal statue of the Emperor Joseph II., which Francis II.

caused to be erected in honor of his uncle, in the Joseph Square, in 1807. It is one of the largest statues in Europe, and was cast by Zauner in a new method of his own invention, which succeeded perfectly. There are by this artist many busts, statues, and bas-reliefs; also the monument of the Emperor Leopold II., in white marble, in the church of St. Augustine. He died at Vienna, in 1822.

ZE, DE. The name of this artist is affixed to a small print representing Christ dead in the Tomb, attended by an Angel. It is executed with the graver, in a style resembling that of John Sadeler, and is apparently from his own design.

ZEEMAN, REMY. See NOOMS.

ZEEMAN, ENOCH, a Dutch painter, who resided many years in London, and died there in 1744. He painted portraits in the labored style of Denner, and met with considerable employment. He had a son named Paul, who followed the same profession. Isaac Zeeman, the brother of Enoch, was also a portrait painter, and died in 1751, leaving a son, who pursued the same branch.

ZEGHERS. See SEGHERS.

ZEITBLOOM, BARTHOLOMEW, an ancient German painter of Ulm, to whom many pictures of the old German school are attributed. Dr. Kügler, in his Hand-Book of the German and Flemish Painters, mentions several pictures of sacred subjects by him, two of which are in the Pinacothek at Munich, and others are dispersed in various churches and collections. They are designed in the old, dry, gothic style, but the coloring is strong and rich. Nothing is known of his history, or the time when he flourished.

ZELOTTI, BATTISTA, an eminent Italian painter, born at Verona in 1532. He was brought up in the school of Antonio Badile, and was the fellow student and friend of Paul Veronese, with whom he cooperated in several important works in the public edifices at Venice. Vasari calls him Battista da Verona, and includes him among the disciples of Titian. Lanzi also thinks that he studied with Titian after he left Badile. "His Holy Family in the Carrara collection, frequently extolled by us before, is entirely in the style of Titian, and from such a studio it would appear we are to look for that warmth of tints in which for the most part he excels Veronese, as well as that power of design in which Zanetti is of opinion that he also surpassed him, although others think very differently. He often surpasses him, likewise, in grandeur, and in what appertains to painting in fresco, a circumstance that Paolo was fully aware of, and for that reason sought to obtain his assistance in works of that kind. He possessed great fertility of invention, and a rapid hand, while he was profound and judicious in his compositions. Indeed, he might have been esteemed another Paolo, had he been able to compete with him in the beauty of his heads, in variety and in grace. In truth, his productions were frequently given to Veronese; even those he painted for the grand hall of the Council of Ten, were engraved under the name of the latter by Valentine le Febre. He was doubtless one of the first artists of his time, though not estimated according to his merits, from his having worked chiefly in fresco, and at a distance from capital cities, in villages, in country seats, and in palaces. One of his grandest works is seen at Cataio, a villa belonging to the Marchese Tommaso Obizzi, where, about 1570, he represented in different rooms, the history of that very ancient family, distinguished no less in the council than in arms. The place is continually sought after by foreigners, attracted thither by its splendor, by the fame of these pictures, and the valuable museum of antiquities collected by the Marchese. In his oil paintings, Zelotti could not compete with Calari, though he approached him near enough in his Conversion of St. Paul, and Christ with his Disciples in the Fishing bark, which he executed for the cathedral of Vicenza, to merit the honor of having them attributed to the pencil of Veronese. This city was his chief theatre of action, where, together with Veronese, and the help of one of his best pupils, he established a school, which partook of the taste of both these masters." Zelotti died in 1592.

ZELTER, CARL FRIEDRICH, a German architect, was born at Berlin in 1758. He received a liberal education, and at the age of seventeen was articled to his father, who was also an architect. During the succeeding eight years he was occupied in professional pursuits, and in 1783 was admitted as a master-builder. During this time, however, he conceived a passion for music, and devoted himself to that art after completing his architectural course. He attained the position of Professor of Music to the University and the Royal Institute of Berlin; and it does not appear that he erected any edifices. Zelter died in 1832.

ZENALE, BERNARDO, called also BERNARDO DA TREVILIO, an Italian painter and architect, born at Trevilio in the Milanese. He was a pupil of Civerchio, and painted history and architecture, and excelled particularly in perspective. According to Lanzi, he was an eminent artist in his time, and the intimate friend of Lionardo da Vinci. Lomazzo relates that Vinci in his Last Supper had endued the countenances of both the saints James with so much beauty, that despairing of making that of the Saviour more imposing, he went to advise with Bernardo Zenale, who to console him, said, "Leave the head of Christ unfinished, as it is, for you will never be able to make it worthy of Christ, among those Apostles;" and this Lionardo is said to have done. (See, however, VINCI.) Vasari calls Zenale Bernardino da Trevio, and says he was an engineer at Milan, in the time of Bramante, "a very able designer, and esteemed an excellent master by Vinci, though his manner was somewhat harsh and dry in his pictures;" and he then goes on to cite his picture of the Resurrection in the cloister of the Grazie, among other works, as exhibiting some beautiful foreshortenings.

As an architect, Zenale gained considerable distinction, and was entrusted with the restorations in the Cathedral at Milan. In 1520 he was invited to Bergamo by the magistrates of that city, to give his opinion concerning the proposed embellishments in the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore.

In his old age, in 1524, he published a work on perspective, containing many original and excellent observations. Few of his works now remain. He has been confounded by several Italian writers with Bernardo Butinone, a native of the same town, and his fellow-pupil. Tassi erroneously calls him Bernardino da Trevigi. Zani says he was born in 1426, and died in 1526; if so, he was ninety-eight years old when he published his work on perspective.

ZENCI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, who flourished about 1570. His style resembles that of Marco da Ravenna, and he is supposed to have been a disciple of that master, though his works are inferior, and incorrectly drawn. He engraved a set of portraits entitled Illustrium Jureconsultorum Imagines. It is said that his name was Zenoi, or Zenoni, and that he engraved some prints after Raffaello, and other masters.

ZENOBRIO. See CARLEVARIS.

ZENODORUS, a celebrated Greek sculptor, who flourished in the first century of the Christian era, during the reigns of Claudius and Nero. Invited to the province of Auvergne in Gaul, he was commissioned by the prefect Vibius Avitus to execute a metallic colossal statue of Mercury. He was engaged ten years upon this work, and received for it the sum of 40,000,000 sesterces; but this amount probably covered also the cost of the materials. He also copied for Avitus the precious vases by Calamis the Greek sculptor, with such skill that they could scarcely be distinguished from the originals, which had been bequeathed by Germanicus to his instructor Cassius Silanus, and thence descended to Avitus, nephew of the latter. The works of Zenodorus gained him so much reputation, that he was employed by Nero to execute the colossal statue of that monarch, 110 or 120 feet high, erected in the vestibule of his Golden Palace. This immense height can hardly be credited, however; it is probably an error of some copyist. After the tyrant's death, the statue was overthrown, and Vespasian subsequently ordered a head with seven rays to be substituted for that of Nero, and consecrated the statue to the Sun, in the fourth quarter of the city. There is a passage in Pliny's account of Zenodorus, which is translated thus: "This statue shows that the art of founding in bronze was lost: for Nero was ready to furnish all the necessary gold and silver; and Zenodorus yielded to no artist of antiquity in the art of chiseling and modeling." It would appear from this, that the statue was composed of some other material than bronze, and probably of brass; since not even the prodigality of Nero was able to revive the art of bronze casting.

ZENONI, DUCE, an Italian engraver, who flourished in 1634. He engraved some plates of portraits, neatly executed with the graver, but in a stiff, and formal style. He was probably also a goldsmith, as he signed his prints Duce Zenoni Orifice.

ZENTNER, J. L., a German engraver, who resided at Paris about 1780, and afterwards visited England, where he engraved some plates of landscapes, animals, and dead game. His plates are etched and finished with the graver, in a neat, clear style.

ZETTER, PAUL DE. This artist  Sculp was a native of Hanover, and flourished about 1630. He was chiefly employed in engraving portraits from his own designs, executed in a neat, but stiff and tasteless style. He engraved several plates for Boissard's Collection of Portraits. He sometimes marked his prints with the above monogram, and at others with his initials P. D. Z. fec.

ZEUXIS. This great artist, one of the most celebrated painters of antiquity, and the most eminent of his time, was born at one of the ancient cities named Heraclea, between B. C. 460 and B. C. 450. Pliny fixes the time when he flourished at B. C. 400; but he could scarcely have been born later than B. C. 450, as he was in the height of his reputation during the reign of Archelaus of Macedonia, which was from B. C. 413 to B. C. 399; and Harduin and others are therefore probably incorrect in fixing upon Heraclea in Lucania, in Italy, as the birth-place of Zeuxis, since that city was not founded until after the destruction of Siris, B. C. 433; and the only reason that seems to be urged for their supposition, is a very insufficient one, namely, that Zeuxis was commissioned to paint a picture by the Crotoniats. When he had made himself rich by his profession, and must accordingly have been advanced in years, he gave away some of his works; and Archelaus was then living, for he presented a picture of the god Pan to that king. From the complaint of Apollodorus, who lived at Athens, Zeuxis must also have been early in that city; he was most likely a native of one of the Heracleas in Greece, and probably, from his connection with Archelaus, of Heraclea Lyncestis of Macedonia.

Zeuxis was instructed in art by Demophilus of Himera, or Neseas of Thasos; artists of whom nothing is known, except that one of them was his instructor. He soon far outstripped his master, as Apollodorus intimated, in verses expressive of his indignation that Zeuxis should have moulded to his own use all previous inventions, and stolen the graces of the best masters; thus paying a fine involuntary compliment to his great rival. Apollodorus having first practiced chiaro-scuro, could not endure that his glory should be eclipsed by a younger artist, who availed himself of his own improvements to rise to a higher degree of excellence. The complaint of Apollodorus, that his rival had robbed him of his art, shows also that Zeuxis excelled in coloring, as effect of coloring and of light and shadow were the peculiar excellencies of Apollodorus. Lucian terms Zeuxis the greatest painter of his time, saying that he was immediately preceded by Apollodorus of Athens, whom he surpassed; and he was immediately followed by Parrhasius of Ephesus, who surpassed him. Parrhasius however, was defective in coloring and chiaro-scuro; and it is quite doubtful whether the latter part of this assertion is correct. Unlike Polygnotus, Zeuxis did not employ himself upon large compositions. He drew well, and in a grand style; and the beauty and grandeur of his forms were so predominant, that he was said by Aristotle to have failed in expressing mind, but Pliny says that in a picture of Penelope bewailing the loss of her husband, not only form, but character were vividly expressed; he censures him, however, for the too great size of the heads and joints in comparison with the other parts of the figures. Quintilian says that Zeuxis followed Homer, who loved powerful forms, even in women; he likewise notices his excellence in light and shade. He was also distinguished for a dramatic effect of composition, and he made a peculiar choice of subject; for he seldom or never, says Lucian, exerted his powers upon such hackneyed subjects as gods, heroes, and battles; but he always selected something new and unattempted, and when he had chosen a subject, he labored his utmost to render it a master-piece, painting very slowly, and with great care. Lucian instances, as an example, a picture of a family of Centaurs, of which he saw a copy at Athens, that excited his wonder at its extraordinary excellence. The original was lost at sea, on its way to Rome, whither it was sent by Sylla. He describes it as follows: "On a grass plot of the most glossy verdure lies the Centauress, with the whole equine part of her stretched on the ground, the hind feet extending backwards, while the upper female part is gently raised and reclining on one elbow. But the fore feet are not equally extended, as if she lay on her side; yet one seems to rest on the knee, having the hoof bent backwards, whereas the other is lifted up and pawing the ground, as horses are wont to do when they are going to spring up. Of her two young, one she holds in her arms to give it the breast, the other lies under her sucking like a foal. On an elevation behind her is seen a Centaur, who appears to be her mate, but is only visible to the half of the horse; he looks down upon her with a complacent smile, holding up in one hand the whelp of a lion, as if jocosely to frighten his young ones with it. In the male Centaur all is fierce and terrific: his shaggy mane-like hair, his rough body, his broad and brawny shoulders, and the countenance, though smiling, yet wild and savage; in short, everything bears the character of these compound beings. The Centauress, on the other hand, as far as she is brutal, resembles the finest mare of the Thessalian breed which is yet untamed, and has never been mounted; by the other moiety, she is a woman of consummate beauty, excepting only in the ears, which have somewhat of the satyr shape. The blending, however, of the human and animal natures is so artificial, and the transition of one to the other so imperceptible, or rather they so gently lose themselves in one another, that it is impossible to say where the one ceases and the other begins. Nor in my mind was it less admirable that the young ones, notwithstanding their tender age, have somewhat wild and fierce in their aspect, and that mixture of infantine timidity and curiosity with which they look up at the whelp, while at the same time they continue eagerly sucking, and cling as close as they can to their mother."

Zeuxis was not only successful in securing wealth, and the applause of the multitude, but was honored with the friendship of Archelaus of Macedonia, for whose palace he executed several pictures, and received for them the sum of 400 minæ—about $8000; which, though a small sum, compared with what was paid the painters of the Alexandrine period, and later, was probably at that time comparatively a large one. Cicero says that the inhabitants of Crotona prevailed on Zeuxis to visit their city, and to paint there a number of pictures for the Temple of Juno, for which he was to receive a large and stipulated sum. On his arrival he informed them that he intended only to paint the picture of Helen, with which they were satisfied, as he was regarded peculiarly excellent in the delineation of women. He accordingly desired to see the most beautiful maidens of the city, from whom he selected five, copied all that was most beautiful and perfect in the forms of each, and thus completed a work of exquisite beauty. It was a very famous work in after times, and artists apparently traveled to Crotona to see it. The painter Nicomachus, seeing this picture, could not restrain the expression of his surprise and admiration, when a bystander, not equally capable of appreciating its excellence, demanded what he saw in the picture to excite such sensations. "Ah," replied the painter, "take my eyes, and you will see a goddess"! This was his most celebrated work. It seems probable that he painted a picture of Helen, besides that for the people of Crotona, which in the time of Pliny was in the Portico of Philip at Rome. Probably a greater work by Zeuxis, though less celebrated than his Helen, was his picture which he presented to the Agrigentines, of the infant Hercules strangling the Serpents sent by Juno to destroy him, in the presence of his panic-struck mother Alcmena, and of Amphitryon. Other famous works by him were—Jupiter in the Assembly of the Gods; Menelaus mourning over the fate of Agamemnon; a Marsyas bound, in the Temple of Concord at Rome in Pliny's time; an Athlete inscribed with the line, "It is easier to find fault than to imitate"; and a Cupid crowned with roses, which was in the Temple of Venus at Athens. The time and place of Zeuxis' death are unknown. Festus relates, on the authority of Verrius Flaccus, that he died with laughter at the picture of an old woman whom he had painted; but this extraordinary circumstance is mentioned by no other writer, and is probably fictitious.

Zeuxis is represented as having been very proud of his reputation, and ostentatious of his wealth. He appeared at the Olympic Games attired in a mantle on which his name was embroidered in letters of gold, a piece of most absurd display in one whose name was deeply impressed on the hearts and imaginations of those by whom he was surrounded. He does not, however, seem to be chargeable with avarice, or, at least, this passion, if it existed, was subservient to his pride; for, when he had attained the height of his fame, he refused any longer to receive money for his pictures, because he regarded them above all pecuniary value. In the earlier part of his career, he was accustomed, however, to exhibit his productions for money, especially his celebrated painting of Helen, whence the figure was denominated, "Helen the Courtesan." The truth seems to have been, that the ruling passion of Zeuxis was the love of pomp, an ever-restless vanity, a constant desire and craving after every kind of distinction. So far as money assisted in procuring this, he stooped to obtain it, and refused it when he could most successfully assume dignity by refusing further recompense.

The story respecting the contest between Zeuxis and Parrhasius, has been frequently related. It is said that the former painted a cluster of grapes with such perfect skill that birds came and pecked them as they were exhibited on the table. Elated with so unequivocal a testimony of his excellence, he called to his rival to draw back the curtain which he supposed concealed his work, anticipating a certain triumph. Now, however, he found himself entrapped, for that which he took for a curtain, was only a painting of one by Parrhasius; upon which he ingenuously confessed himself defeated, since he had deceived only birds, but his antagonist had beguiled the senses of an experienced artist. An anecdote is also related of a similar kind, in which he overcame himself, or rather one part of his work was shown to have been executed at the expense of another. He painted a boy with a basket of grapes, to which the birds resorted; on which he acknowledged that the boy could not be well painted, since, had the similitude been equal in both cases, the birds would have been deterred from approaching. It was, perhaps, from the former of these accounts that Lucian drew his assertion that Zeuxis was inferior to Parrhasius, and if so, it certainly proves very little. Regard must be shown to the description of objects represented, and the artist who could represent a curtain to perfection, would not necessarily be the greatest painter of Greece. There are many testimonies, scattered through the writings of antiquity, to the transcendent genius of Zeuxis.

Cicero remarks that the works of Zeuxis, of Aglaophon, and Apelles, are in different styles, but they are all three perfect in their respective styles. Zeuxis also painted pictures in white, or mere chiaro-scuro, which the Greeks termed monochroms. It is remarkable that Pausanias does not mention the name of this artist, and we may infer from this that Zeuxis painted easel pictures only, or upon tabulæ, wooden panels, which, from their perishable nature and facility of removal, are very easily lost, particularly if the works of eminent artists, whose productions are best worth removal. Cicero states that Zeuxis used only four colors; but this is probably an error; or he may mean in his carnations, in which four are all that are necessary. In regard to the idea which has generally obtained in modern times, that the ancient painters really knew the use of only four colors, the anecdotes above related are almost sufficient to refute it entirely; because, although the stories themselves may be valueless, the fact that they were circulated in ancient times, shows that the ancients believed that exact imitation could be accomplished in colors, which result they could never have arrived at except by the evidence of their senses. For a further dissertation on this point, see the article APELLES.

There was another ancient artist named Zeuxis, a Greek statuary, who was a disciple of Silanion, and flourished from B. C. 316, to B. C. 296.

ZEVI. See STEFANO DA VERONA and ALTICHERIO.

ZIARUKO, JOHN. This artist was a native of Poland, and is supposed to have been a painter. He executed a set of large etchings in a slight, spirited style, from his own designs, representing the Coronation Ceremonies of Louis XIII. of France.

ZIFRONDI, ANTONIO, a painter born at Clusone, in the Bergamese territory, according to Count Tassi, in 1657. After acquiring the rudiments of the art, he went to Bologna, and entered the school of Marc' Antonio Franceschini, under whose able instruction he became a reputable painter of history. There are many of his works in the churches and private collections of his native city, which show that he possessed a ready invention, and great facility of hand. Lanzi says he had a genius and an imagination for grand compositions, and a wonderful facility and rapidity of hand, that enabled him to dash off a picture in two hours; but his works are seldom free from errors of over-haste and carelessness. His name is sometimes written Cifrondi. He died in 1730.

ZILOTTI, DOMENICO BERNARDO, a painter born at Borso, near Bassano, about 1730. He painted landscapes, in which he imitated the style of Francesco Zuccarelli with great spirit and correctness. He also executed quite a number of spirited etchings from his own designs and after other masters, which possess considerable merit.

ZINANI, FRANCESCO, a painter of Reggio, who flourished in 1755. According to Tiraboschi, he studied under Francesco Bibiena, and became one of the most skillful painters of perspective in Lombardy. He was much employed in decorating theatres.

ZINCKE, CHRISTIAN FREDERICK, an excellent painter in enamel, born at Dresden in 1685. He went to England in 1706, and studied under Boit, whom he surpassed; and Cunningham states that he even rivaled Petitot, but Stanley says this is an error, that though he surpassed most artists of his time, and his works are still held in high estimation, he did not equal that master by many degrees. He found abundant employment, was much patronized by George II. and Queen Caroline, and was appointed cabinet painter to the Prince of Wales. The Princess Amelia, daughter of George II., had ten portraits of her illustrious family painted by him. His works are numerous and highly esteemed. He died in 1767.

ZING, or ZINGG, ADRIAN, a Swiss engraver, who flourished in the latter part of the 18th century. He first studied under John Rudolf Holzhalb, at Zurich, and then for two years with Louis Alberli at Berne, after which he went to Paris, and became the pupil of John George Wille. He executed several plates in that metropolis, which gained him considerable reputation, and after a residence there of seven years, he was invited to Dresden by the Elector of Saxony, who appointed him his engraver. He was also elected a member of the Academy in that city. He engraved quite a number of plates of landscapes, marines, sea-ports, views, and other subjects, after Vernet, vander Neer, Dietricy, and other masters, which are executed in a neat, clear style, resembling that of Wille. The times of his birth and death are not recorded.

ZING, ———. See ZAGEL.

ZINGARO, Lo. See SOLARIO.

ZINMERMAN, MICHAEL, a German painter and engraver on wood, who flourished at Vienna, according to Papillon, about 1550. Nothing is known of his works as a painter. He executed the cuts of a large geographical chart consisting of ten parts which join together. It represents the kingdom of Hungary, with the arms of the provinces, and is described as a very fine performance.

ZOAN, ANDREA, a real or supposed engraver, who flourished about 1516. There is a great deal of dispute as to his name, country, and works, which we cannot enter into, further than to say that Bartsch, P. G. tom. xiii., describes thirty-three prints by him, most of which are marked with the initials Z. A., and quite a number more are described by other writers. Some of these are copied from Albert Durer. Zani says, "the initials Z. A., stand for Zoan Andrea, which is the same as Giovanni Andrea, Zoan being the Venetian pronunciation of Gian, or Giovanni," hence he argues that he was a Venetian. For further information the reader must be referred to Bartsch, Zani, and other voluminous writers.

ZOBEL, BENJAMIN, the inventor of Marmotinto, was born in 1762, at Memmingen, in Bavaria. He received his education at the government school of that city, and acquired the rudiments of drawing from a monk belonging to the convent of Otobeuern. In 1781, he went to Amsterdam, where he resided two years, chiefly occupied in portrait painting. In 1783, he visited London, where he formed an acquaintance with Morland and Schweickhardt, the latter of whom was employed at Windsor Castle, by George III.'s "table decker." It was then customary to ornament the royal dinner table by having a silver plateau extending along the centre, on which were strewed various colored sands or marble dust, in fanciful designs of fruit, flowers, arabesque work, &c. For this an artist was required, possessing considerable talent and great freedom of hand. On the retirement of Schweickhardt, Zobel was appointed; and he continued to fill the office for a considerable period. As the sands were not cemented by any substance, this mode of ornamenting the table was a daily occupation; but Zobel conceived the idea of producing a finished and permanent picture, by the use of some substance to fix the sands. After various experiments, a composition, consisting chiefly of gun-arabic and spirits of wine, was found to answer the best. The subject of the picture having been designed either on pannel or milled board, a coating of the glutinous substance was spread over it; the different colored sands were then used in a similar manner as that employed in decking the royal table, namely, by strewing them from a piece of card held at various elevations, according to the strength or softness of the tint required. Thus was formed a picture, not subject to decay, and permanent in all its parts; and this the inventor called Marmotinto. Some of the best specimens of this peculiar art were formerly in the possession of the Duke of York, but were sold at his death, a number of years ago, at Oatlands. Several are still among the collections of paintings belonging to the Duke of Northumberland, and Sir Willoughby Gordon. Zobel also practiced painting on gold and silver grounds in transparent colors, for various purposes, with eminent success. He died in 1831.

ZOBOLI, JACOPO, a painter born at Modena, who first studied under Francesco Stringa, and afterwards at Bologna. From thence he went to Rome, where he settled, and "acquired," says Lanzi, "the reputation of a good artist. This he obtained in a high degree by his labors in the church of S. Eustachio, where he is distinguished among the more modern productions by his St. Girolamo, displaying singular diligence, polish, and harmony of colors, by no means general in those times." He died at Rome in 1761.

ZOCCHI, GIUSEPPE, a painter and engraver, born at Florence in 1711. Lanzi says he displayed such talents when a boy, that the noble family of the Gerini took him under its patronage, and after his elementary studies at Florence, sent him to Rome, to Bologna, and to other parts of Lombardy for his instruction. "Zocchi had a genius fertile in invention, pliant in imitation, and judicious in selection; hence at the conclusion of such a course of study, he was able to compose large works with skill, and to color beautifully. He painted four tolerably large frescos in the Villa Serristori, beyond the gate of St. Nicholas; some apartments in the Rinuccini palace, and one in the Gerini gallery; and these are believed to be his best works of this sort. In small pieces he was still greater, as in his oil pictures of the festivals at Siena, on the arrival of the Emperor Francis I., a work true in perspective and graceful in the multitude of figures." Zocchi also made drawings of the most remarkable views in Florence, and of the villas in its environs, which he caused to be engraved and published in sets; the figures in these were etched by himself. He also etched some plates after Guido, P. da Cortona, Simone da Pesaro, Solimena, and others. He died in 1767.

ZOCOLI, CARLO, a distinguished Italian architect and engineer, was born at Naples in 1718. Milizia does not mention his instructor, but at the age of seventeen he entered the corps of engineers. He attained great distinction, was appointed master of fortifications, and took precedence of many of the older officers; but in consequence of delicate health, he devoted his talents to civil architecture, and was appointed Superintendent of Buildings to the city of Naples. The principal works by Zocoli are, the Cathedral, Seminary, and Episcopal Palace of Calvi; the Convent of the Alcanterini, on the mountain of Pignatoro; the church and Baronial palace in Cutignano, near Nola; the Villa of the Prince of Supino at Portici; and that of the Marquis Palomba at Cesa. Zocoli also constructed two windmills at Capua, and nine others at Scilla, in Calabria. He died in 1771, leaving a son named Raffaele Z., who completed the restorations on the Castle at Scilla, commenced by his father.

ZOFFANY, JOHN, a German painter, born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, in 1735; although Fiorillo places his birth at Regensburg, in Bavaria. It is said that his father, an architect of Bohemian descent, sent him to Italy while young; and after returning to Germany, that he practiced portrait and historical painting at Coblenz for several years. He went to England when about thirty years of age, where he acquired considerable distinction by painting the portraits of Garrick and several other eminent performers in costume, also those of the Earl of Barrymore, and several members of the Royal Family. At the formation of the Royal Academy, Zoffany was chosen one of the original forty members, in 1768; and he painted a picture of the Academicians of 1772, considered among his best works. He also painted conversation pieces with considerable success. On his expressing a wish to visit Italy, George III. gave him a letter to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who received him well, and permitted him to study in the Florentine gallery, of which he painted a picture, now in the royal collection. In 1782, soon after his return to England, he went to the East Indies, and resided several years at Lucknow, where he painted the portraits of several native princes, and many European residents. Three of his best performances were painted in the East Indies, and have been engraved in mezzotinto by Earlom: they represent an Indian Tiger Hunt; a Cock-Fight, with many figures; and the Embassy of Hyderbeck to Lord Cornwallis at Calcutta, a rich display of Indian costumes, with about one hundred figures, and several elephants and horses. After acquiring a handsome fortune, Zoffany returned, in 1796, to England, where he passed the rest of his days, and died at Kew, in 1810.

ZOLA, or ZOLLA, GIUSEPPE, a landscape painter, born at Brescia in 1675. Lanzi says, "he devoted himself to no single master, but formed his style upon many. He was exceedingly rich in conception, and in expedients; his buildings are of a rustic kind, his ruins partake of the modern, and are picturesquely covered with creeping plants and ivy; the back grounds are of an azure hue, and he inserts a great variety of objects and figures, in which he was less happy than in his landscape. His earlier works are held in most esteem. When he obtained greater commissions, he executed them with a more mechanical hand, and with the exception of his coloring, which he always studied, he bestowed little care on the rest. Those pictures are in general most complete in which he introduced the smallest figures, and such may be seen even out of private houses, as in the Monte della Pietà, and in the sacristy of S. Lionardo at Ferrara." In his best works, his figures are elegantly designed, carefully finished, and touched with spirit, though generally not equal to his scenery. He resided the greater part of his life at Ferrara, where he died in 1743.

ZOMPINI, GAETANO, a painter born at Venice in 1702. According to Lanzi he was a pupil of the Cav. Niccolo Bambini, and afterwards by studying the works of Sebastiano Ricci, he formed a mixed style not destitute of originality. "He received honorable commissions from the court of Spain, in which he displayed a rich fund of imagination; he also, in a measure, distinguished himself by his engravings." He died in 1778.

ZONCA, VICTOR, an Italian architect, and talented mechanic, was born about 1580. In youth, he applied himself to the study of mathematics and architecture, and attained sufficient excellence to be appointed architect to the city of Padua. He seems, however, to have attained his chief distinction by the invention of many ingenious machines, entitled Nuovo teatro di machine ed edifizj per varie e sicure operazioni, in folio, Padua, 1607, or 1621. There are said to have been other editions published in 1653 and 1656, but this is quite improbable, as the volume is very rare.

ZOLEMAKER. See SOLEMACKER.

ZOPPO, MARCO, a painter born at Bologna in 1451. He first studied under Dalmasio Lippi, and afterwards at Padua, in the school of Francesco Squarcione, where Andrea Mantegna was his fellow pupil. Lanzi says, "he also studied in the Venetian school, where he painted for the Osservanti at Pesaro, a picture of the Virgin on a throne, crowned, with St. John the Baptist, St. Francis, and other saints, and signed it Marco Zoppo da Bologna Dip. in Vinexia, 1471. This is his most celebrated production, from which, and a few other pieces in the same church, and at Bologna, we may gather some idea of his style. He formed an epoch in the Bolognese school, and rose to equal eminence with Pizzolo and Dario da Trevigi; and, like them, vied with the genius of Mantegna, which gave a further spur to his exertions. His composition is that common to the quattrocentisti (artists of the 14th century), particularly the Venetians, and which he probably introduced into Bologna, a style which continued till the time of Francia and his school, for the most part unvaried, except in the addition of a church to the steps of the throne, sometimes with a harp, and sometimes without. It is not free and graceful, like that of Mantegna, but rather coarse, particularly in the feet; yet less rectilinear in the folds, and bolder and more harmonious perhaps, in the selections of the colors. The fleshes are as much studied as in Signorelli, and in others of the same age, while the figures and accessories are conducted with the most finished care. He was moreover a fine decorator of façades." He died in 1517.

ZOPPO, PAOLO, a painter of Brescia, who flourished in the first part of the 16th century. There are some of his pictures in the churches of his native city, which show that he had studied the works of the Bellini, and approached near the modern manner. Lanzi says he was present at the terrible sacking of the opulent city of Brescia, by the French army, under Gaston de Foix, in 1512, and that he painted the desolation of the city in miniature, upon a large crystal basin, a work of immense labor, intended to be presented to the Doge Gritti; but in transporting it to Venice, the crystal was unfortunately broken, and the unhappy artist, overwhelmed with despair, died about 1530, though Ridolfi says about 1515.

ZOPPO, ROCCO, a Florentine painter, who flourished in the first half of the 16th century. He was a disciple of Pietro Perugino, in whose style, according to Lanzi, his Madonnas are frequently to be met with in private houses at Florence.

ZOPPO, LO, DE GANGI, a Sicilian painter, who flourished, according to Lanzi, in the 18th century. There are some of his works in the Cathedral at Castro Giovanni.

ZOPPO, LO, DI GENOVA. See MICONE.

ZOPPO, IL, DI LUGANO. See DISCEPOLI.

ZOPPO, LO, DA VICENZA. See PIERI.

ZORG. See ROKES.

ZOROTI, DOMENICO, an Italian engraver, who resided in Germany, according to Florent le Comte, and executed some portraits.

ZOUST. See SOEST.

  ZUBERLEIN, or ZIBERLEIN, JACOB, a German engraver on wood, was born at Tübingen, and flourished at Frankfort about 1595. He executed a considerable number of wooden cuts, usually marked with a monogram of his initials, I. Z., to which he sometimes added a small tub. He is said to have been also a painter.

ZUBOZ, ALEXIS, an engraver in mezzotinto, who went to St. Petersburg, where he resided many years, and engraved a series of portraits of the Emperors of Russia; that of Peter the Great is dated 1729.

ZUCCARELLI, or ZUCCHERELLI, FRANCESCO, an eminent landscape painter, born at Pitigliano, in Tuscany, according to Lanzi, in 1702. He studied first with Paolo Anesi, and afterwards successively with Gio. Maria Moranelli and Pietro Nelli. For some time he applied himself to historical painting, but his natural genius leading him to landscape, he afterwards confined himself to that branch, in which he greatly excelled. His scenery is always pleasing, and usually embellished with ruins, cottages, and figures, elegantly designed, and touched with great neatness and spirit. His pictures were greatly admired and extolled, all over Europe. His principal field in Italy was in Venice, until the British Consul, Smith, induced him to visit England in 1752, where he met with very flattering encouragement, and was elected one of the original forty members of the Royal Academy. About 1773, he returned to Italy, and settled at Florence, where he invested a considerable sum of money, the produce of his talents, in the security of one of the monasteries, intending to pass the rest of his days in tranquil repose, but the monastery was soon afterwards suppressed by Joseph II. of Austria, and the unfortunate artist being reduced to indigence, was obliged to resume his pencil. He sometimes decorated the landscapes and architectural pieces of his cotemporaries with beautiful figures. He is said always to have marked his pictures with a pumpkin or squash, of large size, growing on a vine upon a shepherd's cot or fence, or stuck with a stick on a rustic's shoulder, as the rebus of his name, which in Italian signifies little pumpkin. We have a few spirited etchings by this artist from his own designs, and after other masters. He died at Florence in 1788.

ZUCCARO, TADDEO. This painter is sometimes miscalled Zuccherò, and by Vasari, Zuccheri, or Zuccari; but Lanzi says that in his epitaph, and in the books of his brother Federigo, the name is Zuccaro. He was born at S. Angiolo in Vado, in the Duchy of Urbino, in 1529, and was the son of an obscure painter, named Ottaviano Zuccaro. At an early age he manifested a precocious genius, and after receiving instruction from his father, and from Pompeo da Fano, he went to Rome when only fourteen years old. Destitute of means, he was compelled to support himself by grinding colors for the shops; but he still devoted every available moment to the prosecution of art, and frequently, after passing the day in designing from the works of Raffaello, he was compelled by poverty to sleep under the loggia of the Chigi palace. After perseverance under such difficulties, which would have daunted a less devoted lover of art, Taddeo was noticed by Daniello de Por, or da Parma, an artist then in repute, who favored him with his assistance and advice; and Lanzi says he "accomplished himself" under Giacomone da Faenza. His progress from this time seems to have been rapid; in 1547, at the age of eighteen, he was employed to decorate the façade of the Palazzo Mattei, with several emblematical subjects in chiaro-scuro.—Having acquired considerable reputation by this work, he was soon afterwards engaged by the Duke di Urbino to paint a series of frescos in a chapel of the Cathedral: Lanzi also mentions his picture of the Pentecost, in the church of S. Spirito at Urbino. During the pontificate of Julius III., he returned to Rome, and was employed by that pontiff, and by his successor, Paul IV., in the embellishment of the Vatican, and particularly of the apartments called Il Torrione. He painted in various parts of the Ecclesiastical States, and was entrusted by Cardinal Farnese with the entire decoration of his palace at Caprarola, where he represented the civil and military history of the Farnese family, in a variety of compartments, evincing great powers of invention, and a judicious style of composition. Lanzi says that the history of the Evangelists, in the church of the Consolazione at Rome, is among the best of his large fresco works in that city, but that none of his performances have added so much to his celebrity as those at Caprarola, and that strangers who visit that place generally return with a higher opinion of his abilities than they took with them. Lanzi also adds that a number of young artists, fully equal, and perhaps superior to Taddeo, were employed upon the same works at Caprarola, both in conjunction with him and after his death, whose works ought not to be confounded with his, though it is not always easy to distinguish them.

Most of Taddeo's performances are his grand works in fresco. He painted few pictures in oil, and is most pleasing in his small cabinet pictures, which are finished in the first style of excellence. Lanzi says that "from Giacomone da Faenza, and other good artists, whom he assiduously studied, he acquired sufficient talent to distinguish himself. He adopted a style which, though not very correct, was unconstrained and engaging, and very attractive to such as do not look for grandeur of design. He may be compared to that class of orators, who keep the attention of their hearers awake, not from the nature of their subject, but from the clearness of their language, and from their finding, or thinking they find, truth and nature in every word. His pictures may be called compositions of portraits; the heads are beautiful, the hands and feet negligently painted, nor yet labored, as in the Florentine manner; the dress and ornaments, and form of the beard, are agreeable to the times; the disposition is simple, and he often imitates the old painters in showing on the canvass only half figures in the foreground, as if they were on a lower plain. He often repeated the same countenance, and his own portrait. In his hands, feet, and the folds of his drapery, he is still less varied, and frequently errs in his proportions."

According to Vasari, Taddeo Zuccaro carried on a traffic in the art, similar to that of Pierino del Vaga before him, by contriving to abound in commissions, and securing to himself the services of other artists, in order to make them dependent on him, that they might not interfere with his own commissions and emoluments. He died at Rome in 1566, in his thirty-seventh year, worn out with continual exertion, and some disposition to excess. His monument is to be seen by the side of that of Raffaello, in the Rotonda. In 1748, there were published a set of forty-five plates, engraved by John Joseph Prenner, from Taddeo's great work in the palace at Caprarola.

ZUCCARO, CAV. FEDERIGO. This painter was the brother of Taddeo Z., and born at S. Angiolo in Vado, in 1543. He went to Rome at a very early age, and entered the school of his brother, where he had every advantage, and in a few years was so far advanced as to be able to assist Taddeo in his great works in fresco. In concert with Federigo Baroccio, he was employed by Pius IV. to paint in the Belvidere palace the History of Moses and Pharaoh, and the Transfiguration, which gained him great reputation. He also assisted his brother in the works at the Vatican, and the Farnese palace at Caprarola; and he was invited to Florence by the grand duke Francesco I., to paint the great dome of the metropolitan church S. Maria de' Fiori, commenced by Vasari, and left unfinished at his death. In this work Lanzi says there is little to admire, except vastness of conception; he designed more than three hundred figures, fifty feet in height, without mentioning that of Lucifer so gigantic that the rest appeared like children.

Federigo returned to Rome at the earnest solicitation of his brother; but the latter dying soon after, he was engaged to finish the various works upon which Taddeo had been engaged, in the Vatican, the church la Trinità de' Monti, and various other places. He soon became the first artist in Rome, and every work on a large scale was assigned to him. Gregory XIII. engaged him to paint the vault of the Capella Paolina; but about this time, in order to revenge himself upon some of the principal officers of the Pope, who had treated him with indignity, he painted and exposed to public view an allegorical picture of Calumny,* introducing the portraits of all those individuals who had offended him, decorated with asses' ears. His enemies, upon this, made such complaints that he was compelled to quit the dominions of the Pope, and he traveled to France, where he was for some time employed by the Cardinal of Lorraine. Going on to Flanders he painted several cartoons for tapestry, and then crossed the Channel, arriving in England in 1574, where he met a favorable reception, and painted a number of fine portraits, among which was that of Queen Elizabeth. Walpole also says that he painted the portrait of Mary, Queen of Scots, which was engraved by Vertue, and is now at Chiswick.

Federigo's stay in England was quite short, and on returning to Italy he was invited to Venice, to paint the Submission of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa to Pope Alexander III., in the Palazzo Pubblico, which is praised by Zanetti as one of his best works, copious, beautiful, and well sustained. Lanzi says he was highly esteemed, and constantly employed in Venice; he was engaged, in concert with the most eminent Venetian masters of the day, to embellish the Grand Council Hall, where his performances were so much admired that he received the honor of knighthood.

The pontiff being by this time appeased, Federigo returned to complete his work in the Capella Paolina, which Lanzi commends as the best of all he executed in Rome, without the assistance of his brother. During the pontificate of Sixtus V., he was invited to Madrid by Philip II. He executed some frescos in the lower cloister of the Escorial, which, not giving satisfaction to his royal patron, were effaced, and their places supplied by Pellegrino Tibaldi. The king, however, compensated him liberally for his work, and sent him back to Italy with a pension. About this time, he was chosen by Gregory XIII. to put in execution the letters patent for the Academy of St. Luke, which Lanzi says was first organized in November, 1593, according to the account of Signor Barone Vernazza, although the Artists celebrated the year 1695 as the centenary of the Academy. By common consent, Federigo was declared the first president of this celebrated institution, of which he was one of the chief promoters.

Later in life, as it would appear, Federigo Zuccaro undertook a journey through the principal cities of Italy, everywhere leaving proofs of his abilities. Lanzi praises two of his pictures in a chapel at Loreto, representing scenes from the life of the Virgin, painted for the Duke of Urbino, for their simple and graceful style; he also mentions two large pictures in the library of the Cistercian monks at Milan, representing the Miracle della Neve, with a numerous assemblage of figures, in his usual lively manner, the coloring varied and well preserved. Federigo resembled his brother Taddeo in style; he possessed a ready and inventive genius, and his design is not incorrect: but his compositions are frequently incongruous and extravagant, and he was led into a greater degree of mannerism than Taddeo, by an affectation of grandeur, and a commanding facility, being more addicted to ornament, and more crowded in his composition. His works are frequently compositions of portraits, and his coloring, though vigorous, clear, and brilliant, possesses neither mellowness or harmony.

After executing various works in Milan, Pavia, and other Italian cities, Federigo went to Turin, where he painted several pictures for the churches, and commenced the decoration of a gallery for the Duke of Savoy. Here he published his treatise entitled, La Idea de' Pittori, Scultori, e Architetti, which Lanzi says he appears to have written with the intention of rivalling and excelling Vasari; but he chose an abstruse mode of writing, and concocted a mass of sterile and ill-directed speculations; for which reasons Lanzi says we derive more information from a single page of Vasari's plainly written work, than from the whole book of Zuccaro, which tends rather to raise disputes than to convey knowledge. In 1609, while returning to his native place, Federigo fell sick in Ancona, where he died, aged sixty-six years. He left his entire property to the Academy of St. Luke. This artist is said to have been versed in sculpture and architecture, but none of his works are mentioned. Baglioni admires his versatility of talent, but more his good fortune, in which he exceeded all his cotemporaries. He was distinguished for noble personal appearance, engaging manners, and great liberality; all of which qualities gained him the esteem and attachment of many individuals, and contributed in no small degree to his success.

ZUCCATI, SEBASTIANO, an old painter who was living at Treviso in 1490. He painted in the gothic style of the time, and had the honor of being the first instructor of Titian.

ZUCCATI, VALERIO and FRANCESCO, two celebrated workers in mosaic, sons of the preceding, who were living at Venice in 1573. Lanzi, speaking of the perfection to which mosaic painting was carried before and during the time of Titian, says, "The same taste in mosaic work prevailed in the time of Titian, and to this he gave a renewed spirit, and even furnished several of these artists with designs. Marco Luciano Rizzo and Vincenzo Bianchini, are the first who, about 1517, succeeded in effecting a complete reform in the art. To the last is referred that celebrated Judgment of Solomon which adorns the portico or vestibule of San Marco. Both these, however, were surpassed by Francesco and Valerio Zuccati, of Treviso (or rather of the Valtellina), sons of the same Sebastiano who initiated Titian in the first rudiments of art. By them there likewise appear, in the portico of San Marco, among various prophets and doctors of the church, two histories that may be pronounced the best mosaic works produced during the age of painting. I have seen altar-pieces for churches, and pictures for private ornament in the same taste. The Royal Gallery at Florence possesses a portrait from life of Cardinal Bembo, worked by Valerio; and a St. Girolamo by Francesco, is known to have been presented by the Republic to the court of Savoy. Subsequently to these, about 1585, Arminio, a son of Valerio, flourished, and was held in much repute. Nor did this family only possess the art of coloring glass and stone with admirable skill, but they understood the principles of design, more particularly Francesco, who had practiced as a painter, before he entered upon mosaic works." Vasari erroneously calls these artists Zuccheri, and sometimes Zuccherini. See Bianchini.

ZUCCHI, ANDREA, an Italian engraver, born at Venice about 1675. He engraved a part of the plates for a collection of prints from the most celebrated paintings at Venice, consisting of 57 plates, published by Lovisa. He also engraved a set of twelve plates of Venetian costumes. He died in 1740. The following are among his best works:

Tobit and the Angel; after Titian. St. John the Evangelist; do. St. John the Baptist; after P. Veronese. The Martyrdom of Paolo Erizzo; after P. Longhi. The Birth of the Virgin; after Niccolò Bambini. The Miracle of the Manna; after G. Porta. The Goddess Cybele in a Car, drawn by Lions; after Tintoretto. Aurora and Tithon; do. Æneas saving Anchises from the Burning of Troy; after Seb. Ricci.

ZUCCHI, FRANCESCO, an Italian engraver, was the son and scholar of Andrea Z., born at Venice in 1698. He was invited to Dresden, where he engraved several plates from pictures in the Electoral Gallery, among which are the following. He died in 1764.

The Portrait of a Spaniard; after Rubens; in the Dresden Gallery. The Portrait of a Lady, resembling one of Rubens' wives; after the same; in the same collection. St. Helena worshipping the Cross; after Gio. Bettini Cignaroli. Two Allegorical Subjects; after Antonio Balestra.

ZUCCHI, LORENZO, was the younger brother of the preceding, born at Venice in 1704. He was instructed by his father, and in 1738 was appointed engraver to the Elector of Saxony, who employed him to execute several plates from pictures in the Electoral Gallery, for the collection known as the Dresden Gallery. The following are by him. He died about 1779.

The Seven Sacraments; after Spagnoletto. The Martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul; after Nic. del Abate. The Crowning of St. Catherine; after Rubens. A Sacrifice to Venus; after Ger. Laïresse. The Flaying of Marsyas; after Langelli. St. Michael combatting the Dragon; after Torelli. The Tribute-Money; after Titian. David with the Head of Goliath; after Luc. Giordano.

ZUCCHI, ANTONIO, an Italian fresco painter, who accompanied Robert Adam, the architect, to England. He was employed to decorate some of the mansions of the nobility, among others a ceiling at Buckingham House. His subjects were usually mythological, with ruins and other embelishments, which he painted in a light and pleasing manner, though without much force. He died at Rome in 1795.

ZUCCHI, JACOPO, called also DELLA ZUCCA, a painter born at Florence about 1541. He was a pupil of Giorgio Vasari, whom he assisted in some of his works. Lanzi says, "his works exhibit none of the carelessness of Giorgio. He sometimes imitated him, but his style is better and more refined. He lived long at Rome, under the protection of the Cardinal de Medici, whose palace, and more especially the Palazzo Rucellai, he decorated with frescos, with incredible diligence. His picture of the Birth of the Baptist, in S. Giovanni Decollato, is esteemed the best picture in the church; and he appears more a follower of Andrea del Sarto than of any other master. He usually introduced portraits of distinguished characters and men of letters into his compositions, and showed a peculiar grace in the figures of children and young people." There are several altar-pieces and other works by him in the churches at Rome, one of the best of which is the Descent of the Holy Ghost, in S. Spirito in Borgo. He died in the pontificate of Sixtus V. He had a brother named Francesco, who was a good artist in mosaic, according to Baglioni, and Lanzi says he likewise excelled in painting fruit and flowers.

ZUCCO, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Bergamo. According to Tassi, he first studied in the school of the Campi at Cremona, and afterwards under Pietro Moroni, the disciple of Paul Veronese. Lanzi says, "From Moroni he acquired the art of giving a singular degree of spirit to his portraits, and from Veronese the mode of ornamenting them with most taste and fancy. Even in his larger compositions, he sometimes adhered so closely to Paolo, that several of his works were ascribed, even by his fellow-citizens, to that artist, a circumstance that occurred to his pictures of the Nativity and of an Epiphany in the church of S. Gottardo at Bergamo. He adopted, moreover, a variety of manners, apparently ambitious of displaying to the public his power of imitating Cavagna or Talpino, as he pleased." He died in 1627.

ZUGNI, FRANCESCO, a painter born at Brescia, according to Ridolfi, in 1574, and died in 1636, aged 62; Zani says he was born in 1557, and died in 1621; and Lanzi places his death in 1621.—He studied under the younger Palma, and was his ablest disciple. Though inferior to him in beauty of forms and attitudes, he surpassed him in vigor and impasto of coloring, and in the spirit in which he conducted his works. He particularly excelled in fresco, and frequently embellished with his figures the architectural and perspective pieces of Tommaso Sandrini, with whom he was employed in the hall of the Podesta, in that of the Capitano, and in several villas. Zugni displayed great excellence in his oil paintings, one of the most esteemed of which is the Circumcision, in S. Maria delle Grazie, at Venice. He was also much employed by individuals.

ZUMMO, GAETANO GIULIO, a celebrated Sicilian modeler in colored wax, was born of a noble family, at Syracuse, in 1656. His name is often incorrectly spelt Zumbo. He early devoted himself to the study of sculpture, and combining with it a careful investigation of the anatomy of the human body, he produced some good works, and various anatomical preparations in colored wax, prepared after a method of his own. He acquired considerable reputation in various Italian cities—in Bologna, Genoa, and especially at Florence, where the grand duke Cosmo III. took him into his service. Among other works which he executed for that prince, are two most repulsive but ingenious performances, one representing the effects of the Plague; the other called "Corruption" (La Corruzione), consisting of a group of five figures, in high relief, showing different stages of decomposition in the human body after death. De Piles mentions two beautiful works by him at Genoa, representing the Nativity, and the Descent from the Cross. From Genoa, Zummo went to Paris, where he died in 1701.

ZUPELLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter of Cremona, who flourished about the close of the 15th century. He painted landscapes, usually embellished with figures representing subjects from sacred history. His style, though dry and gothic, exhibits much originality, and there is a graceful air in his figures, which distinguishes his works beyond the generality of his cotemporaries. In the church of the Eremitani, at Cremona, is a landscape with the Holy Family, by him, which is highly commended by Lanzi and others. Zani says he died in 1520, and others in 1536, aged 62. Lanzi says he flourished at the close of the 15th century.

ZURBARAN, FRANCISCO, an eminent Spanish painter, was born, according to Palomino, at Fuente de Cantos, near Seville, in 1596. His father was a husbandman, and intended him for the same employment; but he manifested such a strong inclination for painting, that he was placed in the school of Juan de las Roelas, under whose direction he applied himself with such diligence and success, that he soon acquired the reputation of an eminent painter of history. He determined to copy nature in everything, and followed the style of Michael Angelo Caravaggio, at the same time discarding the extravagance and caprice of that master, whose bold effects and vigorous light and shadow he adopted with such great ability, that he was called the Spanish Caravaggio. In 1625, he was commissioned by the Marquis of Malazon to paint some pictures for the chapel of St. Peter, in the cathedral of Seville, representing scenes from the life of that Apostle, which he executed in a very able manner; and about the same time he painted his famous picture of St. Thomas Aquinas for the altar of the church of the college of that saint at Seville. This is esteemed his best performance in respect of correct imitation of nature, and vigor of chiaro-scuro; and it is said to equal the best productions of the Spanish school. He afterwards went to Guadaloupe, and painted eleven pictures from the life of St. Jerome, for the Hieronymite Friars in that city, besides various altar-pieces, which were greatly admired. On returning to Seville, he executed three admirable works for the Carthusians of S. Maria de las Cuevas, evincing great skill and close observance of nature; also various other pictures in the churches and monasteries of that city, among which was a Crucifixion in the church of S. Pablo, remarkable for its boldness of relief, and dated in 1627.

Zurbaran's merit gained him an invitation to Madrid about 1630. He was appointed painter to the King, and employed in the palace of the Buon Retiro, where he painted a series of pictures representing the Labors of Hercules. It constitutes a high commendation of his abilities, that he was greatly favored by King Philip IV., (who is said to have frequently visited him while at work,) at the time when Velasquez was in his full career. Stirling places him in the first rank of the Spanish school, equal to Velasquez in coloring, though not in other respects; and that writer commends him as "the peculiar painter of monks, as Raffaele is of Madonnas and Ribera of martyrdoms." His picture of the History of San Pedro Nolasco, painted for the cloister of La Merced Calzada at Seville, was greatly admired, particularly for the infinite art and delicacy displayed in the white draperies of the monks. It would appear also that he excelled in the more agreeable departments of the art, for his picture of the Infant Jesus sleeping, in the gallery at Madrid, is said to equal in beauty and grace, the same subject by Guido and Murillo. Zurbaran died in the service of King Philip IV., in 1662. There are many of his works in the Casa de Campo, and other royal palaces, in the churches and monasteries of Seville, Cordova, Guadaloupe, and Madrid, besides many in the private collections. The best are said to be in the Museum at Seville. They are quite uncommon out of Spain; but Marshal Soult brought away some, and others have been removed more recently. In the Spanish Museum at the Louvre there is a room devoted chiefly to his works, and it contains, according to the catalogue, eighty-one pictures from his pencil; but many of them are very indifferent, and doubtless by some other artist. In the Duke of Sutherland's collection, is a picture by Zurbaran of the Virgin and Infant, with St. John, which is greatly admired. It is dated 1653.

ZUSTRUS, or SUSTRIS, LAMBERT, a German painter, who flourished towards the close of the 16th century. After receiving at Munich the instructions of Christopher Schwartz, he went to Venice, and became the scholar of Titian. He imitated successfully the style of that great master in coloring, and also in design, though not without some mixture of the Gothic style of his country. There was an excellent work by Zustrus in the cabinet of the King of France, representing the Baptism of Christ by St. John; and another is also mentioned in the Louvre, of Venus and Cupid, with Mars in the background. See Lambert Suterman.

 ZWOTT, or ZWOLL, J. ANCKER DE. This old German engraver flourished about 1500. His name is usually spelt Zwoll, in English works, but Bartsch calls him Zwott, and Zani expressly says that the other orthography is incorrect. His plates resemble the style of Israel von Mecheln, whence he is supposed to have been a pupil of that master, though very inferior to him, his compositions being crowded and confused, and his drawing of the figure meagre and incorrect. They are quite interesting from their age and rarity. Bartsch describes eighteen as follow. Zwott is called the Master of the Shuttle, from the circumstance of his prints being marked with a shuttle.

The Adoration of the Kings. The Last Supper. Christ at the Mount of Olives. Christ taken in the Garden. Christ crucified between two Thieves. The same subject differently treated. The Entombment of Christ. The Saviour standing, holding an open Book in one hand, and giving benediction with the other. The Virgin with the Infant holding a Cross. The Virgin with the Infant, who is turning the leaves of a Book. St. Augustine seated between Statues of SS. Jerome and Lawrence. St. Christopher on Horseback bearing the Saviour on his shoulders. St. George encountering the Dragon. St. Gregory celebrating Mass. St. Anne with the Virgin, Infant, and figures of Angels. A youth in conversation with an aged Pilgrim. A Skeleton in a vaulted Tomb. A design of Gothic Architecture, resembling the upper part of an Altar, with statues and coats of arms.

ZYL. GERARD PIETERSZ VAN, called also GERARD VAN LEYDEN, a Dutch painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1606. He acquired a knowledge of art in his native country, and seems to have attained there considerable excellence in portrait painting; after which he went to England, in 1635, and formed an intimacy with Vandyck, who employed him in his draperies and backgrounds. By this intercourse, Zyl greatly improved his own style, and after residing several years in London, he returned to Amsterdam, where he received plentiful encouragement. He painted many portraits, distinguished for their chaste and clear coloring, and the beauty of the hands, so that he acquired the appellation of the second Vandyck. There are also some conversations and familiar subjects attributed to him. He died in 1667.

ZYLVELT, ADAM VAN, a Dutch engraver, born at Amsterdam about 1635. He imitated the style of John Visscher with some success, and engraved a set of plates representing sea-ports, &c., from the designs of John Lingelbach; also various portraits, several of which are from his own designs. Among them are the following:

Dirk Volkhertz Coornhaert, or Cuernhaert, Engraver. Stephen le Moine, Doctor in Theology at Leyden. Christopher Wittichius, Professor of the University of Leyden. Hermann Witsius, Professor of Theology at Franeker. John Hasius, Minister of the church of Haerlem. Cornelius Bosch.

ZYNNDT, or ZUNDT, MATHIAS, an engraver of little note, who flourished about 1566, and executed a few plates, among which Bartsch mentions three: a View of the city of Grodno, in Lithnania, 1568; a portrait of John de Raleta, Grand Master of Malta, 1566; and a portrait of Louis III. de Bourbon-Conde, 1568.

PROSPECTUS
FOR PUBLISHING AN AMERICAN EDITION,
 OF
BOYDELL'S ILLUSTRATIONS OF SHAKSPEARE.
 (THE WHOLE WORK IS NOW COMPLETED.)

THE subscriber having, by a train of fortunate circumstances, become possessed of all the original one hundred copper-plates of Boydell's folio Illustrations of Shakspeare, and believing that he would render the public a service by restoring them to their original beauty, applied himself with diligence to effect this object. As a work of art, in design, in execution, in unlimited outlay of time and money, in the employment of the best talent in Great Britain, and in the patronage and cordial support of the king, nobility and gentry of England, Boydell's Illustrations of Shakspeare stands pre-eminent and wholly unrivalled.

After having finished a number of the plates, the most worn and difficult to be restored, and taken proofs from them, all the most distinguished artists, engravers, and connoisseurs, in the city of New York, were invited to examine and scrutinize the work, and to compare critically these proofs with the best copies in America, some of which were engraver's proofs before the letter. The result of this trial has been most satisfactory; and the subscriber has, upon their decision, and by the advice of his friends and the lovers of the Fine Arts, determined to push the work to its entire completion as rapidly as the necessity for accuracy and care will admit.

To those who may not be acquainted with this great work, the subscriber begs leave to say that it contains 100 plates, all of which are perfect studies, having from ten to twenty full length figures in the foreground, most of which are genuine portraits, in every variety of grouping and composition, and every human passion faithfully delineated, forming a series of the most original pictures ever executed. It is also believed that nothing can be done that will have so great a tendency to cultivate a taste for the fine arts, in our country, as a general circulation of these splendid prints, illustrating as they do the genius of the great poet, and emanating from the most distinguished British artists, as Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Benjamin West, Sir William Beechey, Fuseli, Romney, Northcote, Westall, Smirke, Opie, as painters; and Sharpe, Bartolozzi, Earlom, Thew, Simon, Middiman, Watson, Fytler, Wilson, and many others, as engravers. We have few public galleries of paintings, and must therefore mostly form our taste for this branch of the fine arts, from engravings; and these plates are fit to grace the drawing room or portfolio of any gentleman. Nothing, it is conceded, has a greater tendency to refine the mind, than the cultivation of the fine arts, and it certainly adds greatly to our pleasure. If the subscriber can be instrumental in assisting to cultivate the growing taste for the fine arts, he will not consider his undertaking fruitless, even though he should fail in reaping the pecuniary recompense, which he trusts a liberal public will feel willing to bestow upon a project of this nature, involving as it does a very heavy outlay of capital in the commencement, and much risk of loss in its prosecution.

The subscriber pledges himself to spare no efforts or expense in perfecting the work, and making it in every way worthy of its magnitude, and of the subjects illustrated. He proposes to publish the work in monthly parts of two or more plates each, at the unprecedented low price of one dollar per plate, to subscribers. Boydell's subscription price was two guineas ($10) per plate, for the first 300 proofs, and one guinea per plate for the prints; besides, many noblemen and others made handsome donations, in addition to their subscriptions, to encourage the work; and yet he failed for the enormous sum of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. During the lifetime of the Boydells it was never sold for less than one hundred guineas per set. Some of the proofs in former years have brought at public sales, fifteen guineas each in London, and twenty-five dollars in New York.

The work will be printed on thick linen paper, 24 by 30 inches, weighing 140 lbs. to the ream. Each print will be accompanied with a stereotype letter-press description of the same, with quotations from the text which it illustrates, printed on the best hot-pressed linen paper, of the same size as the print, with tissue paper between, which will add greatly to the beauty and interest of the work. In Boydell's editions, there is no description of the plates, nor tissue paper; and only a list of the plates at the end of the volumes. The work, when completed, will form two volumes of surpassing beauty, far superior to any of the old copies now in the country.

TERMS.

To subscribers, $1,00 per plate, including the two vignettes which embellish the title-page of each volume

CERTIFICATES.

"We, the undersigned, having examined some of the ORIGINAL copper-plates of 'BOYDELL'S ILLUSTRATIONS OF SHAKSPEARE,' and compared the proofs taken from them by Boydell himself, with those taken by Dr. S. SPOONER, within the last few weeks, from a number of the plates restored by him, give it as our deliberate opinion and judgment, that his efforts to restore this magnificent work, have, so far proved entirely successful, and we heartily recommend it to the American public as being in every respect worthy of their liberal patronage, and as eminently calculated, not only to gratify those who may become its possessors, but also, to encourage and promote the advancement of the Fine Arts in our country. New York, March 1848.

“A CURIOUS PIECE OF HISTORY.—About the year 1785, Alderman J. Boydell, of London, conceived the project of establishing a ‘Shakspeare Gallery,’ upon a scale of grandeur and magnificence which should be in accordance with the fame of the poet, and, at the same time, reflect honor upon the state of the arts in Great Britain and throughout the world. Mr. Boydell was at this time a man of great wealth and influence, and a patron of the fine arts, being an engraver himself, and having accumulated his fortune mostly by dealings in works of that character.

He advertised for designs from artists throughout Great Britain, and paid a guinea for every one submitted, whether accepted or not; and for every one accepted by the committee, a prize of one hundred guineas. The committee for selecting these designs was composed of five eminent artists, Boydell himself being the president. The first painters of the age were then employed to paint these pictures, among whom were Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir Benjamin West, Fuseli, Romney, Northcote, Smirke, Sir William Beechy and Opie.

Allan Cunningham, in his ‘Lives of Eminent British Artists,’ mentions that Sir Joshua Reynolds was at first opposed to Boydell’s project, as impracticable on such an immense scale, and Boydell, to gain his approbation and assistance, privately sent him a letter enclosing a £1000 Bank of England note, and requesting him to paint two pictures at his own price. What sum was paid by Boydell for these pictures was never known. A magnificent building was erected in Pall Mall to exhibit this immense collection, called the Shakspeare Gallery, and was for a long time the pride of London.

The first engravers of England were employed to transfer these gems to copper, and such artists as Sharp, Bartolozzi, Earlom, Thew, Simon, Middiman, Watson, Fytler, Wilson, and many others, exerted their talents for years in this great work. In some instances the labor of more than five years was expended on a single plate, and proof impressions were taken for subscribers at almost every stage of the work. At length in 1803, after nearly twenty years, the work was completed. The price fixed (which was never reduced) was two guineas each, for the first 300 impressions, and the subscription list was then filled up at one guinea each, or one hundred guineas a set, of one hundred plates.

Besides these subscriptions, large donations were made by many of the noblemen of England, to encourage the undertaking and to enable Boydell to meet his enormous outlay. The cost of the whole work, from the commencement, is said to have been more than one million pounds sterling; and although the projector was a wealthy man when he commenced it, he died soon after its completion, a bankrupt to the amount, it is said, of £250,000.

After these plates were issued, Boydell petitioned Parliament to allow him to dispose of his gallery of paintings by a lottery. The petition was granted, and the whole collection was thus disposed of. One of the finest of these pictures, King Lear, by Sir Benjamin West, is now in the Boston Athenæum.

One fact in relation to these plates gives great value to them. All the principal historical characters are genuine portraits of the persons represented in the play; every picture-gallery and old castle in England was ransacked to furnish these portraits.

By some means which cannot now be accounted for, all the plates have found their way to this country, and the one hundred, weighing nearly 4000 pounds, have been purchased by Dr. S. Spooner, of this city. This gentleman, who has long been conversant with works of art, has been for many months silently but steadily pushing on the work of restoring the plates, and has been peculiarly fortunate in securing the services of Mr. George Parker, an engraver of no ordinary merit. It is a little singular that this gentleman was a pupil of the celebrated “Thew,” when the latter was engaged on these same plates originally, and as Thew was considered almost the inventor of the art of stipple engraving, it will be seen that there is every reason to suppose Mr. Parker well qualified to do justice to the work. Dr. Spooner spares no pains or money in the prosecution of the labor, and has succeeded in restoring a number of the plates to such perfection that proofs from them cannot be distinguished from the original impressions. Some two years will be consumed in accomplishing the entire restoration and publication, and although he will be obliged to expend a large sum of money, there can be no doubt that he will be compensated by the admirers of the arts in the United States.”—Commercial Advertiser, Feb. 1, 1848.

The magnitude of the enterprise will at once be perceived on reflecting that there are one hundred plates in the series, originally having from four to six years labor of the engraver on each and every plate.—That Boydell was twenty years in publishing the work, and employed thirty-two master engravers and their subordinates most of that time. In restoring the plates, every line is recut, and the stippling, restippled, so that the restored plates are like new ones, and give as clear and distinct impressions. Ten engravers are now constantly employed on the work. Many hundreds of the most distinguished artists and citizens of New-York have examined the copper-plates, proofs, &c. and have declared the restoration entirely successful, and have recommended the work in the strongest terms as every way worthy of public confidence and support.
